BASILIDES of Pentapolis (3rd c.). Bishop of *Pentapolis, known as the addressee of a letter of *Dionysius of Alexandria (Ep. canonica ad Basilidem episcopum) on the length of *Lent and on the appropriate comportment for approaching the *Eucharist.

CPG 1569; PG 10, 1271-1290; J.B. Pitra, Iuris ecclesiastici graecorum historia et monumenta, I, Rome 1864, 541-545; P.P. Joannou, Fonti. Fascicolo IX. Discipline générale antique (IIe-IXe s.), II: Les canons des Pères grecs, Grottaferrata (Rome) 1963, 4-14.

P. Marone

BASILISCUS. Emperor of the eastern Roman Empire (January 475–August 476), consul in 465 and 476, as magister militum moved against the *Goths from *Thrace, perhaps at the request of his sister Verina, wife of the emperor *Leo I (457–474); in 468 was supreme commander of a large expedition, organized by Leo I with the Western empire, against the *Vandals. Given Basiliscus's ineptitude, large-scale corruption and treacherous plots, the military campaign ended with the annihilation of the *Byzantine fleet by the Vandals. Basiliscus did save himself, and by Verina's intercession obtained a pardon from the emperor. A conspiracy with generals Illus and Theodoric Strabo led to *Zeno's fall (474/475) and put Basiliscus on the throne; he crowned his wife Zenonis queen, and his son Mark caesar. He ruled only twenty months: the usurper thought to consolidate his power by attacking the resolutions of the Council of *Chalcedon and allowing *Timothy Aelurus to return from exile; the latter was received with honor at *Constantinople by the emperor, but not by the Patriarch Acacius. Timothy requested of Basiliscus the encyclical (enkyklion) in which only the councils of *Nicaea, Constantinople I and *Ephesus were recognized as valid, with Pope Leo's Tomus and the definition of Chalcedon explicitly rejected. Patriarch Acacius reacted immediately, stirring up clergy, monks and people, thus forcing Basiliscus to promulgate an antiencyclical by which he revoked the earlier encyclical—the last act of his theological adventures. In the meantime a fire destroyed much of the city; clergy, artisans and merchants were instigated to revolt against the emperor because of his tax policies; Verina became upset over the removal of her lover Patricius. General opinion thus moved against Basiliscus, and Zeno, who had been imprisoned by Trocondus and Illus in a mountain fortress, was able with the connivance of his guard to return to Constantinople. Basiliscus entrusted himself to the church's protection but was handed over by the patriarch and transferred to *Cappadocia with his wife and son, where he died of hunger in prison.

PWK, 3, 101ff.; I.E. Caraghiannopoulos, Historia Byzantinous kratous, Thessaloníki 1978, 300-304; E. Dovere, *L'*Enkyklion Basiliskon. Un caso di normativa imperiale in Oriente su temi di dogmatica teologica: SDHI 51 (1985) 153-188; A. Grillmeier, Gesù il Cristo nella fede della Chiesa, Brescia 1996, 329-343.

J. Irmscher - C. Dell'Osso

BASSIANUS of Ephesus (mid-5th c.). A priest of *Ephesus, Bassanius had a ptocheion with 70 beds built for the poor and sick; he was proud of this work and became popular because of his charitable works. Out of envy his bishop, Memnon, with force and even blows, ordained him bishop of Euaza ca. 431 (Mansi 7, 273ff.), but he refused to go. Memnon was succeeded by Basil, who allowed Bassianus to remain in the city, and on Basil's death the people elected him as their bishop, the choice being accepted by the emperor *Theodosius II. In 448 a rival group elected *Stephen. The 11th and 12th sessions of the Council of *Chalcedon dealt with the contest between Bassianus and Stephen, deciding that neither were fit to govern the Ephesian church and requiring them to resign with a substantial pension, to be paid by the church of Ephesus.

Mansi 7, 273-300; DHGE 6, 1274-1275; DCB 1, 298-299; D.J. Constantelos, Byzantine Philanthropy and Social Welfare, New Brunswick, NJ 1968.

L. Navarra

BASSIANUS of Lodi (d. 409). Bishop of Lodi (Laus Pompeia) from ca. 373 to 409; an anti-*Arian, he participated at the Council of *Aquileia in 381 (he was one of the bishops who condemned the Arian *Palladius), and in 393 at the provincial Council of *Milan that accepted the condemnation of *Jovinian by Pope *Siricius. Mentioned as a friend of *Ambrose (in Ep. 4 and in *Paulinus, Vita Ambr. 47), Bassanius had a church built in honor of the *apostles (basilica apostolorum) outside the city walls on the road to *Rome; it was consecrated by Ambrose ca. 387 (PL 16, 889). Patron of the diocese of Lodi, his identification (by Savio) with *Pacian, who took part in the Roman synod of 372, has been rejected by Lanzoni (Le diocesi d'Italia, II, Faenza 1927, 994).

F. Savio, Gli antichi vescovi d'Italia. La Lombardia II, Bergamo 1932, 156-161; G. Baroni, S. B. nella storia religiosa e civile, nell'arte, nelle lettere e nella legislazione, Lodi 1938; var. aus., San Bassiano vescovo di Lodi. Studi nel XVI centenario della ordinazione episcopale 374-1974, Lodi 1974; Diocesi di Lodi, eds. A. Caprioli et al., Brescia 1989, passim; PCBE 2,269–2,270.

L. Navarra

BAUDONIVIA (late 6th–early 7th c.). Nun of the Monastery of the Holy Cross, *Poitiers, ordered by the abbess Dedimia to write an enlargement of *Venantius Fortunatus's Vita S. Radegundis—not to repeat him, but to add ea quae prolixitate praetermisit. Baudonivia admits her lack of literary skill and uses barbarisms common in Merovingian Latin but rises above the common run of *hagiographers. Venantius's Life then became known as the first book, and Baudonivia's prologue and 28 chapters the second book of St. *Radegund's biography. Her text presupposes that of Venantius and develops as an autonomous narrative with references to significant episodes. The association of Radegund and St. *Helena with respect to the acquisition of the wood of the cross is unique and has the purpose of elevating the importance of the *monastery (thus Baudonivia's Life has been understood as a "Klostervita," a biography to be used in convents). In any event Radegund is a perfect nun with regal qualities that she maintains even within the convent, something not mentioned by Fortunatus.

CPL 1053; PL 72, 663; DHGE 6, 1357-1360; C. Leonardi, Fortunato e Baudonivia, in Aus Kirche und Reich. Studien zu Theologie, Politik und Recht im Mittelalter. Festschrift F. Kempf, Sigmaringen 1983, 23-32; R. Aigrain, Sainte Radegonde, Poitiers 1987; V. Labande-Mailfert, Vie de sainte Radegonde pour la moniale Baudonivie. Traduction: Lettre de Ligugé 239 (1987) 9-32; F.E. Consolino, Due agiografi per una regina: Radegonda di Turingia tra Fortunato e Baudonivia: Studi Storici 29 (1988) 143-159; J. Leclercq, La sainte Radegonde de Venance Fortunat et celle de Baudonivie, in Fructus centesimus. Mélanges offert à G.J.M. Bartelink, Steenbrugge 1989, 207-216; C. Leonardi, Baudonivia la biografa, in Medioevo al femminile, ed. F. Bettini, Rome-Bari 1989, 31-40; E.G. Whatley, An Early Literary Quotation from the "Inventio S. Crucis": A Note on Baudonivia's "Vita S. Radegundis," (BHL 7049): AB 111 (1993) 81-91.

L. Navarra

BEATITUDE

I. Greek Fathers - II. Latin Fathers - III. Augustine.

When beatitude, or happiness, is spoken of in patristic literature and *spirituality, it usually refers in a fairly general way to the joyful state that results from contact or union with the supeme Good: an intellectual, volitional, loving and *mystical possession, fully attained only at the resurrection. From this it follows that happiness in this life—the fruit of *contemplation, possession, love or mystical union with God—is always an imperfect anticipation-participation of what we hope for. The *Platonic ideal of happiness, consisting of unity with the One—accessible only to a minority through an ascending process of gradual intellectual interiorization (the realm of union with the supreme Good)—is corrected by the conception of the Christian fathers: all people and the whole human being, with all its powers, can attain full and final happiness in the enjoyment and "pleasure of the truth," which is God (Aug. Conf. 10, 20-23: NBA 1, 324-330). One thus understands why, for beatitude or happiness, the Greek fathers chose the term markariotēs (rejecting eutychia or eudaimonia) and the Latin fathers similarly beatitudo rather than felicitas.

I. Greek Fathers. In Greco-Christian authors the theme of happiness is continually mingled with eschatological ideas, and their main emphasis is on the happiness promised at the end, in the world to come. We will cite here only those authors offering thematic continuity on this problem. *Hermas, in his inspired and lyrical language, says that "all will be equal for the elect . . . ; the promises made to them" will be fulfilled "with great glory and delight" (Shep. Vis. I,3,4: SC 53,86). *Ignatius of Antioch knows that martyrdom will allow him to "reach God" (Theou epitychein: Rom. 4,1: PG 5, 690); he thus implores the faithful of *Rome not to hinder his death, by which he will obtain the contemplation and enjoyment of the "blessed light": katharon phōs (Rom. 6,2: PG 5, 692). *Theophilus of Antioch assures Autolycus that these, having laid aside the corruption of the body, will attain the joyful vision of God, according to the merits acquired in life (Ad Autol. 1,7: PG 6, 1036). For *Irenaeus of Lyons, "Those who see God are in God and . . . are made partakers of life. . . . And this participation consists . . . in the enjoyment of his goodness" (Adv. haer. 4,20: PG 7, 1032). As for the *Alexandrians, *Clement relates Christian beatitude to baptismal enlightenment, thanks to which "one perceives" (epopteuetai) the holy and saving light that brings one into the blessed, face-to-face vision of God (Paedag. 1,6: PG 8, 280 and 292). For *Origen perfect happiness, conceived in intellectual and mystical terms, is reached in eternal life (De prin. 2,11: SC 252, 394-412), when the just will understand the meaning of things; when fully perfect, as pure intelligences, they will directly contemplate rational essences. In this state of absolute stability and fullness of happiness—their appetites satisfied—human wills remain unalterable, attracted by the knowledge and contemplation of divinity, just as with the Son (Comm. in Rom 5,10: PG 14, 1048-1056; Comm. in Ev. Joh. 1,16: PG 14, 49-51).

As for the *Cappadocians, *Basil likens the peace and joy of the elect in the contemplation of God to the moments of *ecstasy that his presence already produces in this life (Hom. in Ps. 14,1: PG 29, 250-253; Hom. in Ps. 32,1: PG 29, 324-325; Hom. in Ps. 33,11: PG 29, 376-377). Thus Basil, like other Fathers, without denying the predominantly eschatological interpretation of happiness or beatitude, insists on the possibility for good Christians of receiving an "unceasing joy" and an "uninterrupted gladness" already in this life. The basis of this spiritual—though still earthly—joy is *hope, as we read later: "In another passage Paul urges us . . . to rejoice in hope. It is hope, therefore, that makes joy the inseparable companion of the fervent man" (Hom. de grat. act. 1-3: PG 31, 217-225). For *Gregory of Nyssa one tastes perfect happiness in the next life. Nevertheless, given the distance between the infinity of the beatifying object (God) and human limitation, it is impossible that human beings will ever arrive at full contemplation and possession; eternity will be an infinite process of drawing near to the fullness of contemplation-possession-union-beatitude (De anim. et res.: PG 46, 155). This theory allows for various interpretations: for some the person is completely happy in the various stages of this drawing near; for others this happiness bears an essential existential anguish because the person, conscious of being limited, will never reach the desired goal. *Gregory of Nazianzus is more confident of full eternal enjoyment: "Every good soul . . . , freed of the body, arrives immediately at enjoyment . . . of the good he awaits. . . . He enjoys a wonderful joy and exults . . . , advancing happily toward his Lord and enjoys the glory that he already contemplates" (Laud. fun. pro Caes. fr. 21: PG 35, 781-784).

In any event perfect happiness consists in the vision of God, even if the blessed, according to *John Chrysostom, will not be able to comprehend the divine essence (De beato Philog. 6,1: PG 48, 749; In Ioh. hom. 15,1ff.: PG 59, 97). Since the union of the elect with the Lord is indissoluble, adds *Cyril of Alexandria (Comm. in Mt. 4: PG 72, 372-373), our intelligence will be filled with an ineffable light, and earthly knowledge will yield to a "clearer knowledge" that corresponds to the contemplation of the divine nature (Comm. in Ioh. ev. XI, 16,25: PG 74, 461-464); this "perfect knowledge of God" will fill us with happiness (Comm. in Ioh. ev. IX, 14,4: PG 74, 185-188).

II. Latin fathers. The Latin fathers present a more descriptive vision of the perfect happiness of the blessed, proportionate to each one's merits (see, e.g., Hilary of Poitiers, Tract. in Ps. 64,5: PL 9, 415-416; Ambrose Ep. VII, 11: PL 16, 946; Exp. ev. Luc., prol.: PL 15, 1610-1611; ibid., IV, 37: PL 15, 1707; ibid., V, 61: PL 15, 1738). In *Ambrose, moreover, we find the statement that total possession of eternal light, immortal glory and happiness is reached only by a gradual process (Exp. ev. Luc. V, 61: PL 15, 17). For some Latin fathers, beyond essential beatitude there is an accidental beatitude, which consists for *Cyprian of raising and strengthening oneself with bonds of friendship and family relations (De mort. 26: PL 4, 624); *Augustine shares this opinion (Civ. Dei XXII, 29: PL 49, 797). For *Boethius beatitude is the state in which the person reaches perfection: status omnium bonorum aggregatione perfectus (De cons. phil. III, 2: PL 63, 724). *Gregory the Great, finally, discerns an inequality in eternal beatitude, in that the object known is the same for everyone, but the more- or less-perfect knowledge of that object will differ among the blessed (Hom. in ev. 19: PL 76, 1155-1157).

III. Augustine. Anticipating a systematic relation between Scripture and the ancient philosophers, on the one hand, and theologians (who would later work out a coherent doctrine on this theme), on the other, Augustine in the study of happiness reached a greater philosophical density and degree of maturity. In his vast literary output he fully and clearly expounds the foundation and starting point of happiness, the concept of happiness, the conditions of happiness as a state, the true object in which it consists, the beatifying act, false happiness, the way to reach happiness, earthly happiness and perfect beatitude (DTC I, 505). Overcoming the *Stoic ethic's "soteriology of perfect knowledge," centered on self-possession and self-enjoyment, the main theme Augustine develops in his early De beata vita (PL 32, 958-976) is that the happy life consists in the perfect knowledge of God (Retract. I, 2: NBA 2, 12). Happiness does not consist, therefore, in the possession or enjoyment of a created good, but only in the possession or enjoyment of the absolute and perfect Good. The happy life on earth is possible only in hope, and its complete attainment even on this earth points to the other life. The relationship between wisdom, truth and measure leads Augustine back to the very source of perfect happiness: "The blessed life consists in knowing by whom you are led to the truth, by what truth you are made happy and by what principle you are united to the Perfect Measure" (De beata vita 4,35: CCL 29, 84). Consequently, the attainment of happiness is centered on the knowledge of the truth in the interiority of soul, knowledge that is at the same time possession and enjoyment of God (Conf. 10,22: NBA 1, 328). "He is happy who possesses God" (De beata vita 2,11: CCL 29, 72). Elsewhere (e.g., De lib. arb. II, 13,35: CCL 29, 261) Augustine insists on the fact that the wisdom that gives us happiness consists in an amplecti frui delectari of God himself, infinite truth and object of our happiness (En. in ps. 4,3: NBA 25, 36; Conf. 13,8: NBA 1, 456-458). In fact our supreme good is God, immutable Goodness. Thus our moral perfection, and our happiness will consist in knowing and loving this summum bonum, who makes us blessed (Tract. in Ioh. 26,5: NBA 24/1, 600; Trin. 8, 4-8: NBA 4, 336-356), and which is the happiness of the angels and human beings in heaven, their true home (Civ. Dei 9,15: NBA 5/1, 650-654; 10, 1-3: NBA 5/1, 680-690; 12, 1: NBA 5/2, 146-150). The first joy of the city of God will be to praise the Creator: "He will be the goal of our desires, who will be seen without end, loved without boredom and praised without growing tired. This gift, this effect, this activity will be, like eternal life, common to all" (Civ. Dei XXII, 30,1: NBA 5/3, 414). For the elect, eternal life is like a sabbath without evening, an eternal rest not just for the spirit but also for the body. "There we shall rest and see; see and love; love and praise. This is the essence of the end that never ends" (Civ. Dei XXII, 30,5: NBA 5/3, 420), our final and complete happiness.

F. Worter, Die Geistesentwicklung des hl. A. Augustinus bis zu seiner Taufe (Der Dialog De beata vita), Paderborn 1892, 103-118; P. Alfaric, L'évolution intellectuelle de Saint Augustin, Paris 1918, 66-69, 429-431; Ch. Boyer, Christianisme et néo-platonisme dans la formation de S. Augustin, Paris 1920; R. Jolivet, Oeuvres de S. Augustin. IV. Dialogues philosophiques . . . , Paris 1939; H.U. von Balthasar, Présence et pensée. Essai sur la philosophie religieuse de Grégoire de Nysse, Paris 1942; J. Daniélou, Platonisme et théologie mystique. Essai sur la doctrine spirituelle de Saint Grégoire de Nysse, Paris 1944; J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, London 1977, 459-489 (Fr. tr. Paris 1968; It. tr. Bologna 1972); Gran Enciclopedia Rialp (GER) 9, 815-817; R. Holte, Béatitude et sagesse, Paris 1962; DTC 1, 504-508; DSp 1, 1297-1298 (J. De Blic); EC 5, 1381-1386 (Fine ultimo: C. Fabro); EC 12, 1485-1493 (Visione beatifica: A. Piolanti); A. Heilmann - H. Kraft, La teologia dei Padri, It. ed. G. Mura (ed.), tr. by G. Corti and M. Spinelli, I, Rome 1974, 244-258; III, Rome 1975, 182-188; IV, Rome 1975, 323-338; V, Rome 1976, 438; LTK 4, 757-761 (Glück, Glückseligkeit: G. Bien, G. Greshake, G.W. Hunold, Th. Laubach, [3]1995); LTK 9, 437-442 (Seligkeit: W. Beinert, L. Scheffczyk, J. Sudbrack, 2003).

S. Folgado Flórez - M. Spinelli

BEATITUDES. Earthly life is an ascent toward the blessedness of the kingdom of heaven. All people aspire to happiness, and God promises unending happiness to all. The beatitudes announced by Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount proclaim happiness above all for the *poor, the afflicted, the persecuted (Mt 5:3-12; Lk 6:20-26). To believers of the first Christian communities, the beatitudes were a sign of recognition of the Messiah, who had come to inaugurate the time of joy for the disinherited and to manifest in his human heart the tenderness of the heart of God. Thus *Origen: "All the beatitudes he announced in the gospel, Jesus confirms by his example, and he proves his teaching by his witness. He says: Blessed are the meek, and he adds something personal to this: learn of me, who am meek (Mt 11:29). Blessed are the peacemakers: and who is peaceable like my Lord Jesus, who is our peace, who has done away with hatred, destroying it in his flesh? (Eph 2:14-16). Blessed are those who are persecuted for justice; no one has undergone persecution for justice like the Lord Jesus" (In Lc. 38).

The theophanic announcement becomes ethical. The person is invited to choose true blessedness: "All people in fact seek happiness, but most do not know how to reach it" (Aug., In Ps. 118,1,1). The beatitudes become the heart of Christian anthropology: the person who lives them discovers the secret of joy and simultaneously proclaims that Jesus is God. The rarity of their presence in the first Christian writings is a sign that their proclamation has its own vitality and clarity. The message of each of the beatitudes is directed to their overall meaning. For the Didache, "Blessed are the meek" sums up all the beatitudes and all the virtues (3,7-9). *Polycarp of Smyrna, by joining the first and last beatitudes, means to recommend them all: "Blessed are the poor and those persecuted for justice" (Phil. 2,3).

The Sermon on the Mount responds to humanity's widespread aspiration to *justice, called by the philosophers "the most sublime of the *virtues" (Cic., Nat. deor. 12,4). Christians consider it a divine gift, to be realized in earthly life with one's gaze fixed on "eternal justice." *Gregory of Nyssa, recalling the classical definition of justice as the art of "giving to each his due," exclaims: "Considering the loftiness of the divine legislation, I believe that in this justice one must understand something greater. . . . It seems to me that the Lord, in the discourse on virtue and on justice, would present himself to the desire of his listeners" (Beat. IV, PG 1236 A–1245 C). The beatitudes indicate "the perfect Christian lifestyle" (Aug., Serm. in monte 1,1,1). Their literal and spiritual meanings are woven together to make up the total meaning. The words "blessed are the poor" and "blessed are the hungry" in Luke seem at first to be a literal invitation to poverty and fasting (Tertull., Marc. IV 14,9-13; Ieiun. 15,6; cf. Ap. Petri [fr. Akhmim] 1-3; Ep. Ap. 38-40; Ev. Th. 68-69; Act. Th. 94; Nov., Cib. VI 3). The words "blessed are the poor in spirit" and "blessed are those who hunger for justice" of Matthew are echoed by *Clement of Alexandria and Origen, who in turn inspire all of the Fathers: if Christ is in fact poor, the poor who receive from him the riches of God already live in "poverty of spirit" (Clem. Al., Ecl. 11,2-14,4; Quis div. 17,4; Strom. IV 25, 1-4 and V 70,1; Paed. I 101,1-2; Protr. X 99,4; Orig., Comm. Mt. 5,10, Caten. 89; In Lc. 33; In Jo. XXXII 11,127; Princ. II 11,2-3; In Gen. 10,3; In Ex. 11,2).

Human beings have the right to food and justice. Jesus is present in the poor: "When a poor person is hungry, it is Christ who hungers." In every poor person "there are two people who hunger: one hungers for bread, the other for justice" (Aug., In Jo. 8,9). The poor are blessed if they hunger for virtue, otherwise they remain "without God, and moreover without human riches, incapable of tasting the justice of God" (Clem. Al., Quis div. 17,4; cf. Greg. Nys., Beat. IV, PG 44, 1236). The poor not only should expect material and spiritual bread from the community but should also possess a treasure that they can bestow on others—they also enact justice by "distributing what is due" (Greg. Nys., Beat. IV, PG 44, 1233 D). If God prefers the poor, it is because he trusts that they, more easily than the well-to-do, feel hunger for his word that calls to soldarity: "One who is hungry suffers with others who are hungry; he gives, and so becomes just" (Ambr., In Lc. 5,65). Jesus, who is "living justice," invites all to "feed on justice" (Orig., In Jo. XXXII 11,127; Aug., In Jo. 13,5). Mary, Martha's sister, becomes the exemplar of the person who hungers for Christ: ipsum manducabat quem audiebat (Aug., Serm. 179,5). For Augustine: "God is everything for you. If you are hungry he is your bread, if you are thirsty he is your water" (Aug., In Jo. 13,5).

Life is an ascent on the "ladder" that leads to happiness. The one who follows the seven steps of the beatitudes encounters the *Holy Spirit with his seven gifts, who raises him to the summit of perfection (Aug., Serm. in monte I, 3,10). This is the itinerary of the beatitudes: the one who lives in poverty is blessed if he weeps for his sins, his heart is docile, he hungers and thirsts for justice, is merciful, prepares to see God with a pure heart, is a peacemaker; upon reaching the highest step, he will certainly encounter persecution for justice: "There are seven beatitudes that lead to perfection: the eighth illumines and manifests the perfection attained" (ibid. I, 4,12). The "palm of the beatitudes" is martyrdom, and to pour out one's blood for the gospel is the highest form of evangelization: "To give one's life means to proclaim the resurrection of the flesh for eternity" (Ambr., In Lc. 5,59; cf. Aug., Civ. Dei 22,9). There is also a daily martyrdom: to live the beatitudes is a "witness" of faith and charity through which many Christians "are already martyrs in the secret of their conscience, ready to pour out their blood for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Orig., Hom. Num. X, 2).

"True happiness is to be persecuted for the Lord" (Greg. Nys., Beat. VIII, PG 44, 1293 C). The person that "offers love for enmity, benevolence for hatred, good wishes for curses, help to the persecuted" will always live "in the furnace of tribulations" (Ambr., In Lc. 5,73); if he suffers because of members of his community who should love but rather mistreat him, God himself "sweetens the sufferings" in him, transforming them into "beatitude" (Aug., In Ps. 93,27). The eighth beatitude is a hymn to joy in the time of suffering: the martyr Stephen "rejoices, struck everywhere by the stones and eagerly accepting in his body, like a sweet dew, the snowfall of stones, one after the other, repaying his murderers with blessings" (Greg. Nys., Beat. VIII, PG 44, 1296 B).

D. Buzy, Béatitudes: DSp 1, 1298-1310; F. Hauck - G. Bertram, μακάριος, μακαρίζω, μακαρισμός: TWNT 4, 365-373; H. Cazelles - G. Bardy - G. Rabeau, Béatitude: Cath 1, 1342-1355; R. Holte, Béatitudes et sagesse. Saint Augustin et le problème de la fin de l'homme dans la philosophie ancienne, Fr. tr. Paris 1962 (Stockholm 1958); J. Dupont, Les Béatitudes, I-II, Paris [2]1969; III, Paris [2]1973; A. Becker, L'appel des béatitudes. A l'écoute de Saint Augustin, Paris - Fribourg 1977; P. Meloni, "Beati gli affamati e assetati di giustizia". L'interpretazione patristica: Sandalion 2 (1979) 143-219; Id., "Beati i perseguitati per la giustizia." L'interpretazione patristica: Sandalion 3 (1980) 191-250; M. Spinelli, Le Beatitudini nel commento dei Padri Latini, Rome 1983; Y. de Andia, La beatitudine dei miti (Mt V,5) nell'interpretazione di S. Ireneo, IX Conferenza di Studi Patristici, Oxford 1983, 275-286; P. Meloni, Le Beatitudini nei Padri della Chiesa: Parola, Spirito and Vita 21 (1990) 221-240; Id., Le Beatitudini nei Padri della Chiesa: Dizionario di spiritualità biblico-patristica 7 (1994) 258-284.

P. Meloni

BEATUS of Liébana (8th c.). monk of the Asturias. His late anonymous biography (PL 96, 887-894) is unreliable; the information of Elipandus (PL 96, 859-882) and Alcuin (PL 101, 33-303) is quite vague. The partial facts of his life are based on conjecture. He probably entered the Monastery of St. Martin of Liébana (Valcovado, St. Turibius of L.) during the reign of Florius I and Mauregatus (756–768). His writings all pertained to his intervention in the *adoptionist controversy against Elipandus. Two survive: The Apologeticum, or Adv. Elipandum 1. II, and the Commentary on the Apocalypse. The first is a letter in response to a first attack of Elipandus (PL 96, 918-919), which was in turn provoked by another lost writing of Beatus (PL 96, 918 C). Beatus and his disciple Aetherius wrote the Commentary on the Apocalypse (PL 96, 894-1030) in 785/786, which is the best-known and most important work for the history of *exegesis in the Latin world. Its 12 books, preceded by an ample praefatio, contain the commentaries of *Victorinus (*Jerome), *Tyconius and *Apringius, supplemented in turn by continual cross-references to Jerome, *Augustine, *Ambrose, *Fulgentius, *Gregory the Great, *Gregory of Elvira, *Irenaeus, *Isidore and *Bachiarius. From Beatus's Commentary it is possible to recover lost texts (of Tyconius) and complete the authors used by Beatus; it also sheds light on the obscurity of 8th-c. *Spain.

CPL 710, 1752a, 1753: Adv. Elipandum, ed. P. Stevartio, Ingolstadii Typ. Ederiana 1616; PL 96, 895-1030 (ed. Galland); Testo e fonti del Contra Elipando, ed. S. Orfeo, Rome 1966 (diss., Univ. Rome); Beati in Apocalypsin, ed. H.A. Sanders, Rome 1930 (repr. Madrid 1975); M. Alamo, Los Comentarios de Beato al Apocalipsis y Elipando (Misc. Mercati): ST 122 (1946) 16-33; R. Abadal i V., La batalla del Adopcionismo en la desintegración de la Iglesia visigoda, Barcelona 1948; I.M. Gómez, El perdido comentario de Ticonio al Apocalipsis (Misc. Ubach), Montserrat 1953, 387-411; A. Pincherle, Sant'Ambrogio in Beato di Liébana: RSLR 1 (1965) 99-107; O.K. Werckmeister, Pain and Death in the Beatus of Saint Sever: SM 14 (1973) 565-626; A. Pincherle, Note sulla tradizione indiretta della "Expositio evang. sec. Lucam" di S. Ambrogio, Forma futuri (Misc. Pellegrino), Turin 1975, 1097-1110; Id., Tre notarelle, Paradoxos Politeia (Misc. Lazzati), Milan 1979, 500-506; M. Mentré, La miniatura en León y Castilla en la Alta Edad Media, León 1976; Actas del Simposio para el estudio de los códices del "Comentario al Apocalipsis" de Beato de Liébana, Madrid 1978 (cf. J. Fontaine, REAug 23 [1977] 413-421); M.D. Verdejo Sánchez, Comienzos de la disputa adopcionista: Bracara Augusta 33 (1979) 207-213; V. García Lobo, El Beato de S. Miguel de la Escalada: Archivos Leoneses 33 (1979) 205-270; E. Romero Pose, Gregorio de Elvira en el Comentario al Apocalipsis de S. Beato de Liébana: Burgense 20 (1979) 289-305; Id., Una nueva edición del Comentario al Apocalipsis de S. Beato de Liébana: Accad. N. dei Lincei, Boll. dei Class. 1 (1980) 221-231; J.F. Rivera R., El adopcionismo español (s. VIII), Toledo 1980; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura española, Madrid 1997, V, 1-191.

E. Romero Pose

BEDE the Venerable (d. 735). Born in 672/673 in Northumbria, at age 7 Bede was entrusted by his parents to the Benedictine monks of Sts. Peter and Paul at Jarrow, where his main teachers were St. *Benedict Biscop (d. 690) and St. Coelfrid (d. 716). He received an excellent classical and religious education, facilitated by the seriousness of the convent library. Ordained deacon at 19 and priest at 30 (according to the canonical norms of the time), Bede remained his whole life a man of study and prayer, faithfully observing the Rule and the local cloistral statutes. Devoted to the Fathers of the church, esp. St. *Augustine and St. *Isidore, he prepared a *florilegium of patristic texts, intended as an aid in the interpretation of Scripture. To the same end he applied himself to Latin and Greek, while his rather elementary notions of Hebrew were partly taken from works of St. *Jerome (d. 420). He also knew classical literature and the *Latin Christian poets. His conception of history displays a didactic and theological purpose: in spirit Bede was an *Augustinian. For him, history is a contrast between the transitoriness of human affairs and the unmoving eternity of the heavenly homeland, between finite time and eternity. In this way the learned monk of Jarrow is a link between Augustinian historiography and the Chronica sive historia de duabus civitatibus of Otto of Freising (d. ca. 1070; ed. A. Hofmeister, MGH, Ss. rer. germ., 44, 1912). In inserting various documents, episcopal lists and doctrinal controversies into his grandiose Historia ecclesiastica gentis Anglorum, Bede follows the model of *Eusebius of Caesarea, for whom the motive force of history was *providence. Unlike Eusebius, however, Bede did not turn history into *apologetic, or, like other medieval writers, into *hagiography.

Bede is a fair representative of Early Medieval Latin monastic culture, perhaps the most learned precursor of the Carolingian renaissance. In 55 years of monastic life he never left his monastery except for a few literary journeys. Semper aut discere, aut docere, aut scribere dulce habui (learning, teaching or writing has always been my delight—Hist. eccl. gentis Anglorum V, 24): this autobiographical aside emphasizes his zeal and perseverance. A certain lack of originality and theological imprecision prevent him from being numbered among the great theologians of the Latin church. A monastic mentality shaped by the *liturgy, and *prayers included in his works, give him great significance for the English church. Bede died at Jarrow 25 May 735; his body was transferred to the cathedral of Durham between 1020/1030. The fame of his learning and holiness made him, with Alcuin and the school of *York, one of the pedagogues of medieval civilization. The Council of Aquisgrana (836) proclaimed him doctor admirabilis (MGH, Conc. II, 759), and Leo XIII gave him the title "Doctor of the Church" in 1899.

His literary activity is attested by the variety of subjects he dealt with, though much of his output is lost. His interests were almost encyclopedic: sciences of the trivium and the quadrivium, biblical *exegesis, dogmatic theology, morals, history. The best description and analysis of his works is by I. Cecchetti (BS 2, 1006-1074). In exegesis, his various commentaries and homilies show his use of the methodology of the traditional meanings (literal, moral, *allegorical), without suggesting any particular attraction to one or other of these interpretations; his was thus a monastic and wisdom theology. Bede was a man of the Bible: omnem meditandis Scripturis operam dedi, he claims in the autobiographical note that introduces an incomplete list of his works (Historia eccl. gentis Anglorum, loc. cit.). In these treatises we find the essence of the Fathers—*Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, *Gregory the Great—but he is no repetitive compiler, rather elaborating with critical sense a personal reading of the sacred and theological texts. Philological annotations are not lacking: for the 8th c., Bede was a textual critic, esp. in his suggestive comparison of the various biblical recensions. He commented on nearly all the biblical books, or at least their most important passages. A number of works attributed to him are apocryphal: the list, with related manuscript tradition, is given by Fr. Stegmüller, Repertorium biblicum Medii Aevi, II, Madrid 1950, nos. 1598-1646, 1 (for ps.-Bede, nos. 1647-1688).

The following works are certainly authentic: Super Acta Apostolorum expositio (after 709): PL 92, 937-997; Libellus retractationis in Actus Apostolorum (between 715–725): PL 92, 995-1032; De nominibus locorum quae leguntur in libro Actus Apostolorum: PL 92, 1033-1040; PL 23, 1297-1306 (among the works of St. Jerome); De locis sanctis: PL 94, 1170-1190. Bede rewrote the homonymous essay by the monk *Adamnan (d. 704); the work was very famous in the Middle Ages. CCL has produced a critical edition of other authentic exegetical works: In Genesim (118 A, ed. Ch.W. Jones), In primam partem Samuhelis libri IIII (119, D. Hurst), In Regum librum XXX quaestiones (119, D. Hurst). In vol. 119 A, D. Hurst has given us De tabernaculo, De templo, In Ezram et Neemiam; in vol. 120, In Lucae evangelium expositio, In Marci evangelium expositio. Other works can be read in PL 90-94. Two books of homilies are now in CCL 122 (ed. D. Hurst). Among the *ascetic writings, noteworthy is a cento intended for meditation, Collectio psalterii (PL 94, 515-527; J. Fraipont, in CCL 122, 452-470). Two works, though famous, are dubious: De meditatione Passionis Christi per septem diei horas (PL 94, 531-576) and a De remediis peccatorum (PL 94, 567-576).

Bede is famous above all for his historical works: Historia ecclesiastica gentis Anglorum: ed. B. Colgrave, R.A.B. Mynors, Oxford 1969; Historia Abbatum (or Vita sanctorum abbatum): a history of the monasteries of Wearmouth-Jarrow (PL 94, 711-730); Chronicon minus (ad an. 703), which concludes De temporibus liber (PL 90, 288-292: the De temporibus is now in CCL 124 C, 585-611, ed. Ch.W. Jones); Chronicon maius (ad an. 725), which concludes De ratione temporum (PL 90, 520-578; for De ratione temporum, CCL 123 B, Ch.W. Jones). His hagiographical activity is important: a Vita S. Cuthberti (d. 687) in prose (PL 94, 729-790) and verse (id., 575-596; cf. BHL 2020-2021); a Vita S. Felicis Nolani (PL 94, 789-798; BHL 2873); a Vita et passio S. Anastasii has not been traced. For the martyrology attributed to Bede, see Ch.W. Jones, in CCL 123, 565-578. Various minor didactic works (De orthographia, De arte metrica et de schematibus et tropis) are published by Ch.W. Jones, C.B. Kendall and M.H. King in CCL 123 A, with other writings of doubtful authenticity (though they nonetheless ensured Bede considerable fame). Less important are his poetic works: 12 sacred poems (CCL 122, 412-438, ed. J. Fraipont), a poem De die iudicii (id., 439-444), 13 distichs forming an Oratio ad Deum (id., 445-446), three paraphrases of psalms (id., 447-450), a Hymnus virginitatis or Hymnus sanctae Edilthridae (d. 679; ed. G.M. Dreves, Analecta hymnica, 50, 98-100; cf. BHL 2633). Of his letters, only 16 and some fragments remain (PL 94, 655-710; in CCL 123 C, Ch.W. Jones has published three letters to Pleguina, Helmwald and Wicthed). Quite important is a letter to *Egbert, archbishop of York, on the occasion of his episcopal ordination: Bede draws a programmatic portrait of a Merovingian-era bishop.

For editions, see Verzeichnis, 201-207. Beyond the bibliography compiled by I. Cecchetti, BS 2, 1006-1074, the following titles should be mentioned: P. Hunter Blair, The Historical Writings of Bede, in La storiografia altomedievale, I, Spoleto 1970 (Settimane di studio del Centro italiano di studi sull'alto Medioevo, XVIII), 197-221; G. Musca, Il Venerabile Beda storico dell'Alto Medioevo, Bari 1973 (with bibl. 391-399; 400-436: A century of study on Bede the historian); G. Bonner, Bede and Medieval Civilization: ASE 2 (1973) 71-90 (shows the patristic theological dimension of Bede's thought, and his ignorance of Greek theological theory on the two natures in Christ); J.T. Rosenthal, Bede's Use of Miracles in "The Ecclesiastical History": Traditio 31 (1975) 328-335; P. Hunter Blair, The World of Bede, London 1970, ed. review, Cambridge 1990; BBKL I, 453-454; Patrologia IV, 380-404; H.J. Higham, An English Empire: Bede and the Early Anglo-Saxon Kings, Manchester-New York 1995; A. Padit - J. Pelagio, The Doctrine on Prayer in Saint Bede, Rome 2001; G. Caputa, Il sacerdozio dei fedeli secondo San Beda: un itinerario di maturità cristiana, Vatican City 2002.

R. Grégoire

BELISARIUS (ca. 500–565). Byzantine military leader, originally from Germana in present-day W Bulgaria, ordered by *Justinian to lead the reconquest of *Africa (533); his wife, Antonina, accompanied him on the campaign, in which he captured the *Vandal king Gelimer. Antonina also accompanied him during the reconquest of *Italy: landing in Sicilia (535), Belisarius led a brief campaign in Africa to suppress military revolt and then made war against the *Gothic king Theodahad. Belisarius occupied *Rome (9 December 536), which was then besieged by Witigis; he then deposed Pope *Silverius, accused of favoring the Goths, and had him replaced with the deacon *Vigilius. After reconquering *Ravenna (538), Belisarius was recalled to *Constantinople (540). Soon he was sent to oppose the Persian king *Chosroes but returned again (544) to Italy to fight *Totila. Returning to Constantinople (549), he was ordered by Justinian and *Theodora to induce Pope Vigilius to condemn the *Three Chapters, sanctioned by the Second Council of Constantinople (553). After a victorius campaign against the *Huns, who were threatening the city, out of envy Belisarius was accused of treachery and died in 565.

PLRE IIIA, 181-224; PCBE 2/1, 279-281; L.M. Hartmann: PWK III/1, 209-240; L.M. Chassin, Bélisaire, généralissime byzantin (504–565), Paris 1957; G. Downey, Belisarius, Young General of Byzantium, New York 1960; R. Browning, Belisar in Italien: AW 12/2 (1981) 45-54.

E. Malaspina

BELISARIUS Scholasticus (5th c.). In the appendix of G. Huemer's edition of Sedulius (CSEL 10, 309-310) and in the Anthologia Latina pars I, 2, ed. E. Riese (Lipsia 1906, repr. 1972, 49-50), are two 16-verse poems in hexameter, whose *acrostics and telestichs form Sedulius antistes. They are very probably by the same author: Belisarius Scholasticus, who lived ca. 500. In some codices the second poem follows the first immediately; in some it is attributed to Liberatus Scholasticus. Both compositions celebrate *Sedulius's Carmen Paschale allegorically, and indeed somewhat obscurely.

Bardenhewer 4, 647; U. Moricca, Storia della letteratura cristiana latina, 3, 1, Turin 1932, 56; EC 2, 1181.

A. De Nicola

BELLATOR. Mid-6th-c. priest, friend of *Cassiodorus, at whose request he wrote a commentary on Ruth; he also wrote commentaries, all lost, on Tobit, Esther, Judith, Maccabees and Wisdom. He also translated two books of *Origen's homilies on Ezra (Cassiod., Inst. div. 1,5,6).

S. Zincone

BENEDICT I, pope (575–579). Successor of *John III (561–574), elected in 574 but consecrated the following year. A native of *Rome, son of a certain Boniface, with the Roman people Benedict suffered the first *Longobard (Lombard) invasions and a harsh famine. In 579 he asked *Justin II for military help to defend Rome from the Longobards but was refused. It seems, though, that on that occasion Justin gave the pope the gold, jeweled cross reliquiary still kept in the treasury of St. Peter. Benedict approved the canons of the 5th ecumenical council, *Constantinople II. The few letters attributed to him are inauthentic. Benedict died at Rome 30 July, while the city was besieged by the Longobards; he was buried in the sacristy of the Constantinopolitan Basilica.

LP I, 308; H. Grisar, Roma alla fine del mondo antico, Rome 1930, II 175-176 and 254-255; E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums, I, Tübingen 1930, 348, 350-352 and 777; DHGE 8, 7-9 (F. Baix), O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 224-225; A. Saba, Storia dei Papi, Turin 1966, I 211ff.; LTK 2, 204 (H. Zimmermann); EPapi I, Rome 2000, 539-541 (O. Bertolini).

M. Spinelli

BENEDICT II, pope (684–685). Roman, son of Giovanni Savelli, was educated at the schola cantorum founded by *Gregory the Great for the formation of clergy. Benedict was elected immediately after the death of his predecessor *Leo II (July 683) but was not consecrated until 26 June 684, after ratification by the exarch of *Ravenna. With this pope, in fact, the practice of waiting on the confirmation of the pontifical election from Byzantium ended, being transferred by imperial concession to the exarch of Ravenna—a sign of the improved relations between *Rome and *Constantinople (court and church) after the 6th ecumenical council; from then on, the period between election and ratification was never more than two months. Benedict did his utmost to spread and apply the decrees of the 6th ecumenical council (Constantinople III), which condemned *monothelitism. To this end, and thanks also to the diplomatic efforts of the Roman notary Peter, in November 684 he succeeded in gathering all the Spanish bishops at the 14th Council of *Toledo to accept the decisions of the recent ecumenical council; we have a letter on this by the pope ad Petrum notarium. Benedict also intervened in the situation of the church in England, arranging *Wilfrid's reinstatement as bishop of *York. Economically, he helped the clergy, charitable institutions run by the monks, and those responsible for the care of and services in churches. He also ordered restorations and embellishments at St. Peter's, St. Lorenzo in Lucina, St. Valentino and St. Maria ad martyres (Pantheon). Benedict died 8 August 685 and was buried in St. Peter's.

CPL 1739; PL 96, 423-424; Mansi 2, 1085-1086; LP I, 363-365; Jaffé I, 241-242; Hfl-Lecl 3, 550-551; DTC 2, 648; DHGE 8, 9-14 (F. Baix); DBI 8 (1966) 325-329 (O. Bertolini); M. Strohm, Der Konflikt zwischen Erzbischof Julian von Toledo und Papst Benedikt II. Ein Faktum von oekumenischer Bedeutung: AHC 15 (1983) 249-259; M.E. Bertoldi, S. Lorenzo in Lucina, Rome 1994, 29; LTK 2, 204 (G. Schwaiger); Lexicon Topographicum Urbis Romae, III, Rome 1996, 183-185; EPapi I, 621-625 (O. Bertolini).

M. Spinelli

BENEDICT BISCOP (ca. 628–690), saint. Biscop Baducing, a native of Northumbria, spent several years at King Oswin's court before his desire to deepen his knowledge of doctrinal truths led him to *Rome in 653 and 665. He returned to Kent with Theodore of Tarsus, who appointed him *abbot of the Monastery of Sts. Peter and Paul, *Canterbury (669). After a third journey to Rome (670–672), in 674 he founded the *monastery of Wearmouth, and that of Jarrow in 681. Benedict made two other trips to Rome, bringing back a large number of books which he installed at Jarrow (678–679, 683). He died after a long illness on 12 January 690. His greatest achievement was to make the monasteries authentic centers of propagation of Latin culture in *Britain. His many imported codices became the basis of Jarrow's rich library. He also made an important contribution to the Romanization of the English church. He is considered a patron of the Benedictines; *Bede wrote his biography (CPL 1378, PL 94, 713-730).

G. Mongelli, BS 2, 1212-1216; I. Cecchetti, EC 2, 1295-1296; C. Silva Tarouca, EI 6, 607; LTK 2, 180; Fr.W. Bautz, BBKL I, 494; T. Bucherer, Benedict Biscop als Pioner römisch-christlicher Kultur bei den Angelsachsen, Heidelberg 1923; M. Gretch, Die Regula sancti Benedicti in England und ihre altenglische Übersetzung, Munich 1973.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

BENEDICT of Nursia (ca. 480–ca. 560). Our primary source of information on the *patriarch and legislator of Western *monasticism is *Gregory the Great, who dedicated the whole of book II of his Dialogues to Benedict. Born in the territory of Nursia to a well-to-do family, Benedict's date of birth, traditionally fixed ca. 480, could be as late as 490–500. Sent to *Rome to complete his literary education, he soon abandoned the corrupt atmosphere of the city to retire to a solitary life near Subiaco, following a brief sojourn at Affile. He briefly headed a monastery near Vicovaro; later, the number of his disciples growing, he founded 12 monasteries in the Aniene Valley, each with 12 monks under the authority of their own *abbot. Following plots against him he left Subiaco, perhaps ca. 529, and settled at Montecassino, where he founded a monastery on the site of an ancient pagan temple and wrote, at least in its present form, the Rule for his cenobites. His fame grew continually; King *Totila, wishing to meet him, went looking for him at Montecassino. He died probably ca. 560.

Benedict's fundamental work is the Rule, whose prologue and 73 chapters sum up the spiritual journey of return to God through obedience (ch. 5), under the guidance of Christ, to whose love nothing must be preferred (chs. 4 and 72). There is a notable emphasis on humility, which gives complete freedom to conform one's will to God's. The cenobitic community devised by St. Benedict is founded on the authority of the abbot, with the monks under him, bound to their monastery by a vow of stability. Essential parts of Benedictine spirituality are the celebration of the divine office and a balanced synthesis of prayer and work, esp. manual labor, but also intellectual work, centered on the reading of sacred texts (ch. 48). The sources of the Benedictine Rule can be found in Scripture, but also in *Pachomius, Basil, the Vitae Patrum, *Augustine and *John Cassian; its relation to the Regula Magistri remains open; traditional opinion held the latter to be later, but scholars now seem to have settled on a dependence of Benedict's Rule on the Regula Magistri. In any event, a novelty of the Benedictine Rule with respect to the Regula Magistri is that every monk is considered responsible for the entire community. An essential trait of the Christian communal life, according to the Benedictine Rule, is the response of love for a personal God who has first loved us. The presence of Christ in each person gives an eternal value to fraternal relations. The principal merit of Benedict's Rule seems to have been its elaboration of a synthesis of previous monastic experience, showing great wisdom, moderation and balance in the organization of cenobitic life.

CPL 1852; PL 66, 215-930; CSEL 75; SC 181-186bis (with Fr. tr. and commentary by A. de Vogüé). Among other editions we cite those of B. Linderbauer (Metten 1922, with philological commentary, and Bonn 1928, FP, fasc. 17), C. Butler (Friburgi Brisgoviae [3]1935), G. Penco (Florence, I repr. 1970, with It. tr.), S. Pricoco (La Regola di san Benedetto e le Regole dei padri, Fondazione Lorenzo Valla, 1995). There are many translations of the Benedictine Rule into modern languages: we note those in German of P. Bihlmeyer (BKV2, Band 20, Kempten-Munich 1914, 231-325) and of B. Steidle (Beuron 1963); in French of Ph. Schmitz (Maredsous 1962, with a study on Benedict's language, ed. Ch. Mohrmann), in addition to the previously cited edition of A. de Vogüé; in Spanish of J. Aranguren (BAC 406, Madrid 1979). Among Italian translations, beyond that already cited of G. Penco, we note those of the Benedictine fathers of Subiaco (Rome 1975) and of A. Lentini (Montecassino [2]1980). There is a vast bibliography on St. Benedict and his Rule: very useful is the "Bulletin d'histoire bénédictine," along with RBen, which has continual biographical updates on the life, personality and work of St. Benedict; also noteworthy is the "Internationale Bibliographie zur Regula Benedicti" in RBS 11 (1973) and ff. Among studies we note: Benedictus, der Vater des Abendlandes, 547-1947, ed. H.S. Brechter, Munich 1947; Ch. Mohrmann, La latinité de saint Benoît. Étude linguistique sur la tradition manuscrite de la Règle: RBen 62 (1952) 108-139; Commentationes in Regulam S. Benedicti, ed. B. Steidle: SA 42, Rome 1957; S. Pawlowsky, Die biblischen Grundlagen der Regula Benedicti, Vienna 1965; G.

Turbessi, Ascetismo e monachesimo in S. Benedetto, Rome 1965 (with ample bibl.); A. Linage Conde, La antropología de la Regla de san Benito: Asclepio 20 (1968) 135-163; G.M. Widhalm, Die rhetorischen Elemente in der Regula Benedicti, RBS Suppl. II, Hildesheim 1974; A. Linage Conde, San Benito y los Benedictinos, Braga 1991; A. de Vogüé, Saint Benoît. Homme de Dieu, Paris 1993; C. Schütz, "Le Christ - Seigneur" dans la règle de saint Benoît, Irénikon 72 (1999) 42-72; A. Böckmann, Der Mensch nach der Regel Benedikts (RB) auf dem Hintergrund ihrer Tradition, besonders der Regula Magistri (RM), RBS 20 (1999) 35-58; M. de Dreuille, La règle de saint Benoît et les traditions ascétiques de l'Asie à l'Occident, Vie monastique 38, Bégrolles-en-Mauges 2000.

S. Zincone

BENEVOLUS (late 4th c.). Secretary (magister memoriae) of *Valentinian II. While still a *catechumen, he left the court of *Milan and withdrew to Brescia, so as to not have to compile (dictare) the decree, requested by the empress *Justina, regarding the transfer of the basilicas in the time of *Ambrose in 386. *Gaudentius of Brescia says that he refused to "promulgate decisions against the *Catholic churches" (Tract. 1,1-6). The writing of the law was his official responsibility, and in any event was published (CTh 16,1,4) in favor of the *Arians at Milan. This shows that the writing of a law could create problems of conscience, as in the case of Benevolus, responsible for the scrinia, who wrote petitions addressed to the emperor. An important personage at Brescia, Benevolus could not take part in the *Easter services due to illness; Gaudentius sent him 10 Easter sermons, ca. 404 (Praef. of the sermons: CSEL 68,3-4).

Rufinus, HE 11,16; Sozomen, HE 7,13,5-7; PCBE 2, 298-299; cf. W. Ensslin, Memoriales PW 15, 1931, 657; Seeck, Scrinium PW 2, 1991, 893; L. De Giovanni, Il libro XVI del Codice Teodosiano, Naples 1985, 37ff.; R. Lizzi, Vescovi e strutture ecclesiastiche nella città tardoantica (L'Italia Annonaria nel IV-V secolo d.C.), Como 1989, 113ff.; J. Harries, The Roman Imperial Quaestor from Constantine to Theodosius II: JRS 88 (1988) 148-172 (Benevolus, 162-163).

A. Di Berardino

BENJAMIN of Alexandria (d. 665). Anti-*Chalcedonian patriarch of *Alexandria from 626 to 665, he lived in the period of *Egypt's decisive political and religious crisis: the end of *Byzantine rule and the Persian (619–626) and Arab (from 639) invasions. The Byzantine patriarch and prefect of Alexandria, Cyrus Muqauqas, forced him to live hidden in Upper Egypt from 631 to 644. After this date the Arabs allowed him to occupy the see of *Alexandria, and his relations with them seem to have been marked by substantial mutual respect. We have a homily by Benjamin on the wedding at Cana, delivered probably in Sahidic *Coptic and surviving in Bohairic Coptic, which describes at length his stay in Upper Egypt; a fragment of an encomium of *Shenoute; and a fragment of a festal letter (642) against *heretics, in Arabic translation. His biography, in the form of an encomium, seems to have been written by his successor Agatho, who also wrote a homily celebrating Benjamin's consecration of a new church at *Scete in honor of St. *Macarius.

CPG 7941-7944; C.D.G. Müller, Die Homilie über die Hochzeit zu Kana und weitere Schriften des Patriarchen Benjamin I. von Alexandrien, Heidelberg 1968; G. Daoud Girgis, Abba Benjamin. The Coptic Patriarch in the 7th Century, in Piotr O. Scholz - R. Stempel (eds.), Nubia et OC. Festschrift Müller, Tübingen 1987, 17-27; C. Römer, Osterfestbrief des Patriarchen Benjamin I (?), in Kölner Papyri Bd. 5 (Papyrologica Coloniensia 7), Opladen 1985 (= Nr. 215), 77-106; Coptic Encyclopedia 2, 375-377; BBKL 20, 116-121.

T. Orlandi

BERYLLUS of Bostra (d. after 240). Bishop of *Bostra (in modern Jordan), accused of *heresy in a council held at Bostra ca. 240. The assembly's acts are lost, but *Eusebius of Caesarea read and summarized them (HE VI, 33,1-3). The bishops present first questioned Beryllus, then *Origen talked with him and gave an exposition of *dogma that convinced him. According to Eusebius, Beryllus held that Christ had not existed as a being (reality) distinct from the Father and that he had no divinity of his own, only that of the Father that dwelled in him. It is unlikely that Beryllus expressed his thought in this way; rather, it seems that Eusebius described it based on Origen's questions to him. Eusebius also found other letters of Beryllus addressed to Bishop *Alexander of Jerusalem (HE VI, 20.2). *Jerome's information on Beryllus (De vir, ill. 60) is based exclusively on Eusebius.

P. Nautin, Lettres et écrivains chrétiens des II-III^e s., Paris 1961, 135-136; 209-219.

P. Nautin

BESA (d. 474). Disciple of *Shenoute and his successor as head of the community of Athrib (the White Monastery). Like his master, Besa wrote prolifically in the national language, *Coptic, and left many letters (sent to dependent *monasteries), monastic *catecheses and a biography of Shenoute. These works are the only source regarding his life: from them we can deduce that he remained as head long after Shenoute's death (ca. 455), probably ca. 20 years. He was succeeded by Zenobius, who had previously been Shenoute's secretary. It seems that—unlike his terrible teacher—Besa's character was peaceful and mild, both toward the monks and toward the *pagan communities that survived near the monastery.

K. Heinz Kuhn, A Fifth-Century Egyptian Abbot, I-III: JThS ser. II, 5 (1954) 36-48, 147-187; 6 (1955) 35-48; A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus, II/4, Freiburg 1990, 235-241; Coptic Encyclopedia 2, 378-379.

T. Orlandi

BESANÇON, Council of. Celebrated probably 444. Presided over by *Hilary of Arles; *Germanus of Auxerre took part. The council deposed Chelidonius, the irregularly ordained bishop of Besançon; Pope *Leo protected him, however, and invalidated the sentence of the Gallic bishops.

CCL 148, 105; Hfl-Lecl 2, 476-478; Palazzini 1, 173-174.

Ch. Munier

BETH ADRAI, Council of. In 485 at the *Syrian town of Beth Adrai, a council was held that marked a stage in the gradual detachment of *Persian Christianity, which supported *Nestorianism, from the *Byzantine church, then predominantly *monophysite. The Persian king Peroz (457–484) had condemned Baboway, *catholicos of Seleucia, to death, accusing him of working secretly with Byzantium. Baboway's relative and fellow student at the school of *Edessa, *Acacius, was then elected to the see of Seleucia. Acacius sought a rapprochement with *Barsauma, bishop of *Nisibis, who supported Nestorianism and enjoyed the king's favor. At Beth Adrai, Barsauma submitted to Acacius; the council also decided to convene a general council for the following year to treat unresolved dogmatic and disciplinary questions. This council met in 486 at *Seleucia-Ctesiphon; Barsauma was not present, however, writing many letters offering some true and but also some fictitious reasons for his absence.

Synodicon orientale, 532ff., ed. J.B. Chabot, in Notices et extraits des manuscrits de la Bibliothèque Nationale et d'autres bibliothèques 37, Paris 1902; J. Labourt, Le christianisme dans l'empire perse sous la dynastie sassanide (224–632), Paris 1904, 114; G. Bardy, Le Chiese di Persia e d'Armenia nel V secolo, in Fliche-Martin, Storia della Chiesa, ed. A.P. Frutaz, IV, Turin 1972, 408-409.

C. Nardi

BETH LAPAT, Council of (or Bêt Lapat; in Persian Gundaisabur or Gondisapor). *Persian city founded between 256–260 by *Shapur I (242–272), it quickly became an episcopal see and from 410 a *metropolitan see. In April 484 a synod was held there by *Barsauma, pro-*Nestorian bishop of *Nisibis, and other bishops who, like him, deplored the pro-*Byzantine Baboway, *catholicos of Seleucia. At Beth Lapat the catholicos was deposed and ecclesiastical celibacy abolished for the church of Persia. Their conclusions on the doctrine of the *incarnation were clearly contrary to Zeno's Henoticon, increasing the split between the Christianity of the Persian Empire, oriented toward Nestorianism, and that of the Byzantine Empire, where *monophysitism prevailed. According to Michael the Syrian's Chronicon (ed. Chabot, 427), Barsauma had advised King Peroz (457–484): “Unless we proclaim a different dogma in the East from that of the Roman Empire, your Christian subjects will never be sincerely loyal to you. Give me some soldiers and I will make all the Christians of your empire Nestorians.” The source for this advice, though, is monophysite; however, the climate of antimonophysite reaction and detachment from Byzantine influence had already been prepared for some time. The Synodicon orientale does not report the council's acts, considering it schismatic. Barsauma's personality, however, enjoyed great prestige, and many statements of the Council of Beth Lapat were accepted by the Council of *Seleucia in 486.

Synodicon orientale, ed. J.B. Chabot, in Notices et extraits des manuscrits de la Bibl. Nat. et d'autres bibl. 37, Paris 1902; DHGE 8, 1233-1235; J.M. Fiey, Jalons pour une histoire de l'Église en Iraq, CSCO 310 sub. 36, Louvain 1970, 114 and 124; G. Bardy in Fliche-Martin, Storia della Chiesa, Turin 1972, IV 408.

C. Nardi

BETHLEHEM. In the early centuries Bethlehem suffered the same fate as *Jerusalem; the traditional Grotto of the Nativity of the Lord was confiscated by *Hadrian (Testa, Grotte dei Misteri: SBF 14 [1964] 46, 71-78, 113-114). *Constantine built a basilica there, five-aisled with a polygonal, perhaps octagonal, apse (Wilkinson, Jerusalem Pilgrims, 152) and a dominant altar. *Justinian rebuilt it (6th c.), enlarging it with great trichorae and in this way providing two new avenues of access to the venerated grotto. The original floor was decorated in mosaics with geometrical motifs, birds and grape branches; the floor of the second church was of marble crustae, later removed to decorate mosques. In the Shepherds' Field at Deir er-Rawat, a venerated grotto had mosaic floors and was later enclosed by two churches which succeeded each other. Other *monasteries preserve *Byzantine remains. Recently along the road from Jerusalem to Bethlehem, about three miles from Jerusalem, an octagonal church was found dating to the 5th c. and identifiable as the Kathisma, the place where according to apocryphal tradition the Virgin Mary rested (Avner, The Recovery of the Kathisma Church).

B. Bagatti, Gli antichi edifici sacri a Betlemme, Jerusalem 1952; V. Corbo, Gli scavi di Kb. Siyar el-Ghanam (Campo dei Pastori) e i monasteri dei dintorni, Jerusalem 1955; E. Testa, Le "Grotte dei Misteri" giudeo-cristiane: SBF 14 (1964) 46, 71-78, 113-114; J. Wilkinson, Jerusalem Pilgrims before the Crusades, Warminster 1977; New Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in Holy Land 1, Jerusalem 1993, 203-210; R. Avner, The Recovery of the Kathisma Church and Its Influence on Octagonal Buildings, in One Land—Many Cultures. Archaeological Studies in Honour of Stanislao Loffreda OFM, Jerusalem 2003, 173-186.

B. Bagatti - C. Pappalardo

BÉZIERS, Council of. Called early 356 by *Saturninus of Arles, in agreement with *Constantius's two pro-*Arian advisers *Ursacius and *Valens. *Hilary of Poitiers made every effort to rehabilitate *Athanasius, but in vain, and was exiled to *Phrygia for his stance.

CCL 148, 31; Gaudemet, SC 241, 85-89; E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne, I, Paris [2]1964, 161-164, 224-228; Palazzini 1, 175-176.

Ch. Munier

BIAGIUS. We have only legendary passion accounts (BHG[3] 276-277, BHL 1370-1380) of this martyr of *Caesarea in *Cappadocia. Traditions differ regarding his anniversary: 11 February for the Greeks, 15 February for Ado, 3 February for Usward and the Roman Martyrology.

AASS Feb. I, 331-353; Syn. Eccl. CP. 457; AASS Prop. Dec. 47; Vies des SS. 2, 62-37; BS 3, 136-137; BHG3 276-277; BHL 1370-1380.

V. Saxer

BIBIANA (4th c.). The only certain information we have on the martyr Bibiana seems to be in the Liber pontificalis (Duchesne I, 249-250): that Pope *Simplicius (468–483) consecrated, near the Licinian palace on the Esquiline at *Rome, the basilica "of the blessed martyr Bibiana, where her body rests" (probably meaning some *relics). This shows the existence of a cult of Bibiana from the 5th c. A Passio (not earlier than 6th c.) makes her a *Roman virgin scourged under the emperor *Julian after the rest of her family was martyred; her death is 2 December, the day of her feast in two codices of the Mart. hier. (AASS Nov. [1931] II, pars post., 631), in the martyrology of Ado (PL 123, 409) and thus in the Roman Martyrology (ed. H. Delehaye [1940] 559). The church of St. Bibiana was restored numerous times and finally rebuilt by Bernini, who placed a sculpture depicting the martyr there.

BHL 1322, 1323; D. Fedini, La vita di S. Bibiana vergine, e martire romana, Rome 1627; BS 3, 177-181; H. Delehaye, Étude sur le légendier romain, Brussels 1936, 124-143; E. Donckel, Studien über den Kultus der hl. Bibiana: RQA 43 (1935) 23-33; Id., Der Kultus der hl. Bibiana in Rom: RivAC 14 (1937) 125-135; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 297-299. Per l'aspetto topografico: Lexicon Topographicum Urbis Romae I, Rome 1993, 194-195.

A. Pollastri

BIBLE

I. Semantics - II. Veneration.

Many other articles in the encyclopedia treat of bibical themes, esp. Antilegomenon, Apocrypha, Apocalypses, Exegesis, Liturgy and Bible, Scripture, patristic interpretation of the most important biblical books (Revelation, Song of Songs, Exodus, Genesis, Prophets, Psalms, Wisdom books, the gospels, Paul), the principal biblical personages in the Fathers and in iconography, and translations (under various headings).

I. Semantics. The singular term Bible is derived from the Greek neuter plural τὰ βιβλία, diminutive of βίβλος ("papyrus"). Initially the diminutive singular τὸ βιβλίον meant a strip of *papyrus, then the writing contained in the papyrus, and finally a document, writing, book. In *Greek Christian literature it had other meanings in addition to the basic one of "written document": the phylacteries of the Jews (John Chrys., Hom. 72,2 in Mt.), dictionary (Theodoret, Quaest. 74 in Reg. et Par.), act of accusation (Pallad., Vita Chrys. 14), letter (Theoph. Exc. de Leg. Gent. 6) and certificate (Marcus Diac., Vita Porph. 6). Other specialized meanings pertaining to the meaning "book" can be traced: a section or part of a book (Tat., Or. 36; Orig., In Joh. 10,4), individual books of Scripture (Just., Dial. 75; Athan., Ep. Enc. 4; John Chrys., Hom. 42,1 in Jo.). The plural (ta biblia) meant the OT as Christian Scripture (2 Clem. 14,2), as Jewish Scripture (Orig., Hom. 14,12 in Jer.; John Chrys., Hom. 47,3 in Mat.) or simply as an inspired book (Orig., in Jo. 6,8; Cyr. Jer., Catech. 19,5; John Chrys., Hom. 47,3 in Mat.), and the NT as text of the new covenant (John Moschus, Prat. 134), bearing witness on oath (John Chrys., De stat. 15, 5) and/or the whole of the inspired books (John Chrys., Hom. 32,3 in Jo.). In the Testament of Abraham 10 (Rec. B) and in the Revelation to John, the plural term designates the books of the divine judgment (Rev 20:12); in the monk *Callinicus it means simply a magic book (Vita Ipatii, ed. Teub. 90). Such meanings of the term to biblion occur with some secondary variants in the LXX and NT. Worth mentioning are the two expressions of 1 Macc. 12:9 ("the sacred books") and 2 Macc. 8:23 ("the sacred book"). Paul asks Timothy to bring with him to *Rome the papyrus rolls (ta biblia) and the parchments (2 Tim 4:13; cf. Jn 21:15). From the 13th c. the Greek plural was interpreted as a Latin feminine singular, and it passed into the Romance languages in that form.

Lampe, s.v. βιβλίον; S. Zarb, De sacrorum librorum natura et variis eorundem nominibus illustrata: Angelicum 9 (1932) 422-448; EC 2, 1545; C.M. Martini - P. Bonatti, Il messaggio della salvezza. I. Introduzione generale, Turin-Leumann [4]1976, 5-6; R. Fabris, Introduzione alla Bibbia (Logos), Leumann (TO) 1994; G. Schrenk, GLNT II, 262-280; H. Balz, I DENT, I, 574-577; P. Waiberger, NBL I, 1991, 291-293.

II. Veneration. Because of its divine origin, the Bible is studied and venerated more than any other book among Jews and Christians. Held to be the depository of the Word of God, his message to all people, it is venerated and considered the most proximate norm of faith and life. The Jews express this veneration by the expression that it infects the hand of whoever touches it and by the practice of hiding worn out texts in the genizah to protect them from possible profanation. To this exterior aspect must be associated the more important aspect of the use of the Bible in the *liturgy, first that of the *synagogue and later that of the church. The practice of reading its books as individual compositions or as parts of the biblical corpus is very ancient and must be interpreted as a gesture of veneration toward the text considered most apt for expressing human thoughts and feelings toward God. In synagogues, the volume of the Law was and is kept in an appropriate case. Emblematic of the Christian attitude is the custom of the *Byzantine liturgy, which gives the book of the gospels honors equal to those given to the *Eucharist; from the 5th c., the custom spread in councils of putting it at the center of the room on a seat of honor, as a point of reference. The declaration of the Council of Trent that Scripture and *Tradition must be accepted and venerated with equal piety (DS 1501) was echoed by Vatican II, which heard in the Bible the voice of the *Holy Spirit come down to speak with humanity (Dei Verbum, n. 13.21).

G. Ricciotti: EC 2, 1570-1574; S. Marsili, ibid., 1578-1580; J. Ratzinger, Interpretazione del decreto del Concilio di Trento sulla tradizione (Quaestiones disputatae), Brescia 1970, 53-73; R. Latourelle, La Costituzione dogmatica sulla divina Rivelazione, in I libri di Dio, Turin 1975, 264-265.

E. Peretto

BINITARIANISM. *Trinitarian formulas were in use in the church from the very earliest times: one thinks of Mt 28:19 and of the triple *baptismal immersion in the name of the *Father, Son and *Holy Spirit. But *liturgical usage had no adequate corresponding doctrinal understanding: from the 2nd c. on, theological reflection concentrated on exploring the Father/Christ relationship, ignoring the Holy Spirit, who was an object of study only from ca. 360, in the context of the last phase of the *Arian controversy. Before then, only a few authors had included the Holy Spirit in some way in their theological reflection: *Athenagoras, *Irenaeus, *Tertullian, Hippolytus in Contra Noetum and esp. *Origen. By binitarianism, therefore, we refer to theological reflection on the Trinity which fails to organically include the Holy Spirit alongside the Father and the Son: examples of this reflection are, e.g., in ps.-Hippolytus's homily In sanctum Pascha, in *Hermas, *Tatian, *Hippolytus of Rome, *Lactantius, *Victorinus of Petovium, the Western profession of faith of *Serdica (343), and Hilary's Comm. in Mat., before his exile. In some of these authors, the Holy Spirit is identified with Christ's divine component. Besides these texts, binitarian in a strict sense, we must bear in mind that other authors, though treating specifically of the Holy Spirit, do not succeed in including him organically alongside the Father and the Son, since they do not apply to him, explicitly or even implicitly, the concept of person: *Justin Martyr, *Clement of Alexandria, *Novatian, *Hilary in De trinitate.

M. Simonetti, Note di cristologia pneumatica: Augustinianum 12 (1972) 226-232; M. Simonetti, Studi sulla cristologia del II e III secolo, Rome 1993, spec. 46-52.

M. Simonetti

BIOGRAPHY. When Christians began to write biography, the literary genre of bíos (the word biographia is first attested at the end of the 5th c. in *Damascius's Vita Isidori; cf. *Photius, Bibl. Cod. 181 and 242) already had a long history behind it in Greco-Roman civilization. Already in the 6th c. BC the first traces of the genre are found in Theagenes and in Scylax, but it is esp. from the 4th c. BC that, under the combined impulse of the rhetorical encomium (Gk. enkōmion) and Socratic philosophy, Greek biography took the autonomous form that established itself in the centuries of *Hellenism: it is enough to think of Isocrates's Evagoras or Xenophon's Agesilaus. Decisive for the genre's development was the interest it created in the area of Hellenistic culture characterized by antiquarian erudition and the ethical and psychological canons of the *Aristotelian school.

Hermippus the peripatetic, Antigonus of Caristus, Satyrus of Alexandria and Aristoxenus of Tarentum are the most famous names of Greek biography that *Jerome cites in the prologue of De viris illustribus, along with the Latins Varro, Santra, Cornelius Nepos, Hyginus and Suetonius Tranquillus, as models to follow in drawing up the lives and literary profiles of Christian authors. The material, however—which could not have been otherwise—comes from the information reported in *Eusebius of Caesarea's Ecclesiastical History, or from the works themselves of the Christian authors he treated. The genre of Christian "literary biography," of which Jerome should be considered the initiator, found important practitioners in the following centuries and in notably diverse cultural settings, such as *Gennadius of Marseille, *Isidore of Seville and *Ildephonsus of Toledo.

Historical-political biography, also widely practiced in the Greco-Roman world (Nicholas of Damascus, Suetonius, Tacitus, Plutarch, the Scriptores Historiae Augustae) with ever more markedly encomiastic and propagandistic tendencies, found a sensitive Christian interpreter and intelligent innovator in Eusebius of Caesarea: his Life of Constantine is a typical imperial *panegyric with a strongly idealizing and propagandistic drive, in some way a *hagiographical biography though not without significant documentary value. (For all the questions raised by this difficult Eusebian work, see the translation with commentary edited by Averil Cameron and S.G. Hall.)

The genre of dialogue biography, present in Christian works such as *Palladius of Helenopolis's Dialogue on the life of *John Chrysostom, *Sulpicius Severus's Dialogues on St. *Martin of Tours and the Dialogues of *Gregory the Great (whose book II is the sole and fundamental biography of *Benedict of Nursia), also went back to Hellenistic precedents, as P. Oxy. 1176, with its fragment of Satyrus's biographical Life of Euripides, shows.

The most conspicuous and original part of Christian biography, however, apart from the gospel accounts of the earthly life of Jesus of Nazareth, are the lives of the saints, whose study is a legitimate part of hagiography. The lives of the Christian saints of *Late Antiquity were in objective competition with *pagan Greek biographical output on the lives of the "divine men"—the sophists and the philosophers—to such an extent that the Christian ideal of holiness was defined as a sort of *philosophy. Lives of the Sophists were written by Philostratus, author of the famous Life of Apollonius of Tyana, and by Eunapius; Lives and Doctrines of the Philosophers by Diogenes Laertius; *Porphyry and *Iamblichus each wrote a Life of Pythagoras; the Life of Plotinus, written by Porphyry as an introduction to his edition of the Enneads, began a series of *Neoplatonist biographies.

Also within this literary and philosophical context should be placed the 6th book of Eusebius of Caesarea's Ecclesiastical History, dedicated to the biography of *Origen. In these pages, through a tested technique of silences and omissions, Eusebius sets forth an apologetic-encomiastic—and therefore tendentious—portrait of a Christian intellectual who appears to have been unjustly accused of mingling with paganism. Eusebius performs this operation so skillfully that he led the great majority of scholars, from Valesio in the 17th c. until our own day, into the unfortunate error of distingushing this Origen, clearly Christian, from the other Origen spoken of in the Neoplatonic sources. (For a criticism of this perspective and favoring a recovery of the identity of the one Origen, see my contributions in the Origeniana Quinta, Sexta and Septima.) But this biographical doubling that has been disastrous for the study of Origen, with profoundly negative consequences for the understanding of his personality and the correct interpretation of his work, is an extreme case generated by the unique complexity of this extraordinary personality and by his difficult involvement in the tortured events of the relation between Hellenism and Christianity.

Christian biography, with its main purposes of spiritual edification and ideological-religious propaganda, was organized around the two fundamental and complementary experiences of martyrdom and monastic *ascesis, and was a continuation of the first hagiographic sketches constituted by the Acts and Passions of the martyrs. Precisely for this reason the inspiration of Christian biography, in contrast with Greco-Roman biography, which for the most part focused on political, military and intellectual greats of the past, was not constrained by the limits imposed by social extraction or by the genre. Under certain conditions, biographies also focused on members of the middle-lower classes and women. Moreover, Christian biography normally did not portray people who lived in a more or less remote past, but looked at contemporary society by describing the lives of men and women who had died recently or who in some cases were still living (as with *Sulpicius Severus's biography of *Martin of Tours). This focus on recent subjects also accounts for the documentary importance of biography for the social, economic and cultural history of Late Antiquity and the early Middle Ages.

*Gregory of Nyssa's Life of Moses clearly requires a separate treatment. With recourse only to theoria,* he in fact succeeds in recounting a historia within his discourse on Christian virtue and perfection, thus radically altering the meaning and importance of the prestigious philosophical model offered by *Philo of Alexandria (see Geljon's exhaustive study). There is, moreover, no lack of sensational hagiographical falsifications, such as the Acta Pauli (the 2nd-c. work of a presbyter in Asia Minor) or the Passio Hermagorae (a 7th-c. Roman-Gradese counterfeit on St. Mark's activity at *Aquileia). These texts intended to influence present-day historical-ecclesiastical situations through recourse to fantastic accounts of the lives of "apostolic" personages. (Some methodological observations on the theme can be found in my contribution in Alvarium. Festschrift Chr. Gnilka, Münster 2002, 39-51.) The theological implications of Christian hagiographical biography can be measured esp. on the level of the biblical stylization of narrative and plot, and the prizing of miracles as privileged signs of the protagonist's sanctity.

The Vita Cypriani, written by the deacon *Pontius after the saint's martyrdom in 258, is intended to contrast with the early passiones of laypeople and *catechumens by celebrating the *martyrdom and life of the bishop of *Carthage. This work, which in a strict sense is the earliest Christian hagiographical biography, was in turn the prelude to the writing of other lives of holy bishops in the 4th and 5th c., such as Sulpicius Severus's Vita Martini, *Paulinus of Milan's Vita Ambrosii and *Possidius of Calama's Vita Augustini. But an even stronger influence on these last biographies was the *ascetic or *monastic hagiographical biography elaborated in *Athanasius of Alexandria's Vita Antonii (357). Also from *Egypt came numerous Greek and *Coptic recensions of the Life of Pachomius. From the end of the 4th c. a rich output of biographies flourished in both East and West, such as the Vitae composed by Jerome (Vita Pauli; Vita Malchi; Vita Hilarionis), Gregory of Nyssa's Life of Macrina and Life of Gregory Thaumaturge, *Gerontius's Life of Melania Iunior, *Callinicus's Life of Hypatius, *Zacharias Scholasticus's Life of Severus, *Eugippius's Vita Severini, *Jonas of Bobbio's Vita Columbani etc. Also belonging to the genre of monastic biography are the numerous descriptions contained in hagiographical collections such as *Palladius of Helenopilis's Lausiac History, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus's Religious History, *Cyril of Scythopolis's Lives of the Palestinian monks, Gregory of Tours's Liber vitae Patrum and *John Moschus's Prato spirituale. Finally, it is also useful to mention the Roman see's collection of the biographies of bishops mentioned in the Liber pontificalis* and various biographies in verse such as the poems of *Paulinus of Nola on St. Felix, or *Venantius Fortunatus's hexametrical paraphrases of the Vita Martini—a list that could be extended.

Each of these works should be analyzed in its historical-literary context to specify their communication techniques, compositional methods, doctrinal themes, and political-ecclesiastical orientation, and in this way to identify the particular message it wishes to convey. Such analysis would also make possible an evaluation of their divergence from the historical reality they claim to represent. As an illustrative example (among many), one could point out how the depiction of a Roman Catholic and anti-Arian Columbanus by his official biographer, Jonas of Bobbio, conveniently ignores the Irish monk's adherence to the schism of the *Three Chapters and his brusk attitude toward the Roman see.

G. Luck, Die Form der suetonischen Biographie und die frühen Heiligenviten, in Mullus. Festschrift Th. Klauser, Münster 1964, 230-241; W. Bauer, Die Severus-Vita des Zacharias Rhetor, in Aufsätze und kleine Schriften, ed. G. Strecker, Tübingen 1967, 210-228; H. Kech, Hagiographie als christliche Unterhaltungsliteratur. Studien zum Phänomen des Erbaulichen anhand der Mönchsviten des hl. Hieronymus, Göttingen 1977; M. Fuhrmann, Die Mönchsgeschichten des Hieronymus. Formexperimente in erzählender Literatur, in var. aus., Christianisme et formes littéraires de l'Antiquité Tardive en Occident (Entretiens sur l'Antiquité Classique 23), Vandœuvres-Genève 1977, 41-89; E. Giannarelli, La tipologia femminile nella biografia e nell'autobiografia cristiana del IV secolo, Rome 1980; P. Cox, Biography in Late Antiquity: A Quest for the Holy Man (Transformation of the Classical Heritage 5), Berkeley-Los Angeles-London 1983; C.E. Stancliffe, St. Martin and His Hagiographer: History and Miracle in Sulpicius Severus, Oxford 1983; B. Flusin, Miracle et histoire dans l'œuvre de Cyrille de Scythopolis, Paris 1983; K. Berger, Hellenistische Gattungen im Neuen Testament: ANRW II, 25,2, Berlin-New York 1984, 1031-1432, here 1231-1245 (bibl.); A. Spira (ed.), The Biographical Works of Gregory of Nyssa (PMS 12), Cambridge, MA 1984; E.A. Clark, The Life of Melania the Younger, New York-Toronto 1984; R. Albrecht, Das Leben der heiligen Makrina auf dem Hintergrund der Thekla-Traditionen. Studien zu den Ursprüngen des weiblichen Mönchtums im 4. Jahrhundert in Kleinasien (FKDG 38), Göttingen 1986; W. Berschin, Biographie und Epochenstil im lateinischen Mittelalter, I: Von der Passio Perpetuae zu den Dialogi Gregors des Großen (Quellen und Untersuchungen zur lateinischen Philologie des Mittelalters 8), Stuttgart 1986; M. Van Uytfanghe, Stylisation biblique et condition humaine dans l'hagiographie mérovingienne (600–750), Brussels 1987; W. Berschin, Biographie und Epochenstil im lateinischen Mittelalter, II: Merowingische Biographie. Italien, Spanien und die Inseln im frühen Mittelalter (Quellen und Untersuchungen zur lateinischen Philologie des Mittelalters 9), Stuttgart 1988; W.D. McCready, Signs of Sanctity: Miracles in the Thought of Gregory the Great (Studies and Texts 91), Toronto 1989; var. aus., Gerolamo e la biografia letteraria, Genoa 1989; A. Ceresa-Gastaldo (ed.), Biografia e agiografia nella letteratura cristiana antica e medievale, Trento 1990; E. Mühlenberg, Les débuts de la biographie chrétienne: RThPh 122 (1990) 517-529; R.A. Burridge, What Are the Gospels? A Comparison with Graeco-Roman Biography, Cambridge 1992; P.F. Beatrice, Porphyry's Judgment on Origen, in R.J. Daly (ed.), Origeniana Quinta (BETL 105), Louvain 1992, 351-367; A. Momigliano, The Development of Greek Biography, Expanded Edition, Cambridge, MA 1993; I. Gallo - L. Nicastri (eds.), Biografia e autobiografia degli antichi e dei moderni, Naples 1995; S. Swain - M. Edwards (eds.), Portraits: Biographical Representation in the Greek and Latin Literature of the Roman Empire, Oxford 1997; var. aus., La biographie antique (Entretiens sur l'Antiquité Classique 44), Vandœuvres-Genève 1998; A. Cameron - S.G. Hall, Eusebius: Life of Constantine, Oxford 1999; T. Hägg - Ph. Rousseau (eds.), Greek Biography and Panegyric in Late Antiquity (Transformation of the Classical Heritage 31), Berkeley-Los Angeles-London 2000; M. Van Uytfanghe, Biographie: RAC, Suppl. Band I (2000), 1088-1364 (with vast bibl.); P.F. Beatrice, Hermagorica novitas. La testimonianza di Colombano sullo scisma dei Tre Capitoli, in Aquileia e il suo Patriarcato, eds. S. Tavano - G. Bergamini - S. Cavazza, Udine 2000, 75-94; A.C. Geljon, Philonic Exegesis in Gregory of Nyssa's "De Vita Moysis" (Brown Judaic Studies 333 = Studia Philonica Monographs 5), Providence, RI 2002; Th. Böhm, Origenes-Theologe und (Neu-) Platoniker? Oder: Wem soll man mißtrauen-Eusebius oder Porphyrius?: Adamantius 8 (2002) 7-23.

P.F. Beatrice

BIRTH. The biblical exegesis of the Fathers on both the OT and NT (see Lk 1:13) considers marital fecundity to be a good and a gift of God (Clem. Al., Strom. II, 83,142,1-2; Cyr. of Jer., Catech. IX, 15; Ambr., Exp. Lc. 1,29; John Chrys., Anna 1,4). Conversely, the church considered *Encratite movements, which condemned marriage and generation, to be heretical (already 1 Tim 4:13; Iren., Adv. haer. 1,24,1; 1,28,1; Tertull., Adv. Marc. 1,29,2; De car. Chr. 4,2). *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. III, 45-72) does not hesitate to state polemically that abstention from marriage is the impiety of those who wish to suppress generation, God's work (Strom. II, 23,142); the birth of children is a good (Strom. II, 23,142,2); "for those who are married, the aim is procreation; the goal—offspring" (Paedag. II, 10,83,1-2; cf. Strom. II, 11,71,4; III, 15,96,2). For *Origen, prayer obtains from God the birth of children (Orat. 13,2). *Augustine celebrates the divine providentiality of the birth of children (Civ. Dei XII, 23).

Against *abortion and any impediment to the development of the new life, the Fathers unanimously affirm the sacredness of life and its belonging to God (Tertull., Apol. 9,8; Exhort. cast. 12,5; Philosophumena IX, 12; Jerome, Ep. 22,13; conc. Illib. a. 306, can. 63; conc. Ancír. a. 314, can. 21; conc. Trull., a. 692, can. 91). Nonetheless, to exalt virginity, as a virtue and a state, many Christian authors emphasize physical and psychological aspects of the phenomenon of human birth that are quite debatable, and while not openly condemning generation, they seem only to tolerate it, since it is subject to every kind of sorrow and is almost a prelude to death (Jerome, Ad Helvidium 20; Ep. XXII, 19; Ambr., Virg. 1,25; Greg. of Nyss., Virg. 3,5; John Chrys., Hom. in Mt. 8,3). *Theophilus of Antioch says that the woman's pains in childbirth are a proof of human sin (Ad Autol. II, 23), and much of the patristic tradition, echoed in the *liturgy, expressed the perdurance in Christian circles of the OT conception of the physical and ritual impurity of childbirth, such that not only the mother but even the midwife had to be ritually purified before approaching the *sacraments (Can. Hipp., can. 18: the mother, for 40 days if she gave birth to a boy, 80 for a girl; the midwife 20 days for a boy, 40 for a girl; cf. also Novella 17 of the emperor Leo, in K.E. Zachariae von Lingenthal, Ius Graeco-Romanum 3,89).

Origen (Hom. Lev. 8,3) comments on the instructions of Leviticus as proof of the impurity contracted in childbirth, which thus also extended to the newborn (ps.-Prosp., Proem. I, 4). Some Christian authors say that at the moment of birth, a good spirit (*angel) and an evil spirit (*demon) draw near the child (Hermas, Mand. 6,2; Orig., Hom. Lc. 12; Clem. Al., Strom. VII, 127,4; Eus., Praep. Ev. XIII, 13,59). In particular, in the 4th-5th c. the conviction spread that at the moment of birth the child was possessed by an impure spirit that had to be driven out by *baptism (Aug., Symb. 1,2; *Optatus of M., De schism. IV, 6); this is the reason for the rites of *exorcism of the newborn included in the rituals.

More than physical birth, however, the interest of Christian writers focused on the spiritual birth brought about by baptism, a "washing of regeneration [palingenesias] and renewal [anakainōseōs]," as the letter to Titus calls it (3:5). Neophytes are called "newborn infants," artigennēta brephē (1Ptr 2:2). Baptism can therefore be called and thought of as a "second birth" or a "spiritual birth," a "regeneration" (anagennēsis or palingenesia: see Just., 1 Apol. 61,3; 66,1; Iren., Adv. haer. 1,21,1; Clem. Al., Ecl. 7; John Chrys., In Gal. 4,22; Orig., Com. Mt. XV, 23; Cyr. of Jer., Procat. 16; Eus., HE 10,4.34); among the Latins "second nativitas" (Tertull., Exhort. cast. 1,4; De an. 41,4; Cypr., Ad Don. 4; Novat., Trin. XXIX, 169) or spiritalis nativitas (Aug., Nupt. et conc. II, 34,58).

Baptism or the baptismal water can be thought of as the maternal womb which opens for the birth of God's children (Clem. Al., Strom. IV, 160,2; Cyr. of Jer., Catech. I, 2; XX, 4; Aug., Symb. 4,1). This analogy was suggestive for removing the less pleasant aspects of childbirth from the real to the symbolic level (Clem. Al., Paedag. I, cc. 34-52); in particular, the pains and anxiety of physical birth were contrasted with the serenity and joy of birth as children of God (Zeno of Ver., II, 30; John Chrys., Catech. bapt. 4,1). In the context of the 2nd-3rd c. antidocetist debates, the real birth of Jesus via the normal physical process was decisively affirmed, even though he was virginally conceived (Ign., Trall. 9,1; Eph. 18,1; Just., Dial. 45,4; Orig., C. Cels. IV, 73; Philosophumena VII, 31; Tertull., Adv. Marc. III, 9,2-3; De car. Chr. 1,2-3; 4,3-4; Novat., Trin. X, 52-53).

RAC 9, 128-170; DSp 11, 24-34; F. Bolgiani, La tradizione eresiologica sull'encratismo, I, Le notizie di Ireno: AAT 91 (1956-1957) 343-419; II, La confutazione di Clemente Alessandrino: AAT 96 (1961-62) 537-664; H. Crouzel, Virginité et mariage selon Origène, Paris-Bruges 1963; J.P. Broudéhoux, Mariage et famille chez Clément d'Alexandrie, Paris 1970; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Enkrateia e antropologia. Le motivazioni protologiche della continenza e della verginità nel cristianesimo dei primi secoli e nello gnosticismo, IPA, 1984; C. Tibiletti, Verginità e matrimonio in antichi scrittori cristiani, Rome 1983 (Fac. lettere e filosofia, Univ. Macerata n. 15); Gregory of Nyssa (St.) - John Chrysostom (St.) La verginità, ed. S. Lilla, 2, Rome 1990; Ch. Munier, Matrimonio e Verginità nella Chiesa Antica, It. tr., Turin 1990; A. Sicari, Matrimonio e verginità nella rivelazione. L'uomo di fronte alla "Gelosia di Dio," Milan 1992.

V. Loi - B. Amata

BIRTHDAY (dies natalis). The *pagans celebrated the anniversary of birth; a deceased person's family often continued the celebration, but not always on the day of birth (ἡμέρα γενέθλιος = day of birth and memorial of death). Christians celebrated only the anniversary of death, which they called (ἡμέρα, i.e., day of the memorial of death (Mart. Polyc. 18,3). *Tertullian thus mentions masses for the dead: oblationes pro defunctis, pro nataliciis annua die facimus (Cor. 3,3). *Cyprian recommends noting the dates of the deaths of the martyrs (Ep. 12,2), so on the anniversary the eucharistic sacrifice could be celebrated in their memory (Ep. 39,3). The Latin translation dies natalis suggests the interpretation of the memorial of the deceased as a memorial of his spiritual birth to eternal life—a hope that, in the strict sense, regarded only the martyrs. Thus the dies natalis is the day of a martyr's death. The depositio martyrum* of Rome begins the series of the dies natales with the feast of the Lord's birth. From the 4th c., there is the celebration of the anniversary of the introduction of the bishop of Rome, Natalis papae (RAC 7, 760-761). Of course Christians too celebrated the birth and occasionally also the anniversary of birth. In the Sacramentarium gelasianum* there is an Oratio in natale genuinum; this mass was probably solemnly celebrated on the first birthday.

F.X. Kraus, Real-Encyklopädie der christlichen Alterthümer 2 (Freiburg 1886) 483-484; RAC 9, 230-239.

S. Heid

BISHOP

I. 1st c.: New Testament norm and first historical evolution - II. 2nd c.: Birth of the monarchical episcopate - III. 3rd c.: Strengthening of the monarchical episcopate - IV. 4th and 5th c.: The bishops in the imperial church - V. 5th-7th c.: The bishops leading the churches in the Germanic countries.

The first Christian communities immediately established their ecclesiastical offices, which were considered necessary for guaranteeing the operation and development of the church. The primary duties of these offices or ministries were the celebration of the religious service, the preaching of the true doctrine and the direction of the community's charitable activities. Christians drew inspiration for this from the names and the structures of the Jewish *synagogue communities and the phenomenon associated with *Hellenism. But the swiftness and the uniformity with which this process was completed in all the Christian communities demonstrates that the Jewish or the Hellenistic model did not internally influence the church's organizational structures; instead, they developed starting from the church's theological self-awareness. Just two generations after Jesus and the *apostles—later, in the second half of the 2nd c. (around 170)—the formation of the threefold ministry of bishops, *presbyters and deacons (*Diakonia - Diaconate) was already essentially delineated, and no one called into question the belief whether this ordination corresponded to God's will and demonstrated full continuity with the *apostolic tradition.

I. 1st c.: New Testament norm and first historical evolution. The gospels, to make reference to those responsible for the mission and the governing of the community, used the term which in the Greek language was very rarely used to name this type of duty: διακονία. In the Synoptic gospels this term is connected with Jesus himself, who desired that the authority of his disciples not be carried out by means of force (Mk 10:44) or knowledge (Mt 23:8-11), but only by one's disposition to service. Starting from this characteristic, which was very important but generic, a historical process was put into effect through the progressive realization of the formation of the ecclesiastical office. At first, the Christian communities were governed by a college of leaders, which was formed in a different manner according to geographic areas or missionaries. The Christian community of *Jerusalem and the communities of *Palestine, in continuity with the Jewish institution of the "council of elders," were led by "the most elderly" or the "presbyters"—πρεσβύτεροι (Acts 15:22; 20:17-28; Jas 5:14; 1 Pet 5:1-4). On the other hand, the Pauline communities knew of no institution of "presbyters"; rather, those who were chief among them stood as the "presiders" or the "leaders" (Rom 12:8; 1 Th 5:12), or rather the "bishops"—ἐπίσκοποι—and the "deacons"—διάκονοι (Phil 1:1), the latter terminology ("bishop" and "deacons") lasting over the centuries. The phenomenon associated with Hellenism made use of the term ἐπίσκοπος to refer to the governors of various groups, but in all these cases it had as a common denominator the meaning of "overseer" and "administrator." The organizational structure of the bishops and the deacons was soon confused with that of the presbyters (Acts 14:23; 20:17-35; 1 Tim 3:1-13; Tit 1:5-9). Moreover, in *Syria and especially in Palestine, alongside this organizational structure, a triad of "apostles," "prophets" and "teachers" coexisted throughout the entire 2nd c. (1 Cor 12:28-29; Eph 4:11; Didache 13 and 15); these were itinerant charismatics, in contradistinction to the presbyter-bishops and deacons, who instead remained established in one place and were chosen by the community.

At the time of the composition of the text titled Prima Clementis (i.e., the First Epistle of Clement—ca. 96), the communities of *Rome and Corinth were directed by a college of presbyters, who were likewise called "bishops"; 1 Clem. attests to—as do the Pastoral Epistles, which were almost contemporary—a fusion of the episcopal with the presbyteral ministry. Among the chief duties of the presbyter-bishops was the "offering of the sacrifice" (1 Clem. 44,4), which can be understood in the sense of the eucharistic celebration. The chief theological argument for the author of 1 Clem. consists in presenting this form of authority at the head of the Christian communities as established on divine ordination, by which not only the cosmos but also the entire history of salvation was ordered: the cosmic order, the cultic forms of the OT, and the organization of the presbyter-bishops and deacons in the church show that the organization of the Christian communities corresponds to an order established by God (1 Clem. 40,41 and 43,1-6); in fact, the presbyter-bishops and the deacons are presented as successors of the apostles (1 Clem. 42,1-5 and 44,1-2), and therefore the authority of the presbyter-bishops and deacons goes back, through the apostles and Jesus, to God himself. The Pastoral Epistles of the NT reflect the growing importance of the ecclesiastical duties as guarantors of a faithful continuity of the evangelical message (1 Tim 6:20; 2 Tim 1:12-14). These offices were granted by the laying on of hands—χειροτονία—of the "presbyters" (1 Tim 4:14; 2 Tim 1:6; cf. Acts 13:3; 14:23). In the Pastoral Epistles, deacons were also mentioned alongside bishops and presbyters; but an explanation is not given as to the relationship between these two offices—excluding for that time the possibility that it was hierarchical. The bishop was asked for an exemplary life, fidelity in the transmission of the gospel, and the ability to teach "sound doctrine" (1 Tim 3:1-7; Tit 1:7-9).

II. 2nd c.: Birth of the monarchical episcopate. In the 2nd c., the collegial form of government was disappearing; this phenomenon did not appear suddenly or simultaneously in every place. The type of organization that prevailed in the 2nd half of the 2nd c. consisted of a community governed by one sole bishop, who was assisted by presbyters and helped by deacons. One of the first testimonies to the monarchical episcopate and the hierarchical gradation between bishops, presbyters and deacons are the letters of *Ignatius of Antioch, whose dating varies between 110 and 160/170. According to Ignatius's typological thought, ecclesiastical organization and harmony are the image of the celestial organization and harmony: the bishop occupies the place of God (Magn. 6,1) and is the image of the Father (Trall. 3,1); the presbyters, deacons and the rest of the community must be subject to him (Magn. 2-3; Eph. 5,3; Smyrn. 8,1). Baptism, the Eucharist and charity can only be accomplished under his direction (Smyrn. 8,1-2). "Where the bishop is, there is the community, just as where Jesus Christ is, there is the catholic church" (Smyrn. 8,2). Ignatius discerned the foundation of the bishop's authority not in apostolic succession, nor in the creation of the episcopal office by Jesus Christ, but solely in the will of God, who desires that the bishop be the head of the administration of his house (Eph. 6,1). It is the bishop's duty to guarantee the unity of the Christian community; the bishop who, assisted in his functions by the presbyters and the deacons, presides over the eucharistic celebration (Philad. 4; Eph. 20,2), is the sacramental sign through whom the force of the *liturgy and the heavenly hierarchy spiritually produces the unity of the Christian community. The chronological list of bishops of *Rome presented by *Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. haer. 3,3,3) around the year 185 is significant. Irenaeus traces the list of Roman bishops back to *Linus, who was ordained as a bishop by the apostles *Peter and *Paul; the names that Irenaeus lists from Linus to *Anicetus must correspond to noteworthy individuals of the presbyteral college that governed the Roman church in those years. The objective of this list was to demonstrate the authentic origin and the faithful transmission of the apostolic preaching in the church in contrast with the heretical teachings of the *gnostics; in this light, it is very clear how apostolic succession in the person of the bishop guaranteed the continuity of faith. *Tertullian (De praescr. 21,4 and 32,1-3), around the year 200, insisted on the same form of argumentation used by Irenaeus.

Various theological and sociological factors converged in the quick spread of the monarchical episcopate: (1) bishops were able to resolve divisive conflicts within the communities, as the letters of Ignatius clearly emphasize (Magn. 10,1-3; Philad. 4; 7,2; 8,1; Eph. 20,2); (2) the Pastoral Epistles demanded from the bishop the ability to teach doctrine (1 Tim 3:2; 6:20; 2 Tim 4:2-5; Tit 1:9) and, for this reason, in the case of a controversy involving various opinions within the community, the word of the bishop was considered determinative because the apostolic teaching was presented as a closed deposit that was transmitted through the entrusted hands of the bishop; (3) in continuity with the Pastoral Epistles (1 Tim 3:15), the Christian community was presented in Ignatius's letters as the "house of God"—οἶκος θεοῦ—in which the bishop worked as the "paterfamilias"—οἰκοδεσπότης—or the "administrator"—οἰκονόμος—of the community; and (4) according to a sociological norm of human behavior, within the collegial government an eminent representative of this collegiality assumed the function of a spokesman or an overseer.

III. 3rd c.: Strengthening of the monarchical episcopate. This institution reached its full formalization in the 3rd c., as one learns from the Traditio Apostolica (Apostolic Tradition*—ca. 215) and *Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258) in the West and the Didascalia (mid-3rd c.) in the East. The *Traditio Apostolica (*3,3-5) records the prayer of the bishop's ordination with which the oversight of the community is clearly conferred, because this prayer invokes the "chief Spirit," Spiritus principalis, that Christ gave to the *apostles so that they would establish the church everywhere; with this spirit the bishops had the duty of leading their assigned community by serving God, offering the church's sacrifice, forgiving sins and entrusting the necessary duties to competent ministers. Cyprian presented the church as an episcopal church: "The bishop is in the church and the church is with the bishop; and if someone is not with the bishop, he is not in the church" (Ep. 66,8 Hartel). Cyprian strengthened the authority of the bishop in the administration of the forgiveness of sins because, on account of the controversy over the reconciliation of the *lapsed (lapsi), he attributed the full power over *penance only to the bishop and did not accept the idea that the *confessors of the faith appropriated this ability with their letters of peace. Cyprian discerned the foundation of the bishop's authority, the primary guarantor of ecclesiastical unity, in the promise made by Christ to *Peter (Ep. 3,1 and 66,8 Hartel) and in Christ's conferring of authority to the apostles (Ep. 69,11; 73,7; 75,16 Hartel). The Didascalia, returning to *Ignatius of Antioch, bears witness to the heavy influence of the OT in its portrayal of the bishop, who must be honored as if he were God (Didasc. 2,20,1), because he occupies his place (Didasc. 2,28,9); according to the Didascalia, the episcopal offices were liturgical, disciplinary-penitential and magisterial.

The establishment of the episcopal office under the form of the monepiscopacy, just as its theological foundation and its institutional strengthening, should be considered as one of the most important events of the postapostolic development of the church. The episcopal office established its theological foundation, as one can gather from the literary sources of the 1st, 2nd and 3rd c., on various principles: (1) the principle of succession, because the bishop is considered to be a successor of the apostles, who in turn were instituted by Jesus Christ or by God; (2) the principle of the image, because the bishop is considered to be the image of God, inasmuch as he serves the community in God's place, or rather as an earthly priest who works as the image of the heavenly high priest (Jesus Christ); and (3) the assumption of governing functions as a priest, pastor, teacher, judge in potential questions and director or administrator of charitable works. With respect to the appointment of bishops, the bishop was elected by the community (Trad. ap. 2) and subsequently ordained by other bishops through the laying on of hands, or the χειροτονία, and the prayer of consecration (Trad. ap. 3). At the end of the 2nd c. the custom developed of gathering either local or regional episcopal syndods, something which contributed to the growth of the κοινωνία (Lat. communio) between the bishops and the local churches.

IV. 4th and 5th c.: The bishops in the imperial church.

1. Theological aspects. From the theological point of view, the principle was strengthened, which was already present in the first three centuries, according to which the monarchical episcopate corresponded to God's will, his institution through Jesus Christ and the laying on of hands through the *apostles. This theological explanation placed the order of the Christian priesthood in relation to the action of Jesus Christ, so to speak, with his preaching and promises, the Last Supper and the institution of the *Eucharist, with the granting of the power to forgive sins, with the election of the disciples, to whom he entrusted the mission and with the sending of the *Holy Spirit. The contention that the theological foundation for the origins of the episcopate must be historically traced back to Jesus Christ himself is explained starting from the form of thought, proper to that time, which maintained that what was in place at that time was so since the beginning. With *Eusebius of Caesarea (Dem. Ev. 4,15,20) a distinction began to be made in the priestly action, the (threefold office) munus triplex of Christ—regal, sacerdotal and prophetic—in which the bishops fully participated. The theological vision on the priesthood presented by *Jerome was also important: he opposed the attempts of several deacons who dared to place themselves above the presbyters and affirmed that they could not consecrate the Eucharist, in contradistinction to the bishops and the *presbyters (Ep. 146). In the treatise De ecclesiastica hierarchia, written by ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite, the bishop is placed at the apex of a holy hierarchy, which is a reflection of the celestial hierarchy; this work, thanks to the supposed apostolic authority of the author, heavily contributed to strengthening the hierarchical conception of the Christian priesthood, at the apex of which was the bishop.

2. Spiritual aspects. From the viewpoint of spiritual theology, this period included the birth of literature on priestly spirituality. In addition to the lost work of *Theodore of Mopsuestia's De sacerdotio, three works of patristic literature have been preserved, which are known by the generic name of the "priestly trilogy": *Gregory of Nazianzus's Oratio II, *John Chrysostom's treatise De sacerdotio and *Gregory the Great's Regula pastoralis.

3. Juridical aspects. From the juridical point of view, various aspects must be taken into consideration. (1) Starting from the 4th c., the local church was not restricted to the city but extended to rural areas, with the logical consequence of a new principle of organization that was no longer only urban: the "dioceses"; this term drew its origin from the political administration of the empire, with the difference that the civil diocese consisted of various provinces. (2) The appointment of the bishops continued to follow the practice of previous centuries: election through the clergy with the approval of the community and ordination by means of a neighboring bishop (can. 4 of the Council of *Nicaea decreed that the bishops should be ordained by at least three others). An exception to this norm was the appointment of the bishop of *Constantinople, an appointment which was subject to the emperor's authority; moreover, the emperors approved the election of the bishops—or they deposed them—in the case of the episcopal sees of greater importance. (3) The transfer of a bishop to another diocese was prohibited (can. 15 and 16 of Nicaea and can. 5 of *Chalcedon); the biblical foundation for the prohibition of episcopal transfers was the indissolubility of marriage: according to an allegorical interpretation it was held that, just as Christ was the husband of the church (Eph 5:25-33), so too the bishop was spiritually wed to his diocese, sealing a union that only death could dissolve. (4) Starting from the 4th c., the practice of sexual continence among the clergy began to spread; the Christian West, starting from can. 33 of *Elvira (Illiberis) (ca. 306), imposed this type of continence upon bishops, presbyters and deacons; the East, on the other hand, starting from the Council of Nicaea (*Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. 1,11), kept alive the traditional practice, according to which clerics who married before ordination could live a married life without restrictions; nevertheless, the emperor *Justinian demanded celibacy of the bishops, which was subsequently made obligatory for the *Byzantine church in canons 12, 13 and 48 of the Synod of *Trullo in the year 692. (5) In the rural areas the χωρεπίσκοπος ("*chorbishop") was instituted, with pastoral duties in common with the city's ἐπίσκοπος ("bishop"), although some limited episcopal privileges were restricted, such as the administration of confirmation and holy orders, which remained reserved to the city's bishop. (6) The bishops of the dioceses of *Rome, *Alexandria, *Antioch, *Jerusalem and Constantinople were elevated to the level of patriarchs (can. 6 of the Council of Nicaea, can. 3 of the first Council of Constantinople and can. 28 of the Council of Chalcedon), to the point of acquiring authority over the other bishops of the patriarchate. Some Byzantine theologians, such as *Maximus the Confessor and Theodore the Studite, found a legitimate foundation for the authority of the five patriarchs in Mt 16:19, reuniting them under the sole concept of "pentarchy." Moreover, the diocese of *Carthage became the unquestioned *metropolis of Proconsular

*Africa, and for this reason the bishop of Carthage would reclaim the function of being "the first of all Africa," primus totius Africae; the diocese of *Milan was converted into an ecclesiastical center of great influence in N *Italy; and in the rest of the empire influential episcopal sees acquired and lost their metropolitan status on the basis of their political importance or decline. The institution of "apostolic vicars" at *Thessalonica (in the year 412 by Pope *Innocent I) and at *Arles (in the year 417 by Pope *Zosimus I) guaranteed the unity of the church and the influence of the bishop of Rome in the Eastern and Western parts of the empire.

4. Political-social aspects. From the political-social point of view, it is necessary to emphasize how, starting from the so-called Constantinian turn (313), there began a process of social "sacrilization" of the clergy and, more concretely, of the bishops. There is no doubt that, at the ontological level, every priest was a sacred person, but the public and official recognition of this reality is another question; in fact, the NT, when it treats the priesthood of Christ, does not allude to this external dimension of social status. Christian bishops were recognized officially and publicly as holders of the status of sacred persons starting from the 4th c. This new social position of Christian clergy was framed within the categories of thought proper to a Roman religiosity: God guaranteed prosperity and well-being to the state if proper adoration and worthy worship were offered to him. From the moment *Constantine chose the God of the Christians as his protector, he as a result also took on the responsibility of this God's worship. For this reason, Christian priests received from Constantine a series of civil privileges (privilegium immunitatis and privilegium fori). Dispensed thereby from specific civil services, priests were better able to fulfill their own clerical duties so that no impediment would interfere in the completion of the worship owed to the divinity (see *Eusebius of Caesarea, Hist. eccl. 10,7,2). Moreover, in the year 318 the audientia episcopalis* was granted to the bishops, through which juridical status in the matter of civil law, but not in penal law, was granted. Nevertheless, it came about that the bishops began to obtain duties proper to imperial officers such as those of governors or social assistants; thus, for example, *Basil, the metropolitan bishop of Caesarea in *Cappadocia was at the same time the exarch of the political diocese of *Pontus. This awareness of clerical status, which was increasingly more influential within society, became external in the liturgical vestments and other external forms that emphasized the privileged position of the bishops; *John Chrysostom, however (In Ep. II ad Cor. 20,2), was opposed to the idea of putting on a clerical garment, condemning the cassock as a luxury that failed to demonstrate one's solidarity with the poor and that was incompatible with the generosity of almsgiving. One cannot determine with certainty whether the bishops were elevated by Constantine to the noble rank of viri illustres ("famous men"), something which would have allowed them to adorn themselves with the honorary insignia proper to this social status; it is certain that some elements of the liturgical attire and the episcopal rite went back to the models of the Late Antique civil nobility, but this does not indicate an official appointment by Constantine, which does not appear either in the literary or juridical sources. The office of social promotion and assistance for the poor and those in need, to whom the bishops were committed, was noteworthy and higher than the assistance which in the 2nd- and 3rd-c. Christian communities had supplied needy brethren; the bishops of Late Antiquity assumed the responsibility of supplying the population with food that it did not receive from the state food administration, which by that time was not functioning well. The social prestige of the bishops grew enormously for a number of reasons: they were responsible for the religious life in every place; they were members of the old city's elite and administrators of charitable works for the poor; for this reason, the bishop's authority was recognized as a pater populi ("father of the people"), pater civitatis ("father of the citizenry"), pater urbis ("father of the city") or pater patriae ("father of the homeland").

V. 5th-7th c.: The bishops leading the churches in the Germanic countries. After the stabilization of the Germanic peoples for the entire 5th c. in the empire's territories, the ecclesiastical structures of the Western empire underwent significant transformations. Because of the social disorder caused by the invasions of the Germanic peoples, the prohibition of transferring bishops weakened to the point that more than one bishop was removed with force from his see; it seemed fitting for the good of the church that any bishop who was impeded in his functions be transferred to another see. Just as had occurred with the emperors of the Roman Empire, the king of each Germanic nation was the leader and guarantor of the religious life of his people; therefore, the Germanic kings labored to maintain the unity of the religious faith as a guarantee of national unity. To this end they frequently called together the bishops so that they would gather in national synods, and the kings were the ones that confirmed and implemented the decisions of these councils. Even the pope's decisions were applied in each nation only after the cautious authorization of the king. In this way one can explain the fact that the kings progressively appropriated the right to appoint bishops.

J. Neumann, Bischof I: TRE 6 (1980) 653-682; J. Zizioulas, Épiskopè et Épiskopos dans l'Église primitive: bref inventaire de la documentation: Irénikon 56 (1983) 484-502; R.M. Hübner, Die Anfänge von Diakonat, Presbyteriat und Episkopat in der frühen Kirche, in A. Rauch - P. Imhof (eds.), Das Priestertum in der Einen Kirche, Aschaffenburg 1987, 45-89; A. Faivre, Ordonner la fraternité, Paris 1992; E. Dassmann, Entstehung und theologische Begründung der kirchlichen Ämter in der Alten Kirche, Bonn 1993; A. Weiser - H.J. Pottmeyer, Bischof: LTK[3] 2, 481-486; C. O'Donnell - S. Pié-Ninot, Diccionario de eclesiología, Madrid 2001, 780-789; K.S. Frank, Lehrbuch der Geschichte der Alten Kirche, Paderborn [3]2002, 100-113, 309-320; E. Elm, Die Macht der Weisheit: das Bild des Bischofs in der Vita Augustini des Possidius und anderen spätantiken und frühmittelalterlichen Bischofsviten, Leiden 2003; A. Sterk, Renouncing the World Yet Leading the Church. The Monk-Bishop in Late Antiquity, Cambridge, MA - London 2004.

A. Viciano

BITHYNIA and PONTUS. Region of Asia Minor that at its greatest extension spread from the Hellespont on the Propontis (Sea of Marmara) to the SE extremity of the Pontus Euxinus (Black Sea), also including Honorias and Paphlagonia. Bithynia Pontus was the name of the province established in 65–64 BC, after the Roman conquest (Tacitus, Annals I, 74). The witnesses to the apostolic glossolalia on the day of *Pentecost included inhabitants of Pontus; Aquila was also from there (Acts 2:9; 18:2). The rapid expansion of Christianity in that region is attested by 1 Pet, addressed to the "exiles [= Christians] of the diaspora in Pontus and Bithynia." 1 Pet alludes to a state of persecution not unlike that referred to by *Pliny the Younger, governor of the province in 112 (Ep. 96), in his letter to *Trajan; the letter is certainly later than *Nero, perhaps datable to 80–95 (DBS, VII, 1444-1453). In Pontus, the progress of the gospel is attested by the work of *Gregory Thaumaturgus. In Bithynia, the era of the martyrs culminated in the massacre of *Nicomedia, the imperial residence from the time of *Diocletian, which occasioned *Lactantius's conversion. The first ecumenical council (325) and the last of the patristic era (787) met at *Nicaea, rival of *Nicomedia (where *Constantine was baptized) as capital of Bithynia. The first phase of *Arianism brought the episcopate of Bithynia into prominence due to *Eusebius of Nicomedia. *Chalcedon was the seat of the fourth ecumenical council (451), which confirmed Nicomedia's precedence and, in can. 28, extended the jurisdiction of the patriarchate of *Constantinople to *Pontus, a region made illustrious by the *Cappadocians and from which *Evagrius of Pontus took his name.

In the first Notitia episcopatuum, that of ps.-Epiphanius (7th c.), Bithynia was divided into three ecclesiastical provinces, listed in seventh, eighth and ninth place in the Taxis. The first had Nicomedia as metropolis, with eight suffragans; the second, Nicaea, with three suffragans; the third, Chalcedon, with none (Darrouzès 204, 208); Pontus was divided in two: Helenopontus with its metropolis *Amasea, and Pontus Polemoniacus with its metropolis *Neocaesarea, with five suffragans including Trebizond (ibid., 204-205; 209). *Monasticism developed admirably in Bithynia (in the diocese of Chalcedon alone, 40 *hegumens signed the Synod of Constantinople of 536: Mansi, VIII, 1013-1081), esp. in Olympus, and in Pontus in the region of Trebizond. Altogether there were ca. 150 church buildings and more than 250 *monasteries (OCP XXXI [1975] 319), mostly from the patristic era, dominated by the Saccudion (St. Plato and St. Theodore the Studite) and by the monastic federation of Altroa (St. Peter).

DHGE IX, 20-27, cf. IV, 968-988; DB V, 538-542; EC II, 1681-1682; ODB 1,292; 3,1697; R. Janin, Les Églises et les monastères des grands centres byzantins (Bithynie, . . . Trébizonde . . .), Paris 1975; J. Darrouzès, Notitiae episcopatuum Ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae, Paris 1981.

D. Stiernon

BLANDINA (2nd c.). The most famous of the martyrs of *Lyons of 177. "In her, Christ showed that what to human eyes is without beauty, form or value is in God's eyes worthy of great glory, for the love its bears him" (Eus., HE V, 1,17). Bound to a stake as to a cross, to her companions in martyrdom she appeared to be the very image of Christ (ibid., 41), because "she had put on the garments of the great and unconquered athlete, Christ" (ibid., 42). She died after sending all of her companions ahead of her to God, and went to martyrdom "as to a wedding feast" (ibid., 55); "the pagans themselves admitted that never among them had a woman borne so many and such harsh torments" (ibid., 56). Feast 2 June, with the other martyrs of Lyons.

Eusebius, HE V, 1, 17-56; DHGE 9, 130; BS 3, 202; Atti e passioni dei martiri, intr. by A.A.R. Bastiaensen, critical text and commentary, eds. A.A.R. Bastiaensen et al., Fondazione Lorenzo Valla, Milan 1987, 59-95; Histoire des saints, II, 74-82; W.H.C. Frend, Blandina and Perpetua: Two Early Christian Heroines, in Les martyrs de Lyon (177). Lyon 20-23 septembre 1977 (Colloques internationaux du Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, 575), Paris 1978, 167-177; M.L. Guillaumin, Une jeune fille qui s'appelait Blandine. Aux origines d'une tradition hagi- ographique, in Epektasis. Mélanges offerts au card. J. Daniélou, Paris 1972, 93-98; A. Valerio, Le figure femminili negli atti dei martiri del II secolo: Rassegna di Teologia 22 (1981) 35-37; U. Mattioli, Astheneia e andreia: Aspetti della femminilità nella letteratura classica, biblica e cristiana antica, Rome 1983, 146-147; P.A. Gramaglia, Interpretazioni e personificazioni. Personificazioni e modelli del femminile, Atti del Nono Colloquio sulla Interpretazione (Macerata, 6-8 aprile 1987), ed. G. Galli, Genoa 1988, 103-105; C. Mazzucco, Figure di donne cristiane: la martire, in La donna nel mondo antico. Atti del II convegno nazionale di studi (Turin 18-20 aprile), ed. R. Uglione, Turin 1989, 167-195; F.E. Consolino, La donna negli Acta martyrum, in La donna nel pensiero cristiano antico, ed. U. Mattioli, Genoa 1992, 95-117; E.G. Hinson, Women among Martyrs: SP 25 (1993) 423-428; V. Saxer, Atti dei martiri dei primi tre secoli, Padua ²1989, 57-71; LCI 5, 415.

V. Saxer

BLASTUS. This martyr, buried in the cemetery ad clivum cucumeris on the via Salaria antica, is listed on 17 June in the Mart. hier., and also mentioned in the 8th-c. Itineraria. We know nothing with certainty of him or of his martyrdom. If we believe the inscription of Paschal II (817–824) in S. Prassede, his body was brought to Rome from somewhere else.

Mart. hier. 322-323; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 37-38; BS 3, 204-205; AASS nov. 2, 2, 322ff.; DHGE 9, 161ff. (F.O' Brian); Lexicon f. Theologie und Kirche, Freiburg-Basel-Rome-Vienna 1994, 2, col. 523 (M. Stark).

V. Saxer

BLASTUS (2nd c.). A Roman schismatic about whom we have little information; he may have been a *presbyter during *Victor's pontificate. Four independent and discordant ancient sources speak of him. According to ps.-Tertullian (Adversus omnes haer. 8: CSEL 47,225) he was a *quartodeciman; *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE 5, 15) speaks of him in the context of the *Montanists, but this does not make him one, since the historian was following a chronological order. *Pacian of Barcelona considered him a Montanist (Ep. 1,1: PL 13, 1053B); *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, a Valentinian heretic (Haer. fab. 1,23: PG 83, 3). *Irenaeus of Lyons wrote him a letter (lost), the contents of which are unknown (Eusebius, HE 5, 20,1).

DHGE 9,161; LTK³ 2, 523; P. de Labriolle, La crise montaniste, Paris 1913, 276-277.

A. Di Berardino

BLESILLA (2nd half 4th c.). Saint, feast 22 January. Daughter of the Roman noblewoman *Paula and sister of *Eustochium. Widowed young, at age 20 after a grave illness, she embraced the *ascetic life at the encouragement of *Jerome; she followed her mother to Bethlehem, where she died four months later (383). Disturbances broke out at her funeral, as the people attributed her death to the excessive austerity of *monastic practices. Jerome wrote a letter to Paula comforting her over the loss of her daughter, whose intellectual and spiritual virtues he attested (Ep. 39).

BHL 1367; AASS. Ian. II, Venice 1734, 416-417; PCBE 2, Blesilla, 310-311; Ch. Krumeich, Hieronymus und die Christlichen feminae clarissimae, Bonn 1993; G. Jenal, Italia ascetica atque monastica, Das Asketen-und Mönchtum in Italien von den Anfängen bis zur Zeit der Longobarden (ca. 150/250-604), in Monographien zur Geschichte des Mittelalters 39, 1-2, Stuttgart 1995.

G. Pilara

BLESSING

I. Origin - II. Development - III. Types - IV. Ministers of benediction.

I. Origin. In the OT, blessing (v. barāk, eulogeō; n. barākâh, eulogia) refers both to public confession of God's power and generosity and to the favor God grants to human beings when he gives them good fortune (Léon-Dufour 38-39). Things (e.g., fields, property) are blessed insofar as they are good for people worthy of blessing. Human beings may bless, but the source of every blessing is God: thus its non-magical character. For the person who blesses, blessing is immutable: once given, only God, its source, can withdraw it (Bauer I, 71-73). The NT emphasizes the spiritual aspect of blessing, which will have its *eschatological fulfillment on the last day (Mt 25:34). Blessing in the NT is centered on Christ, in whom "we have been blessed with every spiritual blessing" (Eph 1:3). The church has received the faculty to bless to the extent that Christ has given it the Spirit, with its gifts of regeneration, fruitfulness, renewal, life, peace, joy and unity; but the Spirit, God himself, is blessing par excellence, manifesting in himself all the great OT themes of blessing. In Mt 14:19; 26:26; Lk 24:30; 1 Cor 10:6, blessing indicates the ritual action that effects divine favor.

II. Development. It is not surprising that the first common Christian blessings were Jewish or Pauline in inspiration—as in the letters of *Ignatius of Antioch (DACL 2/1, 672)—or connected with the eucharistic elements and with ordination/designation for liturgical and/or ecclesial service. The oldest developed formulas of blessing are in *Hippolytus's Traditio Apostolica (3rd c.), where blessing is directed not just at ordination/designation but also at objects connected with initiation (water, oil) and liturgical use, a practice already alluded to by *Tertullian (Bapt. 4,4). Tertullian situates the theology of blessing in the sphere of sacramentum and gives two types, conversationis sacramentum and disciplinae sacramentum (De Test. anim. 2: PL 1, 611); the latter refers to liturgical blessing, esp. during the *Eucharist, a practice found in the Traditio Apostolica and mentioned by *Augustine in a letter to Paulinus (PL 33, 636). The classical definition of blessing is that of *Ambrose: benedictio est sanctificationis et gratiarum votiva collatio (PL 14, 707). God is always its source, blessing is the work of the Spirit, and the power to bless resides in the church, which has inherited it from the priesthood of Aaron (Apos. Con. I, 2,57: cf. DTC 2, 632). The old medieval liturgical sources, Veronense, Gregorianum, Gelasianum and Hadrianum-Gregorianum, all show ample development both of the formulas of blessing and its objects. The Supplementum Anianense (9th c.) of the Hadr. Greg. contains a fairly complete list of episcopal blessings super populum, which take place during the Eucharist between the Lord's Prayer and Communion. The blessings themselves are of Gallican origin and reflect theological development and liturgical erudition (EC 2, 1300).

III. Types. Blessing considered in itself can be constitutive or invocative. Constitutive blessing is that which confers a permanent consecration for divine service: e.g., the blessing of liturgical vestments. A more solemn type of blessing uses, e.g., oil of consecration, as in the blessing of a church. In invocative blessing, the person or object is not permanently changed: e.g., the blessing of the sick, which implies the church's intercession on their behalf (CE 2, 164). Blessings can also be considered in reference to persons or things.

1. Persons. Of the various blessings, the principal ones are those of ordination (sometimes called consecration) of bishops, *presbyters, deacons (see Diakonia - Diaconate), *subdeacons and for minor orders, and those designating *widows and *virgins (Martimort 684-685). *Catechumens were blessed before being dismissed from the eucharistic assembly and various times during the catechumenate. The assembly was blessed before being dismissed and sometimes during the Eucharist. The Euchology of Serapion (c. 350) contains a blessing for the sick (Deiss, 189), as does the Gelasianum (ed. Mohlberg, n. 1543), which also contains episcopal blessings given upon entering a house (nos. 1544-1547). Special categories of blessing are (1) super populum: there are 15 of these in the Gelasianum (nos. 1273-1287), 13 of which are reproduced in the Fränkische Gelasianum (nos. 1569-1581). The Supplementum Anianense of the Hadr. Greg. gives 51 fully developed texts under the title "Episcopal Blessings," composed for the seasons and feasts of the *liturgical year (Le Sac. Grégorien, nos. 1738-1788). (2) Nuptial blessings: *Ignatius of Antioch (d. ca. 107) mentions the bishop's action in relation to Christian marriage, though his reference is rather obscure (Ad Polyc.: PG 5, 723), while *Tertullian refers to the nuptial blessing ratified by the heavenly Father (Ad Ux.: PL 1, 1415; cf. De Pud.: PL 2, 1038; Ambr., Ep. 19: PL 16, 984; Cyr. Al., In Joann.: PG 73, 223). The Gelasianum (nos. 1451-1454) cites nuptial blessings pronounced after the Lord's Prayer at mass, and again after Communion (see Martène 127-144 for other formulas). (3) Abbots and abbesses: the oldest formula is in the Gregorianum (Lietzmann n. 216) and consists of a simple prayer. The Sacram. Gellonense (8th c.) reproduces the prayer of the Greg. with additional formulas (Martimort 739-740). A more complex ritual developed in the postpatristic era.

2. Things. The oldest significant references are to objects connected with the Eucharist, the agape* and Christian initiation. Gifts of oil, cheese, olives, fruit and flowers offered to the bishop were blessed, as were the cup and bread of the agape, lamps for evening prayer and oil for initiation (Traditio Apos. passim). The Gelasianum contains the blessing of the Easter candle and the font, as do all the other major later *sacramentaries, together with the solemn blessing of the oils (Gel. 382-452 passim). In this phase we find the introduction of objects connected with worship, such as altar, chalice and paten. At the time of the Supplementum Anianense the range of objects to be blessed was greatly extended under the influence of *monasticism, and included places such as the refectory, dormitory, scriptorium, kitchen, granary, etc.

IV. Ministers of benediction. The Apostolic Constitutions* warn that blessing is a task of bishops and presbyters and must not be usurped by deacons or laity, a principle that was followed faithfully in the patristic era (DACL 2, 674). The Traditio Apostolica makes an exception, saying that hands are laid on the catechumen by his guide (teacher), whether cleric or lay person (n. 19).

DACL 2, 670-685; DTC 2, 629-640; CE 2, 613; EC 2, 1300; Dictionary of Biblical Theology, ed. X. Léon-Dufour, London 1967, 35-39; Encyclopedia of Biblical Theology I, ed. J. Bauer, London 1970, 69-75; E. Martène, De Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus, II, Antuerpiae 1763, 127-144; Das Sacramentarium Gregorianum, ed.

H. Lietzmann (LQF 3), Münster 1921; Sacramentarium Veronense, ed. L. Mohlberg, Rome 1966; La Tradition Apostolique de Saint Hippolyte, ed. B. Botte, Münster 1967; Springtime of the Liturgy, ed. L. Deiss, Collegeville 1967, 183-208; Liber Sacramentorum Romanae Aeclesiae ordinis anni circuli, ed. L. Mohlberg, Rome 1968; Le Sacramentaire Grégorien, ed. J. Deshusses, Fribourg 1971; Das Fränkische Sacramentarium Gelasianum, ed. L. Mohlberg, Münster 1939 (LQF 1/2); A.G. Martimort, La Chiesa in preghiera, Rome 1966, 716-732 and 739-740; A.M. Triacca, Le benedizioni "invocative" in genere e su "persone," e su "realtà cosmiche," in I. Scicolone et al., Anamnesis, vol. 7, Genoa 1989, 111-166; Liturgia, eds. D. Sartore, A.M. Triacca, C. Cibien, Cinisello Balsamo 2001, 239-256.

P. Fahey

BLOOD. In the extreme variety of meanings and religious values attributed to blood in various historical and cultural contexts, its relationship with that of a being's living force is one of the most widespread and fundamental. It is well known how in the OT tradition there exists an identification between blood and *soul (anima), from which derives the prohibition of the consumption of the blood of animals. In relation to sacrificial rites, it performs an important function in the same tradition, and it has multiple significations as a means of expiation and purification, while it represents one of the chief ritual elements that converges in the stipulation of the covenant between God and the people (see Ex 24:6-7).

In the Christian perspective, the blood of Christ acquired a central role in salvation, in its expiatory function, and in its impact on the sacramental level of the *eucharistic rite. With respect to the *evangelists, it was primarily *John who insisted on the relationship of the continuity between the Passover sacrifice and the death of Christ, which comes to be likened, therefore, to the new Passover (Jn 19:31-37). It was simultaneously placed as the "founding" of the new people of God, the church, whose chief *sacraments (*baptism and Eucharist) were prefigured in the blood mixed with *water flowing from the side of the crucified one. These essential themes provided the basis for the theological and mystical meditation of Christian authors on the value and meaning of Christ's blood as an instrument of redemption.

EC 10, 1778-1780; Dizionario enciclopedico di spiritualità, II, Roma 1975, 1657-1658; var. aus., Sangue e antropologia biblica, ed. F. Vattioni, I-II, Rome 1981; var. aus., Sangue e antropologia biblica nella Patristica, ed. F. Vattioni, I-II, Rome 1982; vol. III, Rome 1983; var. aus., Sangue e antropologia nella liturgia, ed. F. Vattioni, I-III, Roma 1984; var. aus., Sangue e antropologia nella liturgia, ed. F. Vattioni, I-III, Rome 1987; var. aus., Sangue e antropologia nella teologia, ed. F. Vattioni, I-III, Rome 1989.

S. Sfameni Gasparro

BODY. It is precisely in antiquity that the cult of the body became widespread, but this euphoria concealed a deep nostalgia. The body was disparaged as the "enemy" of the soul. In the Bible, however, the body indicated the person in his key states: the state of nature and of sin, consecration to Christ, life in glory. While the OT uses the same term (basar) for both flesh and body, the Greek of the NT uses two different terms: σάρξ and σῶμα, a distinction which acquires its full value in the light of faith.

The confrontation in this area between the Bible and philosophical thought was not easy: traces of *dualism persist longer in *anthropology than in cosmology. The orthodox reaction against the dualism of the *heretics was decisive for the historical development of the conception of the body. For the *gnostics, says *Irenaeus, "since the body was derived from the earth, it is impossible for it to be saved" (Adv. haer. V, 27,9: SC 153, 112). But such a condemnation of the body implies a misunderstanding of the compexity of the Christian mystery: *creation, *incarnation, *redemption. And the Fathers, while leaning heavily on *Plato, clearly maintain that the body is an integral part of human nature. It is "capable of being immortal," says Irenaeus in his reply to the gnostics (ibid., V, 12,4,154).

But at the same time the patterns of Greek thought raised many problems for the spiritual life, such as the relation between soul and body, which in the last analysis derived from the idea that the heteronomous being/essence was mysteriously united by divine wisdom. After the fall, this union acquired an essentially dialectical character: it was an opposition which grew or diminished according to the person's degree of *spirituality. In the severe *ascesis of the monks, expressions that could indicate the Christian experience of the "lust of the flesh," which struggled against the spirit and had to be dominated, were mingled, in a proportion hard to determine, with a radical mistrust of the body, in which we would be tempted to see the influence of Platonism. One thing is certain: in this field, expressions can never be understood outside of their context, since their value depends on the author, the circumstances in which they were pronounced, their purpose, their audience, whether they were an exposition of the Christian faith or an exhortation to renunciation. More frequently than in systematic treatises, the Fathers express their thought in maxims, often non-Christian in origin, which found their justification in the context. The most frequent were the following: the body is a prison, a tomb of the soul; the soul must be wrested from the "chains of the flesh," from bondage to a corpse; the flesh is like a mire in which the soul can only be defiled and degraded; the body is a "coat of skin," a "horrid mask"; the body is not the same as my essence, but it is my first "good"; we must despise, maltreat, kill the body; we must distrust this "ungrateful friend who weaves snares." Positive aphorisms are more rare: the body is the "instrument of the spirit," like the flute under the flutist's fingers, "the soul's companion in work."

Although the theory of the human body may seem complex, in practice spiritual authors were fully aware of the two imperatives so well emphasized by *Gregory of Nazianzus (Or. 2,17: PG 35, 425ff.): we must fight temptation, the demon in the body, but at the same time we must spiritualize the body and through it the whole visible cosmos.

DSp 2, 2338-2378; 7, 496-514; J. Daniélou, Les tuniques de peau chez Grégoire de Nysse in Glaube, Geist, Geschichte. Festschr. für Ernst Benz, Leiden 1967, 355-367; T. Špidlík, L'ascesi nella Chiesa Orientale: Rivista di vita spirituale 31 (1977) 496-514; and in Ascesi cristiana, ed. E. Ancilli, Rome 1977, 163-181; Id., La spiritualité de l'Orient chrétien. Manuel systématique: OCA 206, Rome 1978, 111ff., 358ff. (bibl.); E. Bellini, Il corpo e la salvezza dell'uomo nella riflessione dei Padri: Communio 54 (1980) 18-26; F. Bottomley, Attitudes to the Body in Western Christendom, London 1979; J. Fantino, L'homme image de Dieu chez saint Irenée de Lyon, Paris 1986; P. Brown, The Body and Society, New York 1988 (It. tr., Il corpo e la società, Turin 1992); E. Musatto, Il problema del corpo in S. Agostino, Rome 1990; D.B. Martin, The Christian Body, New Haven 1995; D. Montserrat, Changing Bodies, Changing Meaning: Studies of the Human Body in Antiquity, London 1998; Cultura e promozione umana. La cura del corpo e dello spirito nell'antichità classica e nei primi secoli cristiani. Un messaggio ancora attuale?, eds. E. Dal Covolo - I. Giannetto, Rome 1998.

T. Špidlík

BOETHIUS (d. ca. 525). Anicius Manlius Torquatus Severinus Boethius (Torquatus may have been a later addition) was born at *Rome between 475–480. He lost his father—Flavius Narsetes Manlius Boethius, consul in 487—while still young and was taken in by the family of the nobleman Quintus Aurelius Memmius Symmachus, where he received his early education. The cognomen Boethius may indicate Greco-Byzantine roots. His paternal grandfather was Flavius Boethius, praetorian prefect, whom the emperor *Valentinian III had put to death along with general Aetius in 454 for reasons still not entirely clear. Both his natural family, the Anicii, and his adoptive family, the Symmachi (whose ancestors included the famous *Symmachus who a century earlier had petitioned the emperor to restore the *Altar of Victory), had long been Christian, and there is no reason to doubt that he received sound religious instruction. His higher education, however, has been much disputed.

A supposed stay in Greece at the school of *Athens is no longer believed, despite its being attested by De disciplina scholarium (PL 64, 1232 B: annis duobus de viginti Athenis convalui), a work no longer attributed to Boethius by anyone, and a mention in *Cassiodorus (Var. I, 45,3: sic enim Atheniensium scholas longe positus introisti), on whose erroneous interpretation the false information of De disciplina is presumably based. On the basis of more concrete indications—the possibility of identifying Boethius's father with the Boethius who was prefect of *Alexandria from 475–477, and the supposed presence of the exegetical works of Ammonius Hermiae among the sources of many Boethian writings—the hypothesis of a more or less direct contact with the school of *Alexandria has been formulated. Today, however, the Ammonian influence, repeatedly upheld esp. by Courcelle, is contested on all sides, and scholars no longer credit the theory of an Alexandrian apprenticeship unconditionally.

While still young he married Symmachus's virtuous daughter Rusticiana, and his technical knowledge (in singular contrast with the purely theoretical character of his surviving work) quickly attracted the attention of King *Theodoric who, even before his election as ordinary consul sine collega (510), honored Boethius with many prestigious tasks such as choosing a citharoedus to send to *Clovis, king of the Franks, overseeing the work of the Arcarius praefectorum, who seemed to be minting underweight coins, and finally (though perhaps some years after his consulate) supervising the construction of two clocks, one solar and one hydraulic, to be sent to the *Burgundian king Gundobad. We know little or nothing of Boethius's activity in the decade following his consulate, but he presumably held the office of Praefectus urbis. A much higher post, that of Magister officiorum, a kind of general superintendent of affairs of court and state, was entrusted to him from 522, the same year in which his two sons assumed the dignity of consul. With such huge successes, Boethius seemed to have reached the apex of his political career and his fortune, but within two years he was completely and utterly ruined. We learn from Boethius's Consolatio (1, pr. 4) and from the so-called Anonymus Valesianus that the cause of his downfall was his support of the senator Albinus who, according to the king's informer Cyprian, was guilty of secret agreements with the Eastern emperor against Theodoric. The accusation was confirmed by three false witnesses (Basil, Opilione and Gaudentius) and aggravated by the charge, perhaps more serious, of *magic. Boethius's great friend and patron Symmachus also met the same fate a year later. Condemned and exiled to Pavia in the much-discussed and disputed Ager Calventianus, he was put to death by Theodoric on a date that oscillates, according to scholars' reconstructions, between 524 and 526. His bones rest in the crypt of the church of S. Pietro in Ciel d'oro at Pavia, where Boethius, following a decision of Leo XIII, is officially venerated as a saint.

Apart from the reasons just mentioned—the only ones given by the sources—many scholars have supposed that behind Boethius's condemnation lay a religious motivation. It has been hypothesized that in condemning Boethius—whose theological treatises made him a spokesman for the most orthodox theses in *trinitarian and *christological matters—the *Arian Theodoric in some way meant to react against the anti-Arian measures taken at that time by the emperor *Justin. There are objective difficulties, however, with the chronological succession of events, to the extent that even the inverse thesis—i.e., that the condemnation of persons such as Boethius and Symmachus had stimulated, if not provoked, those measures—cannot be excluded a priori. The fact remains incontestable that the failure of Pope *John I's mission to the East to achieve Theodoric's wishes, and the consequent irreparable break, both political and religious, between the *Gothic king and the emperor, were events that, esp. if considered in their immediate and remote causes, abundantly explain the climate in which the drama of Boethius matured and reached its tragic conclusion.

Boethius's work has various aspects of differing importance for ascertaining his place in the patristic tradition. The publication in 1877 of a fragment of Cassiodorus commonly known as the Anecdoton Holderi has finally settled all doubts about the authenticity of the so-called Opuscula sacra (which are at least partially mentioned in that fragment) and consequently about Boethius's adherence to Christianity. The singular aporia, however, that gave rise to those doubts is still open to discussion: the fact that Boethius's famous Consolatio philosophiae, composed in exile at Pavia in the certain expectation of imminent death, does not contain a single explicit profession of Christian faith. The prevalent "lay" character of the greater part of Boethius's writings is incontestable. It is commonly agreed that at the beginning of his work must be placed the four treatises of the so-called quadrivium, a term coined by Boethius himself to designate the four mathematical disciplines of the encyclopedic canon: arithmetic, *music, geometry and astronomy. Only the first two survive, but convincing evidence seems to confirm that he completed the whole project. At this point, a comparison with the precedent set by *Augustine—the projected adaptation of Varro's Disciplinae, partially realized in the lost Liber de grammatica and the six books De musica—would seem to suggest itself, but the two surviving treatises (of which the first, on arithmetic, is a translation of Nicomachus and the second, on music, is a complex compilation from Greek sources, esp. Nicomachus and Ptolemy) contain not the least hint at that precedent or at even vaguely Christian problems.

The same is true, and with more reason, of the logical works that constitute the most imposing part of Boethius's output and in which we must distinguish between translations (*Porphyry's Isagoge; *Aristotle's Categories, De interpretatione, Prior analytics, Topics, Elenchi sofistici), commentaries (on Porphyry's Isagoge [in two redactions], De interpretatione [also in two redactions]; Aristotle's Categories; Cicero's Topics) and independent treatises (De divisione, Introductio ad syllogismos categoricos or Antipraedicamenta, Introductio in categoricos syllogismos, De hypotheticis syllogismis, De differentiis topicis). With the complex problems of textual criticism, authenticity, source criticism and nomenclature that this vast production involves, scholars of the caliber of Courcelle, Minio Paluello, Shiel, De Rijk, De Vogel, Stumpf—to cite only the greatest—have been occupying themselves for years, but there are still many problems to be resolved and much material to investigate. All are aware that this whole output, inspired by the grandiose project (see In de int. II, 79,9 M.) of translating and commenting on the whole of Plato and Aristotle in order to demonstrate the essential identity of their views, presents no explicitly Christian ideas. Based on his logical training, Boethius in the Opuscula sacra confronts the complex problems of the Trinity and Christology, presumably out of concern for controversies arising at the time on the margins of resurgent *theopaschism and the *Acacian schism, but also to define his own personal metaphysic. While in the first treatise, De Trinitate, based on Augustine's homonymous work (explicitly mentioned in the proemium), the relation between unity and Trinity in God is illustrated through the Aristotelian category of relation, and in the fifth, Contra Eutychen et Nestorium, the orthodox thesis of the coexistence of two natures and one person in Christ is developed through a full and subtle discussion of the two concepts of nature and person, the third treatise, De hebdomadibus, confronts a theme of primary importance for later speculation, that of the relation between esse ("essence") and id quod est ("existence"), resolving it with a metaphysical construction of which some aspects are original, through the important and controversial concept of participation. The relation to contemporary theological discussions is evident, esp. in the fifth treatise, which has clear references to *heresies and to the theopaschite controversy, but the treatment is exclusively logical-theoretical, without the least reference to biblical texts. The same is true of the second treatise, Utrum Pater et Filius et Spiritus Sanctus de Divinitate substantialiter praedicentur, which is simply a brief resumé of the theme of the first, but not the fourth, the controversial De fide catholica, a sort of salvation history on the basis of Scripture. For this reason and for stylistic ones, variously judged and evaluated, the De fide catholica continues to be considered inauthentic by a significant number of scholars, despite the initial profession of trinitarian faith which seems to connect it, at least formally, with the first two.

What has been said of the definitely authentic theological treatises attenuates, at least in part, the contrast with the Consolatio and with the absence, in that work also, of any explicit or certain reference to Scripture. Conceived in the form of the satura menippea (a mixed composition of alternating prose and verse), this work, the spiritual testament of the still young Boethius, is in the form of a long conversation between the philosopher and philosophy, which appears to him in his prison in the form of a mulier reverendi admodum vultus (a very reverent-looking woman) and discusses, in largely philosophical terms, the great themes of the inconstancy of fortune, the true nature of the summum bonum, providence, free will and the perpetuity of the world. Even medieval exegetes noted that not only does the work lack any explicit reference to the Christian faith but here and there it also puts forward ideas that are not entirely orthodox; we cannot doubt, however, Boethius's faith in the great truths which Christianity shares with the Platonic strand of ancient thought to which he primarily seems to be connected, though through an extremely complex and still much-disputed cultural mediation. Whether the Christian faith played a part in this mediation is something that, even recently, not a few scholars have investigated, and the basic problem of Boethius, the lack of explicit Christian profession, remains open to the most divergent and contrasting solutions. In addition to numerous versions of Platonic, Aristotelian and Hippocratic works, throughout the Middle Ages De unitate et uno and De disciplina scholarium (which contains the false information concerning his stay at Athens) were falsely attributed to Boethius.

CPL 878-894; PL 63, 537-1439; PL 64; CSEL 48 (In Porph. isag. comm.); CCL 94 (Philos. consolatio); this work was also published in CSEL 94. There are numerous editions of the Consolatio, the most recent being De consolatione philosophiae; Opuscula theologica, ed. C. Moreschini, Munich 2000. Trans.: Consolazione della filosofia: Fr.: Paris 1937; Eng.: Oxford 1900; Cambridge, MA and London 1918 (numerous reprintings); Baltimore 1969; P.G. Walsh, New York 1999; It.: Florence 1942; Rome 1946; Catania 1961; Rome 1968; Boezio, La consolazione della filosofia. Opuscoli teologici, ed. L. Obertello, Milan 1978; C. Moreschini, Turin 1994; Sp.: Mexico 1945; Madrid 1964; L. Pozzi, Boezio, Trattato sulla divisione, Padua 1969; Anicii Manlii Severini Boethii "De divisione liber," critical ed., trans., prolegomena, and commentary by J. Magee, Leiden 1998; L. Pérez Gómez, Torrejón de Ardoz 1997. De institutione musica, ed. G. Marzi, Rome 1990 (It. tr.); Boethius, Fundamentals of Music, trans. with intr., notes by C.M. Bower, New Haven 1989; Boèce, Traités théologiques, trans., chronologie, bibliographie et notes par A. Tisserand, Paris 2000; Anicii Manlii Severini Boethii De arithmetica, cura et studio H. Oosthout et I. Schilling, Turnhout 1999; Codices Boethiani, 1, Great Britain and the Republic of Ireland, ed. M.T. Gibson and L.J. Smith, London 1995.

Complete bibl. of L. Obertello, Sev. Boezio, Genoa 1974, 2 vols.; ample bibl. also in Dizion. biografico degli italiani 11, 142-164; Patrologia IV, 202-217; J. Gruber, Boethius 1925-1998: Lustrum 39 (1997) 307-383; 40 (1998) 199-259; Atti del Congresso di studi Boeziani, Rome 1981; H. Chadwick, Boethius, Oxford 1981 (It. tr.: Boezio: la consolazione della musica, della logica, della teologia e della filosofia, Bologna 1986); Atti del congresso internazionale di studi boeziani, Rome 1981; Casey Gerard, An Explication of the de Hebdomadibus of Boethius in the Light of St. Thomas' Commentary: Thomist 51 (1987) 419-484; C. Micaelli, Studi sui trattati teologici di Boezio: Speculum, Contrib di filol. class., Naples 1987; G. D'Onofrio, Dialectic and Theology: Boethius' Opuscula Sacra and Their Early Medieval Readers: Stud. Mediev. 27 (1986) 45-67; Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius, Die theologischen Traktate, tr. and comm. ed. M. Elsalsser, Hamburg 1988, Boèce, Courts traités de théologie. Opuscula sacra, ed. H. Merle, Paris 1991; U. Pizzani, Le lettere di Teoderico a Boezio e la mediazione culturale di Cassiodoro: Cassiodorus 4 (1998) 141-161; C. Micaelli, Dio nel pensiero di Boezio, Naples 1995; C. Schlapkohl, Persona est naturae rationabilis individua substantia: Boethius und die Debatte über den Personbegriff, Marburg 1999.

U. Pizzani

BONIFACE (ca. 675–754). Wynfrith—his baptismal name—was born in Wessex. A monk at Nuthschelle, he spent some years teaching: some writings on grammar and metric, as well as verse riddles, testify to these quiet years. At about age 30 he felt a call to the apostolate among the *pagans of the Continent and left for Friesland. Undiscouraged by early setbacks, in 719 he received directives and investiture at *Rome from *Gregory II, who changed his name to Boniface. From this date until 25 June 754, the day on which he and his companions confessed their faith in blood in the wake of a pagan incursion into Friesland, he dedicated himself to an exceptional missionary activity, esp. in central Germany (Hesse, Thuringia, Bavaria), displaying great organizational ability and promoting the foundation of several *monasteries, including Fulda. He was deeply committed, in agreement with Pepin, to promotion of the reform of the corrupt Frankish clergy, esp. through regional councils. Rome always supported his activity: *Gregory III sent him the pallium, insignia of archepiscopal dignity, sanctioning his authority over all of Germany. A copious correspondence, in which offical and pastoral letters alternate with more relaxed ones to correspondents in Britain, is of fundamental importance since it not only provides a wealth of important historical facts but also and especially reveals the man's character, his inflexible will and his awareness of his capacities, but also his moments of discouragement and the enormous difficulties of the task he had undertaken. Another important source is Boniface's Life, rich in information, written by his disciple Willibald some years after his death.

MGH, ES 1; CCL 133 (Aenigmata); St. Bonifatius. Gedenkgabe zum 1200. Todestag, Fulda 1954; H. Löwe, Pirmin, Willibrord and Bonifatius, in La conversione al cristianesimo nell'Europa dell'Alto Medioevo, Spoleto 1967, 217-261; O. Bertolini, Il dramma di Bonifacio: Boll. Ist. St. Ital. Med. 78 (1967) 21-44; BS 2, 308-319; BBKL I, 684-687.

M. Simonetti

BONIFACE I, pope (418–422). At the death of Pope *Zosimus (417-418), part of the Roman clergy elected as his successor the archdeacon *Eulalius, backed by the court of *Ravenna and the powerful prefect *Symmachus. The next day (28 December 418) the majority of the clergy chose Boniface, who was more popular with the people. Eulalius had recourse to the emperor *Honorius, who ordered Boniface to leave *Rome. In the confusion and disturbances that followed, a synod held at Spoleto enjoined both to stay away from Rome until the situation was clarified. The reaction of Eulalius and his supporters was so negative and intransigent that Honorius deposed him and confirmed the election of Boniface. So as to avoid any such future occurrences, on his return to Rome Boniface presented a petition to Honorius, invoking his support of the church. In his rescript the emperor established that in the case of a double-election, the bishop of Rome would be chosen by a second consultation with the entire community (Jaffé 353). The decision, which remained a dead letter, nevertheless pointed to a heavy interference of the political power in the election of the pope and in the ecclesial sphere more generally.

Boniface fulfilled his ministry with energy and responsibility, remedying some of his predecessor's uncertainties and imprudences. In particular he revoked the primacy conceded by Zosimus to Bishop *Patroclus of *Arles, thus granting the requests of the *Gallican *metropolitans and restoring the old metropolitan order (Jaffé 362). In 419 Boniface intervened against the *Pelagians, whom Honorius had condemned (Prosp. of Aquit., Contra collat. 21, 57: PL 45, 1831); on this occasion *Augustine dedicated to him the Contra duas epist. Pelagianorum. But the most important aspect—and event—of Boniface's pontificate concerned the defense and affirmation of Roman primacy in the face of some tendencies and positions of the Greco-Eastern Church. In 421 the bishops of *Thessaly solicited an edict from the emperor *Theodosius II, based on which all controversies among the Illyrican churches were to be submitted to the bishop of *Constantinople, since the city now had the prerogatives of ancient Rome. Writing to Rufus, bishop of Constantinople, and taking up the positions and language of *Innocent I (401–417), Boniface recognized the privileged rank of the great Eastern churches—*Alexandria, *Antioch and Constantinople—but reaffirmed the superior authority of the see of Rome over the whole church, including the Illyrican communities and all the churches of the East (Ep. 15,5), "members" of the ecclesiastical body whose "head" was exclusively the Church of Rome (Ep. 14,1). Boniface's pontificate was thus a fundamental step in the historical configuration and dogmatic definition of the universal primacy of the bishop of Rome.

Boniface, Epistulae, PL 20, 745-792; Innocent, Ep. 23, PL 20, 546-547; Celestine, Ep. 3, PL 50, 427-429; Prosp. of Aquit., Contra collatorem, PL 51, 213-276; Socrates, HE VII, 36: PG 67, 820; Jaffé 52-54; LP I, LXII, 86-89 and 227-229; E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums, I, Tübingen 1930, 359-364; P. Paschini - V. Monachino, I papi nella storia, I, Rome 1961, 81-87; E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine, I-II, Paris 1964-1966, passim; LTK 2, 578 (P. Duckers - M. Wojtowytsch); P.J. Carefoote, Pope Boniface I, the Pelagian Controversy and the Growth of Papal Authority: Augustiniana 46 (1996) 261-289; Dizionario storico del Papato, ed. Ph. Levillain, I, Milan 1996, 195-197; J.N.D. Kelly, Vite dei Papi, Casale Monf. [2]1997, 76-78; EPapi I, 398-404 (A. Pollastri).

M. Spinelli

BONIFACE II, pope (530–532). Archdeacon at *Rome, was designated pope by his predecessor *Felix IV (526–530). Part of the Roman clergy refused to recognize him, however, and elected the antipope *Dioscorus in his place. With the death of the latter on 14 October 530, Boniface finally assumed the fullness of his powers, also winning the support of the clergy who had opposed him. Boniface nevertheless committed the same imprudence as Felix, nominating a successor, *Vigilius. The initiative provoked a similar opposition among the clergy, and Boniface withdrew his proposal. The event highlighted the situation of uncertainty and lack of transparency that still characterized the fragile moment of pontifical succession, also because of the interference of senators (in fact a Senate consultation prohibited them from giving or receiving money in support of a candidate to the papal throne) and of King Athalaric, who reserved to himself the confirmation of elected pontiffs. Boniface endorsed the canons of the Council of *Orange (529) against the semi-*Pelagians and in favor of *Augustine's theology on *grace and *free will. The tension between Rome and the East continued under this pope: in 531 Boniface presided over a council at Rome in which he declared that the churches of the Illyricum were dependent on him and in which he rejected the claims of *Epiphanius, patriarch of *Constantinople, who had deposed *Stephen, the bishop of Larissa and metropolitan of *Thessaly.

CPL 1691; PL 45, 1790ff.; 65, 31-42; Mansi 8, 729; Collectio Thessalonicensis, ed. C. Silva-Tarouca, Rome 1937, 1-16, n. 1623 (Acta of the Roman Synod of 531); LP I, 283ff.; DHGE IX, 897-898 (G. Bardy); Fliche-Martin IV, It. tr., 1972, 528-531 (on the Council of Orange); A. von Harnack, Kleine Schriften zur Alten Kirche, II, Leipzig 1980, 655-673; J. Speigl, Das Religionsgespräch mit den severianischen Bischöfen in Konstantinopel im Jahre 532: AHC 16 (1984) 264-285; V. Grossi, *L'*Auctoritas di Agostino nella dottrina del peccatum originis da Cartagine (418) a Trento (1546): Augustinianum 31 (1991) 329-360 (341-342); LTK 2, 578 (P. Duckers); EPapi I, 492-495 (P. Bertolini).

M. Spinelli

BONIFACE III, pope (607). Succeeded *Sabinian after a year of the see being vacant, because of the interference and vetoes of the emperor Phocas. Boniface was bishop of *Rome for less than nine months, from February to November 607. We know little of his pontificate; he convened a council at Rome to decree that the successor to a pope or a bishop could in no way be designated while they were still alive. Like his predecessor Boniface, he had also been apocrisarius at *Constantinople during the pontificate of *Gregory the Great, who held him in very high regard. In that capacity he obtained from Phocas the emanation of an edict recognizing the primacy of the Roman see vis-à-vis all of the other churches, including that of *Constantinople (LP I, 316).

LP I, 316; Hfl-Lecl 3, 247; H. Grisar, Geschichte Roms und der Päpste im Mittelalter, I, Freiburg i.B. 1901, 201; E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums, II, Tübingen 1933, 517-518; A. Saba, Storia dei Papi, I, Turin 1939, 235-237; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 290-291, 300 and 309; DHGE 9, 898 (G. Bardy); LTK 2, 578-579 (H. Zimmermann); EPapi I, 577-579 (P. Bertolini).

M. Spinelli

BONIFACE IV, pope (608–615). Succeeded *Boniface III (607) and consecrated pope 15 September 608 after ten months of the see being vacant, awaiting the emperor's approval. Born at Veleria, in Marsica, and son of a doctor, John, he ruled the *Roman see and the universal church in difficult times (hunger, plagues, floods, barbarian violence), sustaining them with charitable works and assistance. Boniface asked and obtained from Phocas the conversion of the Roman Pantheon into a church, consecrated to Mary Most Holy, Ever-Virgin and All Martyrs on 13 May 609 (or 610); the emperor sent splendid gifts to Rome for the occasion. The pope also turned his own house into a *monastery and greatly favored church construction in the Urbe. Boniface kept the church of England close to his heart, which was recently evangelized by the monk and missionary *Augustine of Canterbury, sent by *Gregory I; the first bishop of London, *Mellitus, participated at the Roman synod of 610. The last echoes of the *schism of the *Three Chapters, not yet resolved at *Milan and *Aquileia, took place during this pontificate. The *Longobard (Lombard) king *Agilulf urged *Columbanus, the monk of Bobbio, to intervene in the dispute; the latter wrote Boniface a letter, inviting his attention and urging more caution than, in Columbanus's opinion, Boniface's predecessor *Vigilius had used. We have two letters from this pope, both dated August 613. One is addressed to the Frankish king Theodoric II, the other to *Florian, bishop of *Arles; both concern the bestowal of the honor of the pallium on the prelate. Boniface died 8 May 615 and was buried in St. Peter's basilica.

CPL 1724; MGH, Ep. 3, 453-456; Mansi 10, 503-508; PL 80, 104-106 (letters of Boniface); C. Silva-Tarouca, Nuovi studi sulle antiche lettere dei papi: Gregorianum 12 (1931) 47; H. Ashworth, Did St. Gregory the Great Compose a Sacramentary?, SP 2, Berlin 1957, 3-16 (Boniface possible author of liturgical prayers); LP I, 318; DHGE 9, 898-899; DBI 12, 1970, 136-140 (P. Bertolini); Jaffé I, 220-222; S. D'Amato, "De civitate Valeria." Papa S. Bonifacio IV: Bull. della Dep. abruzzese di storia patria 79 (1989) 121-196; F. Michetti, S. Bonifacio IV e il suo pontificato, Avezzano 1992; P.T.R. Gray - M.W. Herren, Colombanus and the Three Chapters Controversy: JTS 45 (1994) 160-170; LTK 2, 579 (H. Zimmermann); EPapi I, 579-581 (P. Bertolini).

M. Spinelli

BONIFACE V, pope (619–625). Native of *Naples, consecrated pope 23 December 619, more than a year after his predecessor *Adeodatus I's death (615–618), due to the usual delay for obtaining imperial ratification of the election. Like his immediate predecessors, Boniface gave attention to the young church in England, born of *Augustine of Canterbury's mission. Boniface may be responsible for various norms concerning ecclesiastical testamentary law, the right to *asylum of churches and the faculties of acolytes, who were prohibited from administering *baptism in the Lateran basilica; it is likely these norms were the result of a synod. We have three of his letters (Bede, HE II, 8,10-11): one was to Justo—former bishop of Rochester and successor to *Mellitus as archbishop of *Canterbury—in which he confers on him the dignity of the pallium, in part for having contributed to the conversion of King Adelvado. The other two are addressed to Edwin, king of England, and his wife Ethelburga (at Easter 627 the sovereign solemnly announced his own conversion, encouraged by his wife). Boniface died 25 October 625 and was buried in the Vatican basilica.

CPL 1725; PL 80, 435-440 (of Bede); Mansi 10, 547-554; PL 80, 439-440 (a fourth letter of Boniface, apocryphal); LP I, 321-322; Jaffé I, 222-223; DBI 12 (1979) 140-142 (P. Bertolini); P. Hunter Blair, The Letters of Pope Boniface V and the Mission of Paulinus to Northumbria, in Anglo-Saxon Northumbria, London 1984; EPapi I, 583-585 (P. Bertolini).

M. Spinelli

BONIFACIUS, primicerius notariorum. Pope *John I in 525 turned to Bonifacius, primicerius notariorum, and to Bonus secundicerius to fix the date of Easter 526. They consulted the Scythian monk Dionysius, who in a letter recommended adoption of the *Alexandrian cycle of 19 years, fixing Easter 526 at 19 April. In the letter Ad Iohannem papam de ratione paschali (PL 67, col. 513ff.), Bonifacius suggested that the pope conform to that cycle.

CPL 2286, 2289; B. Krusch, Papsttum und Kaisertum. Forschungen P. Kehr - A. Bruckman, Munich 1926, 48-58; DTC 11, 1963; PCBE 2, 331.

V. Loi - B. Amata

BONIFACIUS Comes (d. 432). Native of *Thrace, we have no information on his date of birth but much on his public life, because of a solid military background and the political events in which he was protagonist; he was killed in *Italy in 432. Soldier and strategist under the emperors *Honorius and *Valentinian III, he was appointed general in 414 against the *Goths; particularly notable was his clash with Ataulf during the battle of *Marseille, in which Bonifacius wounded the barbarian leader. He fought against the *Vandals in *Spain before being transferred to *Africa, where he remained for a year (417–418). Finally, in 423 he was sent as magister utriusque militiae to subdue the rebellious tribes, later receiving the high position of comes Africae.

He applied imperial laws against the *Donatists with rigidity and displayed a strong spirit of collaboration with *Catholic bishops such as *Augustine and *Alypius, with whom he corresponded and established friendships. The death of his wife strengthened his intention to abandon public life and withdraw to a *monastery but, dissuaded by Augustine, he stayed faithful to his duties in defense of the imperial cause. His marriage in 426 with Pelagia, a Goth of *Arian faith, for political reasons, caused a change in Bonifacius's soul, as Augustine recounts (Ep. 220). In 427, the plots of *Aetius and *Galla Placidia, the mother of Valentinian III, led to Bonifacius's summons to the court of *Ravenna to give account to the emperor for his choices in managing the imperial patrimony. He was found guilty at the end of the same year and returned to Africa as a rebel. His attitude toward the barbarians was not clear, such that more than once he was accused of aiding the *Vandal invasion; doubts still exist on the matter (Prosp. Aquit., Chron. 1294; Procop., Bell. Vandal. 1,3; Zecchini 148-150). He remained in Africa until 432, at which time, once again on the peninsula, he faced Aetius, who defeated and killed him. He was succeeded as magister militiae by his son-in-law Sebastian, who had filled in for him as comes during his absence in 426–427.

Augustine's letters are an important source for information on Bonifacius's life (Ep. 220), on the compatibility between military and Christian life (Ep. 189), on military and administrative activity (Ep. 185 A; 17*), and on Bonifacius's works in favor of the church of *Hippo (Ep. 7*). Augustine himself wrote the De correctione Donatistarum liber (= Ep. 185; Retr. II, 48), addressed to Bonifacius in ca. 417, when the latter had reassumed the position of tribune of *Numidia. An anonymous Cadurci, cantor of the comes Africae Bonifacius, wrote a *panegyric reported by *Sidonius Apollinarius (Carm. IX, 289-295; Consolino, 183).

Augustine, Ep. 185, 185 A, 189, 220, 7* and 17*; Sidon. Apoll., Carmina IX, 279-280 (PL 58, 702); Prosper Aquit., Chronicon 1294 (MGH 9, 471-472); Procopius, Bell. Vandal. 1,3 (ed. G. Wirth, 317-324); DHGE IX, 924-931; PLRE II, B. 3, 237-240; PCBE I, B. 13, 152-155; R. Gentili, La rivalità tra Ezio, Felice e

Bonifacio e l'invasione dei Vandali nell'Africa, in Il mondo classico, 1955, 363ff.; J.B. Bury, History of the Later Roman Empire, I, London 1923, 196, 223, 243-247; H.J. Diesner, Die Laufbahn des Comes Africae Bonifatius und seine Beziehungen zu Augustinus, in Kirche und Staat im spätrömischen Reich, Berlin 1963, 100-126; Id., Forschungen und Forschritte, t. 35, 281 with ample bibl.; A. Lippold, Der Kleine Pauly Lexikon der Antike I, Stuttgart 1964, 926-927; O. Seeck, Pauly Real-Encyclopädie der Classischen Altertumswissenschaft 5, III, 1, 698-699; Id., Geschichte des Untergangs der Antiken Welt, VI, Stuttgart 1966, 54, 89-90, 105-117; V. Paronetto, Nota sulla datazione dell'epistolario agostiniano (Ep. 220; 229; 230; 231): Augustinianum 14 (1974) 363-367; R. Delmaire, Contribution des nouvelles lettres de saint Augustin à la prosopographie du Bas-Empire romain, in Les lettres de saint Augustin découvertes par Johannes Divjak, Paris 1983, 83-86; G. Zecchini, Aezio: l'ultima difesa dell'Occidente romano, Rome 1983, 141-165; F.E. Consolino, Poesia e propaganda da Valentiniano III ai regni romanobarbarici (secc. V-VI), in Letteratura e propaganda nell'Occidente latino da Augusto ai regni romanobarbarici, Rome 2000, 183-184.

M. Mendoza

BONO PUDICITIAE, De. Authorship of the work on the "value of chastity" has provoked discussions summarized by B. Melin; G.F. Diercks has studied the manuscript tradition. It is today attributed to *Novatian, who is to have written it while bishop. This encomium to *chastity depends on the similar treatises of *Tertullian and *Cyprian. It presents the virtue of chastity as a difficult conquest, the prerogative of noble natures and the condition for attaining interior freedom.

CPL 69; CPPM 3227; PL 4, 819-828; CSEL 3,3,13-25; CCL 4, 103-127; J. Martin, Zu Novatians "De bono pudicitiae": Wochensch. f. klass. Philol. 30 (1919) 239ff.; B. Melin, Studia in Corpus Cyprianeum, Uppsala 1946; Patrologia 1, 574-575; P. Mattei, Deux notes sur mariage (divorce) et virginité dans Novatien: RSLR 29 (1993) 357-365.

V. Saxer

BONOSUS (d. ca. 390). Late 4th-c. bishop of *Serdica in Illyricum, founder of the sect of the Bonosianis. We know of him from a letter sent to Archbishop *Anisius of *Thessalonica and the other Illyrican bishops shortly after the synod of *Capua in winter 391–392 and the Council of *Milan of 392 (De Bonoso). The letter, sometimes attributed to *Ambrose (F. Cavallera, La lettre sur l'évêque Bonose est-elle de saint Sirice ou de saint Ambroise? BLE 21 [1920] 141-147) or to Pope *Siricius (Jaffé 261), states that a bishop named Bonosus was denounced at the Synod of Capua because he held that *Mary was the mother of other children besides Jesus, rejecting her perpetual virginity (Ambr., Inst. virg. 35, 65; Ep. 56a). M. Mercatore's edition of the work, Sardicensis Bonosus. Appendix ad contradictionem XII anathematismi nestoriani, n. 15 (PL 48, 924), confirms Bonosus's existence. His identification remains uncertain, but he might be indentifited with Bonosus of Naissa (Aug., Ep. 292), who did not acknowledge Mary's virginity after Christ's birth (on this point see the contrasting opinions of J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes de l'Empire Romain, Paris 1918 and of Hfl-Lecl). Beyond the Marian *heresy, some also attribute to Bonosus the denial of Christ's divinity (M. Mercatore). On this point, later evidence against the Bonosiani is more explicit (Alc. Avit., Ep. III; Isid., Vir. ill. 32; Simbolo XI concilio di Toledo); they were also sometimes accused of a *trinitarian heresy (Genn., Eccl. dogmat. 52; Greg. M. epist. 67).

DTC 2, 1027-1031; J.A. de Aldama, La carta ambrosiana "De Bonoso": Marianum 25 (1963) 1-22; M.S. Meo, La verginità di Maria nella lettera di papa Siricio al vescovo Anisio di Tessalonica: Marianum 25 (1963) 447-469; K. Schaeferdiek, Bonosus von Naissus, Bonosus von Serdika und die Bonosianer: ZKG 96 (1985) 162-178; Marienlexikon 1, 538.

M.G. Mara

BONOSUS and MAXIMILIAN, martyrs. A late Passio, preserved in Latin, describes the martyrdom of two soldiers, Bonosus and Maximilian, at *Antioch—it mentions their bishop *Meletius, at the time of the emperor *Julian (d. 363), 20 September. There is no ancient evidence of their cult at Antioch, nor any other historical evidence of them. Historians differ not only on the genuineness of the account but also on the existence of the two martyrs. The episode of the comes Julian, who must have been the emperor's maternal uncle, asking them to remove the Christian monogram from the labarum seems to reflect the facts. The removal of the Christian symbol from the insignia is also present in the martyrdom of Juventinus and Maximinus, commemorated by *John Chrysostom on 29 January (In Iuventinum: PG 50, 574-578; Theodoret, HE 3,11; Malalas, Chron. 13,19). Finally, Wood asserts the authenticity of the martyrdom, even if the Passio has been embellished with fantastic elements.

BS 2, 352-353; F. Scorza Barcellona, Martiri e confessori dell'età di Giuliano l'Apostata: dalla storia alla leggenda, in Pagani e cristiani da Giuliano l'Apostata al sacco di Roma, ed. F.E. Consolino, Soveria Mannelli 1995, 53-83; D. Woods, Ammianus Marcellinus and the Deaths of Bonosus and Maximillianus: Hagiographica 2 (1995) 25-55.

A. Di Berardino

BOOK. Between the 1st and 8th c. AD the material production of the book underwent considerable modifications linked to fundamental cultural changes. The classical Greco-Roman book had been a *papyrus scroll. From the pith of cyperus papyrus, a marsh plant, now extinct, but at that time particularly abundant in the Nile delta, narrow strips were cut and superimposed in two layers perpendicular to each other to form a leaf 20-30 by 15-25 cm (7.9-11.8 by 5.9-9.8 in), a certain number of leaves pasted end to end formed the scroll, whose length could vary from a few to 10 or even 15 m. To write or read, the scroll was unrolled from left to right. Copyists wrote with a reed whose point was sharpened and cut in two (pen), and an ink prepared from lampblack diluted in water and thickened with gum arabic; until the early Middle Ages scribes wrote almost exclusively while kneeling: the use of wooden tablets and then tables became generalized later and only in the West. Scribes arranged their texts in relatively narrow parallel columns, calculating their alignment and spacing by eye. The scroll, normally written only on the inside face, was wound around a wooden cylinder with a tag indicating the author and title. Papyrus, a more solid material than is often realized, produced in great quantities in Egypt and exported everywhere, underwent sporadic competition from leather (skin treated with tannin) and parchment (skin washed, dressed and dried under tension): the Jews in particular used leather for the scrolls of the Torah.

From the end of the 1st c., the scroll began to be replaced by the codex, first of papyrus, then of parchment. The substitution was slow and gradual among the *pagans, sudden and general among the Christians: a deliberate innovation, whose reasons remain more or less hypothetical. Whatever these were, by the end of the 4th c. the codex had practically overtaken the scroll; from the 4th to the 8th c., parchment was progressively substituted for papyrus. The codex was made of leaves folded in two and inserted into each other in fascicles; the number of double leaves varied at first but, from the 4th c., fascicles of four or five were the general rule. Sewn together, the fascicles formed the body of the book, which was protected by a cover, usually of soft leather or, later, of wooden tablets covered with leather. On each side of the leaf (recto and verso), the copyist wrote one or two (rarely more) columns; on parchment his hand was guided by lines traced dry beforehand, whose peculiarities may provide clues as to provenance or date. The copyist himself or a colleague often numbered the fascicles; rarely, and only in the first centuries, the leaves and pages. Initial letters, titles and ornaments marking the beginning and ending of works or chapters were very sober until the end of the patristic age; only in the last centuries did the copying centers of *Britain and *Ireland develop the ornamentation of title pages and initials, using tracery and zoomorphic motifs with amazing virtuosity. Luxury books were in a category of their own, in which the Scriptures and liturgical collections predominated (as well as a collection of homilies by *Gregory of Nazianzus): besides illustrated scenes (miniatures), *Eusebius of Caesarea's NT concordance tables (Eusebian canons) were richly decorated from the 5th c.; there are also a certain number of manuscripts copied on purple-tinted parchment with gold or silver ink.

The book of the early centuries was the product either of personal transcription by scholars or of specialized copying ateliers working for the author, for a more or less wealthy client, or for a publisher-bookseller. The role of the latter, well attested in classical *Rome, was still important for the secular book of *Late Antiquity, aimed at the higher social classes. The Christian book, more modest or even shabby in appearance, arose and circulated in humbler circles: local communities and *monasteries. Philosphers and theologians ensured their production and propagation. The triumph of Christianity, the division of the empire and the collapse of the West led to a differentiation in book production. In the West, the copying centers, working for a restricted aristocratic circle, gradually disappeared before the monastic scriptoriums, small cultural islands in a society in which the book, for many, had been transformed from an instrument of communication into an object of worship. Besides the scriptoriums cited in regard to writing (*palaeography), we note here some of the great Western copying centers: *Vivarium, Nonantula and *Verona (diocesan centers) in *Italy; *Tours in *Gaul; *Seville (diocesan center) in *Spain; Reichenau in *Germany; and St. Gall in Switzerland. In Ireland and Britain, numerous copying centers flourished and extended their influence onto the Continent, but they cannot be identified with certainty before the 9th c. In the East, the role played by official milieus (emperor and imperial administration, bishops, large monasteries) was much more important than in the Latin world, but it is much less easy to distinguish copying centers with well defined characteristics.

G. Battelli, Lezioni di paleografia, Vatican City [3]1949 and B. Bischoff, Paläographie des römischen Altertums und des abendländischen Mittelalters (Grundlagen der Germanistik 24), Berlin 1979. On the material production of the book, see the series Codicologica, eds. A. Gruys - J.F. Gumbert, Leiden 1976ff.; E.G. Turner, The Typology of the Early Codex, Univ. of Pennsylvania

1977. On the cultural milieu and the circulation of the book, see two useful collections of important articles: G. Cavallo (ed.), Libri, editori e pubblico nel mondo antico, Rome-Bari 1975; Id., Libri e lettori nel Medioevo. Guida storica e critica, Rome-Bari 1977; see also T.C. Skeat, Early Christian Book Production: Papyri and Manuscripts, Cambridge History of the Bible, II, Cambridge 1969, 54-79 (It. tr. La produzione libraria cristiana delle origini: papiri e manoscritti, Florence 1976); C.H. Roberts, Manuscripts, Society and Belief in Early Christian Egypt, London 1977; D. Diringer, Hand-Produced Book: The Book Before Printing: Ancient, Medieval and Oriental, New York 1982; C.H. Roberts - T.C. Skeat, The Birth of the Codex, London 1983; A. Hamman, L'epopée du livre. Du scribe à l'imprimerie, Paris 1985; J. Glénisson (ed.), Le livre au moyen âge, Turnhout-Paris 1988; The Role of the Book in Medieval Culture, 2 vols., Turnhout 1988; O. Weijers (ed.), Vocabulaire du libre et de l'écriture au moyen âge, Turnhout 1989; A. Blanchard (ed.), Les débuts du codex, Turnhout 1989; Le livre au Moyen Âge, Turnhout 1988; G. Cavallo - P. Fedeli, Lo spazio letterario di Roma antica, 5 vols., Rome 1989; M. Capasso, Volumen. Aspetti della tipologia del rotolo papiraceo antico, Naples 1995; M. Caltabiano, Litterarum Lumen. Ambienti culturali e libri tra il IV e il V secolo, Rome 1996; M. Maniaci, Terminologia del libro manoscritto, Rome 1996; A. Di Fazio, Retractationes: uno sguardo nel laboratorio di scrittura di Agostino: Nicolaus 23 (1996) 359-383; H.Y. Gamble, Books and Readers in the Early Church: A History of Early Christian Texts, New Haven, CT [2]1997; E. Puglia, La cura del libro nel mondo antico. Guasti e restauri del rotolo di papiro, Naples 1997; Calligrafia di Dio. La miniatura celebra la parola, ed. M. Giordana Canova, s.l. 1999; Codex: AL 1, 1022-1038.

P. Canart

BOOK OF ARMAGH. Compiled ca. 807 in the *Irish archdiocese of Armagh, the Book of Armagh is a work written in Latin and ancient Gaelic which contains almost the whole NT, some ecclesiastical texts, but esp. some documents regarding St. *Patrick (c. 373–461) and his mission: two Lives, an incomplete collection of "memoirs" (Dicta Patricii), in part ascribable to *Tírechán, and an abbreviated version of the Confessio, written by the then-aged Patrick to thank God and explain the meaning of his episcopate, in some ways closely following *Augustine's Confessions.

CPL 1100, 1104 and 1105; R.P.C. Hanson - C. Blanc (eds.), Saint Patrick, Confession et Lettre à Caroticus (SC 249), Paris 1978; J. Gwynn, The Book of Armagh, Dublin 1913, XLV-LXIII, 17-30, 453-454; L. Bieler, Patrician Texts in the Book of Armagh (Scriptores Latini Hiberniae 10), Dublin 1979, 124-162; E. MacNeill, Dates of Texts in the Book of Armagh Relating to St. Patrick: JRSAI 58 (1928) 85-101; L. Bieler, The Notulae in the Book of Armagh: Scriptorium 8 (1954) 89-97; L. de Paor, The Aggrandisement of Armagh: Historical Studies 8 (1971) 95-110; D. Powell, St. Patrick's Confession and the Book of Armagh: AB 90 (1972) 371-385; A. Gwynn, The Problem of the Dicta Patricii: Seanchas ardmhacha 8 (1975–1977) 69-80; J. Stevenson, Literacy in Ireland: The Evidence of Patrick Dossier in the Book of Armagh, in The Uses of Literacy in Early Mediaeval Europe, ed. R. McKitterick, Cambridge 1990, 11-35.

P. Marone

BOOK OF LIFE. Man's destiny is written in the rolls in heaven. This was the religious sense of the ancient peoples, while civil communities compiled lists of citizens, indicating their name at birth and canceling it upon death. The Bible introduces the possibility that the names of the just would not be canceled but remain eternally written in the "book of life." This is the spiritual book in which are written the names of the members of God's family, as the names of the descendants of each family were written in the "book of the genealogy" (Ps 69:28 [68:29 LXX]; Phil 4:3; Rev 21:27 et passim; cf. Ex 32:32-33; Is 4:3; Ez 13:9; Dan 12:1; Heb 12:23 and, for the genealogies, Gen 5:1; Mt 1:1-17). The "name" wishes well to its bearer. The name is life. It is God who keeps the "book of the living." Christ will open it on the judgment day to announce the citizens of heaven (Rev 5:1-5; 20:12; cf. Lk 10:20).

In the Christian tradition *baptism was inscription in the "book" by the gift of grace: "If you are inscribed in the people of God, heaven is your homeland and God your lawgiver" (Clem. Al., Protr. X, 108,4; cf. Tertull., Bapt. 17,2; Basil., Bapt. 13,7; Greg. Nyss., Bapt.: PG 46, 417; Apos. Con. VII, 39,4). To remain inscribed is the fruit of perseverance in justice (Clem. Rom. 45,8) and a life of *penance and *ascesis (Hermas, Shepherd, Vis. I, 3,2; Mand. 8,6; Sim. 2,9). *Origen says that the "book of the living" is "the knowledge of God, from which are excluded those who do not have a pure heart" (Orig., Sel. in Ps. 68,29; cf. Basil., In Is. 136; Cyr. of Jer., Cat. 14,30; Apos. Con. VIII, 9,3; Aug., Civ. Dei 20,15 and In Ps. 68,2,13). Jesus' census becomes a symbol of the "book" (Orig., In Lc. 11; Ambr., In Lc. 2,36). The *pagan tradition of inscription into Roman citizenship, obtained as a gift and kept by merit (Tertull., Cor. 13,1; Greg. Naz., Or. 19,15; Paul. Nol., Ep. 13,15), contributed to the appearance of baptismal registers in churches. The liturgical *diptychs, with real and symbolic value, attested membership in the churches and indicated the communion between the earthly communities and the heavenly community. Good wishes for the deceased were often written on Christian tombs with: "God knows his name."

F. Cabrol, Diptyques (Liturgie): DACL 4/1, 1045-1094; G. Schrenk, βιβλίον: TWNT 1, 615-620; L. Koep, Das himmlische Buch in Antike und Christentum, Bonn 1952; Id., Buch (himmlisch): RAC 2, 725-731; J. Campos, El "libro de la vida": Helmantica 21 (1970) 115-147, 249-302; U. Burkard, Livre de vie: DSp 9, 942-947.

P. Meloni

BOOK on the INFANCY (Latin), *apocryphal. Its proper title was probably Books of the Birth of the Sav- ior and of the ostetrica, mentioned in the *Decretum (Ps.-)Gelasianum* (5,4,2). This is a Latin text discovered by James in two manuscripts (Arundel and Hereford, chs. 59-97) and called by the most recent editors in CCAp "a special source"; the best-preserved text is in the Irish apocrypha (Liber Flavus Fergusiorum and Leabhear Breac). The text probably comes from the *Jewish Christian circles of the first centuries and has a fragment similar to that of the Gospel of the Hebrews cited by Sedulius Scottus; it is conjectured to belong either to the Gospel of the Hebrews, the Gospel of the Nazarenes or the Gospel of Peter. The apocryphal work narrates the trip to *Bethlehem and offers a very picturesque description of the *nativity (with *docetist elements), emphasizing in a particular way the role of Joseph, less so that of *Mary.

CANT 53; BHL n 3445m.; CCAp 13, 64-134; 14, 619-880; It. tr.: Erbetta 1/2, 206-217; Moraldi 1, 228-261; Fr.: CCAp 14; Pol.: Starowieyski 1, 317-330; J. Gijsel, Les Évangiles de l'Enfance de M.R. James: AB 94 (1976) 289-302; J.D. Kaestli, Recherches nouvelles sur les Évangiles latins de l'enfance et sur le récit apocryphe de la naissance de Marie: EtudTheolRelig 72 (1997) 219-234.

M. Starowieyski

BORBORIANI. *Gnostics, also called borboritae or barbelitae. Radical antinomianism, common to other gnostic sects, led the borboriani to an extreme form of immorality. The name derives from βόρβορος, meaning "mud": it was probably coined by *Epiphanius (Haer. 26,3) as a metaphor for their impurity. An imperial law was promulgated against the borboriani and other *heretics in 428 (CTh XVI, 5,65). Other sources on the borboriani: Philaster, Haer. 73; Theodoret, Haer. fab. I, 13.

E. Prinzivalli

BORDEAUX
I. City - II. Council.

I. City. The meaning of the city's name (Burdigala) is obscure. Its population was 60,000 at the beginning of the 3rd c., but in 276 it was destroyed by the barbarians. Later fortified, in the 4th c. it regained a notable vitality, both culturally and otherwise. Almost nothing is known of the city's Christian origins: the first solid "Christian" date is 314, when the first attested bishop of Bordeaux, Orientalis (who built the basilica of St. Andrew), participated at the council of *Arles with his deacon Flavius. Among his successors were *Delphinus (predecessor of *Amandus), known for his opposition to *Priscillian (Councils of *Saragossa 380 and Bordeaux 384), who had won over Eucrocia, a noble Bordelaise, and her daughter Procula. The event of the great bishops Amandus and Severinus in the 5th c. is legendary, but it is certain that the king of the *Visigoths persecuted the bishop of the Gallican city. Merovingian rule and its accompanying religious peace led to a great Christian flourishing under bishops Leontius I and II. 4th-c. Bordeaux is minutely described by *Ausonius, though he does not speak of its church, founded a few years earlier by Orientalis. Already in the 4th c. there was a large Christian necropolis outside of the city walls, evidence of Christianity's spread. *Paulinus, future bishop of Nola, and *Sulpicius Severus are known authors, as is Ausonius's grandson *Paulinus of Pella—all were natives of Bordeaux. Also from the city or its surrounding region were the monk Apodemius, who visited *Jerome; Hedybia and Algasia, recipients of Jerome's Ep. 120 and 121 in response to their many exegetical queries; and *Rusticus, whom Jerome exhorted to continence in Ep. 122.

R. Étienne, Bordeaux antique, Bordeaux 1962; J. Coupry - M. Gauthier, Sous les allées de Tourny, sauvetage archéologique à Bordeaux: Arch 47 (1972) 8-17; R. Duru, Aux origines chrétiennes de Bordeaux. Les fouilles de Saint-Seurin: Arch 47 (1972) 18-24; R. Étienne, Défense et illustration de Bordeaux antique: Arch 47 (1972) 37-43; H. Crouzel, Les échanges littéraires entre Bordeaux et l'Orient au IVe siècle: Revue d'histoire du livre 3 (1973) 301-326; D. Barraud - L. Maurin, Bordeaux au Bas-Empire: de la ville païenne à la ville chrétienne (IVe-VIe siècles): Aquitania 14 (1996) 35-53.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

II. Council. A council convoked by *Maximus, proclaimed emperor by the army in *Britain in 383, met in 385 and condemned the *Priscillianists. *Instantius was deposed and deported; Priscillian refused to recognize the council's competence and appealed to the emperor. Taken to *Trier and accused of *magic and immorality before the prefectorial tribunal, he was condemned to death and executed with six partisans, including a woman, Eucrocia. This proceeding, in which bishop Itacius of Ossonuba acted as prosecutor, aroused protests from many bishops (*Martin of Tours, *Hyginus of Cordoba, *Ambrose of Milan), who appealed to the princeps, and led to the Felician *schism.

Hfl-Lecl 2, 385; Gaudemet, SC 241, 113-116; Palazzini 1, 190.

Ch. Munier

BOSTRA (BOSRA)
I. City and council - II. Archaeology.

I. City and council. The etymology of the city's name is uncertain. Perhaps it is from Be'esterah ("house of Astarte"). Its name appears in 1 Macc 5:25-28 in connection with the expedition beyond the Jordan of Judas Maccabeus (164–161 BC) to protect the Jewish communities there. In the pre-Roman period Bostra was a fortress in the Nabataean kingdom, whose capital was *Petra.

Due to its location at the intersection of transportation routes and the fertility of the surrounding plain, Bostra was the most important urban center S of *Damascus. With the end of the Nabataean kingdom in AD 106 Bostra, now called Nova Traiana Colonia, became the administrative center of the province of *Arabia and, probably after 132–135, headquarters of the III Cyrenaica Legion. Through the work of the Syrian emperors, esp. *Alexander Severus (222–235), the city saw an accelerated development and embellishment, interrupted, however, by the devastation of the Palmyran queen *Zenobia's (269) battle with the *Roman Empire. With the division of Arabia into two provinces a few decades later, Bostra remained the principal city of Arabia, while ancient Petra was chosen as capital of Palaestina Tertia or Palaestina Salutaris. In 634 Bostra came under Arab control.

Unlike other Syrian cities, information on the Christian community at Bostra is abundant, leading to the conclusion that already by the 2nd c. it had been evangelized by the church of *Alexandria. *Eusebius mentions how in 215 the governor of Arabia (capital Bostra) sent letters to Bishop *Demetrius of Alexandria and to the prefect of *Egypt, asking them to send *Origen because of his doctrinal prowess. The mission completed, Origen returned to Alexandria (HE VI 19,15; 19,33; 19,37).

The first known bishop of the church of Bostra was *Beryllus, author "of various revelatory works of noble intelligence." This information is from *Eusebius of Caesarea, who adds that Beryllus was "bishop of the Arabs around Bostra" (HE VI 20,2), leading to the conclusion that Christianity had also spread among the nomadic Arab tribes encamped in the region. This area, called Auranitis by the Romans, must have had bishops quite early if, ca. 240, a synod was held at Bostra to judge Beryllus's doctrine; Origen also participated, and convinced Beryllus to abandon the thesis denying Christ's preexistence before the *incarnation. A second synod at Bostra in 248, also participated in by Origen, rejected the doctrine of those bishops who asserted the mortality of the *soul; at stake in the conflict was not *orthodoxy but two anthropological conceptions, Semitic and Greek.

Steeped in Semitic categories is an extremely precious mid-3rd-c. text, composed presumably at Bostra and known as the Didascalia Apostolorum*. Written in Greek, it concerned the duties of ordained ministers, liturgical and doctrinal themes, and questions about the Christian life. The abovementioned link between Origen and the church of Bostra seems to have been even more intense under Bishop *Hippolytus, who appears to have succeeded Beryllus and should be identified with that Hippolytus who gave a homily "in which he claims to speak in church in the presence of Origen" (Jerome, De vir. ill. 61).

The community of Bostra ca. 264 was governed by *Maximus, who took part in the Synods of Antioch of 264 and 268, which culminated in the condemnation of the local bishop, *Paul of Samosata. About a century later there were uprisings in the city between Christians and pagans, stirred up by Emperor *Julian's (361) intention to revive *paganism. The dispute degenerated into such violence that the emperor himself sent a Manifesto to the citizens. On this occasion Julian accused Bishop *Titus of sedition, and in a letter to the citizenry the emperor requested that he be sent away from the city. It does not seem that this actually occurred, since Titus remained in his see also under *Jovian, Julian's successor. In the 5th c. the community of Bostra was governed by *Antipater (after 451), of whom the emperor *Leo I asked a judgment on the Council of *Chalcedon. The anti-Origenist spirit that moved him took form in Antipater's Confutation of the Apology written by Eusebius of Caesarea in defense of the Alexandrian master. From the 6th c. *monophysitism began to spread, esp. among the Arab tribes. The city had a *Melkite metropolitan and, in the 6th c., also a parallel *Jacobite hierarchy with a resident bishop.

G.W. Bowersock, Roman Arabia, Cambridge, MA 1983; M. Sartre, Bostra, des origines à l'Islam, Paris 1985; J.M. Dentzer, Hauran. Recherches archéologiques sur la Syrie du Sud à l'époque hellénistique et Romaine, 2 vols., Paris 1985-1986; L. Padovese, Guida alla Siria, Casale Monf. 1994, 55-60; Fedalto 2, 744; RAC II, Supp. 2003, 98-149.

L. Padovese

II. Archaeology. In the 3rd-5th c. the diocese that had benefited from Origen's doctrine boasted bishops of significant doctrinal stature: Beryllus, Titus, Maximus and Antipater, of whom there remains a beautiful inscription praising his zeal for the cult of the *Theotokos. Despite the fact that its various churches have been studied for some time, the results of archaeological research to date must still be considered partial (Butler, Early Churches, 119, 124-126; Lassus, Sanctuaires, 145, 151). Recently Italian and French excavations have sought to bring to light the ancient Roman plan of the city and to complete the study of various buildings (Cerulli, FR 109-110 [1975] 163-239; Sartre, Bostra, 88-97; Dentzer, OEANE 1, 350-353; Sartre, RACSuppl 9, 98-149). The urban plan has the typical characteristics of a Roman city, with a long E-W colonnaded axial road that departs from an oval plaza to the E and intersects at least three perpendicular roads. The theater is well preserved. The churches generally have a rectangular plan, though the church thought to be the cathedral—the church of Sts. Sergius, Bacchus and Leontius, dedicated by Bishop Julian in 512–513 (Farioli, Bosra, 173-178)—and the so-called "new cathedral," identified in the SE part of the city E of the Nabataean arch, have a central plan. The church dedicated to the Theotokos is from the late 5th c., with the beautiful inscription in honor of the metropolitan bishop Antipater. The building period that is best documented epigraphically is that during the time of Emperor *Justinian. A church dedicated to St. Job should be attributed to Bishop Jordan, in office from 518–539. Numerous churches have been found in the territory of the diocese of Bostra, recovering splendid mosaics and allowing the completion of the list of the bishops of Bostra until the mid-7th c. (see Arabia). Preserved in the museum of the castle are, among other things, the mosaics of the church of Deir el-Adas, depicting camel drivers and peasants harvesting grapes from a vine leaning against a tree (Hermas, Shep., Sim. 2); the mosaic is dated 621 (Balty, Mosaïques, 148-151). The church was dedicated to St. George, and the inscriptions give the names of some inhabitants of the village situated in the Hauran.

M. Sartre, Bostra: RAC 9, 98-149; M.C. Butler, Early Churches in Syria, Princeton, NJ 1929; J. Lassus, Sanctuaires chrétiens de Syrie, Paris 1947; S. Cerulli, La cattedrale dei ss. Sergio, Bacco e Leonzio a Bosra: FR 109-110 (1975) 163-239; J. Balty, Mosaïques antiques de Syrie, Brussels 1977; M. Sartre, Bostra des origines à l'Islam, Paris 1985; R. Farioli Campanati, Gli scavi della chiesa dei ss. Sergio, Bacco e Leonzio a Bostra: Berytus 33 (1985) 61-74; R. Farioli Campanati, Relazioni sugli scavi e ricerche della missione Italo-Siriana a Bosra 1985, 1986, 1987, in XXXV Corso di cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina (Ravenna 22-24 marzo 1988), Ravenna 1988, 45-92; R. Farioli Campanati, Bosra. Chiesa dei ss. Sergio, Bacco e Leonzio: I nuovi ritrovamenti (1988-1989), in La Syrie de Byzance à l'Islam. VII^e-VIII^e siècles, Damas 1992, 173-178; J.-M. Dentzer, Bostra: The Oxford Encyclopedia of Archaeology in the Near East 1, 350-353, New York - Oxford 1997; M. Piccirillo, L'Arabia cristiana, Milan 2002.

B. Bagatti - C. Pappalardo

BRAGA (Portugal)

I. City - II. Councils.

I. City. Ancient Braccara in Hispania Citerior; capital of the province of Gallaecia after *Diocletian's division. At the beginning of the 5th c. with the Germanic invasions, Braga was incorporated into Suevian territory as the capital of the Suevian kingdom. In 456 it was taken temporarily and sacked by the *Visigoth Theodoric II and was under Visigothic rule from 585 to the Muslim invasion. In the mid-3rd c. a flourishing Christian community existed in neighboring Astorga, suggesting that Christianity had already arrived in Braga as well. The tradition that the apostle James preached the gospel in Braga after landing in a neighboring town is pure legend. The first concrete information we have attests the presence of Christianity ca. 400, at which time there was already an organized community, since the city's bishop, Paternus—consecrated by the *Priscillianist Symposius of Astorga, whose faith he too professed but abandoned after reading *Ambrose—attended the I Council of *Toledo, which allowed him to keep his see. Priscillianism was still causing problems at the I Council of Braga (561). Famous Bragans were Paul *Orosius, historian and friend of *Augustine, and the two Aviti, travelers and importers of Christian, esp. *Origenist, culture in the late 4th and early 5th c. From the mid 6th c. Braga was metropolitan see of the province, a privilege shared for some time with Lugo, due to the enlargement of the territory by Suebi's conquests to the south. Braga flourished esp. under its bishop St. *Martin. When the abbot-bishop of Dumium was called to the see of Braga, he remained bishop of both sees. Bishops: Paternus (400); Balconius (contemporary of Pope *Leo I); Profuturus (ca. 538); Lucretius (d. 561); St. Martin (572–580); Pantardus (580–589); Julian (633–638); Potamius (653–656, the year in which he was deposed); Fructuosus (656); Leodegisius Julianus (675); Liuva (681); Faustinus (687–693); Felice (693); Fidesind (d. 745, but always resident at Lugo).

II. Councils. 561, provincial. Held by order of the Suevian king Ariamirus. Metropolitan Lucretius presided over seven other bishops and other representatives of the clergy. They published 17 doctrinal and disciplinary *anathemas directed against Priscillianism and 22 canons; some of the canons refer to clergy, and the rest attempt to give uniformity to liturgical discipline.

572, provincial. Presided over by St. *Martin of Dumium. 5 suffragan bishops of Braga attended, along with Nitigisius, metropolitan of Lugo and 5 other suffragans. They read the acts of the first council of Braga and a text of 1 Pet, and issued 10 canons on economic matters, the reputation of clerics and liturgical rules.

675, provincial. Metropolitan Leodegisius presided over 7 other bishops. After reciting the *Nicene-Constantinopolitan creed with the addition of the filioque, they issued 8 canons to correct a series of abuses, esp. liturgical, among higher clergy.

Mansilla, Geografía I, 149-152; 192-212; 217-221; J. Augusto Ferreira, Fastos episcopales da Igrejia primacial de Braga, Braga 1950; E. Flórez, ES 15; Vives, Concilios, 65-67; 78-106; 370-379; Orlandis, Concilios, 138-159; 391-395.

P. de Luis

BRAULIO of Saragossa (d. 651). Bishop of *Saragossa from 631–651, highly educated, friend of *Isidore and among the most renowned literati of the *Visigothic "renaissance." His Life of St. Aemilianus, a well-known Spanish *hermit, based on oral sources and mostly dedicated to miracles, seeks to present a model of Christian perfection and is marked by the obvious literary pains taken by its author, who crowns his labors with an elegant hymn in the saint's honor in iambic senarii. His letters—44, of various length, including some from correspondents—remind us of those of the 4th and 5th c., because of their variety of argument, refinement of form, taste for friendship and exchange of courtesy. They are one of the most evident and symptomatic signs of the Visigothic renaissance and an important source of knowledge of Spanish history of the period. Ep. 3-8, between Isidore and Braulio, provide interesting information on the composition of Isidore's Etymologiae. Braulio also took a leading part in church politics: he helped compile the Visigothic code and wrote to Pope *Honorius I in the name of the Council of *Toledo of 638 to rebut his charge that the faith of the Spanish bishops was lukewarm.

CPL 1230-1233; PL 80; Epist., ed. J. Madoz, Madrid 1941; C.H. Lynch, St. Braulio, Washington 1939 (Sp. tr. Madrid 1950); A. Robles Sierra, Braulio de Zaragoza testigo de una espiritualidad hispana: Teología espiritual 30 (1986) 119-140; M.L. García Sanchidrián, Las proposiciones completivas en las cartas de Braulio de Zaragoza: Excerpta Philologica 6 (1996) 145-154.

M. Simonetti

BREAD. The use of the term "bread" (Gk. ἄρτος, Lat. panis) is extremely vast in patristic writings, in conjunction, moreover, with its frequency in biblical texts, where different meanings are applied to the word (for the NT see GLNT I, 1267-1272). One can distinguish the following meanings given to bread by ancient Christian authors.

1. Bread as indicative of any food and all bodily necessities (Orig., Com. in Jo. X, 17,100; De or. 27,4; Greg. Nyss., Or. dom. 4; Aug., Serm. 57,7,7) and as daily nourishment, often in relation to Mt 6:11 and Lk 11:3 (see Lord's Prayer).

2. Bread in the eucharistic sense: "the bread of God" is "the flesh of *Jesus Christ from the line of *David" (Ign., Rom. 7,3); bread is the necessary element for the *Eucharist (Just., 1 Apol. 65-67; Tertull., Adv. Marc. I, 14,3; Trad. ap. 21 [ed. Botte]; Cyr. of Jer., Cat. 22,3,6; 23,20). The use of ordinary bread is an expression of divine condescension to human customs (John of Dam., De fid. ort. IV, 13), but this becomes the body of Christ (Greg. Nyss., Bapt. chr.; cf., Orig., C. Cels. VIII, 33) as soon as it is consecrated with the *epiclesis (Iren., Adv. haer. IV, 18,5; Cyr. of Jer., Cat. 19,7; 21,3; 23,8; Theod. of Mops., Hom. cat. 15,12) or consecrated with the words of the Lord Jesus (Ambr., De sacr. IV, 14.23). Christ calls bread his flesh because it can be eaten (Theod. of Mops., Jo. 6,31ff.). The eucharistic bread is the memory of the *incarnation (Just., Dial. 70,4) and demonstrates its reality (Tertull., Adv. Marc. V, 8,3). *Irenaeus inserts a discussion of the eucharistic bread in a polemical, antignostic context: one can be certain that the bread offered in the Eucharist is the body of the Lord only if one recognizes in him the Son of the one who created bread (Adv. haer. IV, 18,4; cf., IV, 33,2). According to *Macarius of Magnesia (Apocr. III, 23), Christ has the ability of working upon bread inasmuch as he is the creator of the earth from which are derived bread, the human body and his own body. The eucharistic bread makes a person immortal (Ign., Eph. 20,2; Theod. of Mops., Hom. cat. 15,12) and incorruptible (Iren., Adv. haer. IV, 18,5; V, 2,2-3; Aug., Tract. Jo. 26,17). In the history of mankind it has put an end to death (Cyr. of Alex., Ador. III), and it bestows life (Hilar., In ps. 128,10), not temporal but eternal (Aug., Ep. 186,2; Tract. Jo. 26,15), because it remits sin (Ambr., Ben. patr. 9,38). Patristic authors also saw the eucharistic bread as the *sacrament of unity, often in connection with 1 Cor 10:17: as one sole bread is formed from many grains (Did. 9,4; Cypr., Ep. 63,13; 69,5; John Chrys., Hom. 24,2 in I Cor.; Aug., Serm. 272), thus those who receive it, though being many, become one sole bread, that is, one sole body of Christ (Aug., Serm. 227; Serm. Guelferb. 7,1-2). This bread is the source of peace and an *eschatological sign of the society of the saints (Aug., Tract. in Jo. 26,14.17); but it is also a sign of a unity already actualized—the unity of faith (Faustus of R., Serm. 16,10-11), the unity in the body of Christ accomplished by *baptism (Ful. of R., Ep. 12,11,24)—and when it is offered, the entire people is signified in it (Ambrosiast., In I Cor. 11,20). Finally, with regard to the preparation of the bread for the Eucharist, it seems that during the patristic era the churches used both unleavened bread and leavened bread and that both customs can be traced back to an ancient *tradition (see J. Parisot: Azyme: DTC 1, 2653-2664; F. Cabrol, Azymes: DACL 1, 3254-3260; A. Penna - M. Jugie, Azimo: EC 2, 578-580).

3. Bread of *blessing or blessed bread or *eulogy (or ἀντίδωρον in the *Byzantine liturgy) seems to have designated the bread offered by the faithful for the Eucharist, which was blessed and distributed to *catechumens or to those who did not receive *Communion. This unconsecrated bread was distinguished from the consecrated bread used for the Eucharist (Trad. ap. 26). In some Eastern churches, perhaps in relation to 1 Cor 10:16, the consecrated bread and the *wine were called εὐλογία (Act. Thom. 50; Orig., Hom. 19 [18],13 in Jer.; Cyr. of Alex., Ador. XIII; Jo. IV, 2; Nest. IV, 5). It then came to indicate also the bread or any gift sent by the priests to their bishops or friends as a symbol of fraternal communion (Paul. of N., Ep. 3,6; 4,5; 7,3; Aug., Ep. 31,9) (see DACL 5, 733-734; LTK 3, 1180-1181).

4. Bread in a metaphorical sense: the bread is Christ (Orig., Cant. II [on Song 1:12]; Prud., Cat. 9,61; Aug., Serm. 130,2), inasmuch as he is life, as the bread is life (Tertull., De or. 6,2). He is the Logos, the Word of God (Orig., Com. in Jo. X, 17,99; XXXII, 24,310; De or. 27; Mt. ser. 85; Greg. Nyss., V. Mos. II, 140; Aug., Serm. 56,6,10; In ps. 95, s. II, 6; for the relation between the divinity of Christ and his being bread, see John Chrys., Hom. 45,2 in Jo.); he is wisdom (Athan., Ep. fest. 7,5.8; Greg. Nyss., Hom. 5 in Eccl.). Bread is the *Scripture (Aug., Serm. 95,1), the Mosaic law (Ambrosiast., Quaest. 47,3; Aug., In 83 quaest. 61,1), the teaching of Christ (Tertull., Adv. Marc. IV, 7,6) and *faith in him (Jn. Chrys., Hom. 46,1 in Jo.), the *preaching of the NT or the work of the *Holy Spirit (Aug., In 83 quaest. 61,4; cf., Serm. 95,2), the knowledge of the *Trinity (Aug., Serm. 105,4; cf., In ps. 102,10), charity (Aug., Serm. 105,6), and the martyr (Ign., Rom. 4,1). (For other meanings of the term bread, see Greg. Great, Moral. XXIII, 49.) In patristic texts, the "bread of *angels" of Ps 78:25 (77:25 LXX) has special prominence, identified by some with material *manna, by others with the Logos, true manna and supersubstantial bread, with Christ the living bread. *Augustine, in particular, affirms that the Word of God, bread of the angels, was made flesh so that man might be able to eat the bread of angels (see G. Madec, "Panis angelorum selon les Pères de l'Église, surtout s. Augustin," in Forma futuri. Studi in onore di M. Pellegrino, Turin 1975, 818-829).

5. One frequently finds Old Testament types related to bread in the writings of ancient Christian authors, often in explanation of Jn 6:31-33; 49-51, the comparison between manna and Christ with his gifts (Cypr., Ep. 69,14; Hilar., In ps. 57,9; Ambr., De myst. 8,47-49; Ambrosiast., Quaest. 95,3; 20,2; John Chrys., Hom. 46,2 in Jo.; Hom. 47,1 in Jo.; Aug., Tract. in Jo. 25,13; 26,12-13; Cyr. Alex., Jo. IV,2-3; Glaph. Ex. II, mann. et coturn.). The manna, bread which is not produced from earth, is a figure of the Word, who shows himself to every person in the aspect that corresponds to one's needs, just as the manna had the ability to satisfy every taste (Wis 16:20-21) (Greg. Nyss., V. Mos. II, 137-140). Christian authors primarily interpreted the liturgical uses of bread mentioned in the OT in a typological sense. The twelve pieces of showbread (Lev 24:5-9; cf., DBS 6, 973ff.) prefigured the eucharistic bread (Trad. ap. 41; Jerome., In Tit. 1,8-9; Cyr. of Alex., Jo. IV, 4), which now replaces them (Cyr. of Jer., Cat. 22,5), and the Word that came down from heaven (Eus., Ps. 33,6-8). For *Origen, at the level of the literal sense, the showbread represented the twelve tribes of Israel, which should have been a memorial and an intercession before the Lord, but, he observes, according to "the greatness of the *mystery," the sole memorial that makes God propitious to human beings is that bread of which Christ speaks when instituting the Eucharist, the one who is the bread come down from heaven and the giver of life and the showbread because God set him forth as a propitiation through faith in his blood (Hom. 13,3 in Lev.). For some authors, moreover, the showbread represents the word of the twelve *apostles (Orig., Hom. 9,4 in Ex.; Procop. of Gaza, Lev.: PG 87, 779ff.) or the twelve months of the year (Jerome, Ep. 64,9). Even the unleavened bread which the Hebrews ate during the Exodus (Ex 12:8) and subsequently every year during the feast of unleavened bread (Ex 13:5-10) undergoes a typological interpretation in relation to the Eucharist (see especially *Ephrem, Hymns on the Unleavened Bread 6,1-6; 17,5; 19,1-3; see also Hymns. cruc. 2,5). These were also understood in a moral sense in reference to the elimination of sin (Greg. Nyss., V. Mos. II, 126; Chromat., Serm. 17A; Greg. Great., In evang. hom. 22,8). Finally, the bread offered by *Melchizedek was commonly interpreted as a figure of the Eucharist (Gen 14:18) (Clem. Alex., Strom. IV, 25,161,3; see: J.L. Ska, Melchisédech: DSp 10, 969-972).

6. The ancient Christian authors mention the use of bread in the *Mithraic cult (Just., 1 Apol. 66,4; Tertull., De praescr. 40,4), among the *heretics (Clem. Alex., Strom. I, 19,96,1; Epiph., Pan. 30,16), in the *gnostic rites (Clem. Alex., Exc. Ex Theod. 82) and among the *Manicheans (Aug., C. Faust. 20,13).

In addition to the texts cited, see TRE 1, 229-278 (bibl.); LTK³ 2, 703-706. For the presence of the term bread in ancient Christian authors, see A. Blaise - H. Chirat, Dictionnaire latin-français des auteurs chrétiens, Strasbourg 1945, 591; Lampe 231-232; for the presence of the term bread in Augustine, see PL 46, 484-485. For the countless times in which bread was used in a eucharistic sense, see J. Solano, Textos eucarísticos primitivos, BAC 88 and 118, Madrid 1962 and 1964 (especially the index of vol. II, 846-847 and 887); L'Eucaristia nei Padri della Chiesa, "Dizionario di spiritualità biblico patristica," Rome 1998. For the interpretation of the bread of Mt 6:11 and Lk 11:3, see also the entry on the Lord's Prayer. For the use of the breaking of bread in the liturgy, see: DACL 5, 2103-2116; EC 5, 1564-1565.

A. Pollastri

BRENDAN (6th c.). Brénainn of Clúain Ferta, called Brendan of Clonfert or Brendan the Navigator, was a 6th-c. *Irish abbot: in 558/564 he founded the Church of Clonfert. He died between 577/583. This biographical information is in the Annals of Ulster and of Inisfallen and derives from an ancient Irish chronicle (lost). These texts, enriched by annalistic data, have handed down certain legendary accounts of the history and myths of Brendan's tribe, accounts transferred in the *hagiographical Lives to Brendan himself, such as the legends of the cynocephali and the Atlantic sea voyages, e.g., the Navigatio s. Brendani. The paternity attributed to him in one Life, earlier than the Navigatio, is the oldest evidence of the spread of his cult. Feast 16 May in Irish calendars.

J.B. O'Riordan, Brendan: Saint and Navigator, Dublin n.d.; P. Grosjean, Vita S. Brendani: AB 48 (1930) 99-123; Id., Notes d'hagiographie celtique: AB 78 (1960) 375-381; DHGE 10, 533-534; BS 3, 404-409; Navigatio S. Brendani, ed. C. Selmer, Notre Dame, IN 1959; C. Selmer (ed.), Navigatio s. Brendani Abbatis, Notre Dame, IN 1959, repr. 1989 (Varese 1968 n. ed. G. Orlandi); Brun-hölzl 2, 524-528; The Early Church in Western Britain and Ireland. Studies presented to C.A. Ralegh Radford (ed. S.M. Pearce) (BAR British Series 102), Oxford 1982, 306-328; L.M. Bitel, Isle of the Saints: Monastic Settlement and Christian Community in Early Ireland, Ithaca - London 1990, 31, 34, 38, 66, 91-93, 113, 129-130, 153, 168, 189, 202, 205, 212; LTK 2, 672 (U. Kindermann); T.M. Charles-Edwards, Early Christian Ireland, Cambridge 2000, 277; 283-284; T. O'Laughlin, Celtic Theology: Humanity, World and God in Early Irish Writings, London - New York 2000, ch. 9; E. Doris, The Celtic West and Europe: Studies in Celtic Literature and Early Irish Church, Bodnein 2001; J.M. Wooding, Fasting, Flesh and Body in the Brendan Dossier, in Celtic Hagiographies and Saints' Cults, ed. J. Cartwright, Lampeter 2003, 161-176.

V. Saxer

BREVIARIUM APOSTOLORUM. Written ca. 600 by an anonymous author and based on the ancient Byzantine or Apostolic Catalogues, the Breviarium Apostolorum, which was often appended to the Martyrologies, tells of the apostles, from the etymology of their names to their death and burial, focusing on the missions of *Peter and *Paul at *Rome, James in *Spain, Philip in *Gaul and *Matthew in *Macedonia. Moreover, as the oldest evidence of the preaching of James on the Iberian Peninsula, the Breviarium Apostolorum, besides being the principal source of the De ortu et obitu patrum of *Isidore of Seville (ca. 560–636), is a document of extraordinary importance for Spanish ecclesiastical history.

L. Duchesne, Les anciens recueils de légendes apostoliques: III Congrès Scientifique International des Catholiques 1894, V sect., 67-79; Martyrologium Hieronymianum, eds. G.B. De Rossi - L. Duchesne, Brussels 1894, LXXV-LXXXI; B. de Gaiffier, Le "Breviarium Apostolorum": AB 81 (1963) 89-116.

P. Marone

BREVIARIUM HIPPONENSE. Contains the decisions and canons of the Council of *Hippo, presided over by *Aurelius of *Carthage (8 October 393), called by *Possidius Plenarium totius Africae concilium (Vita Aug. 7) and held in the secretarium of the Basilica Pacis. *Augustine, not yet a priest, gave a discourse in the bishops' presence, on which is based the work De fide et symbolo. On the occasion of the later council of 13 August at Carthage (397), the bishops of the province of *Byzacena sent a sort of résumé (Breviatio or Breviarium) of the decisions taken at Hippo: it contained a *Latin version of the *Nicene Creed. On 28 August the collection was accepted by other bishops of Proconsular *Africa and *Mauretania who had not participated in the previous session. Two series of canons followed: the first, of 4 canons, laid down that Easter should be celebrated in conformity with the church of Carthage; the second, of 39 canons, regarded disciplinary rules for the different grades of clergy, from lectors to bishops. These canons laid the foundations of ecclesiastical discipline in Christian Africa. The document from 13 August, with two additional canons, was included in the Quesnelliana and many others; the second document, of 28 August 397, was included in the Hispana. The breviarium was taken up again by the Registri ecclesiae Carthaginensis excerpta.

CPL 1764 and 1770; PL 56, 411-433; CCL 149,30-53; H.Th. Bruns, Canones Apostolorum et conciliorum saecc. IV-VII, Berlin, I, 1839, 134-139; Hfl-Lecl 2, 1, 82-91; F. Maassen, Gesch. d. Quellen und d. Litter. des Canonisch. Rechts in Abenlande, Graz 1956, nos. 139-140 (repr.); DDC VII, 434-436; G. Bardy, Conciles d'Hippone au temps de saint Augustin: Augustiniana 5 (1955) 441-458; Ch. Munier, Cinq canons du concile d'Hippone du 8 octobre 393: RDC 18 (1968) 16-29; Id., La tradition manuscrite de l'Abrégé d'Hippone et le canon des Écritures des églises africaines: SE 21 (1972/73) 43-55; B. Neunheuser, "Cum altari adsistitur semper ad Patrem dirigatur oratio." Canon 21 de Konzils von Hippo 393, seine Bedeutung und Nachwirkung: Augustinianum 25 (1985) 105-119; S. Lancel, Saint Augustin, Paris 1999, 229-231; J.-A. Sabw Kanyang, Episcopus et plebs, l'évêque et la communauté ecclésiale dans les conciles africains (345-525), Bern 2000.

L. Dattrino - A. Di Berardino

BREVIARIUM IN PSALMOS. Compilation on the psalms whose origin remains obscure; it depends on the commentaries on the psalms of *Ambrose, *Hilary and esp. *Jerome. The original texts are often mixed, mutilated or interpolated. Thus far there has been no methodical study of this work. Various hypotheses have been advanced regarding authorship and date of composition. Some attribute it to a certain John, a *Roman deacon (CPL 950), perhaps the same person later elected pope with the name *John I (522–526) (L. Brou, Où en est la question . . . , SP 2, 18). Others consider a Gallic or an Irish author possible, at some time between 450 and the 7th-8th c. (CPL 629). The incipit Proxime cum Origenis psalterium . . . legeramus indicates the occasion of the composition; the actual incipit reads: Beatus vir qui non adiit.

CPL 592, 629, 950; PLS 2, 76-78; CPPM 2,2357; Lapidge/ Sharpe 343; DHGE 11, 1380, n. 9, s.v. Cassiodore; L. Brou, Où en est la question des "Psalter collects"?: SP 2 = TU 64 (1957) 17-20; H. Ashworth, The Psalter collections of Pseudo-Jerome and Cassiodorus: Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 45 (1963) 287-304.

L. Dattrino

BREVIARIUM SYRIACUM (or Martyrologium Syriacum). A poor *Syriac translation, done at Edessa in 411, of a *Greek original composed ca. 360 at *Nicomedia and considered to be the oldest martyrology extant. It was included in the Martyrologium Hieronymianum (5th c.). First it lists the Western martyrs from 26 December to 24 November, then martyrs known only in Syria, divided into groups: bishops, priests, deacons, religious clerics and laity.

PO 10,5-26; B. Mariani, Breviarium Syriacum, Rome 1956.

S. Samulowitz

BREVIARIUS DE HIEROSOLYMA. A guide to the churches of *Jerusalem, perhaps composed by a Latin *pilgrim in the first decades of the 6th c. The brief description, in rather rough language, survives in two recensions (see the two juxtaposed examples in Weber, ed., 109-112). The brief Iter, one of the first itinera* to appear, offers very precious topographical information for the period prior to *Justinian's reign (527–565) (Wilmart, 1928, 101). The opening takes the reader straight into the subject: Incipit breviarius quomodo Hierosolyma constructa est. It should in fact be called an itinerary rather than a description.

CPL 2327; CSEL 39, 151-155; CPPM 2,2185; R. Weber CCL 175, 105-112; Schanz-Hosius IV, 1, 404; A. Wilmart, Un nouveau témoin du "Breviarius de Hierosolyma": RBi 37 (1928) 101-106; J. Wilkinson, Christian Pilgrims in Jerusalem During the Byzantine Period: Palestine Exploration Quarterly (1976) 75-101; J. Wilkinson, Jerusalem Pilgrims Before the Crusades, Warminster [2]2002 (with Eng. tr.); Th. O'Loughlin, The Date of the "De situ Hierosolyma" of the Ps. Eucherius: RBe 105 (1995).

L. Dattrino

BRIGID of Kildare (5th c.). As has been wisely noted, because of the tendency, typical of *Celtic *hagiography, to multiply saints, it is easy to find homonymous saints in Ireland; Brigid, with her more than 25 projections, is no exception to this phenomenon. All of these figures can with high probability be considered simply the product of local cults honoring Brigid; the same is true for the apocryphal Brigid of Fiesole.

According to what the various legendary redactions of the Vitae of Brigid tell us—albeit at times with completely conflicting details—she was born in the mid-5th c. at Fochart (Faughard), near Dundalk, from the illegitimate union of a man from Leinster named Dubtach or Dubtoch, and a slave named Broiccseach or Broicsech, the sister of St. Ultan of Ardbraccan. After refusing numerous offers of marriage and obtaining through repeated prayers the partial disfigurement of her beautiful face, in 467 Brigid took her vows under Bishop Macchille at Usny Hill (Westmeath); after many *pilgrimages, she later moved to the plain of Magh Life, where, near a centuries-old oak tree, she founded the famous *monastery of Cill-Dara (Kildare), becoming its abbess and spiritual guide. Many legends surround her life; she was called "the Mary of Ireland" or "the Mary of the Gael," and it is not always easy to separate purely historical data from fantastic accounts, though the picture of her that such legends seem to offer is of a woman full of humanity and of love for people and animals. She died 1 February 523 (or 525) and was buried—according to her late biography written by a 8th-9th-c. monk, Cogitosus (or Cogitus)—together with Bishop Con-laedh in a splendid tomb near the altar of the cathedral of Kildare, which quickly became a place of pilgrimage. Following the frequent Scandinavian invasions her *relics were transferred (ca. 878) to Downpatrick, where they were deposed together with the mortal remains of St. Patrick. On 9 June 1186 Brigid's remains were again moved to the cathedral of Downpatrick, in the presence of Cardinal Vivian, 15 bishops and numerous abbots and religious.

She is ordinarily depicted in the dress of an abbess, in white habit and black veil, candle in hand, a flame over her head and with a crosier. Sometimes, being the patron saint of milkmen, she is depicted in a housewife's clothes ready to churn butter, or in a peasant woman's dress leading animals into the fields. Her feast is 1 February.

DCB 1, 337-338; DHGE 10, 717-719; F. O'Brian, Saint Brigid of Ireland: Her Legend, History and Cult, Louvain-London 1938; BS 3, 430-437; LTK 2, 692-693; T.M. Charles-Edwards, Early Christian Ireland, Cambridge 2000.

M. Ghilardi

BRITAIN

I. Christian origins - II. Councils.

I. Christian origins. The Christian origins of Britain are still unclear, and certainly no credit can be given to the legends, circulating widely in the Middle Ages, according to which the evangelization began with the missionary voyages of Sts. *Peter and *Paul and of at least four other *apostles; the legendary presence of *Joseph of Arimathea, who supposedly brought some drops of the blood of Christ and planted the sacred grove at Glastonbury, encountered just as much success already in ancient times, and this gave rise to numerous stories which flourished in the Middle Ages. Anyone who speaks of a Christianity widespread among the Britons in the 1st. c. AD is exaggerating; for it must be acknowledged that until the earliest years of the 4th c., although one may accept in principle the existence of individual believers, the absence of certain archaeological and literary evidence does not permit postulating the existence of conspicuous communities of believers on the island.

Also completely without foundation is the report, given in good faith by the Venerable Bede, but found by him in a passage of the Liber pontificalis, of a letter sent toward the end of the 2nd c. AD by a British king named Lucius, otherwise unknown and strangely characterized by his name as not of local origin, to Pope *Eleutherus (175–189), in which he requested missionaries to facilitate his own conversion and to evangelize the pagan populations who inhabited the island. Equally fantastic, therefore, is the affirmative response of the pontifex but, as is easy to understand, an abundant and improbable literature was born in the course of time around these letters. A much more solid testimony, but to be considered not yet definitive for proving the existence of a substantial British Christian community, could be that of the *Carthaginian apologist *Tertullian who, writing at the beginning of the 3rd c., surprisingly describes Britain as a Christian stronghold. Also in the first decades of the 3rd c. there is the testimony provided for us by the *Alexandrian exegete *Origen who, in his writings, three times refers to Christian Britain, one time even considering the new faith as a unifying force among the Britons.

The literary and historical sources and the archaeological evidence, however, do not help us to understand with any precision when Christianity became important on the island, and it is difficult to understand how it really reached there, apart from missions and the spontaneous diffusion brought by the army or by merchants. Many modern scholars have maintained, without adequate literary or archaeological evidence, that Christianity reached Britain through the exiles from the *Gallic community of *Lyons that in 177—as we learn from the Martyrium Lugdunensium transmitted to us by *Eusebius of Caesaraea—underwent a very harsh persecution in which not even the bishop *Pothinus, over 90 years old, was spared, expiring in prison after two days of atrocious tortures. Even if the martyrdom of *Alban, and therefore the existence of Christian believers in Britain, is generically attributed to the time of the *Diocletian persecution, the first certain testimony of the presence of a conspicuous Christian community on the island can be assigned to 314. At the anti-*Donatist Council of *Arles three British bishops, as well as a priest and a deacon, appear among the signers: Eborius episcopus de civitate Eboracensi provincia Britannia, Restitutus episcopus de civitate Londiniensi provincia suprascripta. Adelphius episcopus de civitate Colonia Londiniensium. Exinde Sacerdos presbyter, Arminius diaconus. This is an evident confirmation of an ecclesiastical apparatus organized into a hierarchy and subdivided into territorial dioceses (with the borders adapted to the territorial division imposed by Diocletian?) depending on urban sees.

Despite *Pelagius himself being a Briton—for he was born in an unknown locale in Britain around 354—it is difficult to establish how much his ideas circulated among the population of the island; we know, however, from the De laude sanctorum of *Victricius, bishop of Rouen between 385 and 410, that around the year 403 a Catholic mission guided by himself was sent to the island to check the spread of the Pelagian fever, and in 429 and later in 444–445, as Bede testifies (Hist. eccl. gent. angl. I, 17, 21), the bishops of the island had to seek again the help of the Gallic bishops, who sent them *Germanus of Autissidorum (Auxerre) and *Lupus of Tricassium (Troyes) to confront the extremely numerous followers of the doctrine of Pelagius.

In 597 Pope *Gregory I, having noticed the serious departure of the island from the faith, sent into Britain a group of *monks from the Monastery of St. Andrew on the Caelian, among whom were *Augustine and *Lawrence, to convert the Anglo-Saxon tribes. The monks' work of conversion began from Kent (where the Romans too had disembarked some centuries before), whose pagan king *Ethelbert—who would later by converted by Augustine—had married, certainly before 588, the *Frankish princess Bertha (daughter of the Merovingian king of *Paris Charibert I), who was of the Christian faith, which doubtless favored the efforts of the missionaries. The religious relationships with the continental world, after the supposed two-century pause of the 5th and 6th c., in reality were never interrupted, but these relationships directly excluded the influence of Rome, linking instead in a privileged manner with the Frankish world, which in that period was certainly the fulcrum of the Western barbarian world. Furthermore it should be emphasized that the approach itself of the Roman missionaries was not able to do without Frankish mediation: the very presence of Queen Bertha at the court of King Ethelbert of Kent is an eloquent testimony of that, and furthermore, Bede, our privileged source, reports to us that the contacts between the evangelizers and the local sovereign were possible only thanks to the presence, suggested by the pontiff himself, of Frankish-speaking interpreters (Hist. eccl. gent. angl. I, 25). The Northumbrians, who lived in the northern zones of the island, were converted in 627 by *Paulinus, one of the companions of Augustine, but a pagan invasion of those regions—culminating in 633 with the death of the Christian king Edwin in the battle of Haethfelth (Hatfield Chase) at the hands of Caedwalla of Wessex and Penda of Mercia—partially destroyed his work, later taken up with great zeal by *Aidan of Lindisfarne.

D. Watts, Christians and Pagans in Roman Britain, London-New York 1991; D.N. Dumville, Liturgy and the Ecclesiastical History of Late Anglo-Saxon England, Woodbridge 1992; K. Rainsbury Dark, Civitas to Kingdom: British Political Continuity 300–800, Leicester 1994; C.F. Mawer, Evidence for Christianity in Roman Britain: The Small Finds (BAR British Series 243), Oxford 1995; D. Watts, Religion in Late Roman Britain: Forces of Change, London-New York 1998; K. Hylson-Smith, Christianity in England from Roman Times to the Reformation, I, From Roman Times to 1066, London 1999; M. Ghilardi, Egregium Albanum fecunda Britannia profert. Albano e i primi santi della Britannia romana: RomBarb 17 (2002) 1-18.

II. Councils. The first important *council of the British church was held, according to what we learn from the detailed testimony of *Bede (Hist. eccl. gent. angl. II, 2), around the year 603 (the precise date is uncertain) in the place called, in the language of the Angles, Augustines Ac ("Augustine's Oak," today Worcester), near the River Severn, in southwestern Britain. Augustine, with the collaboration of the king of Kent, Ethelbert, had called the representatives of the British dioceses to discuss the method of celebrating Easter and to try to persuade them to adopt the *Roman ecclesiastical traditions: they were celebrating Easter in the Jewish *Quartodeciman manner, from the fourteenth to the twentieth day of the lunar month, with a calculation based on a cycle of 84 years. After long discussions and consultations, the British bishops and doctors refused to accept the Roman tradition, since—just as had been predicted to him by a wise hermit consulted before the council began—Augustine had remained seated at their arrival at the synod, a gesture interpreted as proof of the disdain which he had for them. Again Bede informs us (III, 25) that after many years, in 664, to put an end to the delicate and controversial paschal question, but also to discuss other important questions concerning ecclesiastical usages, it was decided—under the presidence of the king of the Northumbrians Oswiu and of his son Alhfrith—to convoke a new council (in reality it must not have been a council according to the canonical norms) in the *monastery of Streanaeshalch (Whitby), at that time held by the noble abbess Hilda. The protagonists were *Colmanus, bishop of Lindisfarne, for the Scots, and Wilfrid, abbot and later bishop of Eboracum, for the English. King Oswiu, having reminded *Wilfrid with the help of a passage of the gospel of Matthew (Mt 16:18-19) that it was Christ who conceded to Peter the keys to the kingdom of heaven, decided in favor of the Roman traditions. Colmanus and his supporters retreated to *Scotland (III, 26) and from that moment began the predominance of the Roman traditions in English Christianity.

Two years after the death of King Oswiu—who died of an incurable disease at the age of 58 on 15 February 670—in September of the year

672, the archbishop of Doruvernis (Canterbury), Theodore, convoked an imposing council (the first regular council which was held in England according to the canonical norm) at Herutford (Hertford), confirming the *Roman rites in opposition to the *Celtic ones and formulating the request for more bishops for England, indicating thus the way for an extension of the influence of Canterbury (Beda, Hist. eccl. gent. angl. IV, 5).

The same Theodore in 680—apparently to discuss and refute the *monophysite *heresy of *Eutyches, but in reality to obey the will of Pope *Martin, who, against the *monothelite tendencies of the *Constantinopolitan emperor *Constans, wanted local councils united in all the regions of the Occident, which would confirm his attitudes—called at Haethfelth (Hatfield) a new council of the British dioceses (Hist. eccl. gent. angl. IV, 17) and confirmed at that time the adherence of the English bishops to the councils of *Nicaea, *Constantinople (I), *Ephesus, *Chalcedon, *Constantinople (II) and the Lateran synod of 649.

Bede, Hist. eccl. gent. angl. II, 2; III, 25 and 26; IV, 5 and 17; D. Wilkins, Concilia Magnae Britanniae et Hiberniae, I, London 1737; A.W. Haddan - W. Stubbs, Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents Relating to Great Britain and Ireland, I-III, Oxford 1869-1878; M. Deanesley, The Pre-Conquest Church in England, London 1961; C.R. Cubitt, Anglo-Saxon Church Councils c. 650–c. 850, Leicester 1995.

M. Ghilardi

BRITAIN and IRELAND

I. Architecture - II. Manuscripts - III. Sculpture and carving - IV. Metalwork

I. Architecture.

1. Churches in Roman Britain. No direct contemporary testimonies are known, either from history or inscriptions, for any of the paleo-Christian churches in Britain. It should be presumed that three types of cult edifices existed, according to the analogy of other provinces: urban churches, cemeterial or martyrial churches in the periphery, and domestic churches installed in villas outside the cities.

Urban parochial churches: (1) Caerwent (Venta Silurum): An apsed structure built in the course of the 5th c. above the south part of the forum baths has suggested (but without certainty) a church. (2) *Canterbury (Durovernum Cantiacorum): Here, more than in any other *Roman British city aside from London, there is a certain continuity of use. The remains of an urban church might be identified with the basilica which is said to have been restored by *Augustine and dedicated, as *Bede informs us (HE I, 33), to the Holy Savior. It is generally agreed that it was on the site of the present cathedral, even if the reconstruction after 1067 must have removed every trace. (3) Lincoln (Lindum): Excavations in the area of Flexengate have revealed traces of a building with various construction phases, one of which is from the 4th c., oriented east-west, with an apse at the east and a portico or a nave to the north; the central zone preserves a mosaic with black, red and white tesserae as at Silchester. At present it seems to be the best example of an urban church. (4) Richborough (Rutupiae): Wall remains discovered in the northwest part of the Roman fort of Rutupiae have been convincingly interpreted as the foundations of a hall for religious use oriented east-west, probably with an apse to the east. The discovery, a little distant from the remains, of a brick structure of hexagonal form with the internal walls covered in hydraulic mortar, reinforcing the interpretation of the religious use of the building, has been interpreted as a baptismal pool of the hypothetical annexed baptistery. (5) Silchester (Calleva Atrebatum): In May 1992 the remains of a small edifice with a rectangular central area, side rooms, narthex and small eastern apse (4th c., used also in the 5th) were discovered in a small insula to the south of the central forum. At the eastern end are the squalid foundations of a possible baptistery. (6) St. Albans (Verulamium): In the southern part of the city, a building has been discovered that is oriented east-by-northeast–west-by-southwest, with rooms along the side and quadrangular extensions at both ends.

Suburban cemeterial churches: (1) Canterbury: Bede (HE I, 26) notes that in 597 Bertha, Christian queen of Kent of Frankish origin, had the habit of praying in a church prope ipsam civitatem ad orientem. This was probably the basilica known until the Middle Ages as "St. Martin." Otherwise, it would have been the church of St. *Pancras, today in the foundations of the abbey of St. Augustine, with a vast late Roman burial *cemetery on the southwest side. (2) Colchester: Of the three sites which might be hypothesized here as suburban churches, two, to the south of the city, are connected with cemeteries and near Roman roads. (3) Icklingham, Suffolk: A building with solid evidence for being considered a church with attached funeral areas and perhaps a baptistery constitutes an aspect of a Roman settlement whose status remains unclear. Probable date: end of the 4th c. (4) London: The presumable Christian presence in the capital of Roman Britain is indicated by certain suburban churches, known for being built directly on Roman buildings. St.

Bede's in Fleet Street and St. Andrew's at Holborn can be mentioned among those associated with Roman cemeteries. (5) St. Albans: The date of the martyrdom of St. *Alban being uncertain, the probable identification of the locale and the martyrium visited by *Germanus and *Lupus in 429, like the later church to which Bede alludes (HE I, 7), remains the slope of the hill occupied by the present abbey, where the tombs discovered from time to time could belong either to a burial cemetery or to an area which had developed around the martyrium and the tomb of St. Alban. We have here the most certain evidence from Roman Britain for a continuity of worship.

Private churches: (1) Lullingstone, Kent: In the center of a vast and rich country villa, whose owners became Christians in the 2nd half of the 4th c., a group of rooms on the ground floor were adapted for worship. This consisted of a portico, an external room with mural paintings of Christograms and a rectangular room with similar paintings on two walls; on the short wall to the west was a frieze painted with human figures, similar to orantes*. At the beginnings of the 5th c., a fire put an end to the building. (2) Frampton and Hinton St. Mary, Dorset: Various late Roman villas of southern Britain contain mosaics which presumably belonged to Christian owners. The mosaics of Frampton and Hinton St. Mary are on the floors of connecting rooms and have Christian themes combined with pagan subjects. These mosaics, together with the high level of the decoration of Lullingstone, appear in contrast with the sparse decoration of the Roman British churches identified at Silchester and Lincoln, so that Frampton and Hinton St. Mary could represent atypical rooms within the villa, sometimes used for Christian worship. (3) No private urban churches have been identified in Britain. Certain scholars have proposed one at Caerwent and one at Colchester, without any proof.

2. Irish churches. The ancient Irish churches were made of wood and therefore have not survived: the description given by *Cogitosus of the Church of Kildare (7th c.) is the best source of information about them (PL 72, 788D-789). The Church of Kildare, in wood, hung with draperies and decorated with pictures, seems to have been much larger than the oldest stone churches known to us, given that the *monastery hosted a bishop with a school of clerics and an abbess with her virgins and widows, not to mention, presumably, those attached to the monastery, since Cogitosus speaks of a layman attached to the church.

The surviving stone churches are very simple, especially the oldest ones, but they do not seem to be older than the 9th c.: in fact, the first example is at Kells, if Columcille's House is the church which the annals say was completed in 814. The simplicity of the architecture, however, is notable in itself, given that the Irish certainly knew the plans of Continental churches. *Adamnan, in his small, dark building on Iona, probably passed in review some plans and certainly described a certain number of Eastern basilicae (Adamnan's De locis sanctis, ed. D. Meehan, Scriptores Latini Hiberniae, III, Dublin 1958). Despite this, the architecture of the Irish churches offers no signs of the influence of foreign models.

3. Irish monasteries and hermitages. (1) Nendrum: The ancient monasteries are well-known, especially in remote and often panoramic locales, but a convincing date that goes back to the 6th or 7th c. can be given for none of them. Two, however, have yielded ceramic which may indicate a use of the site in the 7th c. One of these, Nendrum, was a three-walled circular enclosure, and the other, Armagh, was an enclosure before being employed for cultural use. At Nendrum the existence of a stone church with a round tower demonstrates that the monastery had a long history, which the excavations have not clarified. It seems probable, however, that the cells of the monks were in the form of circular buildings of dry-wall stone probably with beehive roofs. The presence of crucibles and of a stone mold among the other objects found here shows the importance of artistic metalwork to make *chalices, reliquaries and *book covers.

(2) Church Island, Valencia: The rocky island of Church Island, Valencia, County Kerry, gives an interesting parallel to the layout of Ardwall Island. On Church Island a primitive oratory made of wood with tombs was replaced with a larger edifice in stone, also with burials. But the central characteristic element of the island was a circular house made of stone at a diameter of just 5 m, which presumably could at the most house a *hermit and two or three disciples. Later a rectangular building was built on the extreme edge of the island, which seems to have been a house for guests rather than a building for the community. A sepulcher with aligned flagstones, with an inscribed cross, closely resembles the description by Bede of the hermitage of St. *Cuthbert at Farne Island.

(3) Clonard: Nothing seems to survive today of the church or the cells of Clonard, which between monks, students and pupils contained about a thousand people.

(4) Skellig Michael: When the number of monks in a monastery grew, rather than build a larger church it seems that they preferred to multiply the number of little churches within the wall. In many places these were certainly not of stone, but of oak, covered in reeds in the Irish manner (Bede, HE III, 25), and none of them has reached us, nor have excavations revealed much about them. On the islands far from the western coast, nonetheless, where many of the first seekers after solitude founded their monasteries, wood and reed covering were not easy to obtain, and the buildings were in stone. Eight miles beyond the promontories of southwestern Ireland, the Great Skellig, a pyramid of naked rock, culminates in a peak over 200 m above the Atlantic. Near the highest peak, the body of an ancient monastery, that of Scelig Mhichíl (or Skellig Michael), nestles on a rock terrace next to a 150-m precipice. The most ancient buildings consist of six rectangular beehive cells and two little oratories. The monastery was dedicated to St. *Michael the Archangel and existed at the beginning of the 9th c.

(5) Inishmurray and other sites: On the island of Inishmurray, off the coast of Sligo, the ruins of a massive perimeter wall remain, within which are the remains and traces of beehive cells and of many small churchs in stone. In the Midlands there are remains of great earthen embankments, which once marked the more or less circular boundary walls of various monastic institutions: Inchleraun, Durrow, Moyne (County Mayo) and Seir Kieran, Clonmacnoise, County Offaly, founded near the Shannon in 544, and Armagh, where St. *Patrick set up his principal church, developed into a monastic city, with a large population and renowned centers for teaching and craftsmanship. Glendalough in Wicklow Hills was founded by St. Kevin in the 6th c. Through the fame of his sanctity, after his death the place became a center for *pilgrimage and the monastery one of the principal ecclesiastical centers of the region. The Irish monasteries of the 6th and 7th c., however, were not very imposing to look at: a circular boundary wall, within which were some rectangular wooden buildings covered in reeds or of wooden tiles, and a group of round cabins of woven reeds with perhaps an imposing and rude slab of wood or stone at the gate of the church as the central and distinctive sign of the monastery, even without the tomb of a founder to justify it.

4. Dalriada, kingdom of the Scots. A tradition records that, in the 5th c., the three sons of Erc—Fergus, Loarn and Angus—set sail with 150 men from Dál Riata, a district of County Antrim, in northern Ireland, to invade the north of *Scotland. Whatever the historic truth may be, a limited migration of Scotti (Irish) certainly took place, and the kingdom of Dalriada, Irish in speech, was established along the Argyll coast and its islands. Its most important fortress was Dunadd, which was occupied from the 5th to the 9th c.

Columcilla, or *Columba, arrived at Dalriada with his companions in 536 to support his own faith and those of the accompanying Scotti through the foundation of a monastery at Iona, a tiny island beyond the southwestern point of Mull. Other Irish monks founded monasteries further up the western coast and in the northern isles, which in turn served as a support for the Atlantic voyages of their followers. An important evangelization effort was undertaken from Iona among the Picts, and it was from Iona that *Aidan went to establish in 634–635 the monastery of Lindisfarne (another islet off the coast of Northumbria), after the return to power of the Northumbrian king Oswald, who had been in exile among the Scots of Dalriada. Both Lindisfarne and Iona would later succumb to the attacks of the Vikings, and at the beginning of the 9th c. the majority of the monks of Iona took refuge at Kells in Ireland, while others went east to Dunkeld. Little is known of the monastery of St. Columba at Iona, although it has been suggested that the foundation stone of a cabin on the rock which surfaced at Torr Abb, in front of the current abbey, is that of St. Columba himself. Besides the proof of Christianity given by the class II tile-crosses of the Picts, little is known of the ancient church of the Picts. It is certain that elements from Northumbria are found in the art of the Picts, and this might be the context in which the Book of Kells was conceived and executed among this group.

5. Northern Britons. The British kingdom which had developed to the south of Forth and Clyde in the late Roman period fell under the Anglo-Saxons of Northumbria before or during the 7th c., with the exception of Strathclyde. Little is known of the archaeology of the 5th-6th c. in Lothians and the Borders.

A small number of tombstones from the 5th-6th c., but of Roman tradition, with Latin inscriptions and simple crosses or Christograms, are found scattered between southern Scotland and northern England. One of these stones at Whithorn, near Wigtown, raised by Borrovadus for Latinus and his young daughter, dated to the 5th c., was found in the cemetery next to a small oratory of stone whose walls have traces of white plaster. It might well be the Candida Casa, the "White House" which gave its name to Whithorn. It is traditionally said that the chapel was built by St. *Ninian, who was bishop here for a certain time at the beginning of the 5th c. Heading from Whithorn along the coast to the east, to Ardwall Island, part of a small monastic settlement from the 6th-8th c., which is similiar to that of the Irish monks, has been excavated.

A site in Ireland, of considerable importance for having offered elements which can be dated, based on carbon 14, to around 660, is Carnsore, County Wexford. The site of Ardwall Island, like that of Church Island, began as a rural cemetery, and its position in the area of Whithorn suggests that it was in use during the 6th c. or at most in the last part of the 5th c.

6. Wales and Ireland. The archaeological finds of Wales are extremely limited, aside from a large group of ancient Christian commemorative stones and some settlements. Traces have been found of a possible chapel made of wood, as at Ardwall and Church Islands, on the island of Burry Holms, at the N end of the Gower peninsula, in S Wales. Here, under a small and ancient stone church, which was itself enlarged in the 11th and 12th c., appear four successive cavities, indicating a more ancient chapel in wood, on a different axis. The site has an oval boundary wall, and there seem to have been burials there at different periods. The contemporary Irish settlement of Wales could have begun during the 4th c. but was certainly in existence during the 5th c. Around fifty inscriptions in the ogham dialect, known from Wales, represent the principal archaeological testimony of the presence of an Irish settlement, together with the stones which offer commemorative Latin inscriptions of people with typically Irish names; in some of these the inscriptions are arranged vertically in the manner of the ogham writing.

A commemorative stone of Aberdaron in Gwynedd reads: “Senacus, priest: he lies here with a multitude of brethren,” which attests to the presence of a monastery. Commemorative stones and documentary notices are therefore the only witnesses for the location of the ancient churches in Wales, such as Llantwit Major on the south coast, or the great monastic center of Bangor. Very little is known of pre-Norman monasteries and chapels in Wales, and there are no ruins on the terrain.

7. Southwestern Britain. During the late Roman period in southwestern Britain, the kingdom of Dumnonia appeared, which included Cornwall, Devon and Somerset, but which gradually shrank between the 6th c. and the beginning of the 10th c., under the pressure of the Anglo-Saxon expansion toward the west.

On the eastern borders of Dumnonia are two hill forts from the Iron Age, of larger size than any other fortification in use in the post-Roman period. Both are called Cadbury, one situated near Congresbury, the other, Cadbury Castle, near South Cadbury. Both have provided material, including imported Mediterranean ceramic, which reveals a new occupation in the 5th-6th c. Cadbury Castle is notable not just for its exaggerated dimensions but also because its bastions, with a circumference of 1095 m, were entirely refortified in this period. The identity of the financier of this massive work is unknown, but one could reasonably hypothesize that no one is more apt than Arthur. In southwestern England, Christianity survived the departure of the Romans untouched by the Anglo-Saxon *paganism, and here would be the bridgehead of monasticism coming from the Continent. It has been maintained that Tintagel, in Cornwall, is the oldest known British monastery (end of the 5th c.), but the hypothesis has been challenged in recent decades. The same debate concerns the ancient occupation of the ridge of Glastonbury Tor (worldly or monastic settlement?), while excavations in the abbey of Glastonbury have revealed traces of structures which would later become an Anglo-Saxon monastery of exceptional importance. A little group of commemorative stones of eastern Cornwall and western Devon suggest an Irish settlement in Dumnonia: some of these have Irish ogham inscriptions, and others commemorate, in Roman script, people with Irish names.

8. Anglo-Saxon churches. Christianity was not unknown in England before the arrival of *Augustine. In the North and West a *Celtic church was active, founded when the Romans were still governing the region. Missionaries of this church traveled from Scotland and Ireland toward the Continent, apparently abandoning the Saxon invaders to their gods and beliefs, even if they joined in the general process of conversion, when the mission of Augustine gained ground and culminated in the conversion of King Edwin of Northumbria in 626.

Little has survived of the pre-Augustinian Christianity in Anglo-Saxon England: from churches or remains of churches used in the period between the departure of the Romans and the mission of Augustine there remains that of St. Martin at Canterbury, where a part of the choir might have belonged to the old church which queen Bertha had used before the arrival of Augustine. One of the principal sites of the conversion has been discovered by the excavations at Yeavering, Northumberland. It was the seat of one of the palaces of the convert of Paulinus, King Edwin of Northumbria. Buildings have been found on the site which can be interpreted as churches, while one of these could have been a pagan temple later adapted to Christian worship. The churches built in Kent and in Essex after the arrival of the Augustinian mission in 597 constitute an easily recognizable group: they are built in stone, according to the Roman tradition, and possess common characteristics. A triple arch separated the short rectangular nave from the apse, flanked to the north and south by rooms or porticos which connected through narrow doors with the main body of the church, whose angles were reinforced with robust buttresses. The constructions were in wood, stone, brick or involved two or three of these materials. Even if we know from literary sources the existence of churches in wood (e.g., Lindisfarne, Glastonbury and Chester-le-Street), today a single wooden church from the Anglo-Saxon period remains, that of the 9th c. at Greensted in Essex. Traces of wooden churches have been found at North Elmhan, Norfolk; Pottern, Wiltshire; Rivenhall, Essex; St. Mary (formerly St. Bertelin), Stafford; St. Michael, Thetford; Wharram Percy, Yorkshire; and probably at Yeavering.

A certain number of churches, either complete or preserved only partially, can be dated with sound arguments, such as that of Sts. *Peter and *Paul at Canterbury, begun during the life of Augustine and completed shortly after his death (604–609); part of the present-day church of Monkwearmouth, consecrated in 674; and perhaps certain elements surviving in the twin church in Jarrow (684).

9. Anglo-Saxon monasteries. From the literary sources it is known that hermitages of Celtic type were found in Northumbria (e.g., the residence of *Cuthbert and Inner Farne), but the only probable location of a hermitage is Burgh Castle, Suffolk, organized some years after 630 by an Irish monk named Fursa. A cemetery was found there in 1960, and several cabins were attached, perhaps monastic cells. In the Anglo-Saxon period there were a variety of monastic buildings there. Only with the monastic renaissance of the 10th c. did the claustral order become normative. Among the Anglo-Saxon monasteries, Tynemouth, Whitby, Hartlepool, Glastonbury, the Old Minster at Winchester and the Monastery of St. Augustine at Canterbury have left some rather insignificant information on accessory buildings. But in the two monasteries of Bede, at Monkwearmouth and Jarrow, buildings have been discovered regularly aligned with the church. Associated with these stone buildings were less-solid cabins, one of which, at Jarrow, was almost certainly used as a workshop. Archaeological digs in the central nucleus of the two sites have certified that in 716 more than 600 people were in the two monastic houses, and not all could be housed in the buildings thus far brought to light; but these were rich and famous places.

II. Manuscripts.

1. The "Cathach" of St. Columba. This is the most ancient Irish manuscript, written probably in Ireland in the first part of the 7th c. (It cannot be much later than the death of the saint, in ca. 597.) The importance of the "Cathach" is that it shows the degree of decoration of manuscripts before close links were developed with the continent and before the development of the scriptoriums of Northumbria.

2. The Evangeliarium of St. Augustine. Augustine disembarked in Kent in 597. He and his companions brought books with them, and other books were sent from Rome with those who, like St. *Paulinus, came in the following years. One of these, believed to belong to St. Augustine and preserved as a *relic at Canterbury in the Middle Ages, an illuminated copy of the four gospels, is still preserved at Corpus Christi College of Cambridge.

3. The Book of Durrow. Dated around 675, the Book of Durrow is the first manuscript decorated in an elaborate way; but the writing, the rigor of the ornamentation and some other details show its adherence to a tradition already elaborated by the Irish scribes. Preserved for a long time in the Monastery of St. Columba at Durrow, County Offaly, it was written in Northumbria.

4. The Codex Amiatinus. We have a small group of manuscripts of which the most important, aside from the Lindisfarne Gospels, are the Codex Amiatinus and the Evangeliarium of Echternach, produced around 700 in the insular tradition of the Book of Durrow. The Codex Amiatinus, preserved at Florence, was one of the three copies of the gospels executed on the order of Ceolfrith (d. 716), first abbot of Jarrow, and was modeled on one of those brought from *Italy by *Benedict Biscop. Entirely Italianate in the characters and the ornamentation, the text is written in insular uncial "capitals," which is found only in the group of manuscripts from Wearmouth-Jarrow. The model for the Amiatinus was the Codex Grandior, one of the Bibles copied in Italy in the *Vivarium of *Cassiodorus in Calabria, preceded by a portrait of Esdra, which was used as a model for a portrait of an evangelist in the Codex Amiatinus.

5. Lindisfarne Gospels. Written in Latin around 698, in the monastery of Lindisfarne, situated on Holy Island, close to the coast of Northumberland, this is one of the greatest masterpieces of miniature. It is probably connected with the translation of St.

*Cuthbert (d. 687), which took place 20 March 697. The Latin text of the gospels is that of the Vulgate of St. *Jerome: the exemplar almost certainly was a book of the gospels brought to the monastery of Monkwearmouth-Jarrow from southern Italy. The texts of the Lindisfarne Gospels, the Codex Amiatinus and the Gospel of John of Stonyhurst form together one of the most important sources for the ancient form of the text of the Vulgate. The decoration consists of a series of illuminated pages and of other less decorated capitals. There are no manuscripts of the 7th-8th c. of certain Irish extraction which can equal the exceptional virtuosity of the great manuscripts of Northumbria, among which the Lindisfarne Gospels are the best documented and also the most complete.

6. The Book of Kells. This is the richest in decoration of all the insular books, and the initial pages reach the highest point of a development which began with the humble initials of the "Cathach" of St. Columba. Beyond the intrinsic quality and the amplitude of the ornamentation, the Book of Kells distinguishes itself from the other insular evangeliariums by the use of an organic decorative plan, by the miniatures inserted in the text and by the use of the so-called Beast Canon Tables: characteristics which could indicate just as much a totally new model (or more models) used by the artists of Kells, as an intermediate development (as yet unknown) in the insular miniature between the beginning and the middle of the 8th c. As for the date, it should probably be placed between the St. Petersburg Bede of 746 and the Evangeliarium Mac Regol of 822; but Northumbria, Pictland and Iona, just like Ireland, have been suggested recently as possible places of production. It is certain, however, that the manuscript was at Kells at the beginning of the 9th c.: it was probably written at Iona and transferred to Kells when Iona was sacked by Vikings in 806.

III. Sculpture and carving.

1. The Reculver cross. The most expert school of Anglo-Saxon sculpture in the 7th-8th c. seems to have been that of Northumbria. Traces of Anglo-Saxon sculpture in northern England belonging to the most ancient period are apparently rare: the only example of great importance is the Reculver cross (7th c.). With a round shaft built out of drums, there are five fragments, very worn but finely sculpted and decorated with images, foilage wreaths and ornamental motifs: among the sculpted figures the representations of the *ascension and of the *apostles. When complete it was 4.19 m high, including the base. As for the date, it seems older than the Saxon church of Reculver, founded in 669 by King *Egbert; it is nevertheless a unique sculpture, perhaps from the time of Theodore (archbishop of Canterbury, 668–690) or perhaps from the time of *Augustine himself. When it arrived in the church of Reculver, the cross was placed in front of the balustrade of the presbytery: a position which has no parallels, either in England or the Continent.

2. Breedon-on-the-Hill. Evidence of decorated churches for the most ancient period is rare: the panels were sometimes inserted in a wall, sometimes alone, sometimes as part of a decorative scheme. The best examples are at Breedon-on-the-Hill, Leicestershire, where a *monastery dating to ca. 700 (Bede, HE V, 23) preserves thirty fragmentary sculptures in styles different from any other product of continental Europe (probably historically datable to the 8th c.). The sculpture consists principally of friezes, around 20 cm (8 in) high, for a total length which exceeds 18 m (59 ft), with geometrical motifs, phytomorphs, zoomorphs and human figures. Fragments coming from other parts of Mercia have led to the hypothesis of Peterborough as the center of this school of sculpture. Beyond the friezes there are single panels, one of which, 61 cm (24 in) high, contains a figure of Christ which recalls the Book of Cerne, also painted in Mercia around 820, while another panel, ca. 90 cm (35.4 in) high, shows an angel stylistically connected with the best Carolingian sculpture.

3. The crosses of Ruthwell and of Bewcastle. The double monastery of *Bede at Monkwearmouth (consecrated in 674) and at Jarrow (consecrated in 684) was founded by *Benedict Biscop, who sent for artists from the Continent and reintroduced to Britain the arts of masonry and stoneworking. Around 2,000 fragments of Anglo-Saxon sculpture are known in England and in southern Scotland: a large part of these are crosses or tombstones. The large stone cross, around 5 m (16.4 ft) high, which we find especially in the north of England, must have been used to indicate spots for preaching, funeral monuments and meeting points. The cross, 5.5 m (18 ft) high, in red sandstone, of Ruthwell (Dumfriesshire) should be put into the same chronological context, around 700, as the Lindisfarne Gospels. The four arms of the cross originally bore portraits of the *evangelists (only two remain); below the summit of the cross, different Christian scenes; on the sides of the shaft, decorations of animals and birds and a translation in runic characters of one of the most beautiful Anglo-Saxon poems, The Dream of the Rood. The cross of Bewcastle in Cumbria, which is 20 km (12.4 mi) to the east of the cross of Ruthwell, has lost its top portion. The shaft remains are of gray sandstone, 4.42 m (14.5 ft) high on a pedestal, decorated with sacred figures, in particular St. John on the western side. The most ancient Ibernico-Saxon sculpture in Northumbria should be considered as a direct reflection of monastic culture, and therefore the crosses of Ruthwell and Bewcastle seem to reflect the public worship of a monastic community together with the devotional themes based on written texts such as The Dream of the Rood. It is possible to hypothesize close contacts with *Rome for many centers in Northumbria, on the basis of the life of St. Wilfrid (643–709), closely connected with the churches of Ripon and York. St. Wilfrid stands out as a cosmopolitan ecclesiastic, an important missionary invested with authority at the hands of the pope; he was responsible for the vigorous substitution of the Roman liturgy for the *Celtic uses in northern England and Benedictine monasticism for Celtic monasticism.

4. The crosses of Ahenny. One of the most noteworthy phenomena of Irish art of this period is the application of refined schemes of gold-working and bronze-working to sandstone sculptures. In Ahenny, County Tipperary, two large crosses survive which show the characteristics of metalworking. They rise on massive pyramidal bases, have shafts and arms with oblong cross section, and an ample and massive open ring at the intersection of shaft and transverse arm. No crucifixion is painted, nor are there sculpted figures: on the base, however, animals and plants are seen, a hunting scene, the funeral of a decapitated man and groups of ecclesiastics. The practice of raising monumental crosses in correspondence with monastic settlements was an insular peculiarity of the time, and the monuments of Ahenny are the most ancient true monumental crosses in Ireland. Their form derives from the crosses in wood covered in metal of northern England and southern Scotland.

5. The cross-slab of Aberlemno. Scotland (north and east of Northumbria [Angles], Dalriada [Scots-Irish] and Strathclyde [Britons]) was governed by the Picts, until the Norwegian incursions and settlements of the 9th c., which followed the weakening and substitution of the Pictish sovereigns and their supporters at the hands of the Scots in 843. Toward 400, St. *Ninian, from his Celtic monastery of Whithorn, evangelized the southern Picts, and so the land of the Picts was gradually absorbed into the sphere of the Celtic church until the Pictish nation, in 710 (Bede, HE V, 21), adopted the orthodox Roman form of organization, discipline and liturgy. The symbolic stones constituted for a long time the only significant indication for identifying Pictish artwork. Their origin was in a *pagan context, but not necessarily earlier in any event to the 7th c.: they are unhewn boulders and slabs carved with a series of symbols uniformly stylized: animals and a group of abstract symbols. The stones might have been commemorative, and the symbols could describe death. The symbols, if pagan and religious, must be considered as necessarily older than the end of the 7th c. Examples: the Glamis stone (at Glamis, Angus) and stone 5 of Meigle (Penthshire), both of which bear Pictish symbols, while on the other side a cross sculpted in relief has been added. On both of these stones the cross is a secondary addition. The successive class (class II) of Pictish sculpture, however, bears the cross in relief as its principal characteristic while the symbols play a secondary role. The cross-slab in sandstone in the cemetery of Aberlemno, Angus, 2.29 m high, belongs to the Ibernico-Saxon style of the Lindisfarne Gospels. The reverse shows a group of sculptures similar to those which are found on the side of the Glamis Manse cross-slab.

*6. The sarcophagus of St. Andrews. While the cross-slab of Aberlemno could be considered in relationship with the Lindisfarne Gospels, the sculpted figures of Sts. *Anthony and *Paul, at the top of the cross-slab of Nigg (2.36 m high: cemetery of Nigg, Ross-shire) can be linked with the figures of the Book of Kells. The sculpture of David on the reverse of the slab is important despite being mutilated, because it is related to a group of monuments, including the sarcophagus of St. Andrews (St. Andrews, Fife: length 1.75 m). The sarcophagus depicts David among animals at the center of the front and displays a cruciform decoration on the end panels. The animals are represented in the form of serpents solidly interlaced, like the roughly contemporaneous animals sculpted on the cross of Rothbury in Northumbria, generally considered to date to ca. 800. The iconographic analogies suggest assigning the work to Northumbria and make the sarcophagus of St. Andrews a masterpiece of European art, beyond a contribution of the Picts to the Carolingian renaissance.

7. The casket of Frank. Two examples of carving in Northumbria, the casket of Frank and the coffin of St. Cuthbert, form a special case, apart from the art of monument sculpture. The first is a casket in whalebone, carved on four sides and on the cover with scenes taken from pagan and classical legends, from Roman history and from Christian tradition. Executed in the 8th c., perhaps for a high-ranking patron, it bears on each side one or more inscriptions in Old English, inscribed in Anglo-Saxon-style runes. On the rear panel, part of the inscription is in Latin, carved in a mix of runic and Latin letters. The carving of the figures of the Ruthwell cross and of the sculptures on the chest of St. Cuthbert, far from the slightly barbarizing classicism of the portraits of the evangelists at Lindisfarne, could have arrived in France via a pilgrim, given that it formerly belonged to the Church of St. Julien de Brioude, one of the ancient Christian centers of the Auvergne.

8. The coffin of St. Cuthbert. The coffin of St. Cuthbert, the levis theca (Bede, Vita Cuthberti, ch. 42) in which the saint was placed in 698, is the only sculpted wooden object of any importance surviving from Anglo-Saxon England. It is a coffin made of oak, 1.98 m long, with a double cover. On the external cover a figure of Christ is carved with symbols of the evangelists at the four corners; at the narrower end of the coffin are the archangels Michael and Gabriel, and at the wider end a representation of the Virgin with child. On one of the long sides the twelve *apostles are arranged in two rows, each with his own name; on the other long side are another five archangels, among whom Raphael and Uriel appear. The artist who decorated the reliquary-coffin combined two different sources, a literary and a figurative one. It is not possible to trace all the iconography of the coffin to a single source. A greater unity is clear in the liturgical program than in the iconography, but this is the result of a peculiar artistic interpretation: in fact, however, prayer and art seem to be fused here in a profound unity. A litany is a means for invoking the aid and protection of the saints; the litanies were cited on the biers containing their relics, which became bier-reliquaries, precisely to ensure this kind of protection. The representation of the celestial custodians on the bier of St. Cuthbert was not therefore a simple decoration or a pure recitation of prayers, but the creation, by the monks of Lindisfarne, of an immanent and perpetual fulfillment of this protection.

IV. Metalwork.

1. The Walesby pool. In Britain eighteen fragmentary lead basins, all from the 4th c. and likely used in baptismal ceremonies, have been found with some Christian symbols. One fragment, found at Risby Manor, Walesby, near Market Rasen, Lincolnshire (the full basin measured ca. 1 m [3.3 ft] in diameter and 50 cm [20 in] in depth) offers a scene probably distributed on three horizontal panels separated by four columns. The right panel shows three standing masculine figures, in mantel and tunic, a scene probably repeated in the lost left panel. The central panel represents a naked woman between two other richly veiled and draped women. The columns probably mark the inside of the baptistery. According to the most convincing interpretation, the central panel shows a *baptism in progress and the point of view is that of the officiating cleric or bishop, who is quite close to the font, in front of the candidate, who is receiving baptism within the basin, accompanied by the godmothers. There was scanty knowledge of leaden pools until the excavations of 1974 at Icklingham, Suffolk, where four were found, and the site was revealed to be a Christian cemetery, used roughly between 350 and 400–420, with two important structures: a small Christian church and a baptismal pool.

2. The Mildenhall treasure. The importance of Icklingham as a *Roman Christian center was made even more evident by its proximity to the ancient hoard of silver treasure found by accident at Mildenhall, Suffolk (only 8 km [5 mi] away), in 1942. There were more than thirty pieces of silverwork. The biggest plate (diameter 60 cm [24 in], weighing more than 8 kg [17.6 lb]) is the most beautiful object surviving from Roman Britain. The style dates it to the 4th c., and together with the other objects it must have been hidden around 360. Among the spoons, five have Christian inscriptions: one with Papittedo vivas, another with Pascentia vivas, and three with the Christogram between alpha and omega. The biggest plate and two of the large plates bear Dionysiac scenes, which should be interpreted in a Christian sense, as also the marine symbolism of the ocean in the center of the biggest plate.

3. The Traprain Law treasure. This mass of silver, deliberately broken into fragments, except for a spoon and a small triangular cup, came to light during excavations in 1919 within a natural fortified hilltop beyond the imperial frontier, 32 km (20 mi) E of modern Edinburgh. It weighed more than 24 kg (53 lb) and included pieces belonging to more than 150 different objects. The treasure was buried at the end of the 5th c. Many of the objects are silver plates, but Christian pieces are not absent, perhaps the remains of a cross, and objects coming from a woman's dressing room and from the clothing of an official. A gilded silver flask is decorated with four scenes from the OT and the NT: *Adam and Eve, the adoration of the three kings, *Moses who strikes the rock, and a fourth, identified as the betrayal of *Judas or an episode in the life of Moses, perhaps the miracle of the quails in the desert. A second flask has the Christogram, *alpha and omega, and an inscription. A small colander bears a bowl perforated in the shape of the chi-rho, with other holes under the edge which make the words Iesus Christus. Two of the spoons have the Christogram in the bowl, another on the handle.

4. The Water Newton treasure. This is a silver treasure hoard which is Christian in a particular sense, because it was perhaps property of a church or of a Christian community. Found in 1975 at Durobrivae near Peterborough, Huntingdonshire, the treasure includes about thirty objects, on fifteen of which the Christogram appears, while two vases and a triangular plaque bear long Latin inscriptions related to the Christian liturgy. The group belongs to the 4th c. Its importance consists in the fact that it might be one of the most ancient collections of silver church plates in the entire Roman Empire.

5. The Sutton Hoo ship burial. Redwald, king of East Anglia, died in 624–625 and was buried with a great treasure in a ship at Sutton Hoo, Suffolk, covered with earth. Despite the pagan system of burial, there are indications here that he was Christian. The inscription "Saul" and "Paul" on two *Byzantine silver spoons indicate the baptism of the royal convert. A group of ten silver cups with cruciform ornaments, of probable Christian significance, was placed next to the spoons in the burial deposit and closed in a sheath also decorated with Christian motifs in the form of the cross. The most notable Christian object of the group was the great golden buckle (length 13 cm [5.1 in], weight 414 g [14.6 oz]). The buckle was not functional but is an empty cavity; the rear plate is joined to a hook. Doubtless made in England, its function was to contain Christian sacred *relics: a reliquary therefore made for a king by an English artist according to the design of *Frankish buckles.

6. The pectoral cross of St. Cuthbert. St. Cuthbert died in 687 in his hermitage on Farne Island. In his tomb, in Durham cathedral, five objects approximately contemporaneous with St. Cuthbert were found: the pectoral cross of the saint, a portable altar, a comb, a gospel book and the wooden coffin. The pectoral cross (length 6 cm [2.4 in]), made of gold and decorated with garnets in settings with a circular garnet at the center and a ring-loop, is hollow and perhaps contained a relic. Other crosses made with this technique are known from Wilton and Ixworth, and a small hanging cross, made of gold with a central garnet, appears in the necklace of Desborough. Considered as a group, these objects show that there was no immediate change in the art of gold-working with the arrival of Christianity: slight differences in style in the cross of St. Cuthbert suggest nonetheless that it is a product of Saxon craftsmanship in the north of England, destined for the court environment and for the church of Northumbria in the 7th c.

7. The chalice of Ardagh. The *chalice (height 15 cm [5.9 in]), the most important liturgical object found in 1868 near Ardagh, County Limerick, in Ireland, is made of silver, bronze and gold, with glass and rock crystal insets. It is part of one of the richest groups of ancient Christian objects found in Ireland: a silver chalice, a chalice in bronze and four decorative pins. The treasure hoard must have been the property of a rich monastery. Only partially decorated, on the main body it shows friezes, braids and geometrical and zoomorphic traceries; in the lower part, in contrast, rings of applied filigree and a rock crystal located in the center. Under the horizontal line of golden filigree on the cup the names of the apostles stick out in relief on a clear background in a strip incised with points. The writing is in the elegant characters of the Lindisfarne Gospels. On that basis, the Ardagh chalice is dated around 700, a little after the Lindisfarne Gospels and before the Book of Kells.

8. The Derrynavlan group. The group, found in 1980 at Derrynavlan, County Tipperary, a monastic settlement founded by St. Ruadhan of Lorrha in the 6th c., which flourished in the 8th and 9th c., is another of the richest groups of precious Christian objects found in Ireland. It consists of a silver chalice, a silver paten, a circular support for the paten, a gilded bronze strainer and a bronze cup. The silver chalice (height 18 cm [7.1 in], diameter 17 cm [6.7 in]), very similar to the chalice of Ardagh but with differing proportions, is made up of three principal elements: a bowl with a simple projecting edge, a decorated stem and a high base or foot. Like the Ardagh chalice, it is decorated with a strip of filigreed panels just under the edge, separated by seven mountings of amber drops; on the handles, large shields decorated with amber and filigree; on the stem, golden decorations combined with filigreed panels; on the side under the base, geometrical and zoomorphic motifs. Different filigree techniques were used, datable to the early decades of the 800s. All the objects coming from Derrynavlan can be associated with liturgical service like that of the *mass recorded in the Missal of Stowe in the 8th c. (see *Celtic liturgy).

9. The treasure of the island of St. Ninian. The group, found in 1958 on the island of St. Ninian, Shetland Islands, includes twenty-eight pieces in decorated silver and a porpoise jaw closed in a larchwood box. The group, in provenance from a Pictish environment, was set aside toward the end of the 8th c., even if certain pieces could have been in use for some time. Stylistically the group's character suggests the asymbolic art of the Picts, and comparisons lead to a date subsequent to the Lindisfarne Gospels, perhaps toward the middle of the 8th c. It is debated whether this group should be attributed to a Celtic church or not. In any case, it represents the profane section of a rich hoard, whose most ancient object, a silver cup designed for hanging, cannot be earlier than 700, while the most recent date no later than the last quarter of the 8th c. This collection must date back therefore to ca. 775.

10. The reliquary belt of Moylough. Found in 1943 at Moylough Townland, County Sligo, Ireland, the reliquary belt of Moylough is made of two bronze strips belonging to a leather belt which most likely belonged to a saint. Various texts mention relics of this kind preserved in the monasteries. The exterior bronze plate bears a series of mountings with yellow and red enameled decorations and panels of blue and white millefiori. There are no decorations with animal traceries and engravings, and therefore the belt reliquary is earlier than the chalice of Ardagh, perhaps around 700.

11. The reliquary of Monymusk. This is a box-shaped reliquary 10 cm (3.9 in) long, made of wood decorated with inserted bronze plates; the back side is covered with engraved silver and also decorated with medallions. The decorative details recall the finds from the island of St. Ninian and the decorations of the Lindisfarne Gospels. This reveals influences from Northumbria before the 8th c. in the Pictish region, to whose craftsmanship the work belongs. The reliquary of Monymusk, today at Edinburgh, seems never to have been lost. It is sometimes called "Brecbennoch of St. Columba." It is said to have been carried in the Battle of Bannockburn (1314), and it is mentioned in documents concerning land grants from the beginning of the 16th c.

12. The brooch of Hunterston. The brooch (diameter 10 cm [3.9 in]), found in Scotland around 1830, belongs to the pseudo-penannular decorated type of brooch. The brooch "of Tara" (which gave its name to the type) and the brooches of Westness, Dunbeath and Hunterston belong stylistically to the period of the Lindisfarne Gospels and beyond, to around the first quarter of the 8th c. The brooch of Hunterston is the most ancient remaining from the series, datable to shortly after 700, and since the conjunction between the extremities is decorated with a cross, in the lost prototype this element was almost certainly a reliquary. In fact this is an important piece of Hiberno-Saxon art and in general of Christian antiquity.

13. The treasure of Hoxne. In November of 1992, near the village of Hoxne in Suffolk, the largest and richest treasure hoard ever found in the entire island was uncovered by accident. It consists of 565 golden solidi (principally from Arcadius and Honorius), 60 miliarenses, 14,000 silver siliquae and more than 200 objects in gold and silver, on many of which signs of Christian belief appear. The hoard can be dated to between the middle of the 4th and the first decade of the 5th c.

G. Baldwin-Brown, The Arts in Early England, 6 vols., London 1903-1937; A. Mahr (ed.), Christian Art in Ancient Ireland, I, Dublin 1932; E.A. Lowe, Codices Latini Antiquiores, 12 parts, Oxford 1934-1971; T.D. Kendrick, Anglo-Saxon Art to A.D. 900, London 1938; J. Raftery (ed.), Christian Art in Ancient Ireland, II, Dublin 1941; E.H. Alton - P. Meyer - G.O. Simms, Evangeliorum Quattuor Codex Cennanensis: Introduction and Facsimile, 3 vols., Bern 1950-1951; R.B.K. Stevenson, Pictish Art, in F.T. Wainwright (ed.), The Problem of the Picts, Edinburgh 1955, 97-128; C.F. Battiscombe (ed.), The Relics of St. Cuthbert, Oxford 1956; T.D. Kendrick et al., Evangeliorum Quattuor Codex Lindisfarnensis, 2 vols.: I, facsimile, Bern 1956; II, Commentary, Bern 1960; R.B.K. Stevenson, The Chronology and Relationship of Some Irish and Scottish Crosses: Journal of the Royal Society of Antiquaries of Ireland 86 (1956) 84-96; A. Grabar - C. Nordenfalk, Early Medieval Painting from the Fourth to Eleventh Century ("Book Illumination," ed. C. Nordenfalk), New York 1957; M. & L. De Paor, Early Christian Ireland, London 1958; E.A. Lowe, English Uncial, Oxford 1960; J.M.C. Toynbee, Art in Roman Britain, London 1962; Id., Art in Britain under the Romans, Oxford 1964; R.J. Cramp, Early Northumbrian Sculpture, Jarrow upon Tyne 1965; F. Henry, Irish Art in the Early Christian Period to A.D. 800, London 1965; H.M. & J. Taylor, Anglo-Saxon Architecture, Cambridge 1965; R.L.S. Bruce-Mitford, The Reception by the Anglo-Saxon of Mediterranean Art Following Their Conversion from Ireland and Rome: XIV Settimana di studio del Centro italiano di studi sull'Alto Medioevo, Spoleto 1967; S.S. Frere, Britannia: A History of Roman Britain, London 1967; I. Henderson, The Picts, London 1967; M.W. Barley - R.P.C. Hanson (eds.), Christianity in Roman Britain, 300–700, Leicester 1968; T.J. Brown, The Stonyhurst Gospel of St. John, Oxford 1969; R.L.S. Bruce-Mitford, The Art of the Codex Amiatinus: Journal of the British Archaeological Association, 3rd series, 32 (1969) 1-25; D.J. Smith, The Mosaic Pavements, in A.L.F. Rivet (ed.), The Roman Villa in Britain, London 1969, 71-126; R.J. Cramp, Decorated Window-Glass and Millefiori from Monkwearmouth: Antiquaries Journal 50 (1970) 327-335; M. Swanton (ed.), The Dream of the Rood, Manchester 1970; R.B.K. Stevenson, Sculpture in Scotland in the 6th-9th Centuries AD, in V. Milojčić (ed.), Kolloquium über Spätantike und Frühmittelalterliche Skulptur 2, Mainz 1971, 65-74; T.J. Brown, Northumbria and the Book of Kells, in P. Clemoes (ed.), Anglo-Saxon England, I, 1972, 219-246; A. Small - C. Thomas - D.M. Wilson, St. Ninian's Isle and Its Treasure, Oxford 1973; R.L.S. Bruce-Mitford, Aspects of Anglo-Saxon Archaeology, London 1974; R.B.K. Stevenson, The Hunterston Brooch and Its Significance: Medieval Archaeology 18 (1974) 16-42; R.L.S. Bruce-Mitford, The Sutton Hoo Ship Burial, 1: Excavations, Background, the Ship, Dating and Inventory; 2: Arms, Armour and Regalia, London 1975-1978; R.J. Cramp, Window Glass from the Monastic Site of Jarrow: Journal of Glass Studies 17 (1975) 88-96; D.M. Wilson (ed.), The Archaeology of Anglo-Saxon England, London 1976; K. Hughes, Early Christian Ireland: Introduction to the Sources, Cambridge 1977; J.P.C. Kent - K.S. Painter, Wealth of the Roman World, A.D. 300-700, London 1977; K.S. Painter, The Mildenhall Treasure, London 1977; Id., The Water Newton Early Christian Silver, London 1977; J.J.G. Alexander, Insular Manuscripts, Sixth to Ninth Century; A Survey of Manuscripts Illustrated in the British Isles, I, London 1978; R.T. Farrel (ed.), Bede and Anglo-Saxon England (British Archaeological Reports 46), Oxford 1978; D.M. Wilson, The Art and Archaeology of Bedan Northumbria, in ibid., 1-22; R.L.S. Bruce-Mitford, The Sutton Hoo Ship Burial: A Handbook, London 1979; P. Brown, The Book of Kells, London 1980; H. Richardson, Derrynavlan and Other Early Church Treasures: Journal of the Royal Society of Antiquaries of Ireland 110 (1980) 92-115; M. Ryan, The Derrynavlan Hoard: Ireland Today, Dublin (April 1980) 2-5; J. Backhouse, The Lindisfarne Gospels, London 1981; P. Salway, Roman Britain, Oxford 1981; A.C. Thomas, Christianity in Roman Britain to A.D. 500, London 1981; D.M. Wilson, The Anglo-Saxons, London [3]1981; R. Kozodoy, The Reculver Cross: Archaeologia 108 (1981); G.W. Meates, The Roman Villa at Lullingstone, Kent, I, Kent 1979; M. Redknap, The Christian Celts, Cardiff 1991; D. Watts, Christians and Pagans in Roman Britain, London-New York 1991; D.N. Dumville, Liturgy and the Ecclesiastical History of Late Anglo-Saxon England, Woodbridge 1992; L. Gougaud, Christianity in Celtic Lands: A History of the Churches of the Celts, Their Origin, Their Development, Influence and Mutual Relations, Dublin 1992; B. Lehane, Early Celtic Christianity, London 1994; C. Tedeschi, Osservazioni sui formulari delle iscrizioni britanniche dal V all'VIII secolo: RomBarb 13 (1994) 283-295; Ch. Thomas, And Shall These Mute Stones Speak? Post-Roman Inscriptions in Western Britain, Cardiff 1994; C.F. Mawer, Evidence for Christianity in Roman Britain: The Small Finds (BAR British Series 243), Oxford 1995; Th. Taylor, The Celtic Christianity of Cornwall, Felinfach 1995; C. Tedeschi, Osservazioni sulla paleografia delle iscrizioni britanniche paleocristiane (V-VII sec.): Scrittura e civiltà 19 (1995) 67-121; A.M. Luiselli Fadda - É. Ó Carragáin (eds.), Le isole britanniche e Roma in età romanobarbarica, Roma 1998; Ch. Thomas, Christian Celts: Messages and Images, Stroud 1998; D. Watts, Religion in Late Roman Britain: Forces of Change, London-New York 1998; K. Hylson-Smith, Christianity in England from Roman Times to the Reformation. I. From Roman Times to 1066, London 1999; Th.M. Charles-Edwards, Early Christian Ireland, Cambridge 2000; D. Edel, The Celtic West and Europe: Studies in Celtic Literature and the Early Irish Church, Dublin 2001; M. Ghilardi, Egregium Albanum fecunda Britannia profert. Albano e i primi santi della Britannia romana: RomBarb 17 (2002) 1-18; Id., Le pitture della villa di Lullingstone. Quaranta anni dopo lo scavo: note per una rilettura: RivAC 79 (2003) 289-312.

K.S. Painter - M. Ghilardi

BROTHER/SISTER The term brother/sister is used with multiple meanings in the Greco-Roman world: compatriot, friend, colleague, every man (especially in *Stoicism); furthermore, it assumes a religious meaning—as coreligionist—already in the Greek confraternities and in the mystery religions; later in the NT, especially in the Synoptics, the Acts of the Apostles and in the Pauline letters, it designates every member of the Christian community. The expression brother/sister expresses several ideas at the same time. First, it expresses the suppression of every differentiation of race, age, condition and sex. Second, it expresses the new bonds, stronger than those of blood, created by the spiritual unity of those who fulfill the will of God (see Mk 3:35). And third, it expresses the common *baptism, which renders the Christian, on the one hand, a child of the heavenly Father and, on the other, a brother/sister in the faith to every member of the Christian community, coheir of the same hope, ready to recognize in every person the image of God. The term continued in the first Christian writers to indicate the faithful (Clement of Rome, Didache, the *Apologists; even Lucian, in Mort. Peregr. 13, makes use of it to indicate the Christians; *Justin in Apol. 1,65 writes that the neophyte is led to the "brethren"). At the same time, with baptism Christians have a more vivid awareness of the universal brotherhood (Ignatius, Eph. 10,3; Justin, Dial. 96,2; Aristides, Apol. 15,6; Clement Al., Strom. 7,14,85; Tertullian, Apol. 39,8). The term is deepened christologically: Christ, who has become our brother and the firstborn, leads us to God the Father and makes us participants in the fraternity of a new birth (Origen, Orat. 15,4; Athanasius, Or. c. Arian 2,62; Gregory of Nyssa, Ref. conf. Eun. 80-82; Contra Eun. 3,10,1). The *pagans, interpreting such terms viciously, accused the Christians of sexual promiscuity and incestuous unions, accusations amply refuted by the *Apologists (Athenagoras, Leg. 32,4-5; Theophilus Ant., Ad Aut. 3,13; Minucius, Octav. 9 and 31).

The use of the term is less frequent in the 3rd c. We find it again in Hippolytus's Philosoph. and in the Acts of Pionius. *Cyprian uses it in the Letters and at the beginning of the De lapsis. It appears in epitaphs until the 4th c. (DACL 5, 2580-2585). At the same time a progressive restriction of its application is visible: it is reserved to monks and the clergy. *Constantine uses it for the bishops (Eusebius, Vita Const. 3,24). The bishops apply it to the clerics (Augustine, De cat. rud. 1), but also to the faithful, especially in preaching. Furthermore, some Fathers continue to use such terms without any restriction to indicate the brotherhood of all the Christians (Optatus, C. Parmen. 1,3-4; 4,2; Augustine, En. Ps. 48,8; 127,12; John Chrys., In Hebr. 25,3; In Mt 79 [80],1) and to indicate that all persons are equal before God (Lactantius, Div. Inst. V, 6,12; V, 15,2-3; Augustine, Ep. 23,1). The term is in use particularly among monks, nuns and between them (Basil, Reg. brev. 104; Palladius, Hist. Laus. 17; Jerome, In Hier. 4, praef.; Egeria, Itiner. 10,3). Brotherhood, based on the creation of every person in the image of God and reinforced in Christianity by baptism, is nevertheless also a task to be realized concretely in history.

DACL 5 (1923) 2578-2585; RAC 2, 631-640 (bibl.); Cath 4 (1956) 1568-1970; Griechisch-Deutsches Wörterbuch zu den Schriften des Neuen Testaments und der übrigen urchristlichen Literatur, Berlin [5]1958, 30-32; Lampe (1961) 29-30; DSp 5 (1964) 1141-1167; LTK[3] 2, 710-711.

A. Hamman - M. Maritano

BURGUNDIANS. A people of Scandinavian origin—the name of the Baltic island of Bornholm (Burgundarholm in the Middle Ages) is linked to them—settled in the 1st c. BC in the plains between the Oder and the Vistula. Around the mid-3rd c., during their migration south, the Burgundians clashed with the Gepidae and were then driven back by Emperor Probus and later by Emperor *Maximian. At the end of the century, however, we find them established in the region of the Main and allied with the *Romans against the Alamanni. In 406, after the *Vandals, Suebi, Alans and other barbarian peoples, they broke through the Rhine limes and settled in *Gaul, where they supported (411) the election of the Gallic nobleman *Jovinus as Roman emperor and, as foederati, obtained (413) from the Romans the concession of a territory on the left bank of the Rhine, centered at Worms. According to *Orosius the Burgundians converted to Catholicism during this period, but many scholars think it more likely that they converted to *Arianism. Following an attempted expansion into the province of Belgica, they were severely defeated (436–437) by *Aetius and the *Huns; Aetius, however, established them (443) in Sapaudia, the region around Geneva, as hospites. In 455, led by King Gundioc, they and the Gallo-Roman nobility supported the election of *Avitus as emperor, whom they then followed in the military campaign in *Spain against the Suebi. But then, at odds with Roman power over the deposition of Avitus and the election of Majorian, they occupied *Lyons, *Vienne and the surrounding regions: the provinces of Lugdunensis I and the Viennensis. After Majorian was killed, the Burgundians strengthened their position by supporting Ricimer; King Gundioc married one of Ricimer's sisters and was named magister militum Galliarum, an office conferred also on his successors. Gundioc's eldest son, Gundobad, the most important of the Burgundian kings, always maintained good relations with the Romans and was often their ally. The lex Burgundiorum was promulgated during his reign (502); the most Roman of the barbarian laws, it explicitly proclaimed parity of condition between Romans and Burgundians. Gundobad, though an Arian like his father, was strongly influenced by the bishop of *Vienne, Alcimus Ecdicius *Avitus, and allowed his son *Sigismund to convert to Catholicism. When the latter took power on the death of his father (516), Burgundy became a national Romano-Burgundian kingdom, united under the authority of a Catholic king who was a patricius of the Eastern Roman emperor *Anastasius. Sigismund encouraged the spread of Catholicism in the Burgundian kingdom under the guidance of Avitus, who in 517 convoked the Council of Epaon to assert the priority of the Roman Catholic Church over the Burgundian Arian Church. In 523 the country was invaded by the *Franks, and Sigismund was killed, but his brother Godomar managed to defend the kingdom. In 532 the Frankish kings finally occupied Burgundy, which was integrated into the Merovingian realm in 534.

A. Mentz, Schrift und Sprache der Burgunder: Zeit. f. deut. Alter. 85 (1954) 1-17; E.A. Thompson, The Settlement of the Barbarians in Southern Gaul: JRS 46 (1956) 65-75; M. Beck, Bemerkungen zur Geschichte des ersten Burgunderreiches: SZG 13 (1963) 433-490; R. Guichard, Essai sur l'histoire du peuple burgonde, Paris 1965; O. Perrin, Les Burgondes. Leur histoire des origines à la fin du premier royaume (534), Neuchâtel 1968; L. Musset, Les invasions: les vagues germaniques, Paris [2]1969; G. Chevrier - G. Pieri, La loi romaine des Burgundes: Ius Romanum Medii Aevi, Milan 1969; E. Demougeot, La formation de l'Europe et les invasions barbares, I, Paris 1969, II, Paris 1979; S. Mazzarino, Aezio, la "Notitia Dignitatum" e i Burgundi di Worms, Atti Conv. Lincei: Conv. intern. Renania Romana (April 1975), 23, Rome 1976, 297-317; B. Saitta, I Burgundi (413–534), Catania 1977; R. Soraci, Roma e i Burgundi, Atti Conv. Lincei: Conv. intern. Passaggio dal mondo antico al medioevo. Da Teodosio a s. Gregorio M. (May 1977), Rome 1980, 477-513; H. Rosenberg, Bishop Avitus of Vienne (c. 493–517) and the Burgundian Kingdom: Journal of the Rocky Mountain Medieval-Renaissance Association 3 (1982) 1-12; J. Favrod, Histoire politique du Royaume Burgonde (443–534), Lausanne 1997.

C. Braidotti

BYZACENA, Councils of. Fulgentius Ferrandus's canonical collection (CCL 149, 284-311) refers to various councils celebrated in Byzacena in the 5th and 6th c. but never specifies their dates. Only the acts of the Council of *Thela (or Thelepte), celebrated in February 418, survive.

CCL 149, 54-65; Palazzini 1, 182-183.

Ch. Munier

BYZANTINE LITURGY

I. Origin and geographical areas - II. Present-day situation.

I. Origin and geographical areas.

The *liturgy today known inclusively as "Byzantine" is the result of a long process of encounter and evolution of multiple local traditions in the Eastern Christian empire, concluding in a *Constantinopolitan synthesis. To reach the beginning of this process, we must take into account several geographical areas that were particularly creative in this field.

1. Jerusalem and Palestine. A cosmopolitan region, a center of constant *pilgrimages and densely populated with *monasteries characterized by conciliar *orthodoxy. From the 4th c. a cathedral liturgy marked by the presence of the holy places developed here, attested in *Egeria's Peregrinatio, in the *Armenian lectionary (5th c.) and in the *Georgian lectionary (7th c.). Great monasteries such as the *Laura of St. *Sabas or the *Cenobium of St. Theodosius produced and reformed their particular monastic traditions, formed between the 4th c. and the Persian (614) and Arab (638) invasions. The most important sediment left by *Jerusalem in the Constantinopolitan liturgy is to be found in the *liturgical year (Great Lent, feasts of dedication), in the divine office (agrypnie or vigils) and in the *anaphora of St. James, which in turn influenced *Antiochene eucharistic texts that later emigrated to Constantinople.

A. Baumstark, Denkmäler der Entstehungsgeschichte des byzantinischen Ritus: OrChr 24 (1927) 1-32; J. Mateos, La vigile cathédrale chez Egérie: OCP 27 (1961) 281-312; G. Bertonière, The Historical Development of the Easter Vigil and Related Services in the Greek Church: OCA 193, Rome 1972; A. Tarby, La prière eucharistique de l'Église de Jérusalem, Théol. Hist. 17, Paris 1972.

2. Antioch and Cappadocia. Byzantium-Constantinople, precisely in the period in which it was consolidating its ecclesiastical structure (4th-5th c.), came under the direct influence of hierarchs and theologians of *Antiochene and *Cappadocian origin such as *Gregory of Nazianzus (379), *Nectarius of Tarsus (381–387), *John Chrysostom (398) and *Nestorius (428–431). During this period the liturgy of St. James was introduced at Constantinople, which enjoyed almost universal use in the Syrian East until the 6th-c. *monophysite crisis. Constantinople introduced, from the Cappadocian East, the *anaphora attributed to St. *Basil, which had condensed a more abundant and complex primitive source, perhaps with distant *Egyptian roots, and remained normative until it was replaced—with 10 exceptions annually—by the so-called anaphora of St. John Chrysostom, directly related to the Syrian anaphora of the twelve *apostles. Among works of Antiochene derivation that left a deep mark in the field of liturgical theology and of certain rites, we should also mention ps.-*Dionysius's Ecclesiastical Hierarchies (5th-6th c.).

3. Constantinople. Imperial capital and patriarchal see, it was able more than once to integrate the contributions of the distant provinces into its own local tradition, created around the cathedral of Hagia Sophia and the Byzantine *monasteries, from which the group of Studite cenobia emerged. From the 5th c. the Byzantine liturgy gradually acquired a cosmopolitan dimension, to which political expansion and missionary activity gave a pan-Byzantine and orthodox imprint.

The line of this evolution is contained in the history of the Typikon (a book with the system of rubrics and their interpretation, and the calendar with *hagiographical and topographical information), the highest authority for regulating celebratory life. The Byzantine Church produced various Typika, but three were the most important: (1) the Typikon of the Great Church of Christ (Hagia Sophia of Constantinople), (2) the Typikon of St. Sabas (Palestinian) and (3) the Typikon of Studion (Constantinopolitan). Each of these represents a local tradition based on other liturgical books, which had also developed gradually according to time and place (book of hours, lectionary, psalter, euchology, various hymnals for Propers). The Byzantine liturgical tradition is therefore quite diverse in its origins, since the various geographical areas had the freedom to observe their own Typika. Historical vicissitudes led to the encounter, fusion or respective elimination of the Typika, resulting in the creation of a fairly uniform liturgy in the orthodox world from the end of the Middle Ages. The reform of these three Typika took place in the context of political-social catastrophes that interrupted liturgical life, followed by a work of reconstruction and completion of the lost heritage: (1) at Jerusalem, the Persian invasion of 614 and the devastation under Caliph Hakim in 1009; (2) at Constantinople, the iconoclastic crisis (726–843) and the Latin conquest of the city (1204–1261).

These reforms involved the reorganization, enrichment or reduction of the daily-weekly cycle and the movable *Easter cycle. They are connected with anonymous liturgists, or with great Palestinian names like St. *Sabas, St. *Sophronius, patriarch of Jerusalem (d. 638), St. *Andrew of Crete (d. 726), St. *John of Damascus (d. 749) and St. *Cosmas of Maiuma (d. 760); or with Constantinopolitans like patriarchs *Anthimus (536) and St. *Germanus (d. 733), St. *Theodore the Studite (d. 826), and St. Joseph of Thessalonica (832). The manuscript tradition attests the state and diffusion of the Typika according to periods and regions, so much so that it would be more correct to speak in the plural of Sabaite and Studite Typika. While Studite Typika were quite widespread until the 12th c. and then were increasingly confined to Mt. Athos and Byzantine S Italy (palaeo-Calabrian, Calabro-Sicilian and Apulian families), the Sabaite Typika took definitive root at Constantinople from the 13th c. and so became, at a late date, the present Typikon of the Great Church, homonymous with the archaic one. Thanks to the invention of printing (first ed. Venice 1546), this Constantinopolitan modification of the Typikon of St. Sabas became the normative book of the liturgy of Byzantium and the churches in communion with it (Eastern Chalcedonian patriarchates) or born from its missions. In Russia, its gradual adoption began in the 15th c., becoming definitive with the three 17th-c. editions. Expert 19th-c. Russian liturgists such as A. Dmitrievskij, I. Karabinov, I. Karataev, A. Nikolskij and M. Skaballanovich studied, collected and published its liturgical MS source, throwing much light on this complex evolution and showing, according to M. Arranz, that "the myth of Byzantine liturgical immobility is precisely that: a myth."

Dimanche. Office selon les Huit Tons (intr. N. Egender and C. Hannick), Chevetogne 1972; La prière des Heures Horologhion (intr. N. Egender), Chevetogne 1975; M. Arranz, Les grandes étapes de la liturgie byzantine, XXIII^e Sem. Lit. St. Serge, Rome 1976.

II. Present-day situation.

1. The movable and fixed cycles of the liturgical year.

(a) Movable cycle. Arose as a development of the feast of Easter, center of the liturgical year. It comprises a period of four Sundays before *Lent, six weeks of Lent, Palm Sunday and the Great Week (Holy Week). The Propers for this time are contained in the Triodion. Then follows the period that begins with the Easter Vigil and concludes with All Saints' Sunday (first Sunday after *Pentecost); the Propers are contained in the Pentecostarion, also called the Triodion of Flowers. The Sundays of the movable cycle are often named after the gospel read at their eucharistic liturgy (e.g., Sunday of the Prodigal Son, of Thomas, of the Samaritan Woman), or after particular events or people, e.g., Carnival Sunday (end of rich foods at the beginning of Lent), Orthodoxy Sunday (reestablishment of the cult of icons on the first Sunday of Lent, 843), Sunday of St. John Climacus, of St. Mary the Egyptian, etc.

(b) Fixed annual cycle: regulated by the Byzantine civil calendar, it begins on 1 September and ends on 31 August. The Propers for each day are in the Menaia, i.e., 12 monthly volumes, one for each month of the year. They also contain the Propers for the great fixed feasts, i.e., the Nativity of the Mother of God (8 Sept.), the Exaltation of the Holy Cross (14 Sept.), the Entrance of Mary into the Temple (21 Nov.), the Nativity of the Savior (25 Dec.), Epiphany (6 Jan.), Jesus' Encounter with Simeon, or Hypapante (2 Feb.), the Annunciation (25 March), the Transfiguration (6 Aug.), the Dormition of the Mother of God (15 Aug.). Palm Sunday, the Resurrection, the *Ascension and Pentecost fall in the movable cycle. Every day of the year has a memoria of one or more saints, some of which have a particularly festive character: St. George, St. Nicholas, St. Demetrius, the Nativity and Beheading of St. John the Forerunner.

(c) Fixed weekly cycle: each day of the week has, besides the texts provided by one of the two cycles, a particular coloring that brings out certain aspects of the economy of salvation. Sunday: continual celebration of the victorious resurrection. Monday: the angels recall the eternity and glory of the Word. Tuesday: St. John the Baptist, the most illustrious and immediate precursor of the Messiah. Wednesday and Friday: meditation on the cross and on the passion in union with Mary. Thursday: celebration of the *apostles' missionary activity and that of St. *Nicholas of Myra, the most popular of the hierarchs. Friday: commemoration of the cross. Saturday: commemoration of the absent faithful, i.e., all saints and the dead. The texts corresponding to the various daily offices are contained in the important book of the Eight Tones (Oktoichos, cycle of eight weeks). Their form, always hymnic, goes back to very different times and authors, some of them famous and particularly inspired, both theologically and poetically: St. *John of Damascus, St. *Cosmas of Maiuma, St. Theodore the Studite, St. Theophane Graptós, St. Joseph of Syracuse, etc. They have different technical names according to their style of metrical composition or their position in the hours of the office (sticheron, troparion, apolytikion, kathisma, kontakion, ikos, anavathmos, irmos).

At one time the hymns were dispersed among different collections according to their liturgical genre: irmologion (for the poetic canons of matins), kontakarion, kathismatarion. The book of the Eight Tones, in its present form, is a collection of short poems, full of ecstatic and pneumatic beauty; esp. in those of Sunday, the idea emerges of the liturgy as a feast celebrated in the Lord's vestibules, by a church that wishes to be a new and optimistic garden of paradise, planted by the new Adam: "By your cross you destroyed death, gave paradise to the thief, changed the lament of the woman bearing perfumes into joy, and commanded the apostles to announce the joyful news that you are risen, O Christ of God, giving your great mercy to the world" (Apolytikion, i.e., final troparion for Sunday of the 7th tone).

(d) Fixed daily cycle: the day is divided into periods of time, interrupted by moments of liturgical prayer but conceived as parts of a single structure—whence the name "acoluthia" (following) given to the divine offices. The day always begins with vespers; then follow compline, midnight office (almost everywhere joined to matins or omitted), matins (after which may be celebrated the divine eucharistic liturgy; see Anaphora), prime, terce, sext, none and typics (an appendix of purely monastic origin). The evolution of the office began in the 4th c., when cathedral-urban and monastic elements began to mutually influence one another. The invariable parts (psalms, ecclesiastical prayers and blessings) are in the Horologion, or book of hours, for the use of the lectors; the priestly parts of these are also in the Hieratikon or the Euchologion; and rubrics indicate the variable parts to be taken from the Oktoichos or the Menaia. The multiplication of the Hours, an indication of a preponderant monastic influence, is today undergoing a process of regrouping and anticipation, both in parishes and in monasteries.

2. Liturgical books. Besides those mentioned, we should add that the Euchologion also contains the formularies for the priestly celebration of the *sacraments, with an abundant appendix for offices and various blessings (funerals, inaugurations, thanksgivings, propitiations, blessings etc.). There are also the Apostolos (for Epistles and Acts, without the Apocalypse); the Evangeliarion, liturgically subdivided; the Psalter divided into 20 kathismata, or sections for vespers and matins; and the Typikon, with the rubrics for combining the various liturgical books among themselves for every day of the year. Today synthetic liturgical books are starting to be published, with different names and circulations like the Anthologion, the Synekdimos or various prayer books. The books of chant also have proper names (Anastasimatarion, Sbornik etc.).

3. Some characteristics. Architecture and iconography form an external framework that is intimately linked to the unfolding of the celebration—a contribution that should not be undervalued. The building, exactly like the liturgy, develops the idea of paradise on earth, where the community raises itself toward the heavenly Jerusalem; liturgical commentators such as Germanus of Constantinople, Nicholas Cabásilas and others strongly encouraged this interpretation. Icons, on frescoes or tablets, gradually covered the sacred building; the celebration has incorporated them through prayers, processions, censings and other acts of veneration laid down by the rubrics. Just as with the *Eucharist or other moments of the office, they are a potent reminder of the value of *eschatology and of the transfiguration of the cosmos: liturgical veneration of the human typos represented in a state of sanctification (Christ, Mary, saints) directs the faithful—through the incarnation and salvation—to the divine prototypos.

In the Byzantine liturgy, cultural elements of the *Hellenism of the late Roman period (*gnostic-speculative terminology) mix with proto-Byzantine elements (idea of hierarchy, taste for classification, sense of the splendor of imperial ceremony); the theological ideas of the councils and the Fathers; and Eastern lyricism, *symbolism and *mystagogy. The texts combine the biblical data through the method of negative theology, dear to the *Cappadocians, which safeguards the mystery of God's absolute transcendence and celebrates the divine doxa through a confession of the inadequacy of language (the incomprehensible, incommensurable, inexpressible God). *Dogma is presented by a constant liturgical illustration, without tying itself to exclusively rational definitions, rather rising above itself in numerous occasions of charismatic chant, full of cosmic ambition: "We, who mystically represent the cherubim and sing to the life-giving Trinity the thrice-holy hymn, lay down all cares of this world to welcome the king of the universe, invisibly escorted by angelic hosts, to whom we sing: alleluia! alleluia!" (Hymn "Cheruvikón" for the Great Entrance of the Divine Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom).

A. Baumstark, Liturgie comparée, Chevetogne ³1953; H.G. Beck, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich, Munich 1959; J.M. Sauget, Bibliographie des liturgies orientales, Rome 1962; H. Hunger, Reich der neuen Mitte, Graz-Vienna-Cologne 1965; R. Bornert, Les commentaires byzantins de la Divine Liturgie du VIIᵉ au XVᵉ siècle, Paris 1966; S. Janeras, Bibliografia sulle liturgie orientali, Rome 1969; E.F. Fortino, Liturgia greca, Rome 1970; F. Heilen, Die Ostkirchen, Munich-Basel 1971; J. Mateos, La célébration de la parole dans la liturgie byzantine; OCA 191, Rome 1971; H.J. Schulz, Liturgie, Tagzeiten und Kirchenjahr im byzantinischen Ritas, in Handbuch der Ostkirchenkunde, eds. E. von Ivanka - J. Tyciak, Düsseldorf 1971; A. Schmemann, Introduction to Liturgical Theology, New York ²1975; R.F. Taft, The Great Entrance: A History of the Transfer of Gifts and Other Preanaphoral Rites of the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom: OCA 200, Rome 1975; D. Guillaume (tr.), Parakletike. Triode. Pentecostaire. Evangéliaire. Menée de Janvier; Août; Décembre. Akàthiste et Paraclisis. Baptême. Mariage. Funérailles. Profession monastique, Rome 1977–1982; A. Nélidow, Euchologe ou rituel orthodoxe, Bousquet d'Orb 1979; H.J. Schulz, Die byzantinische Liturgie. Glaubenszeugnis und Symbolgestalt, Trier ²1980; V. Peri, La "Grande Chiesa" bizantina, Brescia 1981; L. Clougnet, Dictionnaire grec-français des nomes liturgiques en usage dans l'église grecque, Paris 1985; H.-J. Schulz, The Byzantine Liturgy: Symbolic Structure and Faith Expression, trans. by M.J. O'Connell, New York 1986; K. Onasch, Lexikon für Liturgie und Kunst der Ostkirche unter Berücksichtigung der Alten Kirche, Berlin-Munich 1993; P. Day, The Liturgical Dictionary of Eastern Christianity, Turnbridge 1995; Th. Pott, La reforme liturgique byzantine. Étude du phénomène et l'évolution non spontanée de la liturgie byzantine, Rome 2000.

D. Gelsi

BYZANTIUM – BYZANTINES. Though prepared by *Diocletian's administrative reforms (284–305) and by *Constantine's transfer of the capital to Byzantium (330)—renamed *Constantinople after its new founder—the Byzantine Empire really began with the division of the Imperium Romanum in 395. In its political ideology it retained the empire's universalistic aims, calling its subjects Romans (Ῥωμαῖοι); in its cultural perspective it amalgamated Christian *orthodoxy and the classical tradition, esp. that of Greece. While in its first phase of development, Byzantium was still characterized by elements of the old models of production; in the 7th-9th c. some traits typical of feudal society gradually asserted themselves, finally leading, from the 12th c., to identification with Western models. The Byzantine Empire, whose population at the end of the 4th c. has been estimated at 65 million, was always a state with a high population density. In 395, beyond Greeks, Romans, Illyricans and Thracians, the empire included infiltrated Germanic elements; the variegated ethnic mix of Anatolia; and Armenians, Syrians, Jews, Arabs and Egyptians. The invasion of the Slavs, who from the 6th c. on spread throughout the Balkans as far as the Peloponnesus, introduced profound changes. They were followed in the 7th c. by the Turkic, but rapidly Slavicized, Protobulgars; later came Petchenegs, Uzes and Cumans. With the Crusades and the Latin occupation of 1204, the importance of the Romance component increased. In the 10th and 11th c. the Byzantine army included Varangians, Russians, Petchenegs, Uzes, Cumans etc.; in the 13th and 14th c. Seljuk Turks as well. All these nationalities were integrated into the Byzantine state, whose official and everyday languages were both Greek and Latin until the 6th c., then just Greek. Christianity was Byzantium's dominant religion in every period, in the form established by the Councils of *Nicaea (325) and *Chalcedon (451). The councils condemned deviations in *Christology, under which were often concealed the separatist tendencies of the peoples annexed to the empire; particular separate churches were formed under various circumstances. *Justinian fought against the remains of *paganism by state repression; the veneration of saints, the cult of *relics and other religious practices were purified of any residual anti-Christian form. Church and ecclesiastical structure were grafted completely onto the state apparatus and were thus closely tied to the ruling class. This amalgam did not eliminate conflicts between emperor and patriarch, however, or between state officials and clergy. Various forms of *monasticism, as well as sects inimical to the church, esp. the *Paulicians in the mid-7th c., arose to denounce the abandonment of early Christian ideals. The iconoclastic struggle penetrated deeply into the life of the people, in whom the cult of icons had long been rooted. Esp. in the 9th and 10th c. the Byzantine church fostered an intensive mission, coordinated with the empire's foreign policy. It came into competition with similar papal attempts and was unsuccessful in the kingdom of Great Moravia, but successful in Byzantium itself, in Bulgaria and in Russia. The universalistic pretensions of the two churches led to the clash with *Rome, the schism of 807 and the definitive break of 1054, which has perpetuated the division between the two churches until our times. The Byzantine tradition survives in the Russian, Romanian, Serbian, Macedonian, Bulgarian and Greek churches, but also in the Eastern and national churches of the Caucasus.

N.H. Baynes - H.St.L.B. Mosa, Byzanz, Geschichte und Kultur des Oströmischen Reiches, Munich 1964; H. Hunger, Reich der neuen Mitte. Der christliche Geist der byzantinischen Kultur, Graz 1965; St. Runciman, Byzantine Civilization, London 2004 (new ed.); H.-G. Beck, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich, Munich [2]1977; J. Irmscher, Byzantinisches Reich, in Enziklopädie zur Frühgeschichte Europas. Arbeitsmaterial, Konzeption, Musterartikel, Berlin 1980, 73-85; J.F. Haldon, Byzantium in the Seventh Century, Cambridge 1990; M. Gallina, Potere e società a Bisanzio, Turin 1995; F. Conca - S. Mannelli (eds.), Atti del V congresso nazionale di studi bizantini, Milano 19-22 ottobre 1994, Milan 1996; M. Grant, From Rome to Byzantium: The Fifth Century AD, New York 1998.

J. Irmscher

C

CAECILIAN (4th c.). Central figure in the outbreak of the *Donatist schism at *Carthage, ca. 311. He was first *archdeacon, then bishop of Carthage. As archdeacon he showed himself a disciplinarian. In ca. 300, he rebuked *Lucilla, a wealthy Spanish member of his congregation, for kissing the bone of an "unauthorized" martyr (necdum vindicatus) before receiving Communion (Opt., De schismate I, 16). During the great persecution of 304, he was accused of using brutal methods to keep food from reaching the confessors of *Abitina in their prison at Carthage (Acta Saturnini 17). On Bishop *Mensurius's death in 311, Caecelian was elected bishop of Carthage (Opt., De schismate I, 19), but his election aroused immediate opposition. Discontent coalesced around the *Numidian bishops who had arrived in Carthage to take part in his consecration but found him already consecrated by three bishops, two from near Carthage, but one, *Felix of Aptunga, from the neighboring province of *Byzacena (see Opt., De schismate I, 19 and Aug., Psalmus contra partem Donati, vv. 42-49). Lucilla's chaplain, Maiorinus, was consecrated bishop in opposition to Caecelian (ca. 312), and a rumor was spread that Felix of Aptunga was a traditor (i.e., had handed over the Scriptures to the authorities during the great persecution) and so could not validly officiate at a consecration. In winter 312–313 after his victory over *Maxentius, *Constantine supported Caecelian's cause but allowed his opponents to state their case against him before a tribunal presided over by Bishop *Miltiades of Rome, himself an *African. Caecelian was vindicated there (2 October 313), again at the larger Council of *Arles of 1 August 314 and, finally, by the emperor himself (10 November 316). But he never won over his fellow countrymen, and on Maiorinus's departure from the scene (summer 313), he was faced with the much more formidable Donatus. Caecelian took part in the Council of *Nicaea in 325 but thereafter disappears from the scene. Date of death unknown.

Optatus of Milevis, De schismate Donatistarum (ed. C. Ziwsa, CSEL 26) I, 16-27 and appendixes; Acta Saturnini 17-20 (PL 8, 699-703); Eusebius, HE X, 5-6; Augustine, Ep. 88. For the audience at Rome, see Optatus I, 23-24; for the Council of Arles, see J. Gaudemet (ed.), Conciles Gaulois du IV^e^ siècle, Paris 1977 (SC 241), 35-65; Monceaux IV, ch. 1; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church, Oxford [2]1971, chs. 1 and 11; PCBE 1, 165-175; T. Caputo, Il processo a Ceciliano di Cartagine: indagine storico-giuridica sulla prima fase della controversia donatista (312-316), Rome 1981; B. Kriegbaum, Caecilianus Carthaginensis episcopus, in Augustinus-Lexikon, I, Basel 1986-1994, 686-688; Id., Zwischen den Synoden von Rom und Arles. Die donatistische Supplik bei Optatus: Archivium Historiae Pontificiae 28 (1990) 23-61.

W.H.C. Frend

CAEDMON (7th c.). Northumbrian poet. *Bede attests his poetic activity (Hist. eccles. IV, 24), telling how Caedmon, an illiterate cowherd at abbess Hilda's (d. 680) *monastery of Streanaeshalch (Whitby), began to write verse after receiving a vision from God. Made a monk, he put into verse parts of the OT, including Genesis and Exodus, and the life of Christ. His one certainly authentic composition is a poem in praise of God the creator, written in Northumbrian dialect but surviving in a *Latin translation by Bede, whose erudition affected it both in form and content. Other poems, all preserved in the codex Junius XI at Oxford's Bodleian library (also known as "Caedmon MS."), are now ascribed to different authors. Closest to Caedmon's hymn, esp. in the antiquity of its language, is Genesis (A); at v. 234, 617 verses of another poem (Genesis B), a translation of a 9th-c. Saxon poem, have been interpolated. Caedmon has a heroic vision of Christianity, dwelling on violent episodes such as the *descent into hell and Christ's temptations; we see little of the gospel message of charity and love. The first to publish all the poems was Franciscus Junius (Amsterdam 1655), who in all probability made them known to John Milton, who was undeniably influenced by them in Paradise Lost. Venerated as a saint, Caedmon's feast is 11 February.

Poesie, Wülker, Bibl. der Angelsäch., II, Leipzig ²1894; Genesis A, Heidelberg 1914 (Holthausen); Genesis B, Heidelberg 1913 (Klaeber). Translation of all the poems: C.W. Kennedy, The Caedmon Poems, London 1916; A.H. Smith, Three Northumbrian Poems, Exeter ²1990 (London ¹1933); W. Jaager, Bedas metrische Vita sancti Cuthberti, Leipzig, 1935; LTK 2, 870; F.W. Bautz, BBKL, I, 841-842; G. Princi Braccini, L'inno di Caedmon e la sua leggenda: una bibliografia annotata, Florence 1988; G. Gollancz, The Caedmon Manuscript, Oxford 1927; Fr.P. Magoun, Bede's Story of Caedmon: The Case History of an Anglo-Saxon Oral Singer: Speculum 30 (1955) 49ff.; C.L. Wrenn, The Poetry of Caedmon, in Essential Articles of Old English Poetry, Hamden 1968; D.W. Fritz, Caedmon: A Traditional Christian Poet: MedSt 31 (1969) 334ff.; U. Schwab, Caedmon, Messina ²1989 (¹1972); B. Luiselli, Beda e l'inno di Caedmon, StudMed 14 (1973) 1013-1036; C.L. Wrenn, A Study of Old English Literature, London ²1975; W. Barnstone, The Poetics of Translation: History, Theory, Practice, New Haven-London 1993, 180ff.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

CAENA CYPRIANI. A late composition which tells of a banquet organized by the Eastern king Joel, with various OT and NT figures as his guests, suitably attired to partake of a rich meal. One by one, however, each guest is given a different dish than the others. At the end there is a burglary which shocks the guests; the guilty party is identified as Achan, son of Carmi (as in the book of Joshua; in Chronicles, Achar). The work is certainly not by *Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258). The hypothesis has been rejected of a mnemonic game for learning biblical characters; it is rather thought of as a sacramentary schema (marriage, reconciliation, *Eucharist, extreme unction). It has a playful tone—even more marked in John Immonide's 9th-c. version—perhaps suggesting a connection with the rite of risus paschalis; in the Middle Ages the *Easter celebration was accompanied by performances aimed at concretely eliciting the joy of Christ's resurrection. Irreverent jocosity, however, is almost absent from the Caena Cypriani; it is rather a game of names, a nursery rhyme with its characters evoked through biblical references. For example, the sufferings inflicted to identify the guilty party are those actually undergone by the various biblical figures (Adam is expelled, Abel killed, Zechariah struck dumb with fear, John beheaded, Jesus crucified, Paul flogged etc.), with biblical allusions but with no concern for chronological order. This may have contributed to the didactic value of the Caena Cypriani.

CPL 1430; CPPM 2, 2148; 2, 2159; PL 4, 1007-1014; MGH Poet. Lat. IV, 2, 1, 872-898; DACL XII, 2, 2339-2343; A. Harnack, Drei wenig beachtete cyprianische Schriften . . . : TU 19, 3, Leipzig 1899; A. Lapôtre, Le souper de Jean Diacre: MEFRA 21 (1901) 305-385; Id., La "Caena Cypriani" et ses énigmes: RecSR 3 (1912) 497-596; H. Wass, Studien zum Heptateuchdichter Cyprian . . . , PhW (1914) 517; R. Krestan: RAC 3, 477-481 (Cyprianus Gallus); Quasten I, 601-602; III, 298; C. Modesto, Studien zur Cena Cypriani und zu deren Rezeption, Tübingen 1992; R.F. Glei, Ridebat de facto Sarra: Bemerkungen zur Cena Cypriani, in W. Ax - R.F. Glei (eds.), Literaturparodie in Antike und Mittelalter, Trier 1993, 153-170; Coena Cypriani, intr., text and It. tr., ed. A. Fontana, Sotto il Monte 1999; F. Mosetto Casaretto, Cipriano e il suo doppio: Giovanni Immonide di fronte al problema attributivo della "Cena": WS 115 (2002) 225-250.

A. Di Berardino

CAESAREA in Cappadocia
I. The city - II. Council.

I. The city. Civil and religious metropolis of *Cappadocia in Asia Minor, reduced to a *Roman province by Tiberius in AD 17 (whence the name Caesarea [Καισάρεια]; originally Mazaka); then, under *Valens (ca. 370), of Cappadocia Prima. Its ruins are at Eskisehir, SW of Kayseri (central Turkey), which perpetuates its name. Evangelized in apostolic times, it had its *martyrs: *Mamas, Gordius, Julitta, etc. Its first known bishop was Alexander, arrested by *Decius (ca. 250). *Gregory Thaumaturgus received episcopal ordination there. Other bishops, *Firmilian and esp. St. *Basil the Great, gave luster to the see, which extended its jurisdiction over the whole "diocese" of *Pontus. In virtue of this almost patriarchal authority, the metropolis, after the creation of the patriarchate of *Constantinople (451), had first place and the title of protothronos, and its titular that of archbishop, a precedence repeated in all the Notitiae episcopatuum, in the first of which Caesarea has five suffragan sees, including *Nyssa. In the 6th-7th c. it produced the religious writers *Theodore Askidas, *Andrew of Caesarea and *Gregory.

PWK III, 1289-1290; DHGE XII, 199-201; EC III, 696; KLP III, 48-49; LTK 2, 876-877; E. de Ruggiero, Dizionario epigrafico di antichità romana, II, Rome 1961, 14; V. Laurent, Le corpus des sceaux de l'empire byzantin, Paris 1963, XXX, 171; F. Hild, Das byzantinische Strassensystem in Kappadokien, Vienna 1977; J. Darrouzès, Notitiae episcopatuum Ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae, Paris 1981, 204 n. 6; 206 n. 73; 216 n. 1; 219 n. 88, etc.; F. Hild - M. Restle, Kappadokien, Vienna 1981, 193-196; B. Gain, L'Église de Cappadoce au 4ᵉ siècle, Rome 1985; Id., Kaisareia I (in Kappadokien): RAC 19/152 (2001) 992-1026.

D. Stiernon

II. Council. According to Lebon, a council was held here immediately after that of *Ancyra (314), during the summer; five of the bishops present were also at *Neocaesarea. Canons 20-25 of this council, which deal with punishments to be imposed for certain faults, actually belong to Ancyra—the close temporal and geographic connection caused the combining of the two collections. An *Armenian translation preserves ten canons, of which six (1, 3, 4, 5, 7 and 9) are part of the Council of Neocaesarea (corresponding to canons 20-25).

CPG 8503; J. Lebon, Sur un concile de Césarée: Muséon 51 (1938) 89-132; E. Honigmann, Two Alleged "Bishops of Great Armenia" as Members of the Synods of Ancyra (314) and Caesarea in Cappadocia: PSt, ST 173, Rome 1953, 1-5; P. L'Huillier, The Church of the Ancient Councils, Crestwood 1996, 208f.

A. Di Berardino

CAESAREA in Mauretania. The *Punic port city of Iol was named Caesarea by Juba II (25 BC–AD 23); when it came under Roman rule in AD 40 it became the capital of the province of *Mauretania Caesareana (Mauretania Caesarea); under *Claudius it was called Colonia Claudia Caesarea. Today it is called Cherchel (Algeria). Only *archaeology and *hagiography cast some light on the Christian origins of this city. Possibly Christian, from a period prior to the peace of the church, are a *sarcophagus with the inscription (I)n Domino, some epitaphs ornamented with an anchor, olive and dove (in one of which the expression Memoria Amandae appears). Certainly Christian are the inscriptions of the priest Victor and the clarissimus M.A.I. Severianus (CCL VIII 9585-9586), the latter remade in the 4th c., both from the *cemetery area W of the city. Some 4th-c. sarcophagus fragments include a lid with the fiery furnace and the adoration of the magi. In the W part of the city an apsed room with two fine mosaics was found, but this is little for a city of perhaps 40,000 inhabitants. Local *martyrs include the standard-bearer Fabius (BHL 2818); the virgin Marciana (AB 24, 261-264), who appears in the Mart. hier. on 11 July; Arcadius, named by *Zeno of Verona (PL 11, 450-455); and Theodora and her children.

As for bishops, Fortunatus took part in the Council of *Arles (314); Clement lived at the time of Firmus's rebellion (371) and was recommended by the *pagan Symmachus to his brother, vicarius Africae; Deuterius was at the conference of *Carthage (411) with the learned and intelligent *Donatist Bishop Emeritus (Augustine, Ep. 87), with whom *Augustine, in 418, was unable to arrange a public debate in the city's main church; Apocorius took part in the conference called at Carthage by *Huneric (484). Perhaps we should add two more names: the Evelpius who appears in the inscription of M.A.I. Severianus (but the possibility of identifying these two is dubious), and the sacerdos (i.e., bishop), priest for the previous 18 years, of inscription CIL VIII 21417, whose name is not preserved. Augustine, together with *Alypius, *Possidius and other bishops, went to Caesarea and the surrounding area in 418, sent by Pope *Zosimus, on unspecified ecclesiastical business. At the will of Pope *Boniface I, he returned there upon the death of Bishop Deuterius, for the choice of his successor, opposing the transfer to Caesarea of Bishop *Honorius of the territory of Cartennae (Ténès), who occupied another see. Unsuccessful, in 420 Augustine sent the case back to the pope for a solution.

PWK 3, 1294-1295; DACL 3, 1269-1281; LTK^3 2, 877; Ph. Leveau, Caesarea de Maurétanie. Une ville romaine et ses campagnes, Rome 1984; S. Lancel, S. Augustin et la Maurétanie césarienne: les années 418-419 à la lumière des nouvelles lettres récemment publiées: REAug 30 (1984) 48-59; Id., II: L'affaire de l'évêque Honorius (automne 419-printemps 420) dans les nouvelles lettres 22, 23* et 23*A*: REAug 30 (1984) 251-262; I. Gui - N. Duval - J.-P. Caillet, Basiliques chrétiennes d'Afrique du Nord, Paris 1992, vol. I, 16 f.; T.W. Potter, Towns in Late Antiquity: Iol Caesarea and Its Context, Oxford 1995.

V. Saxer

CAESAREA in Palestine

I. Origins of Christianity - II. Archaeology.

I. Origins of Christianity. Caesarea in Palestine, or Maritime Caesarea (Καισάρεια παράλιος), was the civil and religious metropolis of *Romano-*Byzantine *Syria-*Palestine. The immense excavated area, one of the most important in the state of Israel, extends along the Mediterranean shore (H. Qeisari) halfway between Tel Aviv and Haifa, N of Hadera. In 9 BC the ancient Tower of Strato was transformed into the *Hellenistic city of Herod the Great, who named it Caesarea in honor of Augustus. Iudaeae caput, it was the residence of the Roman procurators from AD 6 to 66 and thus also of Pontius Pilate. It was quickly touched by the apostolic preaching (ca. 35) of the deacon Philip who settled there (Acts 8:40; 21:8); there *Peter *baptized the centurion Cornelius and the first *pagans in ca. 43 (Acts 10:1-47; 11:11-17; cf. 12:11); Paul passed through in ca. 37 and ca. 52 and was imprisoned and tried there in 58–60 (Acts 23–26). The first bishop known to us is *Theophilus (135). A century after him, *Origen founded a famous school there. Later enlarged by *Pamphilus, its students included *Gregory Thaumaturgus and *Eusebius, later bishop of the city and a historian attentive to events in his own country and to the *martyrs of Caesarea (Mart. Palaest. I, 2-5; III, 4; IV, 2-14; VI; VII, 7,12; VIII, 3-13; IX, 7; X, 3; XI, 29-30; HE, passim). Caesarea's precedence in Palestine was sanctioned by canon 7 of *Nicaea (325) and then integrated into the patriarchate of *Jerusalem (451), under which the metropolis of Caesarea had jurisdiction over 28 suffragans (Palestine Prima). Other important personalities were *Acacius, *Procopius of Gaza and the other *Procopius, *Gelasius, John Grammaticus, and John Khozibita. The city's slow decline was marked by the sack of the churches and massacre of the Christians by the Samaritans in 556, the *Persian occupation (619), and the Arab invasion (638), during which the library was destroyed.

PWK III, 1291-1294; DB 456-465; EC 3, 1347; DHGE 12, 206-209; Beck 154, 197-198; LTK 2, 877; RGG⁴ 2, 5-6; A. Frova - A. Negev, Missione archeologica milanese. Scavi di Cesarea marittima, Milan 1965; KLP III, 48-49; M. Avi-Yonah, Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land, I, London - Jerusalem 1975, 270-285; L.I. Levine, Caesarea under Roman Rule, Leiden 1975; J. Ringel, Césarée de Palestine. Étude historique et archéologique, Paris 1975; C.T. Fritsch, The Joint Expedition to Caesarea Maritima, I, Studies in the History of Caesarea Maritima, Missoula 1975; L.Y. Rahmani, Un autel funéraire romain à Cesarée Maritime: RBi 85 (1978) 268-275; Le port hérodien immergé: ibid. 412-415; R.J. Bull, The Eighth Season of Excavation at Caesarea Maritima: American Journal of Archaeology 84 (1980) 198-199.

D. Stiernon

II. Archaeology. Though largely submerged by the encroachment of the sea, the Roman, Byzantine and Crusaders' town walls and various buildings have been identified. S of the Crusaders' wall was found a badly damaged statue of the Good Shepherd, in a Byzantine-period room. The mosaic floors of this building contain Christian inscriptions, two of which take up the passage Rom 13:3, while others name officials of the imperial treasury (Lehman - Holum, Inscriptions, 96-102), suggesting that the building, rather than being Origen's library, had an administrative function (Enc. Arch. Excavations 1, 280; New Enc. Arch. Excavations 1, 285). The excavations have shown that in the Byzantine period in the city center, on the site of the temple, an octagonal-plan church was built, of which the foundation remains (New Enc. Arch. Excavations 1, 285). Outside the walls to the NE are the remains of a large building with mosaic floors with animal designs. It seems to be a church, but the space is large and there are no traces of roof supports (Ovadiah, Corpus, 44 f.). There is also a cruciform building which preserves remains of paintings with crosses: a treasure was found in it, containing a gold medallion with the Annunciation on one side and Solomon on horseback on the other, and various pendants (Frova, Scavi, 235-244). Many inscriptions repeat biblical verses or mention individual believers (Bagatti, Villaggi di Samaria, 186-194; Lehman - Holum, Inscriptions). Recently the identification of a chapel has been proposed, probably dedicated to St. Paul, in a building in the warehouse district (Patrich, A Chapel of St. Paul at Caesarea Maritima?: SBF 50 [2000] 363-382).

Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land 1, Jerusalem 1970, 270-285; A. Frova, Scavi di Cesarea Marittima, Milan 1965; A. Ovadiah, Corpus of the Byzantine Churches in the Holy Land, Berlin 1970; B. Bagatti, Antichi villaggi cristiani di Samaria, Jerusalem 1979; L.I. Levine - E. Netzer, Excavations at Caesarea Maritima 1975, 1976, 1979 - Final Report, Jerusalem 1986; New Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land 1, Jerusalem 1993, 270-291; C.M. Lehmann - K.G. Holum, The Greek and Latin Inscriptions of Caesarea Maritima, Boston 2000; J. Patrich, A Chapel of St. Paul at Caesarea Maritima?: SBF 50 (2000) 363-382; L. Di Segni, A Chapel of St. Paul at Caesarea Maritima? The Inscriptions: SBF 50 (2000) 383-400.

B. Bagatti - C. Pappalardo

CAESARIA the Elder (ca. 465–524). We know two Caesarias. The first is Caesaria the Elder, sister of *Caesarius of Arles, born ca. 465 near Châlon-sur-Saône, sent by her brother to the *monastery of S. Salvatore at Marseille, at that time the only female community in *Gaul. There Caesaria would be formed in the *ascetic life, according to the will of her brother, bishop of *Arles from 502. She was destined to guide the first monastery of religious at Arles. The monastery, however, was destroyed in 508 during the war between the *Franks and *Burgundians, even before it was finished. Later Caesarius had another monastery, dedicated to St. John, built on the same site (dedicated 26 August 512), and he put his sister in charge, who moved there from Marseille. Caesarius wrote a rule for this community, based on the renunciation of personal possessions, total separation from the world, exemption from episcopal jurisdiction and obedience to the *abbess (mater). Caesaria led the monastery for ten years and had many followers. For security reasons, the monastery was later moved into the city, near the cathedral. Here, Caesarius also had a three-aisled basilica built, dedicated to St. Mary (dedicated 6 June 524), where he and the nuns of St. John would be buried. Caesaria died and was buried the same year (or the next). Honored as a saint already in the time of *Venantius Fortunatus, she is mentioned in the Roman Martyrology on 12 January.

AASS Ian. I, Venetiis 1734, 729-737; Vita Caesarii 1, 28 and 35, ed. Morin, 306-307, 310; Caes. Ar., Reg. ad Virg. 2,50,59 and 70; A. de Vogüé - J. Courreau, Césaire d'Arles, Œuvres monastiques, I, = SC 345, Paris 1988, 21ff., 440ff.; Venan. Fort., Vita S. Radegundis, III, 39-40, PL 88, 267; DHGE 12, 212-215 (G. de Plinval); BS 3, 1146 (G. Bataille); LTK 2, 878 (R. Nürnberg); P. Riché, Éducation et culture dans l'occident barbare, Poitiers 1962, 161; K.F. Stroheker, Der Senator. Adel im spätantiken Gallien, Tübingen 1948, repr. 1970, 157; F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich, Munich 1988, 77; T. Sardella, in Patrologia IV, 295-297.

T. Sardella

CAESARIA the Younger. Succeeded *Caesaria the Elder in directing the monastery. Probably unrelated (according to others, though, Caesaria the Elder and *Caesarius of Arles were her aunt and uncle). Under her leadership the community grew enormously, with nearly 200 religious in the mid-6th c. Caesarius's Testamentum is addressed to her and to the clergy of *Arles. It was she who insisted that five of Caesarius's companions in faith write his biography after his death.

Vita Caesarii 58, ed. Morin, 296 and 320; A. de Vogüé - J. Courreau, Césaire d'Arles, Œuvres monastiques, I, = SC 345, Paris 1988, 21-30; 440-468; LTK 2, 878 (R. Nürnberg); K.F. Stroheker, Der Senator. Adel im spätantiken Gallien, Tübingen 1948, repr. 1970; T. Sardella, in Patrologia IV, 295-297.

T. Sardella

CAESARIUS of Arles (ca. 470–543). Born ca. 470 to a middle-class family at Châlons-sur-Saône in the Burgundian kingdom, he became a cleric, then a monk, at *Lérins, but he left the *monastery after a few years, exhausted by the *ascetic life. At Arles he was deacon (see *Diakonia - Diaconate), priest, *abbot of a monastery and finally bishop (ca. 500). His long episcopate was characterized by his full availability to all, esp. the most needy. It was a delicate political time due to conflicts between *Goths, *Franks and *Burgundians. Being born a Burgundian did not help him as bishop of a city ruled by the Goths: twice he was accused of treason but emerged unscathed. He presided over the Council of *Agde (506) and that of *Orange (529), which marked the end of so-called semi-*Pelagianism. Died 27 August 543. A typical example of a bishop wholly dedicated to his duties, his fame was always great.

His literary activity was all at the service of his pastoral duties. His minor works include De mysterio sanctae Trinitatis and Breviarium adversus haereticos, two short summaries of *trinitarian theology against the *Arians (the Goths were Arian); De gratia, which maintains the radical *Augustinian thesis that the *grace necessary for salvation is conceded only to those *predestined independent of merit according to an inscrutable divine judgment that human beings cannot criticize; and two very rigid Rules, one for monks and one for nuns, the oldest to survive from Gaul. Also attributed to him is the ps.-Augustinian Expositio in Apocalypsim, a collection of homilies explaining this difficult text, attenuating the *eschatological tension and eliminating anti-*Roman traces and millenarian passages: the thousand years of Christ's earthly reign indicate the whole reign of the church in the world; the resurrectio prima of the just is a symbol of *baptism; the new *Jerusalem descending from heaven to earth symbolizes the church spread throughout the earth.

Caesarius was above all a preacher, and the collection of his Sermones is among the most important works of his time. Given his habit of drawing on other authors, the homilies were nearly all dispersed, often confused among *Augustine's sermons. G. Morin has identified and published them after many years' labor, 238 in number (not all certainly authentic), on various subjects: admonitions to the faithful, celebrations of saints and feasts and interpretation of scriptural passages. Some are addressed to monks. Caesarius understood the great importance of preaching to a mass of ignorant and barbarous people, to impart that minimum of instruction indispensable for the practice of the Christian religion. For this reason he not only preached assiduously but also collected his preaching in corpora, which he circulated for the use of other clergy less able than himself and inclined to neglect preaching, a matter in which he constantly appealed to bishops and priests. This primary need to spread the word gave rise to Caesarius's characteristic and effective preaching style: he adapted his language to the modest level and needs of his listeners, aiming to be brief, comprehensible and interesting. To this end he unhesitatingly used the material of others, esp. of Augustine, duly evaluated and adapted to his own ends. To capture and hold his audience's interest, he loved to proceed by questions and answers, and he used similes, sometimes very extended, to present his concepts visually, always choosing images from everyday life and scenes familiar to his hearers. Above all, he insistently admonished his rough audience, recalling them to a minimum of Christian commitment and to the struggle against all sorts of vices: ignorance, drunkenness, intemperance, persistence in *pagan practices. His interpretation of Scripture is mostly *allegorical. Easily accessible doctrinal themes are not lacking. Soon after his death, some disciples wrote his biography, rich in information, one of the most important texts of Gallic *hagiography.

CPL 1008-1019a; G. Morin, S. Caesarii opera omnia, I, Maredsous 1937 (= CCL 103-104), II, Maredsous 1942; SC 175.243 (sermones); P. Riché, Césaire d'Arles, Paris 1958; S. Felici, La catechesi al popolo di S. Cesario di Arles, in Valori attuali della catechesi patristica, Rome 1979, 169-186; W.E. Klingshirn, Caesarius of Arles: The Making of a Christian Community in Late Antique Gaul, Cambridge 1994; K. Berg, Cäsarius von Arles. Ein Bischof des sechsten Jahrhunderts erschliesst das lit- urgische Leben seiner Zeit, Thaur-Vienna-Munich 1994.

M. Simonetti

CAESARIUS of Nazianzus (ca. 335–369). Younger brother of *Gregory of Nazianzus; object of Or. 7, recipient of Ep. 7 and 20, and mentioned in Ep. 29, 30 and 80, of Gregory; and in *Basil, Ep. 26 and 32. After studies at *Alexandria he became a doctor at *Constantinople, remaining celibate. He remained in office under *Julian, not without scandal to his family. He survived the earthquake of 368 but died soon after, leaving large debts. An inauthentic dialogue with Gregory (CPG 7482; PG 38, 852-1189) is attributed to him. R. Riedinger has studied it at length and is preparing a critical edition.

M.M. Hauser-Meury, Prosopographie zu den Schriften Gregors von Nazianz, Bonn 1960, 48-50.

J. Gribomont

CAESARIUS of Nazianzus (pseudo) (d. ca. 550). Under Caesarius of Nazianzus's name are four books of Quaestiones et responsiones on various subjects, theological, philosophical and natural. The unknown author, having adopted the name of *Gregory of Nazianzus's brother (d. 568/569), found it necessary to use earlier sources. Literary, doctrinal and historical considerations date the works to the mid-6th c., after Theodora's death (548). The author is thought to have been a monk of the *Acoemete convent, where religious from different countries assembled: this would explain his very extensive geographical knowledge. He is a very important source for our knowledge of historical geography, the customs of the imperial court of *Constantinople and the religious life of the time.

CPG 7482; PG 38, 852-1189; O. Seeck, PWK 3 (1899) 1299-1300; H. Dörries, RAC 6 (1966) 355-356; R. Riedinger, Pseudo-Kaisarios. Überlieferungsgeschichte und Verfasserfrage, Munich 1969; Patrologia V, 158; I. Dujčev, La versione paleoslava dei dialoghi dello Pseudo- Cesario: Studi Bizantini and Neohellenici 9 (1957) 89-100; R. Riedinger, Neue Quellen zu den Erotapokriseis des Pseudo-Kaisarios: JÖByz 19 (1970) 153-184; Id., Akoimeten, TRE 2 (1978) 148-153; A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition 2/2, London 1995, 374-379.

F. Scorza Barcellona

CAESAROPAPISM. A political-religious system in which civil and religious power are united in a single authority, that of the emperor. More specifically, the identification of state and church power in one person, who assumes in himself alone the functions and power of emperor and pope in their respective spheres.

"Caesaropapist" theory or practice attributed to the Christian emperor at least part of the following functions and powers (Alivisatos): (1) protection of the faith and concern with other ecclesiastical questions as a basic duty of the state, considering belief a state problem; (2) special care and preservation of church property; (3) giving legal status to ecclesiastical canons; (4) guaranteeing episcopal authority by means of state authority; (5) regulating and supervising liturgical functions; (6) regulating and monitoring the moral life of clergy and the life and rule of monks; (7) to the emperor belong clerical privileges, power to set up bishoprics, archbishoprics and metropolitan sees, to transfer bishops, and to punish clerics and laypeople guilty of lèse-majesté with spiritual penalties.

The term is recent (Boehmer, Caesaropapia) and is not the aptest for defining a theory and practice which, historically, has never fully corresponded to the concept described above. The term is anachronistic and antihistorical because it refers to a power of the bishop of *Rome (who took exclusive use of the name pope only from the 6th c.) usurped by the emperor, a power which never existed in the exact way it is described; the term is also ill-adapted to express a reality similar or analogous to that defined above, yet too complex and extended in time to be constrained by definitions. Nevertheless, it has been consecrated by use, and as such we accept it (while acknowledging the note of contempt that unfortunately often accompanies its use, even by some historians).

This system, in its general lines, was theorized and given a theological foundation by *Eusebius of Caesarea. It was practiced only partially by the Christian emperors of antiquity, and they assumed it mainly de facto, with some claims de jure; in the eyes of ecclesiastical authorities, it was at times legitimate and at times illegitimate. The roots of caesaropapist theory and practice go back to primitive and subsequent culture which, until the coming of Christianity, identified religion and public power. On these distant foundations, and much more on the *Hellenistic theory of kingship, which he Christianized, *Eusebius of Caesarea constructed Christianity's first political theology, which seems the most apt to be called "caesaropapist" (bearing in mind the terminological clarifications made above). This was absorbed in the following centuries as the "flesh and blood" (Berkhof) of the *Byzantine Empire and church. The history of the "caesaropapist" practice (within the limits and according to the criteria mentioned above) of the emperors from *Constantine to *Justinian can be summarily traced in the contributions cited below by Berkhof, Ensslin, Lietzmann, Schneemelcher, Kartaschow, Wolf, Alivisatos, Ziegler, Sansterre and Capizzi. The positions taken on these questions by historians of Roman institutions and law are important, esp. those regarding Justinian (Biondi, Crifò).

J.H. Boehmer, Jus ecclesiasticum protestantium, I, Halle [4]1738, 10-11, § XV; C. Baur, Die Anfänge des byzantinischen Cäsaropapismus: Arch. f. kath. Kirchenrecht 111 (1931) 99-113; A.C. Jemolo, Stato e Chiesa: Dizionario di politica, vol. I, Rome 1940, 464-466; H. Lietzmann, Das Problem Staat und Kirche im weströmischen Reich: Kleine Schriften, vol. 1, Berlin 1958, 215-224; H. Berkhof, Kirche und Kaiser, Zürich 1947, 83-104; A. Kartaschow, Die Entstehung der kaiserlichen Synodalgewalt: Kirche u. Kosmos, Studienhefte 2, Witten 1950, 137-152; E. Wolf, Zur Entstehung der kaiserl. Synodalgewalt: ibid., 153-158; B. Biondi, Il diritto romano-cristiano, vol. I, Milan 1952, 135-165; 185-188; 189-230; 242-252; 349-357; vol. III, 1954, 367-374; A.W. Ziegler, Die byz. Religionspolitik u. der sog. Cäsaropapismus, Munich 1953, 3-19; W. Ensslin, Die Religionspolitik des Kaisers Theodosius, Sitzungsber. d. Bayer Ak. d. Wiss., philos.-hist. Kl., Jahrg. 1953/2, 5-28; W. Ensslin, Staat u. Kirche v. Konst. d. Gr. bis Theodosius, Internat. Kongr. f. Byz. Studien 2, Athens 1956, 404-415; A. Piola, Cesaropapismo: Nov. Digesto ital. 3, Turin 1959, 136; H.S. Alivisatos, Caesaropapismus in den byz. kirchl. Gesetzen u. den Canones, Akt. d. XI. Internat. Byzant. Kongr., Munich 1960, 15-20; R. Farina, L'Impero e l'Imperatore crist. in Eusebio di Ces., Zürich 1966; C. Schmitt, Politische Theologie 2, Berlin 1970, 68-88; W. Schneemelcher, Kirche u. Staat im 4. Jahrh.: Bonner Ak. Reden 37, Bonn 1970; J.-M. Sansterre, Eusèbe de Cesarée et la naissance de la théorie "césaropapiste": Byzantion 42 (1972) 131-195; 532-594 (other bibl. in notes 2-4, p. 590, and in note 2, p. 593); C.L. Ottino, Cesaropapismo: Dizionario di politica, Turin 1976, 153; M. Meslin - J. Gouillard, Césaropapisme: Encyclopaedia Universalis, vol. IV, Paris 1980, 86-90; J. Meyendorff, Byzanz: Theol. Realenzykl., vol. VII, 1981, 501f.; G. Podskalsky, Cäsaropapismus: LMA II, 1366-1367; C. Capizzi, Giustiniano tra politica e religione, Soveria Mannelli 1994; Id., Giustiniano: fu un Cesaropapista?: Civiltà Cattolica 145 (1994/2) 37-50; G. Dagron, Empereur et prêtre. Étude sur le "césaropapisme" byzantin, Paris 1996; Ch. Pietri, La politique de Constance II: un premier "césaropapisme" ou l'Imitatio Constantini?, in Christiana respublica, Rome 1997, 281-346; G. Crifò, Chiesa e Impero nella storia del diritto da Costantino a Giustiniano, in Chiesa e Impero da Augusto a Giustiniano, ed. E. dal Covolo - R. Uglione, Rome 2001, 328-355.

R. Farina

CAINITES. 2nd-c. *gnostics (Iren., Adv. haer. I, 31,1; Hipp., Refut. VIII, 20; Epiph., Haer. 38) characterized by a radical opposition to the OT God, in whom they saw a malevolent and inferior power, enemy of the superior and good God, Sophia. They consequently exalted Yahweh's enemies, from Cain to Esau to Judas (whom they honored for making possible Christ's saving death). They also repudiated the Mosaic law and practiced unscrupulous and immoral conduct. They made wide use of *apocrypha, including the Gospel of Judas and Ascension of Paul. Like the *Ophites and Naassenes, their gnostic approach systematized the anti-Jewish and antinomian tendencies already attested in some NT writings.

E. Prinzivalli

CAIUS (or Gaius), pope (283–296). Succeeded *Eutychianus (275–283) in 283 and died in 296, though *Eusebius of Caesarea attributes to him a pontificate of 15 years (HE VIII, 22,1). According to the Liber pontificalis Caius was related to the emperor *Diocletian, like him of *Dalmatian origin. The same source attributes to him the definitive order of accession for the inferior orders of the episcopate (LP I, 161). This information is unfounded, or at least inexact, since other lists of these orders, more or less complete, appear later. It does not seem that he died a *martyr, though he is named in the Acts of Sebastian and those of Susanna. Caius was buried in the *cemetery of St. Callisto; in the 19th c., G.B. De Rossi found some fragments of his funerary inscription.

Eus., HE VI, 43,11; VII, 32,1; VIII, 22,1; LP I, XCVIII-XCIX, CCIX-CCXVII, 64-65, 68-69, 70-73, 148, 154 and 161; II, 63-64; P. Hinschius, Decretales pseudo-Isidorianae et Capitula Angilramn . . ., Lipsiae 1863, 214-218; G.B. De Rossi, La Roma sotterranea cristiana, II, Rome 1867, 114-120; ICR n.s. IV (G.B. De Rossi - A. Ferrua), Vatican City 1964, 9516, 9543 c, 10584; DHGE 9, 237-238 (G. Bardy); BS 3, 646-649 (A. Amore - I. Belli Barsali); DCB 1, 386-387 (W. Smith - H. Wace); L. Reekmans, Le complexe cémétérial du pape Gaius dans la catacombe de Callixte, CV, 1988; LTK[3] 4, 263 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi I, 300-303 (F. Scorza Barcellona).

M. Spinelli

CALCIDIUS (4th c.).*Neoplatonist philosopher and Latin translator, as he himself says, of the primas partes Timaei Platonis (Ep. ad Os.) as far as 53C, furnished with a commentary abounding in citations of previous authors. Some have thought him a *pagan or a Jew, but he seems to be a Christian because he cites the NT and refers to *Origen's commentary on Genesis (Waszink, JbAC, 236). The recipient of the work was a Christian named *Ossius, thought perhaps to be the bishop of Cordoba of that name. Waszink, rather, proposes Ossius to be a Milanese patrician of the late 4th c., a date confirmed by internal analysis of the text. The text was much used in the Middle Ages from the time of John Scotus Eriugena and until the 12th c. was one of the main sources of knowledge of ancient philosophy.

CPL 578f.; J.H. Waszink, Plato Latinus IV: Timaeus a Calcidio translatus commentarioque instructus, London - Leiden [2]1975;

PLS 1, 196f. (Epist. ad Osium); Id., Calcidius: JbAC 15 (1972) 236-244; CE 1, 1057; A.C. Vega, Calcidio, escritor platónico español del siglo IV: Ciudad Dios 152 (1936) 145-164; 154 (1943) 219-241; P. Courcelle, Ambroise de Milan et Calcidius: Studia Waszink, Amsterdam 1973, 45-53; E. Mensching, Zur Calcidiusüberlieferung: VChr 19 (1965) 42-56; E. Jeauneau, L'héritage de la philosophie antique durant le haut moyen âge, in La cultura antica nell'Occ. latino, Spoleto 1975, I, 17-54; E. Des Places, Platonismo e tradizione cristiana, Milan 1976, 222; Patrología III, Madrid 1981, 677; Calcidio, Commentario al Timeo, ed. C. Moreschini, Turin 2003; Nouvelle histoire de la littérature latine, ed. Herzog, Paris 1993, 405-407; Dictionnaire des philosophes antiques, Paris 1994, 156f.; M. Bertolini, Aspetti letterari del Commentarius di Calcidio al Timeo: Koinonia 14 (1990) 89-112; B. Bakhouche, Anges et démons dans le "Commentaire au Timée" de Calcidius (IVe siècle de notre ère): REL 77 (1999) 260-275; RAC, Supp. 2003, 203-300.

A. Di Berardino

CALDONIUS. This bishop's name turns up a dozen times in *Cyprian's letters (Ep. 25; 26,1; 27,3; 41; 42; 44,1; 45,1,4; 48,2,4; 57; 70). Cyprian recommended his church to Caldonius when he left *Carthage to escape *Decius's persecution (January 250–April 251). At the time of the schism of *Felicissimus, Caldonius, who fully shared Cyprian's positions, was sent to Rome to gain information about Pope *Cornelius's election. He affixed his signature to the synodal letter of 255 but not to the acts of the council of 1 September 256; doubtless he died during the interval. His see remains unknown, and the insertion of his name in the list of the bishops of *Braga (Portugal) is pure imagination.

ASS Feb. 2, 57; DHGE 11, 376-378; BS 3, 668-669; J.-L. Maier, L'épiscopat de l'Afrique romaine vandale et byzantine, Bibliotheca Helvetica Romana 11, Rome 1973, 272; J.A. Fischer - A. Lumpe, Die Synoden von den Anfängen bis zum Vorabend des Nicaenums, in W. Brandmüller (ed.), Konziliengeschichte, Paderborn-Munich-Vienna-Zürich 1997, 170ff.; 179; 185; 203; 237.

V. Saxer

CALENDAR

I. Origins of the Christian calendar - II. The early Christian calendars.

The Christian calendar is the list, month by month and day by day, of the feasts observed in the church, and only these. We distinguish the temporal (Sundays, Easter, Christmas etc.) from the sanctoral (feasts of the martyrs and saints). Here we will not speak of the temporal (Harnoncourt - Auf der Maur 9-63; Handbuch der Ostkirchenkunde 2, Düsseldorf 1989, 182-191), or of the controversy over *Easter (A. Strobel, Texte zur Geschichte des frühchristlichen Osterkalenders, Münster 1984; s. v. Pasqua) or of the dependence on the Jewish calendar (S. Safrai - M. Stern [eds.], The Jewish People in the First Century 2, Assen 1987, 834-864), but only of the sanctoral.

I. Origins of the Christian calendar. The oldest known anniversary celebrated is that of *Polycarp of Smyrna, *martyred 23 February ca. 156–167. *Cyprian of Carthage (Ep. 12,2; 39,3) and *Gregory of Nyssa (V. Greg. Thaum.) attest that it was a local custom to keep a sort of register of martyrs and bishops so as to celebrate their feast on the proper day, just as families preserved the memory of their dead (Tert., Exh. cast. 11,1; Cor. 3,3). Each church had a calendar of its own martyrs and bishops different from that of the neighboring churches (Soz., HE 5,3). Lists (nonliturgical) of bishops appear from the 2nd c. as proof of the apostolicity of an episcopal see (for Rome: Hegesippus [Eus., HE 4,22]; Iren., Adv. haer. 3,3,3). At *Byzantium the *diptychs contained the list of the dead and esp. the list of the succession of bishops, to be pronounced during the liturgy. For S *Italy see F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia, Faenza 1927, 27-29.

II. The early Christian calendars. (1) The oldest preserved examples of a Christian calendar are the Depositiones episcoporum* and martyrum, drawn up at Rome and inserted in the Chronography of 354 (RAC 19, 1177-1191). (2) The Calendarium Syriacum of 411, actually a Greco-*Arian calendar of *Nicomedia from ca. 360–362 (AASS Nov. 2,1, LII-LXV). (3) The fragmentary *Gothic calendar, ca. 400, a document attesting the Gothic presence in Italy (ZNTW 1, 308-335; AB 31, 274-291; P. Heather - J. Matthews, The Goths in the Fourth Century, Liverpool 1991, 128-130; Patrologia IV, 492-493). (4) The Calendarium Turonense, written by *Perpetuus of Tours (d. 491), whose general lines are in *Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. 10,31). (5) The Calendarium Carthaginense, ca. 505, actually a martyrology from the 2nd half of the 4th c. (6) The calendar of *Oxyrhynchus, 535–536 (AB 42, 83-99). (7) The *Coptic calendar of *Alexandria, 6th c. (DACL 8, 654-657). (8) The marble calendar of Carmona in Andalusia, 6th-7th c. (9) The Martyrologium Hieronymianum, compiled in N Italy shortly after 431, of which the Gallican archetype of Auxerre is datable to 592. (10) The calendar of Corbie, 7th c. (11) The calendar of *Willibrord, first decade of the 8th c. (CPL 2037). (12) The Martyrologium of the Venerable *Bede (d. 735), from which must be reconstructed the calendar that he used. (13) The Calendarium Sinaiticum, which seems to have been compiled in *Africa in the 8th c. (14) The Catalogus Sanctorum Hiberniae, 8th c., of the Irish saints. (15) The Calendarium Anglicum, 8th c. (16) The calendar of Ratisbon, 8th c. (17) The calendar of Mainz, 781. (18) The Calendarium Rhenaugiense, which is actually from Nivelles, 8th-9th c. (19) The Montecassino calendars, 8th-9th c. (20) The Irish calendar, 821–831. (21) The Bologna calendar, 9th c. (22) The marble calendar of Naples, 840–850.

CPL 2028-2046b; Repertorium 6, 589-595; DACL 8, 624-667; LACL 3 419-420; J.P. Kirsch, Der stadtrömische christliche Festkalender im Altertum, Münster 1924; E. Mahler, Handbuch der jüdischen Chronologie, Hildesheim 1967; A. Cappelli, Cronologia, Cronografia e Calendario Perpetuo dal principio dell'èra cristiana ai nostri giorni, Milan [7]2002; Th. Klauser, Ein Kirchenkalender aus der römischen Titelkirche der heiligen Vier Gekrönten, in Id., Gesammelte Arbeiten zur Liturgiegeschichte, Kirchengeschichte und Christlichen Archäologie, Münster 1974, 46-70; Ph. Harnoncourt - H. Auf der Maur, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit 2,1, Regensburg 1994, 9-63, 136-144; R. Aigrain, L'hagiographie, Brussels [2]2000, 13-31, 404-405; for the synoptic tables of the Roman calendars from the Depositio martyrum on see J.P. Kirsch, Der stadtrömische christliche Festkalender im Altertum, Münster 1924, 221-237; Harnoncourt - Auf der Maur, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit, 298-299, 300-319; W. Geerlings (ed.), Der Kalender. Aspekte einer Geschichte, Paderborn 2002; A. Di Berardino, Liturgical Celebrations and Imperial Legislation in the Fourth Century, in B. Neil et al. (eds.), Prayer and Spirituality in the Early Church 3, Everton Park 2003, 211-232.

S. Heid

CALIGULA (12–41). Gaius Julius Caesar Germanicus, *Roman emperor (37–41), son of Germanicus and of Vipsania Agrippina, nicknamed Caligula by his father's soldiers, whom he imitated from childhood by wearing military boots (caliga). *Tiberius had demanded that the Senate designate as his successor either Caligula or his own grandson Gemellus: in 37 the Senate chose Caligula. An absolute monarch, he had himself worshiped as a living god, and his abuses of power made him unpopular with the Senate. He was killed by conspirators led by Chaerea. Scholars do not accept the tradition, originating with the Senate, that his political behavior was caused by madness, but rather that his behavior was consistent with his policy of affirming and consolidating absolute power.

A. Garzetti, L'impero da Tiberio agli Antonini, Bologna 1960, 83-109 and 598-602; M. Sordi, Il cristianesimo e Roma, Bologna 1965, 31-33 and 420 (bibl.); Id., I Cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan [2]1990; S. Roda, Profilo di storia romana. Dalle origini alla caduta dell'Impero d'Occidente, Rome 2001.

L. Navarra

CALLATIS (Mangalia, district of Constanta, Romania). Greek colony founded in the 6th c. BC, it had a final flowering in the 4th-6th c. AD. Casual finds have uncovered various vestigia, including a Christian funerary stele, in Greek, which mentions a jurist of *Syrian origin (4th-5th c.); a limestone cross on which is incised the name of the local Bishop Stephanus (6th c.), the first bishop attested in *Tomis, another town of *Scythia Minor; and a fragment of architrave with the name of the emperor *Justinian, "lover of buildings" (φιλοκτίστης).

Unsystematic archaeological excavations have found the ruins of a Christian basilica abutting on the N side of the city wall. Built in the 4th-5th c. and probably rebuilt during the reign of *Anastasius I (491–518), the basilica consisted of a rectangular hall, oriented N-S, with the entrance in the middle of the long E side, where originally there was a lateral courtyard, in the Syrian fashion, later transformed into a sumptuous atrium with four porticoes. At the S end of the hall was the presbytery, with no apse because of a road along that side. The main entrance opened from the road onto the atrium and from there to the basilica, to the W, and to the partially excavated building to the E, which probably functioned as a bishop's palace (episcopium). Among the ruins of the basilica were found numerous pieces of architectural sculpture, including two ram's-head capitals.

In the W part of the city was a large early-Christian *cemetery; about a fifth of its total area has been excavated, with ca. 400 tombs (4th-6th c.).

Among the numerous Christian monuments discovered in the last two decades at Callatis, some are significant for understanding some aspects of the socioeconomic panorama of the city at the time of the important development it underwent between the late 4th and late 6th c. Among these, particularly important is a tomb with a dromos ("corridor"), found during an emergency excavation. The tomb, built in small limestone blocks, comprises a room with vaulted ceiling: it is reached by a corridor, 3 m long, which descends by a series of stairs to at least a meter below ground level. There is a cross painted in red on each wall of the corridor and above the entrance to the room: in the latter position there is also a salvific inscription, also painted in red, which reads: Κύριϵ βοήθϵ μοῦ κϵ λυτρώτϵ μοῦ ("Lord help me and purify me").

Inside the room, a similar cross painted in red appears on each wall, but on the W wall there is also a second inscription: ΟΥ ΦΟΒΗΘϹΟΜΕ ΚΑ + ΚΥΡΙΕ + ΚΑ ΟΤΙ ϹΥ ΜΕΤΕΜΟΥ ("I will not fear, Lord, because you are with me").

The state of the monument at its finding gave evidence of at least two phases of usage; the second is attested by some interventions both in the corridor and in the room. To the first phase are attributed the 11 burials in earthen graves in the corners of the room: in one of these graves was a precious gold reliquary. In the second phase, eight niches were opened in the walls of the room, the vault and walls were plastered, and the two inscriptions painted. Ceramics for domestic use accompanied the nine burials. A small bronze vase found in the room may have been used for illumination, since near it the plaster shows signs of soot.

The tomb fits perfectly into the extremely common *Romano-*Byzantine type of tombs with corridor, but it must have belonged to a well-to-do family, willing to incur some expense for the burial of its family members. Though it is impossible to date exactly the (at least) two periods of usage, the tomb fits well into the time of Callatis's flourishing from the 5th to the late 6th c.

A second chance find, near the walls at the S limits of the old city, uncovered a piece unique at Callatis and extremely rare in all of Scythia. This is an ampulla, egg-shaped and very small, of the kind worn hanging from the neck (easily visible on the sides are pierced handles for a small chain or a string), decorated on both sides by an identical cross with the ends slightly visible. On the body of the cross is a decorative motif of concentric circles. This object is like the well-known devotional ampullae linked to *pilgrimages of the faithful to holy places. Considering the position of the city and its consequent intense relations with the East, the presence of such an ampulla at Callatis is not surprising: nevertheless, it remains an extremely rare piece in the archaeological-artistic panorama of the region.

Em. Popescu, Inscripţiile greceşti şi latine din secolele IV-XIII descoperite in România, Bucharest 1976; I. Barnea, Les monuments paléochrétiens de Roumanie, Vatican City 1977; Id., Christian Art in Romania, 1, Bucharest 1979; C. Preda, Callatis. Necropole romano-bizantina, Bucharest 1980; N. Duval, RA 2, Paris 1980, 322-326; A. Rădulescu - V. Lungu, Le christianisme en Scythie Mineure à la lumière des dernières découvertes archéologiques, in Actes du XI Congrès International d'Archéologie Chrétienne, 1984, III, 2561-2615; M. Ionescu - I.I.C. Opris, O ampullă din Asia Minor recent descoperită la Callatis (A pilgrim flask of Asia Minor recently discovered at Callatis): Thraco-Dacica 19 (1998) 167-170.

I. Barnea - A. Garrisi

CALLINICUS (d. after 450). Monk of the *monastery of the Rufiniani near *Constantinople after 426 at the latest, a disciple of the founder St. *Hypatius, whose biography he wrote soon after his death, i.e., ca. 447–450. This work remained unpublished until it was retouched and circulated in the next generation. G.J.M. Bartelink has published the Life of Hypatius (SC 177, Paris 1971) and studied its language, literary form (with affinities to the Life of Anthony) and relation to ps.-*Macarius's spirituality.

CPG 6042; CPG/S 6042; BS 7, 860-861; BHG 760; A. J. Festugière, Les Moines d'Orient II, Paris 1961, 13-82; Patrologia V, 39.

J. Gribomont

CALLINICUS (Nicephorium). Now near Raqqa, Callinicus was a fort on the left bank of the Euphrates, a station on the way to Commagene, N Mesopotamia and *Dura Europos (Ammianus 23,3,7). The founding of the city goes back to Alexander the Great, who named it Nicephorium. Under Seleucus II Callinicus (265–225 BC) the name was changed to Callinicus. Annexed to the Parthian kingdom, in AD 35 it came under the rule of Tiridates III, and at the time of the Flavii under the direct rule of *Rome. Its character as a large commercial center and the rapid expansion of Christianity in this area of ancient *Mesopotamia lead to the assumption that the city had a Christian community very early. *Eusebius of Caesarea confirms this indirectly when he says that the land of the Parthians, of which Callinicus was then a part, was assigned to the evangelistic work of the *apostle *Thomas (HE III 1,1).

In the war between *Julian and the Persian king Sapor, the city hosted the Roman emperor (363), who arrived with a grand display of arms and offered it military support. Callinicus achieved notoriety again in 388 because of the religious riots there. On the occasion of the feast of the Maccabees, some local monks set fire to a chapel used by the *Valentinians, a Christian sect at Callinicus that went back to the 2nd c. At the same time a local *synagogue was burned down at the instigation of the bishop, destroying some precious objects. The comes Orientis, in sensitivity to the influential Jews, informed *Theodosius, who reproved him for not punishing the arsonists and requiring the bishop of Callinicus to rebuild the synagogue at his own expense. *Ambrose of Milan intervened in the affair, obtaining from the emperor the revocation of the two measures, but he had to suffer the consequences of what to Theodosius seemed an undue interference.

In the age-old war between the Byzantines and *Persians and because of its strategic position, Callinicus was fortified by the *Byzantine emperor *Leo I (457–475), who changed its name to Leontopolis. About sixty years later (531), the Byzantine armies led by *Belisarius were defeated on the plain of Callinicus by the Persians, who razed the city to the ground in 542. The clashes between Byzantines and Persians continued even after the truce concluded between *Justinian and *Chosroes (545); only a few years later Callinicus was the theater of another battle between the two armies (583). With the Arab invasion of 639 the city changed the ancient name to Raqqa.

By the will of the emperor and for the purpose of settling the disputes between *Chalcedonian Christians and *monophysites, in 567 the city hosted a meeting of bishops of the two groups, which resolved absolutely nothing. At this time there were numerous recluses living near the city; also nearby was the Monastery of Mar Mattai, famous for theological studies. In his chronicle the historian Michael the Syrian reports the names of 20 monophysite bishops who succeeded one another at Callinicus from the mid-8th to the end of the 12th c.

DHGE 11, 412-414; R. Mouterde - A. Poidebard, Le limes de Chalcis, I, Paris 1945, 127-129; R. Devreesse, Le patriarcat d'Antioche depuis la paix de l'Église jusqu'à la conquête arabe, Paris 1945, 295; L. Padovese, Guida alla Siria, Casale Monf. 1994, 61-63; M. Al-Khalaf - K. Kohlmeyer, Untersuchungen zu ar-Raqqa - Nikephorion/ Callinicum: Mitt. des deutschen archäol. Instituts, Damaskus 2 (1985) 133-162; H. Savon, Ambroise de Milan, Paris 1997, 251-264; Fedalto 2, 809.

L. Padovese

CALLINICUS I, patriarch. Patriarch of *Constantinople (693–705), was first presbyter and skeuophylax of the Church of St. Mary in Blachernae, Constantinople, then succeeded Paul III in the patriarchal see (Niceph., Chronogr. brev. 68 f., PG 100, 1048 cd, cf. Theoph., Chron. A.M. 6186, PG 108, 744). He opposed *Justinian II's (685–695 and 705–711) violence and oppression against his subjects and the church; e.g., he refused to compose a prayer for the demolition of a church on whose site the emperor wished to (and did) build a fountain and a headquarters for the Blue party (Theoph., Chron. A.M. 6185, PG 108, 748 ab). The emperor seems to have decided to rid himself of his patriarch violently, so Callinicus took part in *Leontius's plot and uprising which led to the fall of Justinian, who was mutilated and exiled to Chersona (695; Niceph., De rebus post Maur. gestis, PG 100, 937-940; Theoph., Chron. A.M. 6187, PG 108, 750ff.). But when Justinian regained the empire in 705, he had Callinicus blinded and exiled to *Rome, where he died (Niceph., De rebus post Maur. gestis PG 100, 944 c; Theoph., Chron. A.M. 6198, PG 108, 760 c). Basil II's Menologion adds that he died walled up alive in a vaulted room (PG 117, 600 cd); the anonymous 10th-c. menologion relates rather that the patriarch was found alive after 40 days and lived for another four days, and that the pope, after an apparition of the *apostles, had Callinicus buried in St. Peter's (Latyshev, Menol. Anon. Byz. II, St. Petersburg 1912, 339-341). The Greeks venerate him as a saint (memoria 23 August).

AASS Aug. IV, 645-647; BHG n. 288 f.; DHGE 11, 415; Fliche-Martin, Storia d. Ch. V, 241-242; LTK 5, 1262; BS 3, 673-675.

A. De Nicola

CALLINICUS of Pelusium. Bishop of *Pelusium (Egypt), follower of *Melitius and enemy of *Athanasius, whom he, with Ision of Athribis and Eudaemon of Tanis, accused of violence against Ischyras and unjust taxation of the Egyptians (Athan., Ap. c. Arian. 60; Socr., HE I, 27) before Emperor *Constantine. At *Tyre (335) one of the charges against Athanasius was that he had deposed and maltreated Callinicus (Soz., HE II, 25). Callinicus was present at the Council of *Serdica (343).

M. Simonetti, see index; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Egypte au IVe siècle (328-373), Rome 1996.

E. Prinzivalli

CALLISTUS I, pope (217–222). Of servile condition, after occupations scarcely honorable, at least according to *Hippolytus of Rome (his main biographical source: Haer. 9,1-12; 10,27), Pope *Zephyrinus appointed him deacon of the *cemetery on the Via Appia, now famous as the "catacombs of St. Callisto." Elected bishop (see Eusebius, HE 6,21,1-2), he intervened in current theological controversies, *excommunicating *Sabellius for *heresy. Despite this clearly antimonarchian stance, Hippolytus accused him of being a *patripassian himself. Hübner, who stresses the similarities between Callistus's *trinitarian doctrine and that of *Noetus, considers Hippolytus's criticisms to be well founded. Hippolytus also accused him of moral laxity, since he had too lightly readmitted to the community those guilty of indecency and had allowed marriages between noblewomen and slaves; in any case his position was an important step in the history of *penitence. His refusal to depose clergy, perhaps guilty, is also of some interest. It is still disputed whether Callistus was the author of the Edictum peremptorium, mentioned by *Tertullian (Pud. 1, 6) (cf. Brent, who defends his authorship). It is very probable, however, that he died a martyr. The Depositio martyrum of 354 puts his memoria on 14 October at Trastevere, where his tomb is still venerated.

Hippolytus, Haer. 9,12,16-18; 10,27,3-4; AASS Oct. VI (1868)

401-448; BHL 1523ff.; DHGE 11, 421-424; BS 3,680-689; J. Gaudemet, Sociétés et mariages, Strasbourg 1980, 104-115; St.G. Hall: TRE 7 (1981) 559-563 (fundamental); LTK[3] 2, 891; A. Brent, Hippolytus and the Roman Church in the Third Century, Leiden 1995; R.H. Heine, The Christology of Callistus: JTS 49 (1998) 56-91; H.J. Vogt, Die Trinitätslehre des Papstes Kalixt I: ThQ 179 (1999) 195-209; RGG[4] 2, 13f.; R.M. Hübner: LACL (2002) 422ff. (bibl.).

B. Studer

CANDIDIANUS Comes. Commander of the guard of Emperor *Theodosius II, sent in 431 to *Ephesus to maintain order in the sessions of the ecumenical council there; he also kept bishops from returning to their sees before the council's work was concluded and kept laypeople and curious monks away.

CPG 6257, 8668, 8687, 8688, 8689; PG 84, 595-597, 648-649; ACO I,4, 31-33, 86; ACO I,I,I, 120-121; PLRE II, 257.

P. Marone

CANDIDUS the Arian (4th c.). Among the *African rhetor *Marius Victorinus's anti-*Arian works are two letters to him from an otherwise unknown Arian named Candidus: in the first, Candidus expounds Arian doctrine on the basis of *Platonic philosophy; in the second he sends Victorinus the texts, in *Latin, of two letters by Arius and *Eusebius of Nicomedia. Various modern scholars think that Candidus was a literary fiction of Victorinus, who used him to present his refutation of Arian doctrine more clearly and effectively.

CPL 680-681; SC 68, 106-124, 176-182; P. Nautin, Candidus l'Arien, in L'homme devant Dieu I, Paris 1964, 309-320; P. Hadot, Marius Victorinus. Recherches sur sa vie et ses œuvres, Paris 1971, 272-275; J. Ulrich, Die Anfänge der abendländischen Rezeption des Nizänums, Berlin 1994, 244-263.

M. Simonetti

CANDIDUS the Valentinian (3rd c.). *Jerome read a dialogue by *Origen on the Son's generation from the Father, which involved a division of substance (probolē) and the perdition of the devil because of his wicked nature. Was Candidus the *heretic who, according to Origen's letter "to his friends at *Alexandria" (cited by *Rufinus), debated with Origen at *Athens and falsified the minutes of it? This seems to follow from Jerome's text, which cites another passage from the same letter before speaking of Origen's dialogue with Candidus: in any case, more information would be helpful.

Jerome, Apol. adv. lib. Ruf. II, 18-19; FL 23, 440-443; Rufinus, De adult. lib. Orig. 7, CCL 20, 11-12.

H. Crouzel

CANON, MURATORIAN (Muratorian Fragment). The Muratorian Canon is the oldest list of the sacred books of the NT; it is not known whether the list of NT books was preceded by a list of the canonical books of the OT. The Muratorian Canon is named for the Italian scientist L.A. Muratori (d. 1750), who discovered it in an 8th- c. manuscript of Milan's Biblioteca Ambrosiana and published it in 1740. It includes 85 lines; the beginning is lost, and it begins with the last sentences on the gospel of St. Mark, followed by the gospel of St. Luke and the books of the NT, except Heb, Jas, 2 Pet and 3 Jn. It lists two Apocalypses: of John and of Peter; some did not want the latter read in church. The Book of Wisdom—according to the author—was written by Solomon's friends; the Shepherd, a very useful book, cannot be read officially in the church. It mentions the Letters to the Laodiceans and to the Alexandrians as Marcionite works. It rejects the works of Valentinus of Arsinoe, Miltiades, *Basilides (Asiatic founder of the *Cataphrygians) and the authors of the Book of Psalms of Marcion (the last lines, containing this information, are difficult to understand). The text comes from an unknown author and was written probably at *Rome in the 2nd half of the 2nd c.: he speaks of Pope *Pius (ca. 142–155) as a contemporary, but the date remains disputed. It is possible that the original was written in Greek. The Muratorian Canon is the first list of the texts of the Bible and is one of the most important texts for the history of the NT canon.

Zahn 1-143; H. Lietzmann, Das muratorische Fragment, Bonn 1933; Enchiridion Biblicum nr. 1. G. Bardy, DBS 5, 1957, 1394-1408; TRE 6, 22-48; Ger. tr.: Schneemelcher 1, 27f.; B.M. Metzger, Il canone del NT, Brescia 1997, 169-178; T. Zahn, Hippolytus, der Verfasser des muratorisches Kanon: NeuKirchlZeit 33 (1922) 417-436; G.M. Hanemann, The Muratorian Fragment and the Developement of the Canon, Oxford 1992; J.P. Henne, La datation du Canon de Muratori: RBen 100 (1993) 54-75; J.D. Kaestli, La datation du Canon de Muratori: Cristianesimo in the storia 15 (1994) 609-634; V. Verheyden, The Canon Muratori: A Matter of Dispute, in The Biblical Canons, J.-M. Auwers, H.J. De Jonge (eds.), Louvain 2003, 487-556.

M. Starowieyski

CANON, ROMAN. The *Roman eucharistic prayer is called canon actionis by the old Gelasian *sacramentary (Mohlberg, Liber sacramentorum, 183). The *Eucharist is an action regulated by a canon. The Roman Canon has preserved the expression infra actionem for the parts known as Communicantes and Hanc igitur. The idea of observing a canon as the norm of action in the celebration of the Eucharist was formulated by St. *Augustine: Totum illum agendi ordinem . . . quem universa per orbem servat Ecclesia ("He [the Apostle] prescribed in its entirety the order observed by the universal church throughout the world" (Ep. 54,6: PL 33, 203); Pope *Vigilius, in a letter to *Profuturus of Braga, gives the name canonica prex to the unchangeable part of the Roman eucharistic prayer.

The 6th-c. Ordo Romanus I speaks of the canon without a preface (Andrieu, Les Ordines Romani, 95), a practice which contradicts the oldest tradition. For *Cyprian, the preface and the rest of the eucharistic prayer form a unity: Ideo et sacerdos ante orationem praefatione praemissa parat fratrum mentes dicendo: sursum corda, ut dum respondet plebs: habemus ad Dominum, admoneatur nihil aliud se quam Dominum cogitare debere [Thus also the priest, by way of the preface before his prayer, prepares the minds of the brothers saying: "Lift up your hearts," so that when the common people respond "We have [lift] them to the Lord," let him be admonished that he himself ought to be thinking nothing other than about the Lord (De dom. orat. 31: CSEL 3, 289, 14-17)]. The change could have been caused by the fact that, from the 4th c., only the prefaces became interchangeable, while the rest of the canon, except for certain embolisms, remained fixed. On this, in 538 Pope Vigilius wrote to Profuturus of Braga: Ordinem quoque precum in celebritate missarum nullo nos tempore, nulla festivitate significamus habere divisum, sed semper eodem tenore oblata Deo munera consecrare. Quoties vero paschalis, aut ascensionis domini, vel pentecostes, et epiphaniae, sanctorumque Dei fuerit agenda festivitas, singula capitula diebus apta subjungimus, quibus commemorationem sanctae solemnitatis, aut eorum facimus, quorum natalitia celebramus: cetera vero ordine consueto prosequimur [As to the arrangement of prayers in the celebration of the mass, we intend to have no difference for any time, nor any feast; rather, we mean always to consecrate the gifts offered to God in the same way. Whenever the feasts of Easter, or the Ascension of the Lord, or Pentecost and Epiphany, and the saints of God festivals are to be observed, we add distinct paragraphs appropriate to those days by which we celebrate the commemoration of a holy solemnity, or we celebrate the anniversaries of the saints: we continue with the usual order for the other observances (PL 69, 18)].

The origin of the Roman Canon is an open question, although scholars tend to date it to the time of Pope *Damasus I. The language of the canon displays the rhythm and language proper to pre-4th-c. Roman discourse, without the cursus that we find in later orations, esp. at the time of Pope *Leo I. The primitive *epiclesis also shows the canon's ancient origin, i.e., before the Eastern *pneumatological specifications. The earliest traces of the text are in a partial citation by St. *Ambrose in De Sacramentis (IV, 21-27), which begins with Fac nobis hanc oblationem scriptam [Make for us this written offering] and ends with quod tibi obtulit summus sacerdos Melchisedech [which is what your High Priest Melchizedek offered]. It can be assumed that Ambrose also knew a form of a preface and a petition, since in De Sacram. (IV, 14) he states: Laus Deo defertur, oratio petitur pro populo, pro regibus, pro caeteris [Praise is offered to God, prayer is requested for the people, for kings, for the rest]. The present text of the canon is virtually that of St. Gregory (Botte-Mohrmann, L'ordinaire de la messe, 15-25).

Patristic citations of parts of the Roman Canon shed light on its history and theology. At the Te igitur, according to St. Leo, the church and its leaders are remembered: De fratribus vero quos et epistolis tuis et legatorum nostrorum relatione communionis nostrae cupidos esse cognovimus . . . pacis et communionis nostrae unitate laetentur. . . . De nominibus autem Dioscori, Juvenalis, et Eusthatii ad sacrum altare recitandis dilectionem tuam hoc decet custodire, quod nostri ibidem constituti faciendum esse dixerunt, quodque honorandae S. Flaviani memoriae non repugnet, et a gratia tua Christianae plebis animos non avertat [But concerning the brothers whom we learn from your letters and from the delegates report desire to be in communion with us . . . they may be heartened by their unity of peace and communion with us. . . . However, concerning the recitation of the names of Dioscorus, Juvenal and Eustathius at the sacred altar, it behooves you, beloved, to hold to that which our brothers who were present said ought to be done and which is not incompatible with the honorable memory of St. Flavian and will not turn the souls of the laity away from you (Ep. 80: PL 54, 913-915)]. In his letter to *Justinian (Ep. 4 ad Just., 2: PL 69, 22), Pope Vigilius cites the Te igitur with the words pro Ecclesia quam adunare, regere, custodire digneris [You have been deemed worthy to unite, to rule, to defend on behalf of the church]. The practice of naming bishops in this part of the Mass should be seen in the context of the doctrinal controversies of that time, when communion with a group of bishops assured orthodoxy of faith.

In the 4th c. the practice arose of reading the names of those the Mass was being offered for during the canon. The deacon read the names (*diptychs) aloud, and the priest then continued with quorum tibi fides cognita est. . . . *Jerome criticized this practice in In Ezech. 6, 18: Publiceque diaconus in Ecclesiis recitet offerentium nomina: tantum offert illa, tantum ille pollicitus est, placentque sibi ad plausum populi, torquente eos conscientia [The deacon in the churches publicly recites the names which are presented: all those offered are presented, and they seek approval for themselves and bend their consciences to the applause of the people (PL 25, 175)] and In Hierem. 2, 108: At nunc publice recitantur offerentium nomina et redemptio peccatorum mutatur in laudem: nec meminerunt viduae illius in evangelio, quae in gazophylacium duo aera mittendo omnium divitum vicit donaria [But now the names of those offered are publicly recited, and the forgiveness of sins exchanged for praise; but they do not remember the widow in the gospel who placed her two mites into the treasury triumphing over all the donations of the rich (PL 24, 784)]. Pope *Innocent I, however, approved the practice and ordered the bishop of Gubbio, who followed the custom of reading the diptychs before the canon, to observe the Roman practice inter sacra mysteria (Ep. 25: PL 20, 553).

The addition of the names of the saints in the Communicantes was done by Pope Vigilius. The pope speaks in Ep. 2, cited above (PL 69, 18), of special capitula for Easter, *Ascension, *Pentecost and *Epiphany: those for Christmas, Epiphany and Ascension nonetheless seem of Leonine origin. The memory of the Blessed Virgin, introduced into Eastern *anaphorae after the Council of *Ephesus, was in the Roman Canon from the time of Pope Gelasius.

The Quam oblationem presents a problem. Ambrose ends it with the words quod est figura Corporis et Sanguinis Domini nostri Iesu Christi (De Sacr. IV, 21: CSEL 73, 55, 2), an expression which recalls the ancient imago and similitudo used by *Gelasius in his letter to *Eutyches (Tract. III, De duabus naturis in Christo, 14: Thiel I, 451). The Gregorian text leaves out the term figura and introduces the causative particle ut, indicating in this way the independence of the epiclesis from the account of institution. In the Ambrosian text, however, the quod est figura is necessary for entering into the account of the institution, which according to *Ambrose is properly consecratory: Consecratio igitur quibus verbis est et cuius sermonibus? Domini Iesu. Nam reliqua omnia, quae dicuntur in superioribus, a sacerdote dicuntur . . . Ubi venitur, ut conficiatur venerabile sacramentum, iam non suis sermonibus utitur sacerdos, sed utitur sermonibus Christi. Ergo sermo Christi hoc conficit sacramentum [With whose words and sayings, therefore, is the consecration given? Those of our Lord Jesus. For all of the other words which are spoken previously are said by the priest. . . . When we arrive at the preparation of the venerable sacrament, the priest no longer uses his own words; rather he uses the words of Christ. Therefore the word of Christ accomplishes this sacrament (De Sacram. IV, 4,14: CSEL 73, 52, 10-16; the question of the epiclesis is treated under its own entry)].

Commemoration of the dead must have been introduced into the Roman Canon by some 3rd-c. Christian funerary prayer, as is shown by the text: its Latin recalls that of the catacombs. *Augustine attests to the practice of reading the names of the dead in the eucharistic prayer, writing in Serm. 172, 2: Ut pro eis qui in corporis et sanguinis Christi communione defuncti sunt, cum ad ipsum sacrificium loco suo commemorantur, oretur, ac pro illis quoque id offerri commemoretur [Prayers should be offered for those who have died in the communion of the body and blood of Christ; whenever their names are commemorated at the sacrifice in the usual place, it should be announced that the sacrifice is offered for them (PL 38, 936)]. The final doxology of the Roman Canon, with the formula in unitate Spiritus Sancti, seems to be later, since it employs a fully developed *trinitarian doctrine. Ambrose's doxology, however, seems much older (De Sacram. VI, 5,24: SC 25 bis, 152). Both lack the perspective of ps.-Hippolytus, of the church in which the doxology is offered to the Father and to the Son with the *Holy Spirit (Tr. Ap.: LQF 39, 55).

L. Eizenhöfer, Canon Missae Romanae (Rer. Eccl. Doc., s. minor, subs. stud. I, VII): Pars prior: Traditio textus (Rome 1954); pars altera: Textus propinqui (Rome 1966); F. Cabrol, Canon: DACL 2, 1847-1905; E. Bishop, On the Early Texts of the Roman Canon: Liturgia historica, Oxford 1918, 77-115; B. Botte, Le canon de la messe romaine, éd. critique, intr. et notes, Louvain 1935; A. Baumstark, Das Problem des römischen Messkanon: EphLit 53 (1939) 204-244; M. Andrieu, Les Ordines Romani du haut moyen-âge. 2. Les textes, Louvain 1948 (Spicil. Sacr. Lovan. 23); B. Capelle, Innocent Ier et le canon de la messe: RecTh 19 (1952) 236-247 (= Travaux Liturgiques . . . , 2, 236-247); B. Botte - Ch. Mohrmann, L'ordinaire de la messe, Paris 1953; B. Capelle, Problèmes du "Communicantes" de la messe: Riv. Lit. 40 (1953) 187-195 (= Travaux liturgiques . . . , 2, 269-275); Id., L'évolution du qui pridie de la messe romaine: RecTh 22 (1955) 5-16 (= Travaux liturgiques . . . , 2, 276-286); Id., L'intercession dans la messe romaine: RBen 65 (1955) 181-191 (= Travaux liturgiques . . . , 2, 248-257); A.G. Martimort (ed.), L'Église en prière, Tournai 1961 (It. tr. Rome [2]1966); P. Borella, Evoluzione letteraria del canone romano, Riv. Lit. 53 (1966) 523-561; L.C Mohlberg, Liber sacramentorum romanae aecclesiae ordinis anni circuli, Rome 1960, [2]1968 (Rer. Eccl. Doc. 4); A.G. Martimort (ed.), The Church at Prayer: The Eucharist, Shannon 1973; J. Jungmann, The Mass, Collegeville 1976; A. Keifer Ralph, The Unity of the Roman Canon: An Examination of Its Unique Structure: Studia Liturgica 11 (1976) 39-58; F. Manns, *Origine judeo-chrétienne de l'*Unde et memores: EphLit 101 (1987) 60-68; M.J. Moreton, Rethinking the Origin of the Roman Canon: SP 26 (1991) 63-66; E. Mazza, L'anafora eucaristica. Studi sulle origini (BELS 62), Rome 1992; G. Di Napoli, Communicantes and Nobis quoque. Un'ipotesi sulla loro origine e funzione: EO 8 (1997) 435-436; A. Hänggi - I. Pahl, Prex eucharistica, Fribourg 1998, 423-477; E. Mazza, The Eucharist in the First Four Centuries, in Handbook for Liturgical Studies, vol. 3, Collegeville, MN 1999, 52-55; G. Di Napoli, Il lento processo di formazione del canone romano: EO 17 (2000) 229-268; C. Cibien, Preghiere eucharistiche, in Liturgia (Dizionari S. Paolo), Cinisello B. 2001, 1523-1524.

A. Chupungco

CANONES ADOMNANI (7th c.). An anonymous collection, though attributed to *Adamnán, of 20 hygienic canons on pure and impure foods, along the lines of Mosaic legislation.

CPL 1792; Kenney 80; BCLL 609. Editions: PL 88, 815-816; PL 96, 1324-1325; F.W.H. Wasserschleben, Die irische Kanonensammlung, Giessen 1874, rev. ed. Leipzig, 1885, 120-123; L. Bieler, The Irish Penitentials, Dublin 1963, 176-181; J.T. McNeill - H.M. Gamer, Medieval Handbooks of Penance: A Translation of the Principal 'Libri Poenitentiales' and Selections from Related Documents, New York 1938 ([2]1965; [3]1979), 131-134; H. Sauer, Zur Überlieferung und Anlage von Erzbischof Wulfstans Handbuch: Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 36 (1980) 341-384.

A. Di Berardino

CANONES HIBERNENSES (mid 7th c.). This name indicates a collection of six Irish texts of ecclesiastical and civil laws, four of which are attributed to synods. According to Bieler's order they are: (1) De disputatione Hibernensis synodi (29 canons); (2) De arreis (12 canons in two recensions: a list of commutations of penances); (3) Synodus sapientium (Sic de decimis disputant) (8 canons on tithing); (4) Synodus Hibernensis (9 canons on penance or legal fines); (5) De iectione ecclesiae graduum ab hospitio (11 canons on fines for those who refuse hospitality or who kill an ecclesiastic); and (6) De canibus synodus sapientium (4 canons on restoration of damages caused by dogs).

CPL 1884; Kenney 78; BCLL, 602-608.

Editions: F.W.H. Wasserschleben, Die irische Kanonensammlung, Giessen 1874, rev. ed. Leipzig 1885, 136-144; PL 96, 1326; P. Ciprotti, Penitenziali anteriori al sec. VII, Milan 1966, 3-8; L. Bieler, The Irish Penitentials, Dublin 1963, 160-175.

Translations: J.T. McNeill - H.M. Gamer, Medieval Handbooks of Penance: A Translation of the Principal "Libri Poenitentiales" and Selections from Related Documents, New York 1938 ([2]1965; [3]1979), 118-130.

Studies: L. Bieler, The Irish Penitentials, Dublin 1963, 20-26 and 277-283; E. Coccia, La cultura irlandese precarolina miracolo o mito?: SM 17 (1943) 351-352; M.P. Sheehy, The Collectio Canonum Hibernensis: A Celtic Phenomenon, in Die Iren und Europa im frühe Mittelalter, ed. H. Loew, Stuttgart 1982, 525-535; G. MacNiocaill, Christian Influences in Early Irish Law: ibid., 151-156; D. Ó Corráin - L. Breatnach - A. Breen, The Laws of the Irish: Peritia 3 (1984) 382-438; C. Vogel, Il peccatore e la penitenza nel Medioevo, enlarged ed., ed. C. Achille Cesarini, Leumann [2]1988, 70 f., 82; T. O'Laughlin, Celtic Theology: Humanity, World and God in Early Irish Writings, London - New York 2000, ch. 6.

A. Di Berardino

CANONICAL - CANON. These terms, derived from Greek canon, which originally meant the stem of a cane and, by extension, any long, straight stick of wood. Since the ancients used canes for measuring, canon also came to mean measure, rule and, by metonymy, measured or ruled. This sense, which reflects the Greek ideal of measure, is present in 2 Cor 10:13, 16, where Paul claims to keep his apostolate to the field that has been "measured" to him. The nominative form designates a priest who is part of the chapter of a cathedral or collegiate church, as well as other religious institutions which arose in the Middle Ages and later; it can be an honorary title. The adjective canonical distinguishes ecclesiastical legislation from civil, esp. from the 12th c., and indicates that which is in conformity with the norms established by the ecclesiastical legislator: canonical age, canonical impediments, canonical visits, canonical hours. Toward the mid-4th c. there were canonical cantors employed in the service of the church and inscribed in its official register.

In opposition to noncanonical books and distinguished from them, it designates those books which form the Bible, i.e., that are considered inspired, comprising the official list of the church and endowed with an intrinsic capacity to infallibly regulate faith and morals. The term was used in this latter sense by *Origen (In Cant. prol.) and by *Jerome between 389–390 (Praef. in lib. Salom.). Between Origen and Jerome was the Council of *Laodicea (ca. 360), which in canon 59 clearly distinguishes the canonical books from the noncanonical, not allowing the recitation of the latter in church (Ench. Bibl., Rome 1954, 5). See also *Ancient Lists of Canonical Books and Apocrypha.

Basil, Ep. 188 (PG 32, 673); Hfl-Lecl 1/2, 1008; H. Leclercq, Chanoines: DACL III/1, 247-248; P. Torquebiau, Chanoines: DDC III, 471-488; Ch. Dereine, Chanoines: DHGE XII, 353-405; Höpfel H., DBS I, 1022-1045.

E. Peretto

CANONICAL BOOKS. See *ANCIENT LISTS of CANONICAL BOOKS and APOCRYPHA.

CANONICAL COLLECTIONS

I. Eastern collections - II. Western collections up to the 8th c.

The canonical collections bring together the disciplinary rules enacted by the ecclesiastical authorities. They are distinguished by their provenance into general and particular (collections of conciliar decisions or collections of decretals); by the quality of the documents composing them into authentic and apocryphal collections; by the authority of their compiler into private and official (or authentic) collections; and by their ordering principle into chronological and systematic collections. The NT writings do not just hand down the evidence of the primitive church's belief; they also contain the moral and disciplinary precepts that determine the church's basic institutions and the essential principles of Christian living and are thus in a way the basis of all later canon law and of the first canonical collections. As the Christian communities developed, the need to organize them became more and more compelling; their leaders, naturally appealing to *apostolic authority whose succession they had inherited, took the decisions that seemed to them useful for the good functioning of the churches. This procedure, attested to by the pastoral and canonical epistles, remained valid until the 4th c. and gave rise to a great number of writings called apostolic *apocrypha, whose influence on the canonical collections was considerable. The peace of *Constantine allowed the church to strengthen its hierarchical structures and to fix, through agreed legislation, prescriptions relating to faith and discipline; *councils became a public and general institution; the popes were entreated more and more to pronounce on particular problems, and they replied with rescripts or decretals. These documents form the primitive nucleus of the first canonical collections properly so-called, which appear first in the East, then in the West, from the 4th c.

I. Eastern collections. We are still far from being able to define the origin of the first Eastern canonical collections.

1. Chronological collections: according to E. Schwartz, the first collection of this type was compiled at Antioch under Bishop *Meletius, between 362–381. It is called Syntagma canonum and contains in chronological order the most important particular councils (*Ancyra, 314; *Neocaesarea, 314–325; *Gangra, ca. 341; *Antioch, 341; *Laodicea, 343–380). It seems to have been widely circulated in the East, since the Council of *Chalcedon refers to its first canon and cites it more than once. (Its canons were numbered as a continuous series.) The Antiochene Syntagma, supplemented by the canons of the general councils (*Nicaea [325] first, because of its dignity; *Constantinople, 381; Chalcedon, 451), became the primitive nucleus of the majority of the Eastern collections, and particularly those of the *Byzantine church. In the 6th c. the canons of *Ephesus (431), the 133 canons of the Council of *Carthage of May 419 and those of the Council of *Serdica (343) were added to them. The imperial chancellery polished them up in order to have a collection that brought together the canon law current in all the churches of the oecumene. From 501, the Antiochene Syntagma was translated into *Syriac for the church of Hierapolis (Mabbug). There are also very old *Coptic translations for the church of *Alexandria, which in turn transmitted them to that of *Ethiopia.

The Council *in Trullo, which met at Constantinople in 691 (or 692), fixed the official list of the sources of the canon law of the Byzantine church: to the documents of the Syntagma were definitively added the 85 canons of the Apostles, the canon of the Council of Constantinople under *Nectarius (394), the canons of the Fathers of the Eastern church (*Dionysius of Alexandria, *Gregory Thaumaturgus, *Peter of Alexandria, *Athanasius, *Basil of Caesarea, *Gregory of Nyssa, Timothy, *Alexander of Alexandria, *Cyril of Alexandria, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Amphilochius of Iconium, *Gennadius of Constantinople), those of *Cyprian (on second *baptism of heretics), and finally 102 disciplinary canons of the Council in Trullo itself.

2. From the 6th c., for obvious practical reasons, the Eastern canonists composed systematic collections, arranging the material of the chronological canonical collections by subject under as many rubrics, thus making it easier to use the text to find what was wanted. In some cases these collections brought together only the conciliar canons; in other cases the imperial laws enacted on ecclesiastical matters (nomoi), and in some cases both (nomocanonical collections). Of the first type, the most important include the canonical collection in 50 titles by *John III Scholasticus (patriarch of Constantinople 565–577), who also composed another canonical collection of 87 chapters, starting from Justinian's Novelle. The principal nomocanonical collections are those in 50 titles, a fusion of the last two mentioned collections into one, composed at the end of the 6th c. and several times enriched by a supplement, and the Nomocanon in 14 titles (9th c.). The main commentators on Byzantine canon law are Theodore Prodromos (8th c.), Zonara, Aristenes and Balsamon (12th c.).

II. Western collections up to the 8th c. It is hard to specify the origin and tenor of the first Western canonical collections. Each region gradually prepared codes of current canon law, bringing together documents that built it up (local or general councils, decretals, imperial laws, etc.).

1. The Church of *Rome seems to have possessed, from the 4th c., a small collection comprising the canons of Nicaea, to which had been added, under the same name, those of *Serdica. *Innocent I (Jaffé, 292) and *Zosimus (Jaffé, 347) seem to refer to it. In the West, in the 4th and 5th c., many other *Latin translations of the canons of Nicaea circulated, to which certain canons of the Greek councils of the Antiochene Syntagma canonum (Ancyra, Neocaesarea, Gangra, Antioch, Laodicea, Constantinople) were added, in whole or in part. Various recensions (Isidoriana, Prisca or Italica, Gallo-Hispanic, etc.) were also preserved which, from the 4th to 6th c., were joined to other canonical documents to form local canonical collections.

2. *African canonical legislation was abundant from the 4th c., thanks to the decisions of the Councils of *Carthage (345 and 390). A number of canonical collections were issued in this province under *Aurelius, primate of Carthage (391–427/430), in particular the Epitome of the Council of *Hippo of 393, composed in 397 by the bishops of *Byzacena (Munier, Concilia Africae, XXI), which offers a substantial summary of the *African canon law of that time. Its provisions were observed in all the provinces of the region and reconfirmed by the plenary councils that met at Aurelius's instigation and under his presidency. The affair of *Apiarius, which set the Africans against Roman claims regarding appeals to Rome, provided a good reason for the formation of ample dossiers justifying the point of view of the Council of Carthage of May 419. To prove that their canons were in agreement with those of Nicaea, the Africans composed a brief collection of 40 (33) canons, known to historians as Canones in causa Apiarii (Munier, 98ff.). On the same occasion they sent to Rome ample extracts from the acts of their councils (from 393 to 418); from all these, at the end of the 5th c., *Dionysius Exiguus made a collection of 100 canons, called Codex canonum ecclesiae africanae (Munier, 173ff.). After this golden age the African church, exhausted by the *Vandal invasion, produced little in the way of canons; just two compilations contained all the legislation of that time: the Epitome of the deacon *Ferrandus (523/546) and *Cresconius's Concordia canonum.

3. To the common elements of the collections (canons of local councils, canons of the Greek councils, decretals), from the 5th c. the Gallo-Roman churches added two particular collections that circulated widely all through the early Middle Ages: the so-called collection of the II Council of *Arles, a private collection composed between 442 and 506; and particularly the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua, thought to have been compiled by the priest *Gennadius of Marseille (ca. 475/485). With the passing of time, this code was considered to be that of the IV Council of Carthage of 398. It is a vast composition in three parts: a profession of faith for the bishop being consecrated; a compendium of canon law in 102 canons, taken from the Eastern and local councils; and a small ritual for ordination. From the 6th to the 9th c. the *Gallican churches composed their canonical collections as best they could, bearing in mind the political events that continually built up and destroyed kingdoms (*Franks, *Burgundians, *Visigoths). In this way many canonical collections appeared, more or less closely resembling each other, whose provenance and area of application are very difficult to ascertain. Among the best known are the collections of Corbie, Cologne, Toulouse-Albi, Lorsch, *Lyons, Reims, Pithou, St. Maur, St. Amand and Burgundy (Maassen, 556-642). The most widespread was the Vetus Gallica, once called the Angers canonical collection, a small systematic collection of 400 canons distributed under some 60 titles. Its latest editor claims to distinguish three stages of elaboration: Lyons, ca. 600; Autun, ca. 675; Corbie, early 8th c. (Mordek 95ff.).

4. From the 6th c., *Spain possessed two canonical collections: the Novara collection, whose first nucleus may go back to 550, and the Epitome (late 6th c.) and Capitula of *Martin of Braga (ca. 563). But these canonical collections were quickly overshadowed by the Hispana, the official canonical collection of the churches belonging to the *Visigothic kingdom of Toledo. The Hispana stands out for the excellent quality of its components, borrowed from sound sources (Greek, African, Gallic, Spanish councils) and classified regionally and chronologically, with the addition of 103 decretals and pontifical documents from *Damasus to *Gregory the Great. Though it may have had several authors, the Hispana reached *Gaul from the 8th c. and was used there to compile the ps.-Isidorian collections.

5. To complete this description of the regional canonical collections, we must return to Rome, whose first steps in this area were very modest. In the course of the 5th c., thanks to material received from Africa and the East, during the affair of Apiarius they finally managed to compose better-furnished canonical collections. The *Acacian *schism (476–519) and the double pontifical election of 498 led to the composition of many canonical collections, whose exact relations are still to be clarified. In this crowded but qualitatively diverse output, we may distinguish three groups of canonical collections. The first contains those before Dionysius Exiguus: the Freising collection, very concerned to bring out the rights of the Roman see (Munier, La Tradition, 49-53), and the Quesnelliana, very rich in documents of a theological nature (profession of faith, *Pelagian dossier) and in St. Leo's letters. These canonical collections were overshadowed by those of the Scythian monk Dionysius, who arrived in *Rome after Pope *Gelasius's death (496).

Dionysius's work was of decisive importance for the history of the canonical collections. He gathered into well-ordered collections the legislative texts originating from the different churches of Christendom (Eastern and African councils; decretals, from *Siricius to *Anastasius II, interesting for universal law). Thanks to the prefaces to his canonical collections, we know that Dionysius left three redactions of his conciliar canons and one collection of decretals (Maassen 422ff.). In 774 Pope Hadrian gave Charlemagne a copious recension of the Dionysiana and the Hadriana (the Dionysio-Hadriana), thus ensuring an extraordinary circulation for the Roman canonist's work. Following the agitation over the election of Pope *Symmachus (498), several minor canonical collections were issued in *Italy. They seem to have been composed by (Roman) clerics who, in one way or another, took part in those debates, well described by the Symmachian apocrypha. Among the most characteristic, we may cite that of St. Biagius, that of the Vatican, and the supplement to the Dionysiana (Maassen 445ff.; 504-526); to these we owe the formulation of the principle: Prima sedes non iudicabitur a quoquam.

DDC 4, 1446ff.; LTK 6, 254ff.; F. Maassen, Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des canonischen Rechts in Abendlande I, Graz 1870; A. van Hove, Commentarium lovaniense, in CJC, I Prolegomena, Mechliniae - Rome 1945; A.M. Stickler, Historia iuris canonici latini I, Historia fontium, Taurini 1950; Ch. Munier, Les Statuta ecclesiae antiqua, Paris 1960; Id., Concilia Galliae a. 314-505, Turnholti 1964; Id., Concilia Africae a. 345-525, Turnholti 1974; Id., La tradition littéraire des dossiers africains: RDC 29 (1979) 41-52; A. García, Historia del Derecho canónico I, Salamanca 1967; H. Mordek, Kirchenrecht und Reform in Frankenreich. Die Collectio Vetus Gallica, Berlin 1975; Patrologia IV, 497-514; Patrologia V, 659-675; J. Gaudemet, Les sources du droit de l'Église en Occident du II[e] au VII[e] siècle, Paris 1985; C. Van de Wiel, History of Canon Law, Louvain 1992; Ch. Munier, Vie conciliaire et collection canoniques en Occident, IV[e]-XII[e] siècles, London 1987; P. Landau, Kanones und Dekretalen. Beiträge zur Geschichte der Quellen des kanonischen Rechts, Goldbach 1997-1996; B.E. Ferme, Introduzione alla storia del diritto canonico, I, Rome 1998; L. Kéry, Canonical Collections of the Early Middle Ages (ca. 400-1140): A Bibliographical Guide to the Manuscript and Literature, Washington, DC 1999; J. Detlev - H. Fuhrmann, Papal Letters in the Early Middle Ages, Washington, DC. 2001; LACL[3] 428-437.

Ch. Munier

CANONS, NICENE (pseudo). The *Council of *Nicaea of 325 published 20 canons. The Arabic translation enlarges the collection in two versions which are substantially the same and differ only in the arrangement of the canons. One version has 80 canons (Mansi 2, 947-982), the other 84 (Mansi 2, 982-1010). They were discovered in the West in the 16th c. by Giovanni Battista Romano and were immediately translated into *Latin; the translation of the second collection goes back to Abraham Ecchellensis. They come from the *Melkite church and were later accepted by the *Coptic and Chaldean churches (Maruta of Maipherqat).

CPG 8523; Hfl-Lecl 1, 511-523; W. Riedel, Die Kirchenrechtsquellen des Patriarchats Alexandrien, Leipzig 1900; G. Graf, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur, Rome 1930, vol. 1, 586-593; J.B. Darblade, La collection canonique arabe des Melkites (XIII[e]-XVII[e] siècles), Vatican City 1946; Coptic Encyclopedia 6, 1789-1790; D. Ceccarelli Morolli, I canoni Arabo-Niceni e la loro probabile relazione con la Nubia Cristiana: Utrumque Ius 26 (1994) 534-550.

A. Di Berardino

CANONS of HIPPOLYTUS. These 38 canons are preserved only in Arabic, which R. Coquin has shown to be a translation from Sahidic Coptic, in turn translated from Greek. The author used a document which modern historians usually call the Apostolic Tradition but which is in fact the fusion of two different works. It is this document, which was and still is in the canonical collections, that the author of the 38 canons translated, omitting many details and making some additions, in this way attempting to reconcile various traditions: the reworked document preserves a ring of antiquity and authority in both its old and new parts. The profession of faith, the theme of canon I, is inspired by the *Nicene Creed: the work is therefore not earlier than the 4th c. The reasons advanced for dating it before 385 (Botte) or in the years 336/340 (Coquin, 329 [31]) are not decisive. They were composed in *Egypt—according to some at *Alexandria, according to others in some small city; Kretschmar (1970, 166; 1977, 58 n. 2) thinks it was in Asia Minor. The Canons of Hippolytus deal with ordinations, the clergy, Christian initiation, marriage, women etc., in no precise order. The author highlights the importance of *presbyters: "The presbyter is equal to the bishop all except for the see (episcopal) and ordination" (can. 2). The Canons of Hippolytus have had an independent circulation, without being integrated into larger collections, though they have been joined to them; they circulated only in the Coptic church.

CPG 1742; D.B. von Haneberg, Canones S. Hippolyti Arabice e codicibus Romanis, Munich 1870 (ed. and Lat. tr.); H. Achelis, Die ältesten Quellen des orientalischen Kirchenrechts, I, Canones Hippolyti, Leipzig 1891 (Lat. tr.); W. Riedel, Die kirchenrechtlichen Quellen Patriarchats Alexandrien, Leipzig 1900 (repr. Aalen 1968), 193-230 (Ger. tr.); R. Coquin, Les canons d'Hippolyte, in PO 31,2 (Paris 1966 [better translation]). Eng. tr.: The Canons of Hippolytus, ed. P.F. Bradshaw, tr. by C. Bebawi, Nottingham 1987; Jap.: A. Laplante, Hipporyutos no kihanshu, Major Seminary, Fukuoka 1988; DACL 2, 1942-1949; Coptic Encyclopedia 2, 458f.; A. Baumstark, Kanones des Hippolytus oder Kanones des Julius: OrChr 2 (1902) 191-196; B. Botte, L'origine des Canons d'Hippolyte, in Mélanges Andrieu, Strasbourg 1956, 53-63; J.-M. Hanssens, L'Édition critique des canons d'Hippolyte: OCP 32 (1966) 534-544; G. Kretschmar, Die Geschichte des Taufgottesdienstes in der alten Kirche, in Leiturgia V, Kassel 1970; G. Kretschmar, Nouvelles recherches sur l'initiation chrétienne: La MaisonD. 132 (1977) 7-32; H. Brakmann, Alexandreia und die Kanones des Hippolyt: JbAC 22 (1979) 139-149; B. Steimer, Vertex traditionis. Die Gattung der altchristlichen Kirchenordnungen, Berlin 1992, 72-79.

P. Nautin

CANTERBURY. City of SE England (Durovernum Cantiacorum), with good probability was one of the first emplacements aimed at by the *Romans after their landing on the coast of Kent in AD 43. Three important arterial military roads, from Rutupiae (Richborough), Dubris (Dover) and Lemanis (Lympne), converged at Canterbury, from whence departed—and ran in a straight line—the main road to Londinium (London): this convergence of communication routes sealed the site's strategic importance, already recognized and valued by the autochthonous communities.

After the Roman period, Canterbury had great importance at the time of *Augustine's mission of evangelization, initiated by *Gregory I. In 597, monks from the Roman *monastery of St. Andrew on the Caelian Mount, after landing on the beaches of Kent, found a genuine support in the powerful local king *Ethelbert of Cantia, whose wife Bertha, daughter of the Merovingian king of Paris Charibert, was a Christian. The pope had wanted the metropolitan see for S England to be established at London but, after the king's conversion, and considering the repeated and kind concessions he had bestowed on the missionaries, *Augustine decided for Canterbury. Following this choice, as *Bede recounts in detail, Augustine decided to restore an ancient church built in Canterbury in Roman times, dedicating it to the Savior (Hist. eccl. gent. angl. I, 33); this valuable circumstance allows us to hypothesize—contrary to the archaeological data and the silence of the literary sources—the existence of a primitive Christian community at Durovernum Cantiacorum. Also with the king's help, Augustine built—though the consecration took place only with his successor *Lawrence—a monastery not far from the city with an attached church dedicated to the *apostles *Peter and *Paul, near the portico in which he was later buried (Hist. eccl. gent. angl. II, 3). On the death of Deusdedit (14 July 664)—Augustine's fifth successor after Lawrence, *Mellitus, *Justus and *Honorius—the local bishopric remained vacant for a long time; to correct this dangerous situation, *Egbert, king of Kent and son of Earconbert, and Oswy, king of Northumbria, sent the priest Wighard, a highly regarded English religious, to Rome for the purpose of having him ordained archbishop by Pope Vitalian. In this way they sought to fix the precarious situation and organizational gaps of the English churches. Wighard's death of plague at Rome, however, gave the pope the chance to send a person of his own choice to manage that difficult land, an outsider who had not been conditioned by the environment. After a long search the choice fell to a *Cilician monk, Theodore of *Tarsus, whose episcopal activity as Deusdedit's successor proved decisive for the radical and definitive reorganization of the churches of England. He conformed to the Synod of Whitby (664), adopting Roman rites instead of *Celtic and, visiting the whole country, founded numerous new churches, strengthened the church's unity and consolidated the primatial role of Canterbury. In the 7th c. many churches and monasteries were built in Kent, contributing to the consolidation of Canterbury's supremacy, while in the following century the city's importance was threatened by the domination of King Offa of Mercia. Archbishops: Augustine, 597–604; Lawrence, 604–619; Mellitus, 619–624; Justus, 624–627; Honorius, 627–653; Deusdedit, 655–664; Wighard, ca. 665; Theodore, 668–690; Berthweald, 693–731; Tatwine, 731–734; Nothelm, 735–739; *Cuthbert, 740–760.

DACL 2, 1999-2027; DHGE 11, 785-812.

M. Ghilardi

CANTICLE of CANTICLES. See *SONG of SONGS

CAPPADOCIA
I. The region - II. Council.

I. The region. Roman province created ca. AD 17 under *Tiberius upon the death of its last king, Archelaus: it was under the jurisdiction of a procurator of equestrian rank who, when needed, was to receive military help from the governor of *Syria. Our main source for Cappadocia's administrative organization, which remained unchanged after its annexation to the empire, is Strabo (XII, 1-2, 540C). It was centralized and bureaucratic, perhaps modeled on that of *Egypt: the territory was divided into ten smaller units called strategiae, to which Pompey had added part of *Cilicia to make an eleventh. The country was organized along feudal lines: the system went back to the pre-Seleucid era and had long endured in a territory which had never been conquered in depth or really *Hellenized; the lower orders lived in small villages under the rule of local lords; there was also a multitude of slaves who were exported, through commercial channels, in large numbers as far as *Rome, as several sources attest. Under *Vespasian, Tiberius's equestrian procurator was replaced by a consular legate, who also ruled *Galatia, Paphlagonia, Pontus Galaticus and Polemoniacus, and Armenia Minor. *Trajan left Armenia Minor and the districts of Pontus under the jurisdiction of the consularis of Cappadocia, while Galatia and Paphlagonia had a separate governor: this system remained unchanged until *Diocletian's reorganization of the provinces in the late 3rd c., which divided Cappadocia in two, in line with the general policy of breaking up the larger provinces into smaller units. The W part continued to be called Cappadocia: the smaller E part was briefly joined to Armenia Minor, but before the end of the 4th c. it became a separate province called Armenia Secunda.

Christianity arrived very early in Cappadocia, already in the 1st c. (see1 Pet 1:1), using, as occurred elsewhere, the network of the synagogues. In the 3rd c. it was already an important Christian center; its bishop, *Firmilian, had numerous contacts. *Origen went to *Caesarea for a certain period, teaching there (Eusebius, HE 6,27-28). There were various *martyrs during the persecutions of Diocletian and his successors, including Gordius and the 40 martyrs of *Sebaste, Ierone and the martyrs of Melitene. In the 4th c., Cappadocia produced the celebrated *Basil of Caesarea, *Gregory of Nazianzus and *Gregory of Nyssa, the so-called Cappadocian fathers, to whom we may add Basil's cousin *Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium. During the first four centuries, the metropolitan of Caesarea exercised a sort of supremacy over the N and NE provinces of Asia Minor, with the title of exarch; even later he retained first place after the patriarch of *Constantinople. By the mid-4th c., Christianity appears to have spread widely in the province, not only in the cities but also in the rural areas, as is proven by the presence of *chorbishops (rural bishops) alongside the bishops; a good ten bishops of Cappadocian cities were present at the *Council of *Nicaea. Even in the 2nd-3rd c., we know the names of some, such as Primianus, *Theoctistus and Firmilian of Caesarea (Gams, Ser. episc., 440). Church buildings were built everywhere.

R. Teja, Die römische Provinz Kappadokien, ANRW, II, Prinzipat, 7, 2 (1980) 1083-1124 (with bibl.); RAC 2, 861-891; C. Jolivet-Lévy, Les églises byzantines de Cappadoce: le programme iconographique de l'abside et de ses abords, Paris 1991; N. Thierry, La Cappadoce de l'antiquité au Moyen Âge, Turnhout 2002; R. van Dam, Kingdom of Snow: Roman Rule and Greek Culture in Cappadocia, Philadelphia 2002; Id., Families and Friends in Late Roman Cappadocia, Philadelphia 2003; Id., Becoming Christian: The Conversion of Roman Cappadocia, Philadelphia 2003.

M. Forlin Patrucco

II. Council. The emperor *Valens had divided Cappadocia into two civil provinces, with capitals at *Caesarea and *Tyana. *Anthimus, bishop of Tyana, took advantage of this to claim full metropolitan rights over his city. *Basil disagreed, claiming that civil divisions were irrelevant to ecclesiastical organization. A synod, held in 372 in an unspecified place, accepted this thesis and admitted the possibility of creating new episcopal sees. Basil then consecrated his friends as bishops of small towns in Cappadocia Secunda, including *Gregory of Nazianzus for the isolated village of Sasima.

Mansi 3, 453-454; Tillemont, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire eccl., Venice 1722, vol. 9, 174-182; Basil, Ep. 58, 92, 120-122, 210; Gregory of Nazianzus, Ep. 47-50; N. Thierry, La Cappadoce de l'antiquité au Moyen Âge, Turnhout 2002.

A. Di Berardino

CAPREOLUS. Succeeded *Aurelius as bishop of *Carthage during the difficult time of the *Vandal conquest of *Africa (427–437); he had to struggle against their encroaching *Arianism. We have two of his letters, one to the Council of *Ephesus (431), where he was represented by a deacon, the other to the Spanish bishops Vitalis and Tonantius; both letters concerned the *christological problems of the day (PL 50, 843-858). Some ps.-Augustinian sermons are attributed to him.

PWK 3, 1548; DHGE 11, 959-961; Cath 2, 517; LTK³ 2, 936 (B. Kriegbaum); J.-L. Maier, L'épiscopat de l'Afrique romaine vandale et byzantine, Bibliotheca Helvetica Romana 11, Rome 1973, 274; A. Isola, I cristiani dell'Africa Vandalica nei 'Sermoni' del tempo (429-534), Milan 1990, 87; PCBE 1, 189-190.

V. Saxer

CAPSA. Now Gafsa (Tunisia). Considered a key position in ancient *Africa: oppidum magnum (Sall., Jug. 89, 4). Destroyed by Marius and rebuilt in the course of the 1st c. AD, it embraced Christianity very early. In 256 its bishop Donatulus signed, in 69th place, the Sent. epp. of the council of that year. *Cyprian addressed Ep. 57 to him and five other bishops, who were meeting to elect a seventh. *Fortunatus attended *Gratus's council (345/348); *Quintasius was at the council of the *Maximianists, an extreme wing of *Donatism, held at Cabarsussi (Mansi 2, 845-8). At the Conference of *Carthage (411), Fortunatus represented the *Catholics and Celeres the *Donatists. Vindemialis was summoned by *Huneric to the conference of 484: his name appears in the Passio 7 bb.mm. Caps.; according to *Gregory of Tours (HF 2, 3), he raised the dead. The bishop of Capsa still figures in the list compiled by the emperor Leo VI the Wise in 883.

PWK 3, 1553; DHGE 11, 965-968; J.-L. Maier, L'épiscopat de l'Afrique romaine, vandale et byzantine, Neuchâtel 1973, 122; C. Lepelley, Les cités de l'Afrique romaine au Bas-Empire, Paris 1981, 2, 281-282; Encyclopédie berbère, 12, Capsa-Cheval, Aix-en-Provence 1993, 1757-1911.

V. Saxer

CAPUA
I. History - II. Council.

I. History.
The ancient city. The territory of ancient Capua, today St. Maria Capua Vetere (Caserta), N of Naples, had been occasionally inhabited since the Recent Neolithic Age and even in the Bronze Age (4th millennium BC and 10th c. BC) but gives evidence of stable human occupation only from the Iron Age. From its origins it assumed a strategic importance, being at the center of an especially fertile region near the Volturno River, and a natural route of travel between Latium and Campania. In archaic times, an initial Etruscan hegemony was progressively supplanted by the Campano-Samnite element. Some extraurban sanctuaries were active in the Samnite period, including the very famous one of Diana Tifatina. Capua was Romanized from 59 BC with Caesar's dedication of a colony of veterans (Concordia Iulia Felix Capua). The city's extraordinary economic flourishing was arrested by the construction of the Via Domitiana, from Pozzuoli to Sinuessa, which routed most of the commercial traffic around the area, leading to the gradual abandonment of the river port of Casilinum on the Volturno. However, Capua's resurgence and prestige—which took place in the 4th c. AD when the city was the capital of the provincia of Campania and see of the consularis, such that the poet Ausonius numbered it among the eight greatest cities of the Roman Empire (Ordo nobil. Urb. 8)—is well known. In the course of the 5th c., a period of general crisis for Campania, the city began a gradual decline; in 456 it was sacked by *Genseric. The old city survived in the center of St. Maria Capua Vetere, and in the second half of the 9th c. it once again flourished, with the name of Capua, a new city on the site of the ancient river port of Casilinum.

The Christian city. From the origins of Christianity the community of Capua certainly had an important role, but other than the traditional information on the consecration of the protobishop Priscus by *Peter, before the 4th c. the literary and archaeological sources tell us little. Amply attested, however, is the strong connection with *Rome, not only through the frequent contact of the prelates of the two sees, but also for the widespread cult of the *apostles Peter and *Paul, alongside indigenous *martyrs. The Prologus Paschae of 395 refers to the letters (lost) of a *Cyprian, probably bishop of *Carthage, to Augustine and Felicita, martyred apud ciuitatem Capuensem under *Decius (MGH AA, IX, Chronica minora, I,738).

In the 4th c., in close connection with its role as a civil metropolis, Capua played an important role in ecclesiastical politics: its titular, Proterius, participated in the synods of *Rome of 313 and *Arles of 314, and his church, with that of Naples, was one of the only two in all of S Italy to benefit from a direct intervention by the emperor *Constantine, who built a basilica dedicated to the Apostles intra urbe Capua (LP I,185-186). The episcopal see of Capua played a leading role during the *Arian crisis, as a mediator between Rome and the Eastern episcopates. Its bishop, Vincent, perhaps to be identified with the *presbyter who represented *Sylvester of Rome at the Council of *Nicaea, is cited twice in the Apologia of *Athanasius to *Constantius (PG 25,595-641). He participated at the Council of *Serdica of 343; in 344 he was sent on a mission to *Antioch to Constantius to mitigate the emperor's anti-Nicene measures; in 353 he was present as a Roman legate at the Council of Arles, where he was forced to subscribe to the condemnation of Athanasius, and in 357 Liberius, during his exile at Terracina, asked him to intervene with the emperor on his behalf.

The name of the bishop of Capua who, in 391 or 392, hosted the council convoked to discuss the *Melitian *schism and the doctrine of *Bonosus of Serdica, remains unknown. In this period, the size of the Christian community is attested by the large subdial funerary areas in the zone of St. Prisco and St. Agostino, which perhaps preexisted the *Constantinian era and were certainly connected with the burial of the bodies of the Capuan martyrs Priscus, Augustine and Felicita.

The city began a slow decline at the start of the 5th c. connected with *Alaric's incursions, and the only new construction of which we have evidence were religious buildings. Among these were a church dedicated to Mary (now S. Maria Maggiore) by Bishop *Symmachus (ca. 424–439), as attested by a mosaic which has now disappeared: Sanctae Mariae Symmachus episcopus. The same bishop probably also built the church of St. Prisco, on the site of an earlier, more modest memoria of the martyr. Symmachus should perhaps be identified with the bishop of the same name who, in 431, visited and celebrated the *Eucharist for the dying *Paulinus of Nola who, in his time, had eulogized the importance of the Capuan church in a letter to Bishop *Delphinus of Bordeaux (Ep. 14,4: CSEL 29,109). From after Symmachus until the end of the 6th c. there are gaps in the list of bishops, and we have no information on any significant building projects undertaken by them. Among certainly attested bishops are Tiburtius, who participated at the Roman synod of 465 (Mansi 7,965-966), Constantine, who subscribed the synod of 501 (Mansi 8,234) and Probinus (CIL X,4517).

A figure of undoubted importance among the bishops of the first decades of the 6th c. was *Germanus (d. 541: CIL X,4503), cited in two well-known episodes of the Dialogues of *Gregory the Great (4,50; 2,35): the apparition of the soul of the Roman deacon *Paschasius, freed by Germanus's prayers from expiatory sufferings, and the postmortem apparition of Germanus himself to his friend St. Benedict and to *Sabinus of Canosa. Germanus, of a noble Capuan family, was a member of the delegation that Pope *Hormisdas sent in 519 to the emperor *Justin I to settle the *Acacian schism. Archaeological research has shown intense building activity by Germanus, especially regarding the basilica where the *relics of St. Stephen were to be deposited upon the return of the mission to *Constantinople. This church (today replaced by the modern S. Maria delle Grazie) functioned as the cathedral from the end of the 7th to the middle of the 9th c., and again, for a brief period, during the Capuan schism of 879, when Pope John VIII (872–882) made it the see of one of the two contending bishops (Erchempert, hist. Langob. Beneu., 46). This is why the site of Germanus's basilica has more than once been identified as the location of the ancient Constantinian basilica, with a central-plan baptistery (the so-called Catabulum) situated nearby (though susceptible to other interpretations—perhaps thermal baths).

At the beginning of the *Longobard (Lombard) period, the correspondence of Gregory the Great attests the departure of the local clergy for the *Byzantine territories and the intervention of the pope himself, who consecrated the Roman subdeacon *Festus for the see of Capua. Coming into conflict with the clergy and later forced to abandon the see, Festus died at Rome in November 594, and Gregory appointed Bishop Gaudiosus of Nola as visitator (Ep. V,13-14: MGH I,293-294; CSEL 140,279-280). From the Gregorian correspondence we know that the activity of Festus's successor Basil, attested in 598–602, centered mainly on the *Byzantine area, in Sicily and at Rome, giving the impression that he was in exile (Ep. MGH IX,72, CSEL IX,73; X,4; XI,15; MGH XIII,4, CSEL XIII,2). Of Basil's two successors, Gaudiosus participated at the Roman council of 649 (Mansi 10,865-866); Decoroso, perhaps involved in the foundation of Montevergine, translated the relics of St. Rufinus and was one of the main protagonists of the evangelization of the southern Longobards (BHL I,2117). Even if Paul the Deacon still mentions Capua, with Naples and Salerno, as among the most important cities of Campania (hist. Lang. 2,17), between the 8th and 9th c. it was reduced to a series of inhabited areas around the major churches of the ancient city. The Chronicon Salernitanum indicates the presence at Capua in 787 of Charlemagne, there to claim *Frankish sovereignty over the Duchy of Benevento (chron. 11). In 841, following internal battles and the military intervention of Duke Anastasius of Naples, the Longobardian counts decided to transfer the citizens first to a more secure site, near Triflisco (Bellona), where they founded Sicopoli, in honor of the Beneventan prince Sico (d. 832), and later, in 856, to the site of the ancient river port of Casilinum, where the episcopal see was also soon moved.

The ancient city: DHGE 11,888-907; DACL 2,2064-2084; J. Heurgon, Recherche sur l'histoire, la religion et la civilisation de Capoue préromaine des origines à la deuxième guerre punique, BEFAR 154, Paris 1942; A. de Franciscis, Il santuario di Diana Tifatina, Naples 1957; Id., Capua, EAA 2, Rome 1959, 335-336; Capua preromana, 1-6, Florence 1965-1994; W. Johannowsky, Capua, EAA Supplemento 1, Rome 1970, 180-182; Id., Capua antica, Naples 1989; F. Cassola, La conquista romana. La regione fino al V secolo d.C.: Storia e civiltà della Campania. L'Evo antico, ed. G. Pugliese Carratelli, Naples 1991, 203-217; V. von Falkenhausen, La Campania tra Goti e Bizantini: Storia e civiltà della Campania. Il Medioevo, ed. G. Pugliese Carratelli, Naples 1992, 7-35; C. Albore Livadie, Capua, EAA Supplemento 2, Rome 1994, 875-879; Il Museo archeologico dell'Antica Capua, Naples 1995; L. Melillo Faenza, S. Maria Capua Vetere: Bollettino di Archeologia 22 (1998) 73-76; V. Sampaolo, Organizzazione dello spazio urbano e di quello extraurbano a Capua. La forma della città e del territorio: Atlante tematico di Topografia antica, Supplementi 5 (Atti dell'Incontro. S. Maria Capua Vetere, 27-28 novembre 1998), Rome 1999, 139-146; La Via Appia. Iniziative e interventi per la conoscenza e la valorizzazione da Roma a Capua, eds. L. Quilici-S. Quilici Gigli, Rome 2002; F. Guandalini, Il territorio ad ovest di Capua: Carta archeologica e ricerche in Campania, 2. Comuni di Brezza, Capua, S. Prisco, eds. L.Quilici-S. Quilici Gigli, Rome 2004, 11-66; V. Bellelli, La tomba "principesca" dei Quattordici Ponti nel contesto di Capua arcaica, Rome 2006; Lungo l'Appia. Scritti su Capua antica e dintorni, eds. M.L. Chirico-R. Cioffi-S. Quilici Gigli-G. Pignatelli, Naples 2009.

The Christian city: Erchempertus Beneuentanus, Historia Langobardorum Beneuentanorum, MGH, Scriptores rerum Langobardicarum et Italicarum, ed. G. Waitz, Berlin 1878, 231-264; Anonymous, Chronicon Salernitanum, ed. U. Westerberg, Stockholm 1956; G. Jannelli, Serie cronologica dei vescovi dell'antica Capua, Sicopoli, Capua Nuova e Berolasi e degli arcivescovi capuani, Caserta 1872; G. Chierici, Contributo allo studio dell'architettura paleocristiana nella Campania: Atti del III Congresso Internazionale di Archeologia cristiana (Ravenna, 25-30 settembre 1932) Rome 1934, 203-217; G. Chierici, L'elemento romano nell'architettura paleocristiana della Campania: Atti del III Congresso Nazionale di Studi Romani (Roma 22-27 aprile 1933), Bologna 1934, 207-214; A. De Franciscis, Cimitero presso la chiesa di S. Agostino in S. Maria Capua Vetere: RivAC XXV (1949), 133-145; N. Cilento, Le origini della signoria capuana nella Longobardia minore, Rome 1966; G. Bovini, Mosaici paleocristiani scomparsi di S. Maria Capua Vetere e di S. Prisco: Il contributo dell'arcidiocesi di Capua alla vita religiosa e culturale del Meridione (Atti del Convegno nazionale di studi storici promosso dalla Società di Storia Patria di Terra di Lavoro, Capua-Caserta-S.M. Capua Vetere 26-31 ottobre 1966), Rome 1967, 51-64; W. Johannowsky, Capua: Aggiornamento a É. Bertaux, L'Art dans l'Italie Méridionale, IV, ed. A. Prandi, Rome 1978, 149-151; M. Pagano-J. Rougetet, Il battistero della basilica costantiniana di Capua (cosiddetto "Catabulum"), MEFRA 96 (1984/2) 987-1016; A. De Franciscis, La basilica Apostolorum nell'antica Capua: Archivio Storico di Terra di Lavoro IX (1984-1985) 85-104; G. Otranto, Le origini del Cristianesimo nell'Italia Meridionale: Storia del Mezzogiorno, I,2, Il Mezzoggiorno Antico, Naples 1991, 277-322; G. Fiaccadori, Il Cristianesimo. Dalle Origini alle invasioni barbariche: Storia e civiltà della Campania. Il Medioevo ed. G. Pugliese Carratelli, Naples 1992, 145-170; D. Korol, Zum frühchristlichen Apsismosaik der Bischofskirche von Capua Vetere (SS. Stefano e Agata) und zu zwei weiteren Apsidenbildern dieser Stadt (S. Pietro in Corpo und S. Maria Maggiore): Boreas 17 (1994) 121-148; S. Palmieri, Duchi, principi e vescovi nella Longobardia meridionale: Longobardia e longobardi nell'Italia meridionale. Le istituzioni ecclesiastiche, Milan 1996, 43-99; Germano di Capua (+ 541 ca), ambasciatore ecumenico a Costantinopoli e modello di santità per il Cassinate: ricerche storiche sul personaggio, sulla fortuna del suo culto e su aspetti particolari del medioevo locale, ed. Filippo Carcione, Venafro 1999; S. De Caro, Dati recenti sul tardoantico nella Campania settentrionale: L'Italia meridionale in età tardo antica (Atti del XXXVIII Convegno di Studi sulla Magna Grecia, Taranto, 2-6 ottobre 1998) Naples 2000, 223-242; C. Martorelli, L'architettura dei battisteri di Napoli, Capua e Marcellianum: L'edificio battesimale in Italia. Aspetti e problemi (Atti dell'VIII Congresso Nazionale di Archeologia cristiana, Genova et al., 21-26 settembre 1998), I, Bordighera 2001, 1037-1056; L. Melillo Faenza, Capua. Indagini archeologiche in piazza S. Pietro: 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia (Atti del VII Congresso Nazionale di Archeologia cristiana, Cassino, 20-24 settembre 1993), II, ed. E. Russo, Cassino 2003, 632-637; N. Ciavolino, Capua. Indagini per il ritrovamento della catacomba di S. Agostino: 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, cit., 638-643; A. Aulisa, Capua nel Martirologio geronimiano: VetChr 41 (2004) 225-258; G. Bova, Sulle orme di Pietro. La basilica di S. Pietro Apostolo nell'antica Capua, Naples 2004; G. Cera, Alcune considerazioni sul cosiddetto Catabulum di Santa Maria Capua Vetere: Atta 17 (2008), 73-89; S. Episcopo, La cristianizzazione di Capua: nuove prospettive per una ricerca archeologica: La cristianizzazione in Italia tra Tardoantico ed Altomedioevo, eds. R.M. Bonacasa Carra-E. Vitale (Atti del IX Congresso di Archeologia Cristiana, Agrigento 20-25 novembre 2004), Palermo 2007, 1017-1040; Id., La cristianizzazione di Capua tra III e IX secolo: i riflessi nell'insediamento, i monumenti, i nuovi personaggi "eccellenti": Lungo l'Appia. Scritti su Capua antica e dintorni, eds. M.L. Chirico-R. Cioffi-S. Quilici Gigli-G. Pignatelli, Naples 2009, 83-92.

II. Council. In the winter of 391–392 a synod met at Capua of which the acts have not survived. The assembly, which seems to have aroused some interest, to the point of being called plenaria by the Excerpta of the Registrum ecclesiae Cartaginensis (can. 48: Mansi, 3,738; CCL 149,187), addressed and failed to provide real solutions to two questions: the *Melitian *schism that still divided the church of *Antioch, and the doctrine on Mary's virginity of *Bonosus of Serdica (d. ca. 390). It also reiterated the traditional condemnation of the repetition of *baptism and ordinations, and the prohibition of the transfer of bishops. The *council was convoked by *Siricius, who did not participate; *Ambrose of Milan played a large part in its preparation and decisions.

The Antiochene schism. The Antiochene schism after the death of *Paulinus (d. 388), adversary first of Meletius and then of *Flavian of Antioch, was perpetuated with the episcopal consecration of *Evagrius, done in opposition to the canons since the elect was consecrated without the agreement of other prelates of the ecclesiastical region and because he was directly designated by his predecessor. His opponent, Flavian, favored by neither *Rome nor *Alexandria, was elected during the Council of *Constantinople of 381. Prior to that, *Ambrose and the Council of *Aquileia (381) had proposed that the Eastern bishops meet to discuss the question and had advanced the proposal that, upon the death of one of the two contenders, the other would remain the only legitimate bishop. The Eastern bishops declined the invitation and responded by dryly inviting their colleagues to accept the decisions of Constantinople. In the Synod of Rome of the following year, the Western bishops reiterated their support for Paulinus and condemned those who consecrated Flavian (*Diodorus of Tarsus and *Acacius of Beroea), but neither *Gratian nor *Theodosius were interested in reopening the case and the Roman condemnations remained ineffective. Ten years later, Paulinus's death reopened the question, and the bishops meeting at Capua invited Flavian to present himself to the council, but the Antiochene prelate, enjoying the favor of Theodosius and the Eastern episcopate, excused himself from going to Capua for his poor health and the danger of traveling in winter. Nothing remained for the Western bishops but to make a general appeal to the parties for harmony and, through Ambrose, *Theophilus of Alexandria and the *Egyptian bishops were charged with reaching a solution, which the bishop of Rome would then have to ratify (Ambr., Ep. 70, 6-7: CSEL 82,5-6). Theophilus convoked the parties, but Flavian, strongly supported by Theodosius, did not appear. The schism—despite enduring dissent in the Antiochene community—was definitively concluded with the death of Evagrius, in 382, before he was able to consecrate a successor.

Bonosus of Serdica. The council also took up the doctrine of Bonosus of Serdica. We are informed of his doctrine by a synodal letter, written probably by Ambrose or by *Siricius (Ambr., Ep. 71: CSEL 82, 7-10). Bonosus denied the perpetual virginity of Mary, whom he claimed had other children besides Jesus. The synodal letter reveals that the Council of Capua had delegated the bishops finitimi (neighboring bishops), particularly the *Macedonians, and *Anisius of Thessalonica, Roman plenipotentiary with supermetropolitan powers over Illyricum, to judge the dispute between Bonosus and his accusers. Bonosus's condemnation is attested by the correspondence of *Innocent I, who on various occasions concerned himself with the validity of the ordinations conferred by the bishop of Serdica (PL 20,519-21; 531-535; 619).

The Antiochene schism: Mansi, 3,683-686; Concilia Africae, CCL 149,187; Ambrosius, Ep. 70, CSEL 82/3, 3-6; Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. 5,23, GCS 5, Berlin 1998, 321-324; C.H. Hefele, Histoire des Conciles, II,1, Paris 1908, 80-82; F. Hommes Dudden, The Life and Time of St. Ambrose, II, Oxford 1935, 398-403; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana, SEA 11, Rome 1975, 548-550; XVI Centenario del Concilio di Capua, 392-1992 (Atti del Convegno internazionale di studi mariologici, Capua 19-24 Maggio 1992), eds. G. Liccardo-F. Ruotolo-S. Tanzarella, Capua 1993; F. Trisoglio, Sant'Ambrogio e il Concilio di Capua: I concili della cristianità occidentale, secoli III-V (XXX Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Roma, 3-5 maggio 2001), SEA 78, Rome 2002, 471-483.

Bonosus of Serdica: Ambrosius, Ep. 71, CSEL 82/3, 7-10; DTC 2,1027-1031; J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes de l'Empire Romain, Paris 1918, 344-351; F. Cavallera, Le letter sur l'évêque Bonose est-elle de saint Sirice ou de saint Ambroise: BLE 21 (1920) 141-147; M. Zelzer, Prolegomena: CSEL 82/3 XXX-XXXI.

Rocco Ronzani

CARACALLA (186–217). Marcus Aurelius Severus Antoninus, emperor 212–217, son of *Septimius Severus and Julia Domna, nicknamed Caracalla from his Gallic dress. When his father died in *Britain in 211, Caracalla and his brother Geta succeeded him. The following year Caracalla had his brother and many of his supporters killed, so as to reign alone. To gain the support of the soldiers, he greatly increased their pay, placing an excessive burden on the state finances. He introduced Eastern cults into *Rome, esp. that of the Sun. He was relatively tolerant to the Christians: *Tertullian, writing in Caracalla's lifetime, hinted that he had a Christian nurse, saying that Caracalla was lacte christiano educatus (Ad Scap. IV, 5). In his reign we know only of the *martyrdom of a Bishop Alexander in Latium (AASS Sept., VI, 230-235; BS 1 [1961] 789-790), some hostile acts against the Christian inhabitants of *Osroene, including *Bardesanes, and the continuation of the persecution in *Africa by the proconsul Scapula, against whom Tertullian wrote Ad Scapulam, denouncing his violence and threatening him with God's punishment. Caracalla's most important legislation was the Constitutio Antoniniana of 212, which extended Roman citizenship to free inhabitants of the empire who did not yet have it. He began the construction of his baths at Rome, attempted military operations against the Germans and Parthians, and was assassinated in 217 near *Edessa by the prefect Opellius Macrinus.

P. Monceaux, Histoire littéraire de l'Afrique chrétienne, Paris 1901; M. Sordi, Il cristianesimo e Roma, Bologna 1965, 233-237; P. Keresztes, The Constitutio Antoniniana and the Persecutions under Caracalla: AJPh 90 (1970) 446-459; M. Sordi, I Cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan [2]1990; G. Jossa, I cristiani e l'impero romano da Tiberio a Marco Aurelio, Naples 1991; A. Ziolkowski, Storia di Roma, It. tr., Milan 2000.

L. Navarra

CARMEN ad Deum post conversionem et baptismum suum. Anonymous poem in 120 distichs on the theme of *conversion and *baptism, wrongly attributed to *Paulinus of Nola by Mai, who discovered it in the Vatican Library (Urb. lat. 533). It may be the work of a 5th-c. Gallic poet using the verse Sermo of *Orientius titled Commonitorium. Confession of human moral weakness in the face of God's perfection (vv. 49-58; 81-89) is followed by continual theological references to the mystery of the *Trinity (vv. 197-240) (Sancte Deus, Lucis lumen . . .). The work praises God's greatness in the creation of the world and in the intimate life of the spirit, as seen in the *penitence of the convert and the joy of divine forgiveness.

CPL 1469; CPPM 2,1376; PLS 3,1129-34; CSEL 30 (1894) 350-356, carmen III; M.G. Bianco, La vita alla luce della sapienza. Il carme anonimo Sancte Deus lucis lumen concordia rerum (intr., critical text, tr. and commentary), Rome 1990.

L. Dattrino

CARMEN ad Flavium Felicem de resurrectione mortuorum (incipit: Qui[s] mihi ruricolas optabit). 406-hexameter poem by an unknown author, seemingly in the 5th c. in *Africa; anciently attributed to *Tertullian and *Cyprian, then to *Verecundus of Junca on the basis of *Isidore of Seville (De vir. ill. 7). Miltner-Zurunic points out similarities with the work of the poet *Dracontius, also an *African, while for Dando the carmen could be by *Avitus of Vienne. If the recipient of the carmen was the African poet who lived under the *Vandal king Thrasamund, then it must be dated ca. 500 (see PLRE II, 462).

After an introductory description of nature and a digression describing the work of creation and the initial events of the human race, so that people may poenas aeternas evadere flammae (v. 40), the author colorfully and fully describes the last things: the final resurrection and God's judgment.

CPL 869, 1463; CPPM II, A n. 545; PL 2, 1147-1156; PL 4, 1055-1060; CSEL 3,3, 308-325; J.H. Waszink, Bonn 1947; H. Miltner-Zurnic, De carmine ad Flavium Felicem misso, quod inscribitur De resurrectione mortuorum: WS 48 (1930) 82-97; M. Dando, Alcimus Avitus (c. 450–c. 518) as the author of the De resurrectione mortuorum . . . : CM 26 (1965) 259-266; J.H. Waszink, Alcune osservazioni sul testo del Carmen de resurrectione mortuorum et de iudicio Domini: SicGymn 29 (1976) 449-459; Id., Einige Bemerkungen über den Text des Carmen de resurrectione mortuorum et de iudicio domini, in Fest. A. Stuiber 1982, 79-85; S. Isetta, Carmen ad Flavium Felicem. Problemi di attribuzione e reminiscenze classiche: VetChr 20 (1983) 111-140.

A. Di Berardino

CARMEN ad quendam senatorem (late 4th c.?). The anonymous composition—wrongly attributed to *Cyprian and published among his spurious works—is an invective in 85 hexameters, directed at a senator with a good literary and philosopical education (vv. 3-4: Quia carmina semper amasti / carmine respondens properavi scribere versus; and v. 48: Philosophum fingis). The Christian ex-consul had embraced the religion of the Great Mother. With a series of pressing interrogationes (rhetorical device frequently used in antipagan pièces), the poet asks the *apostate how is it possible that an ex-consul could be a priest of Isis without covering himself in shame. The god's effeminate priests, who walked the streets of *Rome wagging their hips (v. 11-12: per urbem leniter incedunt), did not escape the poet's sarcasm: using the motifs of contemporary Roman satire against the Eastern cults, he stigmatized the most repugnant aspects of their life. The poet exhorts the apostate to mend his ways and to correct his sin by faith (v. 83: Corrige delictum fidamine; fidamine is a neologism, as is vericolae in v. 43).

CPL 1432; CPPM 543, 1623, 2163.

Editions: PL 2, 1163-1166; CSEL 3/3 (1871) 302-305; CSEL 23 (1891) 227-230; F. Buecheler - A. Riese, Anthologia Latina 1, 2, Leipzig 1906, n. 689b (ed. anast.: Amsterdam 1972, 163-165).

Studies: Patrologia III, 299-300; RAC, Supp. Lief. 10, 2003, 319ff.; H. Bloch, La rinascita pagana in Occidente alla fine del secolo IV, in A. Momigliano (ed.), Il conflitto tra paganesimo e cristianesimo nel IV secolo, Turin 31975, 199-224; L. Vidman, Isis und Sarapis, in Die orientalischen Religionen im Römerreich, Leiden 1981, 96-120; J. Fontaine, Naissance de la poésie dans l'Occident chrétien, Paris 1981, 216-217; R.B. Begley, The Carmen ad quendam senatorem: Date, Milieu, and Tradition, diss. dact., Chapel Hill 1984; A. Bartalucci, L'antica esegesi virgiliana e una citazione dell'Eneide in un carme anonimo cristiano: qualche ipotesi sulla problematica del carme Ad senatorem quendam: Studi classici and orientali 42 (1992) 127-145; M. Cutino, Sul rapporto fra il cosiddetto Poema ultimum (CSEL 30 Hartel) e il Carmen ad senatorem (CSEL 23 Peiper): Emerita 67 (1999) 46-64; W. Wischmeyer, Bemerkungen und Beobachtungen zu Ps. Cyprian, Carmen ad quendam senatorem, in Vielseitigkeit des AT, Frankfurt a.M. 1999, 335-343; M. Corsano, Un incontro problematico: cristiani e pagani in tre carmi adespoti: Orpheus 21 (2000) 26-43.

A.V. Nazzaro

CARMEN adversus marcionitas. A composition of 1302 verses in five books, wrongly attributed to *Tertullian. The subject is in the title: "Against the followers of *Marcion." Book I speaks of the origin of Marcion's doctrine; books II and III confirm the relationship between the OT and NT; books IV and V expound the theories of the Marcionites. The author is completely unknown. Müller dates it before the *Council of *Nicaea (Untersuch. z. Carmen adv. Marc.). K. Holl dates it between 475–525, placing the author in *Gaul or *Africa, not *Italy or *Spain (Gesamm. Aufsätze, 12-25). R. Willems dates it not before the 5th c. (Tertulliani opera, 1420). Frede dates it after *Commodian, but not before the 5th c., probably in Gaul, following *Isidore of Seville in attributing it to a certain Victorinus (De viris ill. 8: PL 83, 1088A). The fact that Tertullian wrote a work against Marcion explains the false attribution of the carmen.

CPL 36; CPPM 2, 1621a and 2, 1218; PL 2, 1110-1146; RAC 5, 1016-1017; R. Willems CCL 2 (1954) 1421-1454. Eng. tr.: S. Thelwall, ANL 18, 318-384; ANF 4, 102-165. K. Holl, Gesammelte Aufsätze 3 (1928) 13-53; M. Müller, Untersuch. zum "Carmen adv. Marcionem," Ochsenfurt 1936; C. Rambaux, Un "locus non desperatus": Carmen adv. Marcionem, IV, 105: REAug 18 (1972) 43-45; A. Font Jaume, Studia tertullianea: el Carmen adv. Marcionem, Barcelona 1986; K. Pollmann, Das Carmen adversus Marcionitas. Einleitung, Text, Übersetzung und Kommentar, Göttingen 1991; C. Micaelli, "Carmen adversus Marcionitas": ispirazione biblica e sua ripresa nei centoni "De lege" e "De nativitate," in Poesia tardoantica e medievale, ed. M. Salvadore, Alexandria 2001, 171-198; F. Stella, Poesia e Teologia. L'Occidente tra IV e VIII secolo, Milan 2001, 139-145.

L. Dattrino

CARMEN adversus paganos. Datable between 376, the year of the death of Quintus Aurelius *Symmachus's father, and 409, the year of the Pompeianus's murder, this anonymous composition, handed down on the last three pages of the codex Par. Lat. 8084, a 6th-c. manuscript of *Prudentius, is an invective, in 122 hexameters, against senators who worship the gods of the ancient religion (vv. 1-24) and, in particular, against a praefectus urbis, variously identified with Virius Nicomachus Flavianus (Morel, De Rossi, Mommsen, Musso), Vettius Agorius Praetextatus (Ellis, Moricca, Cracco Ruggini, Fontaine, Puglisi, Vera, Bartalucci), Gabinius Barbarus Pompeianus (Manganaro) and Symmachus's father (Mazzarino) (vv. 25-122). In the style of Christian *apologetic, the Christian poet derides the *pagans for their obscene love stories: Jove's marriage to his sister Juno; Venus's love for Adonis; Apollo's lying oracle; Jove's transformation into a swan, a shower of gold and a bull; the expulsion of Saturn; Venus's lament over the dead Adonis. The fanatical prefect, who for three months had subjected *Rome to purification rites, paid for his misdeeds with a slow death. An initiate in many rites (of Bacchus, Serapis, Cybele, Saturn, Bellona) and a believer in nymphs, satyrs and Pan, the deceased was held responsible for the apostasy of Christian senators through the scandalous offer of honors and positions. The poet concludes with an insulting invitation to the prefect's wife to stop weeping over her husband suffering from dropsy, whom she hoped would be cured by the Latian Jupiter. The variegated picture of *paganism with its rites and myths, marked by an absolute lack of charity on the part of the Christian author toward the deceased, makes the short poem, which on many points is obscure due to the density of the satirical expression, a historical document of great importance.

CPL 1431; CPPM 1584.

Editions: PLS I, 780; Th. Mommsen, Hermes 4 (1870) 350-363; F. Bücheler - A. Riese, Anthologia Latina, Leipzig 1894, I, 1 n. 4 (ed. anast.: Amsterdam 1973, 20-24); G. Manganaro, Il poemetto anonimo Contra paganos. Testo, traduzione e commento: Nuovo Didaskaleion 11 (1961) 23-45; F. Roncoroni, Carmen Codicis Parisini 8084: RSLR 8 (1972) 58-79; "Contro i Pagani." Carmen cod.: Paris. Lat. 8084. Intr., testo critico, tr. e commento di A. Bartalucci, Pisa 1998 (with an exhaustive bibliography).

Studies: L. Cracco Ruggini, Il paganesimo romano tra religione e politica (384-394 d.C.): per una reinterpretazione del "Carmen contra Paganos," Rome 1979; B. Adamik, Das sog. Carmen contra paganos: Acta Antiqua Acad. Sc. Hungariae 368 (1995) 185-233; R. Romano, L'ultimo pagano. Flaviano nello specchio del "Carmen contra paganos," Palermo 1998; A. Fraschetti, La Conversione. Da Roma pagana a Roma cristiana, Bari 1999, 70-74; M. Corsano, Un incontro problematico: cristiani e pagani in tre carmi adespoti: Orpheus 21 (2000) 26-43.

A.V. Nazzaro

CARMEN de ingratis (429–430). In this polemical-doctrinal poem, *Prosper of Aquitaine (d. after 455) deals in verse with the subject of the theology of *grace, against the new theory of the semi-*Pelagians treated in the Epistula ad Rufinum (426–427). The carmen consists of 1002 hexameters, preceded by a preface of 5 elegiac distichs, which contain the propositio and an appeal to the reader to obtain from the reading of the poem a sure and convinced doctrine of grace, and by an introduction of 11 hexameters, in which the poet declares himself to be moved by love for the church and by the need to oppose the spread of the resurrected Pelagian *heresy. The title Περὶ ἀχαρίστων, id est de ingratis, attested by the MSS, was probably given by the author himself (along the lines of *Prudentius), but in the preface he translates the Greek expression: adversum ingratos falsa et virtute superbos / centenis decies versibus excolui (to oppose the enemies of grace and men proud in their false virtues/I have composed a thousand verses) (vv. 3-4). The term ingrates, to be understood both as "ungrateful" and "those who lack grace," designates the Pelagians and their rejection of God's prevenient grace.

The poem, characterized throughout by an insistent religious intolerance, is divided into four parts. In the first (vv. 1-225), after quickly outlining the history of Pelagianism, condemned by unanimous decrees of the church beginning with the see of *Rome (vv. 39-42: pestem subeuntem prima recidit / sedes Rome Petri, quae pastoralis honoris / facta caput mundi, quidquid non possidet armis / religion tenet [when the pestilence appeared it was cut off first/ by Rome, the seat of Peter/who was honored as chief among the pastoral offices of the whole world; what she does not possess by force of arms/she holds with her religious authority]), the poet identifies this heresy with semi-Pelagianism, whose followers demand, as an act of justice, either condemnation or admission into the church. In the other three parts the poet expounds semi-Pelagian doctrine, dwelling on its similarities and differences with Pelagianism. In this versification of a theological controversy, influenced by the works of *Augustine, to whom he offers enthusiastic praise (vv. 92ff.), Prosper demonstrates a good knowledge of *pagan poetry (Virgil, but also Lucretius and Ovid).

Editions: PL 51, 91-148; Ch.T. Huegelmeyer, Washington 1962 (text, Eng. tr. and comm.).

Studies: M. Manitius, Geschichte der christlich-lateinischen Poesie bis zur Mitte des 8. Jahrhunderts, Stuttgart 1891, 203-210; S. Colombo, La poesia cristiana antica. Parte I. La poesia latina, Rome 1910, 164-165; A.V. Nazzaro, Prospero di Aquitania: Enc. Virg. IV, Rome 1988, 327; C. Braidotti, Prefazioni in distici elegiaci, in G. Catanzaro - F. Santucci, La poesia cristiana latina in distici elegiaci, Assisi 1993, 76-78.

A.V. Nazzaro

CARMEN de passione Domini. Short poem of 80 Latin hexameters in which Christ crucified speaks to human beings, recalling how much he has done for them—becoming incarnate, working, suffering, dying on the cross—and exhorts them to profit from his saving action. Ignatius first attributed it to *Lactantius in the Aldine edition of his works (1515); Heumann (1729) considered it much later. Manitius subsequently assigned it, if not to Lactantius himself, at least to some unidentifiable early Christian poet. The most likely solution seems to be that of S. Brandt, who firmly denies Lactantius's authorship; he puts it between 1495 and 1500 and makes its author an anonymous Italian versifier who, at about that time, edited a short miscellany of Latin sacred poetry (opusculum preserved in the Munich Academy Library, which had escaped previous scholars). The compiler, copying models of the poets in the collection (Philomusus, Cantalicius, Zavenzonius) and also borrowing from Virgil, Prudentius, Orientius, Paulinus of Périgueux and Venantius Fortunatus, clumsily composed the carmen and included it in the collection.

CPL 1457; CPPM II/A n. 546; PL 7, 283-286; CSEL 27, I, 148-151; A. Roncoroni, Sul De passione Domini pseudolattanziano: VChr 29 (1975) 208-221.

L. Navarra

CARMEN de Providentia. Reflecting on the carnage wrought by the barbarian invasions at the start of the 5th c., people asked: "But what have innocent boys done, what have girls done, who committed no evil during their short life? Why were God's temples allowed to be ravaged by fire? The honor of consecrated chastity did not protect the virgins, nor sentimental love the widows" (vv. 43-48). In 415–416, when the barbarians had occupied the country for ten years, the poet of the Carmen de Providentia, author of other works, tried to answer these anguished questions in 46 elegiac distichs and 876 hexameters (the long reply). He used Scripture widely to show that God is the wise creator of the world and of humanity. By the devil's temptation, human beings have fallen into sin, but there have always been just people. God has always cared for the world and for people and has written his law in their hearts. Christ became incarnate, and with his help one can easily observe God's law; human beings enjoy free will, so that all suffer the same temptations and difficulties; but whereas for the good, misfortune is the crown of virtue, for the wicked it is a punishment. The charge of *Pelagianism has weighed on this important poetic composition, which sought to give theological answers to situations experienced by its contemporaries. Some scholars have erroneously attributed it to *Prosper of Aquitaine.

CPL 532; PL 51, 617-638; M.P. McHugh, Washington 1964 (critical ed. with Eng. tr.); L. Valentin, Saint Prosper d'Aquitaine, Toulouse-Paris 1900; C. Tibiletti, Note sulla teologia del "Carmen de providentia Dei": Augustinianum 30 (1990) 453-476; J.F. Drinkwater - Hugh Elton (eds.), Fifth-Century Gaul: Crisis of Identity?, Cambridge 1992, 101-106; W.E. Klingshirn, The Making of a Christian Community in Late Antique Gaul, Cambridge 1994.

A. Di Berardino

CARMEN de synodo Ticinensi. A rhythmic composition passed down by two 7th-8th-c. witnesses of Bobbio, Ambrosianus C 105 inf. and Ambrosianus

E 147 sup., the latter textually superior to the former and thus preferred by editors (on the codices, see eds. Bethmann, 189, and Strecker, 728; CLA, I,26b; CLA, III,323b). The work, commissioned by the *Longobard (Lombard) King Cunipert (680–700), son of the Catholic Perctarit of the Bavarian branch of the descendants of the Lethings, celebrates the synod held at Pavia in 698 which ended the *schism of the *Three Chapters, a schism promoted for political reasons by the Longobards themselves, separating some churches of N *Italy from *Rome for more than a century and a half. The carmen does not limit itself to reviewing the facts of the schism and its resolution but is also a glorification of the dynasty, meant to reinforce its legitimacy internally, marked by various movements of revolt, and to promote a royal ideology in imitation of *Byzantine imperial dignity. The composition is also the only testimony of the abandonment of *Arianism by the Longobards, which took place under Aribert I, Cunipert's grandfather, unmentioned by Paul the Deacon, who gives us little information (including about the end of the Three Chapters schism), which does not always agree with the poem's account. Affinities have been highlighted between the text and the inscription dedicated to the three sovereigns Aribert, Perctarit and Cunipert for their common tomb in S. Salvatore at Pavia (MGH, Poëtae latini aevi Karolini, 4,2, 726). B. Oltrocchi and others maintain that the author of the carmen was the grammarian Felix, uncle of Flavian, Pavesian preceptor of Paul the Deacon, an attribution accepted until O. Holder-Egger who, preferring to draw the author's name from the double acrostic formed by the initial letters of the verses, proposes the author as one Stefanus m(a)g(ister). P. Lehmann, however, without attributing a value to the final strophe beginning with the letter G, resolved the acrostic as Stefanus m(onachus), almost necessarilly implying a changing of the place of composition from Pavia to the nearby monastery of Bobbio.

CPL 1540; D. Schaller -E. Könsgen, Initia carminum Latinorum saeculo undecimo antiquiorum, Göttingen 1977, nr. 15726; B. Oltrocchi, Ecclesiae Mediolanensis historia ligustica in Romanam, Gothicam, Langobardicam tribus libris distribuita . . ., II, Mediolani 1795, 534-536, 579-580, 625-627; S. Bofisio, Concilia Papiensia, Papiae 1852, 1-2; C. Troja, Codice diplomatico longobardo dal DLXVIII al DCCLXXIV, vol. 3, Naples 1853, 330, 353, 363; A. Joppi, Ritmo o cantilena barbarica in elogio dei re longobardi Ariberto I, Bertarido e Cuniberto, colla notizia dei sinodi di Pavia e di Roma nei quali avvenne la riunione della chiesa scismatica di Aquileia alla comunione della chiesa romana: Archeografo Triestino, Nuova serie, 1 (1869-1870) 85-87; A. Reifferscheid, Sitzungsberidite der Wiener Akad., 1871; Carmen de synodo Ticinensi, ed. L. Bethmann, MGH, Scriptores rerum Langobardicarum et Italicarum saec. VI-IX, Hannoverae 1878, 189-191; Rythmus de synodo Ticinensi, ed. K. Strecker, MGH, Poëtae latini aevi Karolini, 4,2, Berolini 1881, 728-731; W. Meyer, Die Spaltung des Patriarchats Aquileja, Berlin 1898, 4-9; on the composition's meter: Id., Gesammelte Abhandlungen zur mittellateinischen Rythmik, I, Berlin 1905, 212; G. Ferrara, Il Carmen de Synodo Ticinensi. Contributo alla storia della ritmica latina: Rendiconti del Regio Istituto Lombardo di Scienze e Lettee, Ser. II, vol. 37 (1904) 500-518; M. Manitius, I, 199-200; O. Bertolini, I papi e le relazioni politiche di Roma con i Ducati longobardi di Spoleto e Benevento: RSCI 8 (1954) 1-22; D. Norberg, Introduction à l'étude de la versification latine médiévale, Stockholm 1958, 111-112; P. Lehmann, Stefanus magister?: Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 14 (1958) 469-471; G.P. Bognetti, S. Maria Foris Portas e la Storia Religiosa dei Longobardi: L'età longobarda, II, Milan 1966, 458-474; F. Ermini, Storia della letteratura latina medievale, Spoleto 1960, 557-559; P. Bertolini, Cuniperto: DBI, 31, 384-388; P. Radiciotti, Flaviano: DBI, 48, Rome 1997, 295-296; M. Kamptner, Scripsi per prosa (Stephanus, Rhythmus de Synodo Ticinensi, MGH Poet. IV/2, pp. 728-731): Poesia dell'alto medioevo europeo: manoscritti, lingua e musica dei ritmi latini. Poetry of Early Medieval Europe: Manuscripts, Language and Music of the Latin Rhythmical Texts, ed. F. Stella, Florence 2000, 187-195; F. De Rubeis, Le epigrafi dei re longobardi: Poesia dell'alto medioevo europeo, cit., 223-240, here 227-228; Id., La tradizione epigrafica in Paolo Diacono: Paolo Diacono. Uno scrittore tra tradizione longobarda e rinnovamento carolingio, ed. P. Chiesa, Udine 2000, 139-162., here 148; F. Lo Monaco, Stefanus. Rythmus de synodo Ticinensi: La trasmissione dei testi latini del medioevo. Mediaeval Latin Texts and Their Transmission, Te.Tra., I, eds. P. Chiesa-L. Castaldi, Florence 2004, 411-414; B. Dumézil, Les Racines chrétiennes de l'Europe. Conversion et liberté dans les royaumes barbares, v^{e}-viii^{e} siècles, Paris 2005, 346-349.

Rocco Ronzani

CARMEN FIGURATUM. The carmen figuratum is an extremely artificial poetic form, the characteristic of which is to include a visual aspect of the text; the effect of this "visual" poetry is obtained either because the written poem (sometimes polymetric) is in the shape of an image, or because the individual letters, using different colors, depict a geometrical design, symbolic letters or an object (the so-called carmina cancellata) and in this way convey a metatext. Letters highlighted in this way, when read continuously, like so-called versus intexti, also constitute a paratextual statement (which usually provides a guide to the reading): to figure out the relation of its contents with the main text is a challenge for the reader. "Technopaegnia" of this type in the form of poems which reproduce a shape were first produced in the *Hellenistic period (Simmias of Rhodes, Theocritus, Dosiades of Crete: Anth. Pal. 15,21; 22; 24-27); among the Romans this tradition must have been inherited, ca. 100 BC, from Laevius, who composed a figurative poem modeled on Simmias (Pterygium Phoenicis: fr. 22 Morel). Thanks to the most important ancient representative of the genre, Publilius Optatianus Porphyrius (4th c.), the form of the carmen cancellatum was introduced; it exercised a lasting influence on the technopaegnia of Late Antiquity, the Middle Ages and the Early Modern period. In the Merovingian period *Venantius Fortunatus (6th c.) introduced it and used it from then on also in combination with acrostics and telestichs, as the bearer of a resolutely Christian message; his carmina cancellata, composed in honor of a fragment of the *cross, usually form the figure of the cross. The cross remains the main motif to be represented until beyond the Late Antique period: in the early 9th c. Rabanus Maurus composed 28 figurative poems (De laudibus sanctae crucis), in which he used various techniques for depicting a cross. With Alcuin, who puts himself in conscious continuity with Optatianus, Giuseppe Scotus, Theodulf of Orléans and Paul the Deacon, the carmen figuratum of the Carolingian era experienced in a renewed form a link with *panegyric, as was indicated by Optatianus.

B. Bowler, The Word as Image, London 1970; G. Pozzi, La parola dipinta, Milan 1981; U. Ernst, Zahl und Maß in den Figurengedichten der Antike und des Frühmittelalters. Beobachtungen zur Entwicklung tektonischer Bauformen, in Mensura. Maß, Zahl, Zahlensymbolik im Mittelalter, ed. A. Zimmermann, Berlin - New York 1984 (Miscellanea Mediaevalia 16, 2), 310-332; J. Adler - U. Ernst, Text als Figur: visuelle Poesie von der Antike bis zur Moderne (Ausstellung im Zeughaus der Herzog-August-Bibliothek vom 1. September 1987 bis 23. Mai 1988), Weinheim [2]1988; G. Polara, Le parole nella pagina: grafica e contenuti nei carmi figurati latini: VetChr 28 (1991) 291-336; U. Ernst, Carmen Figuratum. Geschichte des Figurengedichts von den antiken Ursprüngen bis zum Ausgang des Mittelalters, Cologne - Weimar - Vienna 1991; Id., Permutation als Prinzip in der Lyrik: Poetica 24 (1992) 225-267.

D. Weber

CARPOCRATES (2nd c.). *Irenaeus informs us of Carpocrates's doctrine but tells us nothing about his life; *Clement of Alexandria informs us not so much about him as about his son Epiphanes, and says that Carpocrates was an Alexandrian, while his wife, Alexandria, was from Cephalonia. Carpocrates was active in the 1st half of the 2nd c. From Irenaeus we learn that the *heresy of the Carpocratians also spread at Rome at the time of *Anicetus (mid-2nd c., by a certain *Marcellina). According to Irenaeus, Carpocrates taught that the world was created by inferior angels; above them is the ungenerated God, to whom souls, held prisoner by the archons of the world, tend to return. To help souls escape the archons, God sent a power, Jesus, different from other men only in that he has a more just soul. Souls succeed in freeing themselves from slavery to the body only after a series of transmigrations into other bodies, which ends when the soul has undergone every kind of experience, in this way attaining freedom. A consequence of this theory is the conviction that there are no good or bad actions as such, but they only appear so in human eyes: salvation in fact depends on faith and love. Irenaeus also hints at the use of *magic arts, charms and magic potions by the Carpocratians. Given that what Clement tells us of Epiphanes is not particularly *gnostic in character, it may be that Irenaeus's information reflects later developments in the Carpocratian sect rather than the thought of Carpocrates himself.

Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. I, 25; Clement Al., Strom. III, 5-9; Tertullian, De Anima 23-35; Hippolytus, Ref. VII, 32; Eusebius, HE IV, 7,9; Origen, C. Cel. V, 62; Epiphanius, Pan. 27; H. Liboron, Die Karpokratianische Gnosis, Leipzig 1938; H. Kraft, Gab es einen Gnostiker Karpokrates: TZ 8 (1952) 434-443; S. Pétrement, Le Dieu separé. Les origines du gnosticisme, Paris 1984, 474ff.; P. Lampe, Karpokratianer, in Id., Die stadtrömischen Christen in den ersten beiden Jahrhunderten: Untersuchungen zur Sozialgeschichte, Tübingen 1987, 269-270.

A. Monaci Castagno

CARPOPHORUS, M. AURELIUS (2nd-3rd c.). A Christian freed from *Commodus's household. The future Pope *Callistus was his slave. *Hippolytus's account (Philos. IX, 2,12), unfavorable to Callistus, is that Carpophorus had entrusted Callistus with the running of a bank: Callistus went bankrupt and Carpophorus condemned him to the treadmill, but later freed him. When Callistus disturbed a *synagogue meeting and was taken before the prefect, Carpophorus tried to save him from being condemned as a Christian.

E. Prinzivalli, s.v. Callisto I, santo: Epapi I, 237-246.

E. Prinzivalli

CARTERIUS (late 4th c.). One of the 12 bishops present—the 11th signatory—at the 1st Council of *Saragossa (380), held against the *Priscillianists at the time of Pope *Damasus; his see is unknown. No other Bishop Carterius is known after that council. He may be the Carterius mentioned by *Jerome in 397 (Ep. 69, ad Oceanum) and by *Braulio of Saragossa in 651 (Ep. 44, ad Fructuosum). According to Madoz—but not Gams—Jerome and Braulio allude to the same person. According to Braulio, Carterius was from *Gallaecia. He wrote a treatise (lost) against *Helvidius and *Jovinian.

Gams, Die Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, II/1, Regensburg 1864 (Graz 1956), 471; J. Madoz, Epistolario de S. Braulio de Zaragoza, Madrid 1941, 205; J. Vives, Concilios visigóticos e hispano-romanos, Barcelona - Madrid 1963, 16; L. Riesco Terrero, Epistolario de San Braulio: Anal. Univ. Hisp. 31, Seville 1975, 180, 182; M. Alamo, Carterius: DHGE 11, 1147; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura española, Madrid 1997, II, 25-26.

E. Romero Pose

CARTHAGE

I. History - II. Christian origins and antiquity - III. Christian topography - IV. Bishops - V. Councils.

Carthage is situated at the end of an irregular peninsula, between the sea and two salt lakes. The city is centered on the hill of Byrsa (63 m), extending around it in a vast quadrilateral ca. 1200-1300 m in length, bounded by the Julian enclosure.

In ca. 425 the city was enclosed by a semicircular wall (whose exact course is unknown), on the side overlooking the sea on the NE and SW.

I. History. Kart-hadschat, the "new city" of the Phoenicians, was founded in ca. 814 BC. Destroyed by Scipio Africanus in 146, rebuilt by Caesar and *Augustus, taken by surprise by *Genseric 19 October 439, reconquered by *Belisarius in 534, it fell into the hands of Hassan Ibn an-Nu'man, who destroyed it in 698. A small Christian community under a bishop survived until the arrival of the Almohads (12th c.). The French king St. Louis camped outside the city from 7 July to 25 August 1270, the day of his death.

II. Christian origins and antiquity. We do not know when Christianity took root at Carthage: the first Christians we meet, in 180, were not from Carthage but from Scilli, an unidentifiable place in Proconsular Africa. In 203, *Perpetua and her companions seem to have been from Carthage or nearby, not from Thuburbo Minus, as has been said: the deacons Tertius and Pomponius, the Bishop *Optatus and the priest Aspasius appear in their passion account. The first known African writer, *Tertullian, published his treatises at Carthage roughly between 197 and 217. Cyprian was bishop 249–258, during the persecutions of *Decius and *Valerian, and was a victim of the latter; he presided over seven councils, ruling on the question of the lapsi (see *lapsed, problem of the) in 251, on the *baptism of *heretics in 256. Donatism started here in ca. 313, linked to the question of the traditores of *Diocletian's persecution (304). It was settled in 411 by a conference-debate between *Catholics and Donatists. *Augustine studied and taught at Carthage (371–383) and, as a bishop, returned nearly every year (395–430). With the *Vandal invasion, *Arianism took root, with endemic persecution. The *Byzantine conquest drew Carthage into the turmoil of the *christological controversies. Muslim rule not only despoiled the city of its monuments, to the benefit of Tunis, but also led to the disappearance of Christianity.

III. Christian topography. Our knowledge of Carthage's Christian topography comes from literary sources and primarily concerns *cemeteries, which in the 4th c. were largely incorporated into the urban organization of the Carthaginian church. The division of the city into seven ecclesiastical regions, each seemingly with its own parish church, doubtless goes back to the same era. The following catalog lists churches alphabetically, Catholic first, then non-Catholic. After each proper name, the term basilica should be understood, unless accompanied by another term.

Catholic. Agilaei: Conc. Carth. 525; Fulg. Ferr., V. Fulg. 56; Mansi 8, 636. Bigua monasterium: Pass. 7 bb. mm. Caps. 16. Celerinae: Aug., En. Ps. 99; Serm. 48, 174. Cypriani in Mappalibus: A. Cypr. 5, 6; Aug., Denis 11, 22; En. Ps. 32, 35; Serm. 311, 313, 330; Victor of Vita, Hist. pers. Afr. prov. 1, 16. Cypriani mensa in agro Sexti: A. Cypr. 5, 2; Aug., Denis 14, 15; En. Ps. 38, 80; Serm. 8, 13, 49, 114, 131, 154, 169, 305, 309, 310, 313; Frangip. 1, 5; Morin 15; Victor of Vita, Hist. pers. 1, 16; Cypriani memoria: Aug., Conf. 5, 8; Procop., Bell. vand. 1, 21, 17-18. Fausti: Sent. epp. 31; Conc. Carth. 418, 419; Aug., In Jo. ev. tr. 51; Serm. 23, 101, 134, 261; Victor of Vita, Hist. pers. 1, 25; 2, 18,48; 3, 24. Gratiani: Aug., Serm. 156. Honoriana: Aug., Serm. 163; Ps.-Prosp. Aq., Lib. de prom. Dei 3, 38, 44. Iuliani Antioc.: Leont., V. Greg. Agrig. Maiorum: Aug., Morin 12; Serm. 16A, 34, 165, 294; CIL VIII 25038. Monasterium ad pontum Mandracium: Proc., Aedif. VI, 5,2. Novarum: Sent. epp. 30; Opt. of Mil., 1, 19; Aug., Brev. coll. III, 25,13; Denis 61; Guelf. 30; Serm. 14, 37; Victor of Vita, Hist. pers. 1, 9, 25. Pauli Reg. VI: Aug., Serm. 119. Petri, Reg. III: Aug., Serm. 15. Reg. II: PL 43, 814. Scillitanorum: Aug., Serm. 48, 155. Stephani monasterium: Ps.-Prosp. Aq., Lib. de prom. Dei 6. Tertull.: Sent. epp. 16. Tricliarum: Aug., Serm. 29, 53. Non-Catholic. Tertullianistarum (church of the followers of Tertullian): Aug., Haer. 86. Theoprepia (main Donatist church): Aug., Ep. 139. Thrasamundi (469–523, Vandal Arian church): Fel., Anthol. lat. 1, 213, vv. 5-6. Only two of these churches have been identified by excavation: the basilica Maiorum at Mcidfa, thanks to the inscription commemorating the martyrs Perpetua and companions; and the monasterium S. Stephani, E of the Theodosian wall. The question of the location of St. *Cyprian's basilicas remains open: C. Lepelley, Les Cités de l'Afrique Romaine au Bas-Empire, II: Notices d'Histoire municipale, Paris 1981, 11-53; H. Hurst, Cartagine, la nuova Alessandria, in A. Momigliano - A. Sciavone (eds.), Storia di Roma. 3. L'età Tardo Antica, II, I luoghi e le culture, Turin 1993, 327-337; J.B. Rives, Religion and Authority in Roman Carthage from Augustus to Constantine, Oxford 1995; Institut National d'Archéologie et d'art Tunisie and British Academy Carthage Committee, v. 1/1: Excavations at Carthage: The British Mission, Sheffield 1984; LTK³ 5, 1271-1275; N. Duval, L'état actuel des recherches archéologiques sur Carthage chrétienne (études d'archéologie chrétienne nordafricaine, XXV): Ant Tard 5 (1997) 309-350; L. Ennabli, Carthage. Une métropole chrétienne du IVᵉ siècle à la fin du VII[e] siècle (Études africaines), Paris 1997.

IV. Bishops. List of known bishops: 1. Optatus (?) (203). 2. *Agrippinus (ca. 220). 3. Donatus (before 249). 4. Cyprian (249–258). 5. *Lucian (?) (after 259). 6-7. *Carpophorus and Cyrus (no date). 8. *Mensurius (303–311). 9. *Caecilian (311). 10. *Gratus (342–345/348). 11. *Restitutus (ca. 350). 12. Genetlius (ca. 390). 13. *Aurelius (ca. 392–427). 14. Capreolus (427–ca. 437). 15. Quodvultdeus (437–454). 16. *Deogratias (454–457). 17. *Eugenius (481–505). 18. *Boniface (523–535). 19. Reparatus (535–563). 20. Primosus (563–565). 21. Publicius (565–589). 22. Domenicus (594–601). 23. Victor (ca. 646). 24. Stephen. 25. James (990). 26. Thomas (1053). 27. Cyriac (1073–1076). The gaps in the 5th c. are due to the *Vandal persecution, which left the see vacant; the others are due to the state of the evidence in our possession.

PWK 10, 2150-2243; DACL 2, 2190-2230; DHGE 11, 1140-1233; LTK 6,1-4; Cath 2, 602-604; RBK 3 (1978) 1158-1189; J.L. Maier, L'episcopat de l'Afrique Romaine, vandale et byzantine, Rome 1973; A. Mandouze, Prosopographie chrétienne du Bas-Empire, I: l'Afrique (303-533), Paris 1982; S. Lancel, Évêchés et cités dans les provinces africaines (III[e]-V[e] siècles), in L'Afrique dans l'Occident Romain, École Française de Rome 1990, 273-290.

V. Saxer

V. Councils. *Augustine often mentions a *council called at Carthage by Agrippinus, a predecessor of *Cyprian. This council examined *baptism conferred by *heretics and declared it invalid: Un. bapt. 13, 22; Bapt. 2, 7, 12; Ep. 93, 10, 35, etc. Its date is unknown, but was certainly around 220–225; the number of bishops is also unknown. Cyprian refers to certain conciliar decisions earlier than himself, esp. that which forbade clerics to become guardians or trustees (Ep. 1, 1-2): it is valid to think that this decision was taken by Agrippinus's council. The passage in Cyprian's Ep. 55, 21 (cf. Tertull., Pud., passim) on Agrippinus's leniency, in the name of his fellow bishops, toward remarried divorcees, may refer to the same council.

DHGE II, 1039-1043; Hfl-Lecl I, 155; Palazzini 1, 248.

Under Cyprian's immediate predecessor, Donatus (hence before 248), an assembly of *African bishops, probably at Carthage, *excommunicated Bishop *Privatus of Lambaesis. Cyprian's council of May 252 refused to review this decision.

Cyprian, Ep. 59 (55), 10, 1; 57 (54).

Cyprian presided over seven councils at Carthage. We have only fragmentary information on them. The first four (spring 251, May 252, late 253, late 254) were occupied with the question of the lapsi (*Lapsed, Problem of the); the last three (255, spring 256, 1 September 256) with the baptism of heretics.

That of 251 was held soon after *Easter. Cyprian informed the assembly of Pope *Cornelius's letter notifying them of his election (Ep. 45 [42]). Two bishops, *Caldonius and *Fortunatus, were sent to *Rome to obtain exact information on the *Novatianist *schism, and a definite pronouncement on it was deferred to their return (Ep. 44, 1). The council was relatively indulgent toward lapsi, pardoning libellatici and subjecting thurificati and sacrificati to canonical *penance (Ep. 49 [46] and 48 [45]); Pope Cornelius was consulted on these measures. The council confirmed the excommunication of the deacon *Felicissimus of Carthage and the five priests of his party.

On 15 May 252, a council of 42 bishops met at Carthage under Cyprian. Its synodal letter confirmed the pardon of lapsi who had done penance but banned them from future admission to the priesthood.

In 253, a council of 66 bishops from Africa and *Numidia criticized Bishop Terapius of Bulla for admitting the priest Victor to communion too soon, without having first imposed the penance he deserved, but it did not annul the reconciliation. It approved the custom of baptizing newborns without waiting for the eighth day and sent a letter (Ep. 64 [59]) congratulating Pope *Lucius on his return from exile.

The council of 254 counted 37 bishops from Proconsular Africa. Its synodal (Ep. 67 [68]) approved the deposition of the renegade Spanish bishops *Martial of Mérida (Emerita) and *Basilides of Léon and Astorga (Legio-Asturica), and the election of their successors. It also rebuked Pope *Stephen, who had been taken in by these two prelates.

The council of autumn 255, with 31 Proconsular bishops, replied unanimously to a question from 18 *Numidian bishops that they should maintain the African tradition of rebaptizing heretics, "because no one can be baptized outside the church, since there is only one baptism and this is in the church" (Ep. 70).

In spring 256, a council of 71 Proconsular and *Numidian bishops confirmed this, notified Pope Stephen of its decision and expressed a hope of obtaining his approval; it was also decided that clerics who reentered the church from heresy could only be admitted as laymen (Ep. 72).

On 1 September 256, after Stephen had ordered the Africans to conform to the Roman custom under pain of excommunication, Cyprian called 87 bishops, more than 50 from Proconsularis, 30 or so from Numidia and some from Mauretania, to Carthage. The acts of this council survive, titled Sententiae episcoporum LXXXVII de haereticis baptizandis (CSEL 3, 1, 435-461). First they read Bishop Jubaianus's letter to Cyprian on the baptism of heretics and the latter's reply (Ep. 73); then Jubaianus's second letter accepting Cyprian's opinion. The bishop of Carthage then asked each bishop present to express his opinion freely on the question, which they did in hierarchical order, Cyprian being the last to speak. All declared that baptism administered by heretics was invalid and that those so baptized must be rebaptized before being admitted into the church.

Hfl-Lecl I, 165-191; V. Saxer, Vie liturgique et quotidienne à Carthage vers le milieu du III^e siècle, Vatican City 1969, 13-20; Palazzini 1, 248-252; J.A. Fischer, Die Konzilien zu Karthago und Rom in Jahr 251: Annuarium Historiae Conciliorum 11 (1979) 263-286; E. Contreras, Sententiae episcoporum numero LXXXVII de haereticis baptizandis: Augustinianum 27 (1987) 407-421; M. Marin, Le Sententiae episcoporum LXXXVII: Invigilata Lucernis 11 (1989) 329-359; G. Dunn, The Carthaginian Synod of 251: Cyprian's Model of Pastoral Ministry, in I Concili della Cristianità occidentale (secoli III-V). XXX Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana (Rome 3-5 May 2001), SEA 78, Rome 2002, 235-257.

Sometime between 345 and 348, the Catholic bishops of the African provinces met at Carthage under the presidency of Bishop Gratus, Caecilian's successor. They rejoiced at what they thought was the end of the *Donatist schism—the emperor *Constans had decreed the enforcement of the law of 316, ordering that schismatic communities be dissolved, their property handed over to the Catholics and recalcitrants exiled—and issued several disciplinary regulations. Some of these concerned Donatism: forbidding rebaptism of heretics and schismatics who returned to the church (can. 1), or the honoring of *suicides as *martyrs (can. 2). To raise the moral level of the clergy, the Fathers impressed on them the obligation of chastity (cans. 3-4), stability (cans. 5 and 7) and disinterest (cans. 5, 8-9, 13). They asked bishops not to usurp their neighbors' rights but to respect their commitments, esp. concerning the dividing up of places contested between different dioceses (cans. 10 and 12).

CCL 149, 2-10; Hfl-Lecl II, 839-841; Monceaux III, 221-226; IV, 349-351; Palazzini 1, 254.

On 16 June 390, Genetlius of Carthage presided over a general African council at Carthage, which promulgated 13 canons. These, in effect, repeated the decisions of Gratus's council on clerical chastity (can. 2) and on the procedure for judging higher clergy (can. 10). The council also made important clarifications of priests' rights: they were forbidden to consecrate chrism, bless virgins or reconcile penitents, though for this latter item they could obtain express authorization from the bishop (can. 3). The council forbade the formation of new bishoprics (can. 5) and declared that the primate's assent was necessary to institute a new bishop (can. 13). It excommunicated anyone who had received in his church someone excommunicated in another church (can. 7) and was very anxious to avoid any dissent (cans. 8 and 9). Finally, it provided for the exclusion of anyone who would not observe its ordinances (can. 13).

CCL 149, 11-19; Hfl-Lecl II, 76-78; Palazzini 1, 255; Ch. Munier, La tradition du II^e Concile de Carthago (390): RSR 46 (1972) 193-211.

During the episcopate of *Aurelius (390–430), many provincial (Proconsularis) or plenary (all the African provinces) councils were held at Carthage. Ample extracts survive, thanks to the dossiers sent to Rome by the Africans over the affair of *Apiarius (418–424), justifying their actions. These documents, which give us intimate knowledge of the African church's legislation in the 5th c., are the Codex Apiarii causae (CCL 149, 79-172) and the Registri Ecclesiae Carthaginensis Excerpta (= RC; CCL 149, 173-247), which *Dionysius Exiguus inserted in the second recension of his canonical collection. The Council of *Hippo of 393 had settled that an African plenary council should meet annually. On 26 June 394 a council met at Carthage under Aurelius, but we cannot establish whether it was general. Its acts are lost; all we know is that it designated delegates for the Council of Hadrumentum in Byzacena (CCL 149, 183).

Hfl-Lecl II, 98-100; Palazzini 1, 256; J. Gaudemet, Les sources du droit de l'Église en Occident du II^e au VII^e siècle, Paris 1985, 81-83.

In 395 and 396 the general insecurity, due to Gildo's revolt, prevented the regular celebration of councils. Only in 397 could the African general council meet. Augustine attended as bishop of Hippo. The conditions in which it was held were rather curious. The bishops of Byzacena had arrived at Carthage much earlier than the other delegations, esp. the Numidians, and did not seem at all disposed to wait for the council's opening, fixed for 27 August. It is likely that this attitude was inspired by a thorny problem of precedence: did not the province of Byzacena, once part of Proconsularis, have precedence over Numidia? The Numidians might well have replied that their province was older than Byzacena and that consequently their primate had the right to second place, immediately after the primate of Carthage. We do not know if the question was ever resolved—in any event, it is strange to see it reemerge in 525 after the long Vandal intermission (CCL 149, 259-262). In 397, however, it was more lively than ever, so much so that the bishops of Byzacena, by withdrawing before the opening of the council and thus not sitting with the Numidians, would have avoided either provoking an incident or creating a precedent. In their defense, we must point out that they did a useful work by compiling the Breviarium Hipponense (CCL 149, 22-44), which they pledged to observe in their province.

At the end of the conciliar session, 28 August 397, the bishops of Byzacena having returned to their own sees, some 40 prelates from Proconsularis, Numidia and Mauretania approved the Breviarium (CCL 149, 143). They also defined many provisions on matters of discipline: forbidding rebaptism, reordination and transfer of bishops (RC 48); requiring three bishops to be present at the consecration of another bishop (RC 49); specifiying that the date of Easter was to be announced by the primate of Carthage (RC 50); announcing that no new dioceses could be created (RC 53); demarking provisions against bishops who usurped the rights of others (chs. 54 and 56). An exception was made for the primate of Carthage, who was authorized by custom to provide for the needs of churches who requested it, for the ordination of candidates to the episcopate, and for the clerics of all the dioceses of Africa (RC 55).

CCL 149, 20-53; Hfl-Lecl II, 100-102; Palazzini 1, 256; M. Krámitz, La prescrizione del canone della Scrittura nel Concilio di Cartagine (397), in I Concili della Cristianità occidentale (secoli III-V). XXX Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana (Rome 3-5 May 2001), SEA 78, Rome 2002, 259-267.

The year 398 was too turbulent to hold a plenary council at Carthage: Gildo had passed on to open revolt against the emperor. We should not believe, therefore, the Spanish canonical collection known as the Hispana, which dates an imaginary IV Council of Carthage to 8 November 398: this is actually the Provençal compilation called Statuta ecclesiae antiqua (ed. Ch. Munier, Paris 1960). After the return of peace, the African bishops met on 27 April 399, a date earlier than that of the annual meeting, in the secretarium of the Basilica restituta of Carthage. The Fathers delegated two bishops to ask emperor Honorius to allow churches the right of asylum, conceded to temples by the law of 29 January 399 (CTh XVI, 10, 15).

CCL 149, 193-194; Hfl-Lecl II, 120-121; Palazzini 1, 256.

In 400 no council was held at Carthage, perhaps because of the tensions between Christians and *pagans aroused by the law of 399. In 401, however, there were two councils. On 15 June the bishops of Proconsularis met. Aurelius submitted for approval the petitions he thought should be presented to the authorities overseas (CCL 149, 194-198). He renewed a suggestion of the Council of Carthage of 397, which would have enabled him to admit some converted Donatists to major orders (RC 47: CCL 149, 186). Consulted previously about this, the churches of *Rome and *Milan rejected it. Aurelius proposed to make another attempt to convince *Anastasius, the new pope, and *Venerius, the new bishop of Milan, of its necessity and legitimacy, bearing in mind the distressed circumstances of the African churches (RC 57: CCL 149, 145). The legation was also to ask the emperor for a group of provisions against the idols, temples and banquets of the pagans (RC 58 and 60), and against the entertainments offered on *Sundays and Christian feast days (RC 60). It was also to ask for various regulations to strengthen the authority of ecclesiastical tribunals (RC 59 and 62), to ensure protection for converts (RC 63) and to proceed to the freeing of slaves in churches (RC 64).

CCL 149, 194-198; Hfl-Lecl II, 125-126; Palazzini 1, 257.

The plenary council of 401 met at Carthage on 13 September. Meanwhile, Pope Anastasius's reply, exhorting the bishops to continue the struggle against Donatism, had reached Africa. Eager to restore the unity of the churches and not wishing to offend the majesty of the pope, the Fathers resolved on a final effort to restore religious peace (RC 66 and 69). The assembly also issued various disciplinary canons: it particularly reminded the higher clergy of their obligations of continence (RC 70) and stability (RC 71). It forbade trustee bishops' misappropriation of vacant sees (RC 74). It reactivated some old rules, such as obliging bishops to attend councils (RC 76) and forbidding them to leave their goods to pagans or heretics (RC 81). It also forbade their affiliating a foreign monk to their dioceses or entrusting the direction of a *monastery to such (RC 60). It prescribed the baptism of children whose baptism was in doubt, particularly those ransomed from barbarians (RC 72). It laid down how much respite should be allowed to condemned clergy to make arrangements for appeal (RC 79). The delegates to the imperial court were entrusted with the question of manumissio (RC 82), that of the defensores ecclesiae (RC 75), and that of the struggle against paganism (RC 84). Finally, the council set up a commission of 20 bishops to restore order in the church of Hippo Diarrytus (Bizerta) and replace *Equitius (RC 78).

CCL 149, 198-205; Hfl-Lecl II, 126-128; Palazzini 1, 257.

In 402 the plenary African council was held at Milevis in Numidia. In 403 one was held at Carthage on 25 August. It decided to continue the effort to bring the Donatists back to the unity of the Catholic faith, particularly by inviting them to take part in public conferences, like debates. To avoid and detect chicanery, invitations would be made by local magistrates, so that formal proof of the facts should be in the public archives (RC 91-92).

CCL 149, 208-211; Hfl-Lecl II, 154-155; Palazzini 1, 257-258.

The council held at Carthage in June 404 concluded that the policy of religious pacification had failed. A delegation was sent to the court of *Ravenna to ask for imperial protection against the violence of the Donatists (RC 93). The council demanded the restoration of penalties against heretics who had performed ordinations and a restriction on their rights to make wills. These suggestions, aimed at avoiding physical punishments, came from Augustine (Ep. 185, 7, 29: CSEL 57, 24). But the sight of the Donatists' victims made such an impression on the emperor that, from 12 February 405, he issued severe laws against them and ordered religious unity to be restored in all African cities in favor of the Catholics (CTh XVI 5,38; 6,3-6). It was then that the state resolved to suppress the dissident church, if necessary by direct coercion.

CCL 149, 211-214; Hfl-Lecl II, 155-156; Palazzini 1, 258.

The plenary council of 23 August 405 sent a delegation to thank the emperor for his measures against the Donatists, which had brought about religious unity at Carthage; the judges were entrusted with the task of promoting it in the other provinces as well (RC 94).

CCL 149, 214; Hfl-Lecl II, 156; Palazzini 1, 258-259.

In 406 there was no plenary council, but the African bishops met at Carthage on 13 June 407. They decided that, from then on, councils of all the African provinces would be held only in cases of serious matters that affected all (RC 95). The Fathers also fixed many rules on ecclesiastical jurisdiction (RC 104), appeal procedures (RC 96), the creation of new episcopal sees (RC 98), the maintenance of returned Donatist bishops (RC 99), formulas of prayer (RC 103), divorcées (RC 102), journeys of bishops to the imperial court (RC 106), excommunicated clerics (RC 105). They also wrote to Pope *Innocent I, inviting him to put an end to their dispute with the church of *Alexandria (RC 101), and sent a delegation to the emperor, requesting all necessary measures against Donatism (RC 97). This was not without effect: on 15 November 407, Honorius issued a new law against Donatists, *Manichees, *Priscillianists and pagans (CTh XVI, 5, 43; 10, 19), which aroused a violent reaction and provoked bloody public disorders (Aug., Ep. 91: CSEL 34, 2, 432).

CCL 149, 214-219; Hfl-Lecl II, 156-158; Palazzini 1, 259.

The councils that met at Carthage in June and October 408 both sent legations to the court of Ravenna, contra paganos et haereticos.

CCL 149, 219; Hfl-Lecl II, 158-159; Palazzini 1, 259-260.

The same was done in 410. The end of all these efforts was the calling of the conference of Carthage of 1-8 June 411, which saw the rout of Donatism.

CCL 149, 220; Hfl-Lecl II, 159, 168, 180, 183; Palazzini 1, 260.

From this date, the disciplinary activity of the African councils seems to have slowed, but other problems soon engaged their attention: the *Pelagian controversy and the affair of *Apiarius. From 411–412 an ecclesiastical tribunal under the presidency of Aurelius excommunicated *Celestius. In summer 416 the bishops of Proconsularis confirmed this sentence and sent Pope Innocent a detailed synodal to inform him of the "intrigues" of the "enemies of grace." This was echoed by the Numidian bishops, meeting at Milevis. Finally, five bishops (Aurelius, Alypius, Augustine, *Evodius and *Possidius) addressed their concerns to the pope. Rome's reply was clear: Pelagius and Celestius were put outside the communion of the church until they acknowledged their faults, as were all those who obstinately upheld their ruinous doctrines (Aug., Ep. 181, 9; 182, 6). How the intrigues of Celestius and his Roman partisans soon led the new Pope *Zosimus to question these sentences is well known.

A new council, urgently convoked at Carthage at the end of 417, made a strong protest to Rome. Its acts are lost, but their essence can be reconstructed from scattered references in Augustine's writings (C. ep. Pel. II, 3, 5; De gr. et pecc. or. II, 7, 8; Ep. 215, 3) and in Zosimus's reply (Ep. Quamvis patrum: PL 20, 676). The latter, dated 21 March 418, reached Carthage on 29 April. Two days later, 1 May 418, the plenary council of the African episcopate opened: more than 200 bishops proclaimed the Catholic doctrine of original sin and its transmission (cans. 1-3); the role and necessity of grace (cans. 4-6); and the possibility of avoiding sin (cans. 7-9) (CCL 149, 67-78). They also ruled on a number of disciplinary questions connected with the reintegration of the Donatists (RC 117-121, 124). They defined certain points of procedure (RC 122) and issued sanctions against negligent bishops (RC 123-124). They authorized priests, deacons and minor clergy to appeal to the primate of their province and to the general council of the African provinces (RC 125), but forbade them to appeal overseas, on pain of excommunication which would pursue them through all the territory of Africa. Having adopted these measures, they concluded the affair of Celestius, while that of Apiarius, in the same year, would demonstrate just how well-founded the Fathers' apprehensions were.

CCL 149, 220-228; Hfl-Lecl II, 190-195; Palazzini 1, 262.

Several councils were occupied with the case of Apiarius, a priest of Sicca Veneria in Africa Proconsularis who, excommunicated by his Bishop Urbanus for various misdemeanors, took his case to Rome. Pope Zosimus received him favorably and, during the summer of 418, sent a legation to Carthage charged with his instructions on this and on various points of discipline (CCL 149, 90-93): he openly asked that, in cases regarding bishops, recourse to Rome should always be possible, in accordance with the provisions laid down by the Council of *Nicaea on the matter of appeals, and that, in cases concerning priests and deacons, appeal should be made to neighboring bishops. In support of these requests, the pope produced texts which he thought were Nicene, but which were in fact two canons of the Council of *Serdica. The Africans reacted with determination to Rome's demands: they reaffirmed their veneration for the decisions of Nicaea but put forward very clear reservations about Zosimus's texts, of which they found no trace in the Greek copies of that council. In all probability, Zosimus never saw this reply: he died on 27 September 418, and not until April 419 could his successor Boniface send messengers to Carthage to inform Zosimus's delegates about events at Rome and to confirm his predecessor's mandate to them.

The general council of the African provinces met in May 419 and finally put an end to the question of Apiarius, in agreement with the Roman legates. After asking pardon, he was readmitted to church communion but removed from the clergy of Sicca Veneria. The debates over Apiarius were essentially about Rome's demands in the matter of appeal. *Alypius suggested a procedure that could establish the "Nicene" authenticity of Zosimus's canons: the obtaining of a duly certified copy of the Nicene canons from the great sees of the East: *Constantinople, *Antioch and *Alexandria (CCL 149, 160). The Eastern bishops' reply arrived the same year and fully confirmed the Africans' reservations (CCL 149, 162-163). The plenary council of May 419 brought together 217 bishops; its final session (30 May) laid down numerous procedural rules which over the centuries became laws, since they were taken up indefatigably by the medieval canonical collections. In particular, excommunicates (RC 128), slaves, freedmen and infames personae (RC 129) were excluded from making accusations in ecclesial courts. The council also laid down rules about the admission of witnesses (RC 131) and enjoined bishops not to inflict excommunication lightly (RC 132-133).

CCL 149, 229-234; Hfl-Lecl II, 198-201; Palazzini 1, 263-264; W. Marschall, Karthago und Rome: Päpste und Papstum 1 (1971); C. Pietri, Roma Christiana, 2, Rome 1976, 1250-1275; M. Wojtowytsch, Papsttum und Konzile von den Anfängen bis zu Leo I.: Päpste und Papsttum 17 (1981) 254-264, 368-369.

The affair of Apiarius, seemingly settled, bounced back several years later. Admitted to the clergy of Tabarka, the sad hero of this story gave himself up to new excesses. Excommunicated again, he once again sought refuge at Rome, where Pope Celestine admitted him to communion. A new Roman legation was sent to Carthage, headed by the same *Faustinus of Potenza (in Picenum) who had presided over that of 418–419. He insisted on Apiarius's reinstatement and made a great noise about the privileges of the Roman church. But events quickly took an unexpected turn: Apiarius, of his own accord, made a genuine confession, and Faustinus had no option but to apologize. In the letter they sent to Pope Celestine, the Africans summed up all these disputes in a council of Carthage, which must be placed around 424 (CCL 149, 169-172). They reaffirmed the principles of their legislation on ecclesiastical procedure and excommunication and asked the Roman pontiff to be willing in the future to respect them in their entirety, since they were in perfect agreement with the canons of Nicaea. And finally, they begged him to abstain from any untimely intervention in local affairs through his legates. The single canon published by this council clearly manifests the Africans' exasperation: Ut nullus ad romanam ecclesiam audeat appellare (CCL 149, 266). On 13 June 421 a general council of Africa was held at Carthage, but its acts are lost.

CCL 149, XXXIV-XXXV; Hfl-Lecl II, 213-214; Palazzini 1, 264; Ch. Munier, Un canon inédit du XX[e] concile de Carthage: RSR 40 (1966) 113-126.

The Vandal invasion put an end to conciliar activity in N Africa. It did not revive until the early 6th c., and then only briefly. On 5 February 525 Boniface of Carthage gathered, at Carthage, some 60 bishops from Proconsular Africa, Numidia and Tripolitania, and some from Mauretania Caesareana and Sitifiana; only those of Byzacena could not come, though they were invited. The question of precedence among the African provinces occupied much of the debate. Afterward, Boniface ordered the reading of the Nicene *Creed and a whole series of canons issued by the earlier African councils, judging them useful for the instruction of the new bishops (CCL 149, 254-272). The next day, 6 February, the council dealt with particular affairs, specifically the conflict between *Liberatus, primate of Byzacena, and the abbot Peter.

CCL 149, 254-282; Hfl-Lecl II, 1069-1074; Palazzini 1, 265; J. Gaudemet, Les sources du droit de l'Église en Occident du II[e] au VII[e] siècle, Paris 1985, 104-105.

The Council of Carthage of 536 recalled the provisions made in 525 in favor of monasteries, primarily that when monasteries requested the ordination of clerics for the service of the monastery itself or the oratories attached to it, this must be done by the local bishop, but this did not give him any particular right over the monastery.

CCL 149, 283; Hfl-Lecl II, 1136-1139; Palazzini 1, 265-266.

Ch. Munier

CARTHAGINENSIS. Province of Hispania created by *Diocletian (ca. 297) from territories previously belonging to Baetica and Tarraconensis which, ca. 385, included the Balearic Islands. The following episcopal sees are documented in the 4th and early 5th c., attested by the presence of their bishops at councils: Acci (Guadix, Granada), Basti (Baza, Granada), Castulo (Cazlona, Jaén), Complutum (Alcalá de Henares, Madrid), Eliocroca (near Lorca, Murcia), Mentesa Bastetanorum (La Guardia, Jaén) and Toletum (Toledo, metropolitan see during the *Visigothic era). Evidence also remains of other possible sees, from the presence of presbyters at councils, sometimes noted as representing their bishops: Baria (Vera, Almería) and Carthago Nova (Cartagena, Murcia, metropolitan see of Byzantine Spania). In the 6th c. we find the sees of: Ercauica (Castro de Santaver), Oretum (Granátula, Jaén), Oxama (Osma, Soria), Saetabis (Játiva, Valencia), Segobia (Segovia), Segobriga (Cabeza de Griego, Cuenca), Segontia (Sigüenza, Guadalajara), Valentia (Valencia), Valeria (Cuenca), Bigastrum (Bigastro, Alicante), Elo (near Elche, Alicante) and Palentia (Palencia). In the 7th c.: Beatia (Baeza, Jaén), Dianium (Denia, Alicante), Ilice (Elche, Alicante). A *cenobium is attested at Baecula (Bailén, Jaén).

Among its most famous religious personalities are *Justinian (1st half 6th c.), bishop of Valencia, promoter of the cult of *Vincent, and the writers *Licinianus, bishop of Cartagena (late 6th–early 7th c.), *Eutropius, bishop of Valencia (late 6th–early 7th c.) and *Julian, bishop of *Toledo (late 7th c.), who convoked four councils in his see. Numerous councils were held in Carthaginensis: Toledo I (400), Toledo II (527), Valencia (546), Toledo III (589), Toledo (597), Toledo IV (633), Toledo V (636), Toledo VI (638), Toledo VII (646), Toledo VIII (653), Toledo IX (655), Toledo X (656), Toledo XI (675), Toledo XII (681), Toledo XIII (683), Toledo XIV (684), Toledo XV (688), Toledo XVI (693), Toledo XVII (694) and Toledo XVIII (703, without acts).

Archaeologically, noteworthy are early Christian *sarcophagi of Roman importation (4th c.). Some go back to the 1st half of the 4th c., e.g., those of Elo, Erustes (Toledo), Layos (Toledo), Toledo and Yecla (Murcia); the rest, those of Valencia and Hellín (Albacete), are from the 2nd half of the 4th c. Locally produced sarcophagi are later, such as that of La Puebla Nueva (Toledo), from the Theodosian period. Also from the 4th c. are the mausoleums of La Alberca (Murcia), Vegas de Pedroza (Segovia) and Las Vegas de Puebla Nueva (Toledo). At Alcalá de Henares are the remains of a martyrium dedicated to Justus and Pastor, linked to a metropolis of the *Visigothic period. From the 2nd half of the 7th c. is the old Visigothic villa of Pla de Nadal (20 km [12.4 mi] NW of Valencia).

Among early Christian basilicas are those of Elche (initially a *synagogue), rectangular with three aisles and semicircular apse toward the E, with floor mosaics dated from between the 4th c. and the Visigothic period; a church at Elo, rectangular with apse, built in two phases (the first horseshoe shaped, between the 4th and 5th c.); Aljezares (Murcia), church with three aisles, with apse and abutting circular-plan baptistery (late 4th c.); Segobriga, church with three aisles with semicircular crypt, wide transept and important decoration (5th-7th c.). From the Visigothic period are the churches of Almenara (La Plana Baixa, Castelló), rectangular with three aisles and central apse (6th c.); Recopolis (Zorita de los Canes, Guadalajara; ca. 578), cruciform with apse rectangular outside and circular inside (6th c.); Tolmo de Minateda (Hellín, Albacete), basilica with three aisles, apse toward the E and baptistery to the W, and lateral entrances (late 6th–early 7th c.); Las Tamujas de Malpica de Tajo (Toledo; 7th c.) and San Pedro de Mata (Toledo; 7th c.). The most important examples are from the second half of the 7th and early 8th c.: crypt of San Antolín (cathedral of Palencia), perhaps from the time of Wamba; Santa Maria de Quintanilla de las Viñas (Mambrillas de Lara, Burgos), with three aisles, transept and figurative decorations. The archaeology of Toledo is poorly known, despite it having been the capital of the Visigothic kingdom. Epigraphy (Vives, n. 307, 312, 317-319, 327) allows us to suppose the existence of Christian basilicas at Bailén (Jaén), Guadix, Cehegín (Murcia), Denia (Alicante) and Játiva (Valencia), traditionally situated under the hermitage of St. Philip; notable is the fragment of the Toledan inscription which reproduces a part of the Credo (Vives, n. 552). Also very important is the treasure of Guarrazar (period of Recesvinto) discovered in the 19th c. near Guadamur (Toledo), composed of a group of votive crowns and richly decorated crosses.

The best-known early Christian complex is that of Valencia (excavated from 1985), where the cult of the *martyr Vincent gave origin to the creation of a series of rooms linked to his passion (known from his Passio and from *Prudentius). The church of Roqueta, where the martyr was first buried, has been located; related structures of an important monastic community at Punta de l'Illa, probably founded by Bishop Justinian and destroyed at the end of the 6th c., have been documented. Excavations done in the area of Almoina have brought to light a 4th-c. necropolis—a handmade glass article with biblical scenes has been found there, part of a child's funeral trousseau (late 4th c.)—and a small church probably with three aisles and horseshoe apse, at the lower levels of which are the remains of a 3rd-c. administrative building, which has been interpreted by its excavators as the place where the martyrdom occurred; the most famous find here is a marble altar intact in one piece. The cathedral is from the Visigothic period, a basilica with three aisles and central apse. Two buildings are attached to the cathedral at its extreme N and S: the latter is called "St. Vincent's Prison," though it is actually a bishop's funerary church, cruciform with square apse, also containing a second grave (dated to ca. 560); the building to the N is also cruciform, perhaps a baptistery or another funerary environment. The complex and the deposition of St. Vincent's *relics there have been traditionally attributed to Justinian, but more recent studies seem to attribute it to Anesius, another bishop of the city.

J. Vives - T. Marín, Concilios visigóticos e hispano-romanos, Madrid 1963; var. aus., Actas I reunión nacional de Arqueología paleocristiana hispánica, Vitoria 1967; P. de Palol, Arte hispánico de la época visigoda, Barcelona 1966; Id., Demografía y arqueología de los siglos IV-VIII: BSEAA (1966) 5-66; Id., Arqueología cristiana de la España romana, Madrid-Valladolid 1967; Id., Arqueología cristiana hispánica de tiempos romanos y visigodos: RivAC Miscell. Josi, II (1967) 177-232; J. Vives, Inscripciones cristianas de la España romana y visigoda, Barcelona [2]1969; D. Iturgaiz, Baptisterios paleocristianos de Hispania, Barcelona 1970; P. de Palol, Arqueología cristiana romana y visigoda: DHEE, I (1972) 96-113; A. Recio, Tapas romanas de sarcófagos paleocristianos en Hispania: Atti VIII Congr. Int. Arch. Crist., Vatican City - Barcelona 1972, 409-430; M. Sotomayor, Datos históricos sobre sarcófagos romano-cristianos de España, Granada 1973; L.A. García Moreno, Prosopografía del reino visigodo de Toledo, Salamanca 1974; R. Puertas, Iglesias hispánicas (s. IV al VIII). Testimonios literarios, Madrid 1975; E. Llobregat, La primitiva cristiandat valenciana. Segles IV al VIII, Valencia 1977; H. Schlunk - Th. Hauschild, Hispania Antiqua. Die Denkmäler der frühchristlichen und westgotischen Zeit, Mainz am Rhein 1979; M. Sotomayor, Historia de la Iglesia en España, I. La Iglesia en la España romana y visigoda (ed. García Villoslada), Madrid 1979; F. Fernández, Aportación al estudio de Recópolis: AEA 55 (1982) 119-136; var. aus., Actes II reunió d'Arqueologia paleocristiana hispànica, Barcelona 1982; L. Olmo, Arquitectura religiosa y organización litúrgica en época visigoda. La basílica de Recópolis: AEA 61 (1988) 157-178; A. Méndez - S. Rascón, Los visigodos en Alcalá de Henares, Alcalá de Henares 1989; L. Caballero - J. Bueno, De nuevo a propósito de la basílica de Recópolis: AEA 62 (1989) 283-291; L.A. García Moreno, Historia de España visigoda, Madrid 1989; J. Corell, Inscripción del obispo Anesio, atribuida erróneamente a Justiniano: Saitabi 39 (1989) 63-72; V. Escrivá - R. Soriano, El área episcopal de Valentia: AEA 63 (1990) 347-354; M.I. García - M. Roselló, Late Roman Unguentarium: Ungüentarios cristianos de la antigüedad tardía procedentes de Punta de L'Illa de Cullera, Valencia: AEA 66 (1993) 294-300; J. Corell, La inscripció del primer bisbe històricament conegut de València: Estudis Castellonencs 6 (1994) 383-390; F.J. García de Castro, Sociedad y poblamiento en la Hispania del siglo IV d.C., Valladolid 1995; L.J. Balsameda, El tesoro perdido de Guarrazar: AEA 68 (1995) 149-164; C. Godoy, Arqueología y liturgia. Iglesias hispánicas (siglos IV al VIII), Barcelona 1995; S. Rascón, La ciudad hispanorromana de Complutum, Alcalá de Henares 1995; L. Caballero - S. Feijoo, La iglesia altomedieval de San Juan Bautista en Baños de Cerrato (Palencia): AEA 71 (1998) 181-242; B. Gamo, La Antigüedad Tardía en la provincia de Albacete, Albacete 1998; J. Vilella, Las primacías eclesiásticas en Hispania durante el s. IV: Polis 10 (1998) 269-285; var. aus., Acta Antiqua Complutensia, I: Complutum y las ciudades hispanas en la Antigüedad Tardía, eds. L.A. García Moreno - S. Rascón, Alcalá de Henares 1999; S. Gutiérrez - B. Gamo, Excavación de una basílica visigoda en el Tolmo de Minateda (Hellín, Albacete, España): Bulletin de l'Association pour l'Antiquité Tardive 8 (1999) 51-56; var. aus., Los orígenes del cristianismo en Valencia y su entorno (coord. A. Riera), Valencia 2000; L. Abad - S. Gutiérrez - B. Gamo, La basílica y el baptisterio del Tolmo de Minateda (Hellín, Al- bacete): AEA 73 (2000) 193-221; J. Vilella, Las iglesias y las cristiandades hispanas: panorama prosopográfico, in La Hispania del siglo IV. Administración, economía, sociedad, cristianización, R. Teja (ed.), Bari 2002, 117-159.

J.A. Jiménez

CASSIAN of Imola. His cult is attested in the early 5th c. by *Prudentius (Peristephanon 9), who, traveling from *Spain to *Rome, tells how he stopped at the Forum Cornelii at the saint's tomb: on its sides were depicted the events of the *martyrdom of Cassian, a teacher of ars notaria who was struck down by his students bearing stilettos (the Berna MS, Burgerbibliothek 264, transmits Prudentius's poem with numerous illustrations). A Carolinian-era Passio s. Cassiani by Ubaldus of Saint-Amand puts Prudentius's account into prose.

Cassian's mention on 13 August in the Martyrologium hieronymianum attests his cult in the 1st half of the 5th c.; at *Milan in 451 there was a votive chapel in his honor; at *Rome Pope *Symmachus (498–514) dedicated an altar to him in the *Vatican basilica. According to a tradition, *Peter Chrysologus, the Imolese bishop of *Ravenna (424–451), went to Imola to render homage at St. Cassian's tomb and died there. The tomb became a site of the bishop's palace and quite famous. The tomb was in use at least from the beginning of the 11th c. until 1132, when the Castrum s. Cassiani was destroyed and the saint's *relics were deposited in the cathedral dedicated to him inside the city. The 12th-c. Vita et gesta Cassiani, Ingenuini et Albini is evidence of St. Cassian's cult in the Tyrol, at Säben and at Brixen.

BHL 1625-1629; F. Lanzoni, Le leggende di S. Cassiano d'Imola: Didaskaleion, n.s. 3 (1925) 1-44; BS 3, 909-912; F. Dolbeau, Passion de s. Cassien d'Imola composée d'après Prudence par Hucbald de Saint-Amand: RBen 87 (1977) 238-256; M. Bless-Grabher, Cassian von Imola. Die Legende eines Lehrers und Märtyrer und ihre Entwicklung von der Spätantike bis zur Neuzeit, Bern - Frankfurt - Las Vegas 1978; A. Meluzzi, S. Cassiano martire imolese: Studi Romagnoli 29 (1978) 419-422; E.J. Beer, Überlegungen zu Stil und Herkunft des Berner Prudentius-Codex 264, in Florilegium Sangallense. Festschrift J. Duft, St. Gallen - Sigmaringen 1980, 15-70; G. Binazzi, Orso, Cassiano, Apollinare. Appunti sulla diffusione dei culti al seguito delle milizie: RomBarb 9 (1986-87) 5-24; I. Deug Su, La "Vita Rictrudis" di Ubaldo di Saint-Amand: un'agiografia intellettuale e i santi imperfetti: StudMed s. III, 31 (1990) 545-582 (esp. 553ff.); C. Lambert, Fonti letterarie e archeologia. L'esempio della basilica tardoantica di S. Cassiano di Imola: RSLR 30 (1994) 39-55; P. Golinelli, Città e culto dei santi nel Medioevo italiano, Bologna 1996, 24-28; R. Copeland, Dissenting Critical Practices, in Criticism and Dissent in the Middle Ages, Cambridge 1996, 1-23; Il grande libro dei Santi. Dizionario enciclopedico 1, Turin 1998, 379-380.

V. Milazzo

CASSIODORUS (Flavius Magnus Aurelius Cassiodorus), senator (ca. 490–ca. 585). Our biographical information comes from Cassiodorus himself, esp. the Ordo generis Cassiodororum and the Variae. Born at Scyllacium (Calabria) ca. 485–490. His family, probably *Syrian in origin, had in three generations achieved fame and wealth; his father, comes sacrarum largitionum under *Odoacer, then a faithful subject of *Theodoric, was later praetorian prefect; between 501 and 507 he achieved the rank of patrician. Cassiodorus could vaunt illustrious relatives like the Symmachi and, by marriage, the noble Anici family, to whom belonged *Boethius. From the autobiographical Ordo gen. Cassiod., discovered by A. Holder and published by H. Usener in 1877 under the title Anecdoton Holderi, we learn that, as a youth, Cassiodorus recited a *panegyric of Theodoric and was rewarded with the post of quaestor, which he held until 511. In 514 he was appointed ordinary consul, a purely honorific title. This was followed, as in the case of his father and grandfather, by that of corrector Lucaniae et Bruttionum. He took no active part in the settlement of the Laurentian *schism, to which he alludes in the Chronicon (ad a. 514: Senator v.c. cons. Me etiam consule in vestrorum laude tempore adunato clero vel populo Romanae Ecclesiae rediit optata concordia). Theodoric was suspicious of the reconciliation between pope and emperor and, to consolidate his power constitutionally, asked the Italian "collaborators" for conspicuous expressions of approval. Cassiodorus thus dedicated to the king's general Eutharic Cillica a Panegyric, surviving in fragments, and a Chronicon from Adam to AD 519, whose sources range from Livy to Jerome, Aufidius Bassus to the Chronicon Paschale, *Prosper of Aquitaine to *Eutropius. In 523 Cassiodorus succeeded Boethius as magister officiorum; in 533 he was praetorian prefect, a post he held until 536, in which year *Gothic society suffered a serious breakdown in the war against *Justinian's *Byzantines. During this long period, Cassiodorus skillfully maneuvered through court intrigues, sincerely favoring political cohesion between Romans and *Goths, to whom, in his Historia Gothorum, he ascribed a Roman genealogy (Var. IX 25: originem gothicam historiam fecit esse romanam). A loyal friend of Theodoric, he became his intimate adviser, encouraging his intellectual ambitions. After his retirement from public life, ca. 537–538, Cassiodorus put together all the documents connected with his chancellery activity. This heterogeneous work is titled Variae and consists of 12 books; books VI and VII contain legal formulas, the others official letters written by Cassiodorus either in his own name or, more often, in that of the Gothic kings. A vital source for the history of a barbarian kingdom, these letters are written in a style refined to the point of preciosity, always adapted to their various recipients, as the author himself says: quia necesse nobis fuit stilum non unum sumere qui personas varias suscepimus admonere.

Another historical work of this period was the lost Historia Gothorum, in 12 books, written at Theodoric's order. Besides numerous allusions to it in the Variae, we have a summary, the so-called Getica, made in 551 by the Goth Jordanes. Its chief source was Ablabius's Gothic history (Var. X 20,2), and it is among the first national histories of barbarian peoples which flourished in the Middle Ages.

After the fall of the Gothic kingdom, Cassiodorus felt called to dedicate himself to God. In 536 he and Pope *Agapetus tried to found at *Rome a university of theological studies with an attached library on the model of those already flourishing in the East, but the attempt failed because of the pope's death and the renewal of the *Byzantine war. The first work of this period is De anima, appended to the Variae. In its final prayer, Cassiodorus reveals the emotion of his conversion: ex servis filii, ex impiis iusti, de captivis reddimur absoluti. Then follows, modeled on *Augustine, the Expositio Psalmorum, a complete commentary on all the psalms, composed probably at *Constantinople, where Cassiodorus lived for ten years and found means to uphold Pope *Vigilius's ecclesiastical policy and to influence the Byzantine emperor in favor of *Italy.

Returning to his possessions in Calabria at the age of 70, in ca. 550 he founded the *monastery of *Vivarium. Many monks responded to a wholly particular calling: besides manual labor, time was set aside for the study of sacred and profane texts, transcription of which was considered a form of tribute to God. In this center, where both *cenobitism and *anchorism were allowed, there was as yet no precise rule: the monks were left free to follow tam patrum regulas quam praeceptoris proprii iussa. For monks intent on intellectual work, Cassiodorus composed the Institutiones divinarum litterarum, continually revised until the end of his life, a sort of introduction to sacred and profane literature and a rudimentary catalog of books, most of which were at Vivarium. Surviving translations of Greek works made in the scriptorium include the Historia Ecclesiastica Tripartita, the Antiquitatum Iudaicarum libri XXII and the Adumbrationes in Epistulas Canonicas, all carefully supervised and corrected by Cassiodorus himself. But Gaudentius's De musica and some of *Origen's homilies are lost. At the age of 90, aware of the grave linguistic crisis that now gripped the land of Italy, Cassiodorus composed his last work, De orthographia. After his death in ca. 580, Vivarium survived for some decades, but by the 7th c. its famous library was being dismembered and dispersed.

As a man, Cassiodorus had no particularly prominent characteristics. In the years dedicated to serving the Gothic kings, he attempted a far from clear justification of the barbarian presence in Italy; the intuitions of the period post conversionem were soon overtaken by the *Benedictine rule. His works, purged of their stylistic excesses, exercised a great influence on medieval Latin prose; his Institutiones formed a basis for the cataloging of many medieval libraries.

CPL 896ff.; PL 69-70; L. Traube, Orationum reliquiae, MGH AA XII (1894) addit. tert., 457-484; Th. Mommsen, Chronica, ibid., 109-161; Th. Mommsen, Variae, ibid.; S.J.B. Barnish, The Variae of Magnus Aurelius Cassiodorus Senator, Liverpool 1992; A.J. Fridh, Variae, CCSL 96, Turnholti 1973; J.W. Halporn, Cassiodorus's Liber de Anima: Introduction and Critical Text: Traditio 16 (1960) 39-109; Id., CCL 96; L. Helbling, Vom Adel des Menschen, Einsiedeln 1965; H. Usener, Anecdoton Holderi, Leipzig 1877; M. Adriaen, Expositio Psalmorum, CCL 97-98, 1958; P.G. Walsh, Cassiodorus: Explanation of the Psalms, 3 vols., Mahwah, NJ 1990-91; R.A.B. Mynors, Institutiones, Oxford 1937; W. Jacob - R. Hanslik, Historia ecclesiastica tripartita, CSEL 71, 1952; H. Keil, De orthographia, Gramm. Lat. VII, 143-210. Cf. Repertorium 2, 149-153. For the bibl. on Cassiodorus until 1959, A. Momigliano, Secondo contributo alla storia degli studi classici e del mondo antico, Rome 1960, 219-229; until 1972, A.J. Fridh in the ed. of the Variae; until 1979, A. Momigliano, Dizionario biografico degli Italiani, s.v.; PWK III, 1671; EI 9, 337; RAC 2, 915; W. Eder, NP II, 1004-1007; P. de Labriolle, Histoire de la littérature latine chrétienne, Paris [3]1947, 673ff.; A. van de Vyver, C. et son œuvre: Speculum 6 (1931) 244ff.; Id., Les institutiones de Cassiodore et sa Fondation à Vivarium: RBén 53 (1941) 59ff.; H.I. Marrou, St. Augustin et la fin de la culture antique, Paris 1938-1949; P. Courcelle, Les lettres grecques en Occident. De Macrobe à Cassiodore, Paris [2]1948, 318ff.; L.W. Jones, The Influence of Cassiodorus on Middle Age Culture: Speculum 20 (1945) 433ff.; Id., An introduction to Divine and Human Readings by Cassiodorus S., New York 1946; A. Josefsson Fridh, Études critiques et syntaxiques sur les Variae de Cassiodore, Göteborg 1950; Id., Terminologie et formules dans les Variae de Cassiodore Études sur le développement du style administratif aux derniers siècles de l'antiquité, Stockholm 1956; Id., Contributions à la critique et à l'interprétation des Variae de Cassiodore, Göteborg 1968; S. Lundström, Zur Historia tripartita des Cassiodor, Lund 1952; A. Momigliano, Cassiodoro, PBA 41 (1955) 207ff.; Id., Cassiodorus and the Italian culture of his time, London 1956; KLP I, 1067-1068; G. Wille, Musica Romana. Die Bedeutung der Musik im Leben der Römer, Amsterdam 1967, 700ff.; G. Ludwig, Cassiodor: Über den Ursprung der abendländischen Schule, Frankfurt a.M. 1967; F. Weißengruber, Cassiodors Stellung innerhalb der monast. Profanbildung des Abendlandes: WSt n.F. 1 (1967) 202ff.; A. Ceresa Gastaldo, Contenuto e metodo dell'Expositio psalmorum di Cassiodoro: VCh 5 (1968) 61ff.; J. Svennung, Zu Cassiodor und Jordanes: Eranos 67 (1969) 71ff.; D. Briesemeister, Cassiodor, in K. Fassmann, Die Großen der Weltgeschichte, II, Zürich 1972, 779ff.; M.L. Angrisani, Iord. "Get." 266 e Cassiod. "inst." I 28: RomBarb 4 (1979) 5-11; J.J. O'Donnell, Cassiodorus, Berkeley - Los Angeles 1979; L. Viscido, Studi cassiodorei, Soveria Mannelli 1983; G. Vide, The Roman Chancery Tradition: Studies in the Language of Codex Theodosianus and Cassiodorus's Variae, Göteborg 1984; M. Simonetti, La produzione letteraria latina fra Romani e barbari (sec. V-VIII), Rome 1986; V.A. Sirago, Gli Ostrogoti in Gallia secondo le Variae di Cassiodoro: REA 89 (1987) 63-77; S.J.B. Barnish, The Work of Cassiodorus after His Conversion: Latomus 48 (1989) 157-187; R. McPherson, Rome in Involution: Cassiodorus's Variae in Their Literary and Historical Setting, Poznan 1989; S. Leanza, Cassiodoro: dalla corte di Ravenna al Vivarium di Squillace, atti del Convegno internazionale di studi, Squillace 25-27 October 1990, Soveria Mannelli 1993; A. Stüven, Rechtliche Ausprägungen der "civilitas" im Ostgotenreich. Mit vergleichender Berücksichtigung des westgotischen und des burgundischen Rechts, Frankfurt a.M. 1995; J. Moorhead, Cassiodorus on the Goths in Ostrogothic Italy: RomBarb 16 (1999) 241-259; C. Rohr, La tradizione culturale tardo-romano nel regno degli Ostrogoti - il panegirico di Ennodio a Teoderico: RomBarb 16 (1999) 261-284; P. D'Alessandro, Agostino, Claudiano Mamerto, Cassiodoro e i Disciplinarum libri di Varrone, in Mousa. Scritti in onore di Giuseppe Morelli, Bologna 1997; A. Soby Christensen, Cassiodorus, Jordanes and the History of the Goths: Studies in a Migration Myth, Copenhagen 2002; G. Hafner, Cassiodor: ein Leben fur kommende Zeiten, Stuttgart 2002.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

CASTING LOTS for JESUS' CLOTHING (iconography). The gospel account of the soldiers who played a game for Christ's tunic (Mt 27:35; Mk 15:24; Lk 23:34; Jn 19:23-24; see Ps 22:18) does not appear in ancient Christian art before the *Constantinian peace, the moment that, alongside other scenes from the passion, it was introduced to recall one of the steps that marked Christ's victorious earthly journey. The scene was represented for the first time, according to A. Ferrua (Le pitture, 74-75, pls. 72-73; Kötzsche-Breitenbruch, Die neue Katacombe, 42-45), on a painting from the catacomb of the Via Dino Compagni at *Rome, which is datable to the 2nd half of the 4th c. Two soldiers depicted on the sides of an instrument used for games, made up a sort of framework that maintained a rotating urn in the form of a vessel from which emerged two small discs; in the background, a building is represented, perhaps the sepulcher of Christ, with two shields on the sides. The iconographic schema, entirely similar to the one that reappears on miniatures and early medieval ivories (E.T. De Wald, The Illustrations of the Utrecht Psalter, Princeton, NJ 1942, 13-14, pl. XIX; A. Goldschmidt, Die Elfenbeinskulpturen aus der Zeit der karolingischen und sächsischen Kaiser. VIII-IX Jahrhundert, I, Berlin 1914, 20, 66, nn. 31 and 132 a, pls. XV, LVII), makes very probable the identification of the scene proposed by A. Ferrua. In the Eastern world, the episode was found for the first time in a miniature of the Evangelary of *Rabbula from the year 586 (Cecchelli, Rabb. Gosp., 69-71), on an iconography very different from the Western one: three soldiers, seated under the cross, are in the act of playing a game of morra for the tunic (i.e., an Italian game in which one guesses the number of fingers held up simultaneously by another player, similar to the American game of odds and evens). The same figurative schema—evidently characteristic of the Eastern world—appears, substantially the same, on early and late medieval *Byzantine icons, one of which is preserved in the convent of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai, which can be dated to the 8th c. (K. Weitzmann - M. Chatzidakis - K. Miatev - S. Radojčić, Frühe Ikonen. Sinai, Griechenland, Bulgarien, Jugoslawien, Wien-München 1966, LXXIX, n. 6).

A. Ferrua, Le pitture della nuova catacomba di Via Latina, Città del Vaticano 1960, 74-75, pls. 72-73; E. Lucchesi Palli, s.v. Morraspiele: LCI 3, 281-282; L. Kötzsche-Breitenbruch, Die neue Katakombe an der via Latina in Rom. Untersuchungen zur Ikonographie der alttestamentlichen Wandmalereien: JbAC 4 Erg.-Bd., Münster 1976, 42-45; D. Goffredo, s.v. Soldati che si giocano le vesti di Cristo: TIP, 279-280.

V. Fiocchi Nicolai

CATAPHRYGIANS. Followers of *Montanus, so called from the place where this heretical movement began, between Mysia and Phrygia. According to the *Muratorian fragment (4), they had writings through which they spread their doctrines. The sect was founded in the 2nd c.: the name "Montanists" was much later (Cyr. of Jer., Catech. XVI, 8; Did. Alex., Trin. III, 18; CTh XVI, 5, 48), but it survived and became definitive. Earlier writers used the circumlocution "heresy according (kata) to the Phryges" (Euseb. HE V, 16,1; VI, 20,3), further shortened to "according to the Phryges" (Epiph., Haer. XLVIII, 1; XLIX, 1) and thus "Cataphrygians" (John Dam., Haer. LXXXVII). The movement, particularly widespread in Asia and active under various names, disappeared toward the 6th c., though there is still evidence of them in the 7th c., when the emperor *Leo the Isaurian still sought their conversion. Its doctrinal cornerstones were the prophetic revelations of *Maximilla and Prisca, marked by a severe *ascesis conceding nothing to human nature, repudiation of the role of the hierarchy, identification of the Father with the Son, imposition of celibacy, and a claim to the discernment of spirits.

Eusebius, Vita Costant. III, 64-65; P. de Labriolle, Les sources de l'histoire du Montanisme, Fribourg 1913, repr. New York 1980; T.D. Barnes, The Chronology of Montanism: JTS 21 (1970) 403-408; D. Powell, Tertullianists and Cataphrygians: VChr 29 (1975) 33-54; F. Blanchetière, Le montanisme originel: RSR 52 (1978) 118-134; 53 (1979) 1-32; A. Strobel, Das heilige Land der Montanisten, Berlin 1980, 10-64; 222-291; Ch. Trevett, Montan- ism: Gender, Authority and the New Prophecy, Cambridge 1996; Id., Montanist Inscriptions and Testimonia: Epigraphic Sources Illustrating the History of Montanism, Macon, GA 1997; A. Stewart-Sykes, The Original Condemnation of Asian Montanism: JEH 50 (1999) 1-22.

E. Peretto

CATECHESIS

Introduction - I. Etymology and meaning - II. First and second centuries - III. Third century - IV. Fourth and fifth centuries - V. Sixth century - VI. Seventh century.

Introduction. We will confine ourselves to elementary oral religious instruction, especially as it was imparted during *initiation into a worshiping community. The recipients are, in the first place, the initiates themselves and/or the parents, their sponsors (R. Turcan, Initiation: RAC 18, 87-159; P.-M. Gy, La notion chrétienne d'initiation, in Id., La liturgie dans l'histoire, Paris 1990, 17-39). Initially elementary instruction coincided with the missionary message (the kērygma) and was not strictly distinguishable from it (see, e.g., Acts 8:12; 18:8). In its later development it became baptismal instruction on faith, on the conduct of one's life and on the *sacraments of initiation (prima fidei rudimenta: Hilar. Arel., vit. Honorat. 5 [SC 235, 82]); this was divided into: (1) the catechumenate (M. Metzger et al., Katechumenat: RAC 20 [2003] 497-574) and postbaptismal *mystagogy (see Cyril of Jer., Cat. 18,33); (2) preparation of parents and godparents for the *baptism of babies; and (3) the ongoing daily element of catechesis in the Late Antique and Early Medieval *liturgy of communities and *monasteries. Catechesis thus understood is distinguished from normal education and scholarly formation (enkyklios paideia); within Christianity it is distinguished by its purpose (and not necessarily by its form and name) from ordinary *Sunday, daily and festal homilies (M. Sachot, Homilie: RAC 16, 155-175), though candidates for baptism were usually among the hearers of these latter homilies. At the same time, baptized persons also listened to catechesis and to mixed forms of catechesis and homily. We will not address here the teaching given to Christian officeholders or catechesis within monasticism.

I. Etymology and meaning. Etymologically, katēchēsis derives from katēchein, "to instruct orally" (= to give/receive information); against the meaning "to resound deeply" (e.g., from the stage; cf. G. Schneider, "κατηχέω": ExegWbNT 2 [1981] 673-674, with A. Knauber, Zur Grundbedeutung der Wortgruppe κατηχέω—catechizo: Oberrhein. Pastoralblatt 68 [1967] 291-304, 294.299); according to Knauber (299) it is to allow the elementary presentation to "resound in the ear and the heart." The verb and its derivatives are late, are not in the LXX, and are rarely found in *Hellenistic Jewish writers (Josephus, vit. 65; Philo, leg. ad Gai. 198). The verb katēchein appears eight times in the NT, two of these with the ordinary meaning of "communicate/tell" and in the passive "be instructed /come to know" (Acts 21:21, 24); six times in a more technical sense of "instruct/teach" (Lk 1:4; Acts 18:25; Rom 2:17-21; 1 Cor 14:19; Gal 6:6 [Lat. catechizare]; H.W. Beyer, "κατηχέω": ThWbNT 3 [1928] 639): in Paul it becomes a technical term for Christian instruction; A. Knauber (302-303) is skeptical: in no place does catechesis have the modern meaning. The term therefore has multiple meanings (polisemy) and takes on a religious meaning according to its object, in this way finally evolving into the Christian meaning (A. Turck, Katēchein et Katēchēsis chez les premiers Pères: RSPhTh 47 [1963] 360; A. Knauber, 295-304).

Katēchein was used to mean "ecclesiastical instruction" for the first time in 2 Clem. 17,1 (A. Turck, 360; G. Schneider, 673; also A. Knauber, 360; G. Schneider, 301: early concretization). *Irenaeus uses katēcheito (Adv. haer. 3, 12,7 [SC 211, 208; ancient Lat. tr.: audierat]; cf. Rom 2:18: katēchoumenos ek tou nomou); but more often kēryssein, didaskein and paradidonai. The apocryphal acts of the *apostles frequently use katēchein in reference to "faith" and "baptism" (Act. Barn. [AAA 2,2,296]; Act. Paul. et Thecl. 39 [1,265]; further documentation: A. Turck, 364-366). The noun katēchēsis "(oral) instruction," but also "rumor," appears first (Dion. Hal. [1st c. BC] Demosth. 50; Cic. Att. 15,12; cf. Orig. C. Cels. 3,40; further documentation: A. Knauber 300-301) and is extended, with "catechumenate," to become a technical term for elementary ecclesiastical instruction in the developed liturgy of Christian initiation (see O. Pasquato - H. Brakmann, Katechese [Katechismus]: RAC 20 [2003] 444: Jerusalem). The above-cited writings from the discourses of Cyril of Jer. (RAC 20, 442-443) are later scribal additions (A.A. Touton; PG 33, 152). *John Chrysostom still usually calls his catecheses didaskalia or logos, and katēchēsis only once (T.H. Finn 60-61). At the end of the *Late Antique period, in *Antioch and *Constantinople, in particular the discourses (now once a year) of the bishop to the candidates for *baptism are called catechesis or theiai katēchēseis. The term katēchēsis has been borrowed in *Coptic to indicate religious discourses by ecclesiastical authorities, even those not aimed at baptismal preparation (Pachom. cat. 1 [CSCO 159/Copt. 23,1]; Horsies. cat: therein, 66; Ps-Pet. I Alex. hom. in Christ. bapt. [T. Orlandi, Omelie copte, Turin 1981, 30]).

As translations from Greek into Latin we find catechesis and catechizare in the Vetus Latina (Acts 18:24; Gal 6:6; Aug. C. Cresc. 1,11,14) and *Tertullian (Adv. Marc. 4,29,10; Cor. 11,4; Idol. 10,6: the teacher, qui de idolis catechizat [40 Waszink / van Winden with comm.; ibid., 197: "a 'heathen catechumenate'"]). *Origen, *Rufinus and *Jerome translate katēchein as instruere, docere, rarely catechizare (see Eger. Peregr. 46: cathecisis). A catechesis of *Theodore of Mopsuestia is cited by Mario Mercator (5th c.) as a sermo catechismi (ACO 1,5,176; cf. Paulin. Med. and Possid.: O. Pasquato, K.: RAC 20, 458.467). Later catechizare refers to catechumenal action and thus to liturgical practice, and no longer to instruction (A. Knauber, 294).

II. First and second centuries.

1. New Testament: early Christian preaching, kerygma and catchesis of the apostles. Already characteristic of *baptism (Mt 3:7-12; Lk 3:7-18) is the prophetic-eschatological preaching of John the Baptist (J. Ernst: RAC 18, 522). Christianity is presented at *Pentecost (30?) with the *kerygma or first (Christian) apostolic preaching of *Peter (Acts 2:14-36), concluding in AD 70, when it detached itself from *Judaism. The official kerygma of Christ, died-risen-ascended-approved by the Father (Acts 2:32-33), aims at arousing in *pagans a comprehensive faith in the one God, in Christ (G. Groppo, Predicazione apostolica: J. Gevaert [ed.], Diz. di Catechetica, 508; C.H. Dodd, La predicazione apostolica e il suo sviluppo, Brescia 1978). A primitive Christian catechism with a fixed scheme (A. Seelberg, Der Katechismus der Urchristenheit, Leipzig 1903 [repr. Munich 1966]) cannot be identified. Both a dogmatic and an ethical component are always present (two ways, golden rule, two commandments, decalogue and beatitudes).

Formulas of confession and the creeds of the early church form the regula fidei. The mission, like Christ himself, is open to all (Mt 28:19; cf. U. Luz, Das Ev. nach Matthäus 4: EvKathKommNT 1,4 [2002] 429-458 [bibl.]). The kerygma is addressed first to Jews, then to *pagans (Acts 4:15-17; 17:16-34: Paul at the Athenian Areopagus), with references to *Stoic *philosophy and *Hellenistic *mysticism. In a fragment of the famous Kerigma Petri (100–120), it says that Christians worship God in a new way, as a tertium genus (H.-I. Marrou, "Geschichtsphilosophie": RAC 10, 765: tertium genus). By this elementary catechesis the Christians came to be recognized as a new group which clearly distinguished itself from "Jews" and "Greeks" (Gal 3:28). 1 Pet (late 1st/early 2nd c.) seems to be a primitive baptismal catechesis (N. Brox, Der 1 Petrusbrief: EvKathKomm 21 [1979] 19-22). Then came a more structured instruction, taking its cue from salvation history (OT) in Christ (C.H. Dodd, According to the Scriptures, London 1952, 126-127). Later, the forms of the kerygma and catechesis were adapted to the addressees (see C. Bissoli, Tracce catechistiche negli scritti del NT: Historiam Perscrutari, 467-481 [bibl.]; B. Maggioni, Gesù comunicatore della fede, ibid., 513-520; G. Leonardi, Il metodo educativo della comunità ebraica e di Gesù con i suoi discepoli. Continuità e innovazioni, ibid., 483-511 [bibl.]; G.P. Peron, Seguitemi! Vi farò pescatori di uomini (Mk 1,17), Rome 2000 [bibl.]). Later, the communities prayed the Our Father, as an initiation in prayer (Gal 4:1-7: here 6 and Rom 8:5-17; S. Sabugal, Il Padre nostro, Rome [4]1994, 28-36: Lk and Mt).

2. Apostolic Fathers. The *Didache (K. Niederwimmer, Die Didache: KommApostVät 1 [1989]; H. van Sandt/D. Flusser, The Didache: CompRerIudNT 3,5, Assen 2002) has links with both Judaism and *paganism. "This catechetical, liturgical and disciplinary manual, intermediary between the NT and the apostolic Fathers, appears between 50/70" (J.-P. Audet, La Didaché. Instruction des Apôtres, Paris 1978, 219), or later. It is addressed to a disciple, perhaps pagan. It includes the decalogue; chs. 11-13, on the *apostles, prophets and teachers, may go back to Syrian *Antioch (ibid.), to a pagan community (see Bishop; Diakonia - Diaconate). The eschatological part (ch. 16) goes back to Jewish tradition. The teaching of the two ways (ch. 1), ethical-wisdom (OT) and nondualistic, takes up a Jewish model (Dt 30:15), enriching it with the commandment to love (S. Giet, L'énigme de la Didaché, Paris 1970, 56-71) and with elements of the Sermon on the Mount. The didaskaloi have a role similar to that of Jewish didaskaloi (ibid., 29-30). The "two ways" owe to the Manual of Discipline (3,15-22) of Qumran "the whole framework of their development" (J.-P. Audet 159), animating it with love of God and neighbor (Mt 5:3–7:27; Lk 6:20-49; A. Sand, "Goldene Regel": LTK[3] 4,821-822). The result is something like a set of notes following the primitive—catechesis. A treatise on *virtues and vices, an essential "catechetical space," prior to baptism, something like catechesis for new converts (V. Saxer, Les rites, 37-40; G. Schöllgen, Art. Didache: LTK[3] 3, 207-208).

The model of the two ways continues in the Epis- tle of Barnabas (ca. 130) (Ep. Barn. 18,1–21,1): the true covenant is sealed with Jesus in the hearts of believers. Postbaptismal catechesis receives special emphasis (Ep. Barn. 2–17) (F.R. Prostmeier, Der Barnabasbrief: KommApostVät 8 [1999] 77-78). The Epistle of Barnabas attests the presence of testimonia (Jewish and Christian) in catechesis (P. Prigent).

2 Clement (140–150) also has links to Judaism, with the Jewish-Qumranic two ways, but with references to the redemption (Christological hymn: 1,4-8) as the grace of light (4a), an allusion to baptism as illumination, which *Justin will call phōtismos. From baptism is derived the "homologia" (confessio, 3,4) for preserving one's baptism (E. dal Covolo, Custodire il battesimo [. . .]. 2CL, in La cristologia nei Padri della Chiesa, Rome 1993, 160). There is a link with paganism: the earthly Christ as "Father" gives new life in baptism (second creation), a second zōē in contrast with the first bios (F. Bergamelli, Il Cristo della 2CL [2Clem. 1,4-8; 9, 5-10] e il Cristo di Antiochia [Eph. 7,2], 141). It is a homily which comments on the liturgical biblical texts (19,1; 15,2; 17,3); it seems to be *mystagogical catechesis, read to neophytes during the Easter season (A. Lindemann, Die Clemensbriefe: HNT 17 [Tübingen 1992]).

At the end of this period (140/150) the *apocalyptic genre appears with the Shepherd of *Hermas, imitating 4 Esdras (N. Brox, Der Hirt des Hermas, Kommentar zu den Apostolischen Vätern 7, Göttingen 1991, 476-485). The Shepherd is a catechesis of postbaptismal *conversion/penitence (A. Hilhorst: RAC 14, 685) in which the difficulty of abandoning pagan ways is evident (Vis. III, 15,3). Candidates to baptism and neophytes must avoid a priori every sin after baptism (Mand. 4,3,3-6; Sim. 9,18,1-2). It contains other charismatic functions: itinerant missionaries (apostoloi), teachers (didaskaloi) (Vis. 3,5,1; Sim. 9,15,4; 16,5), numerous prophets. The theme of the two ways reappears (Mand. 6,1), personified in the two angels (Mand. 6,2,1-9). *Penitence is the heart of the Shepherd: there is only one remission of sins, through baptism (Mand. 4,3,1-2; R. Joly, Le milieu complexe du Pasteur de H: ANRW 2,27,1; 524-551; P. Henne, L'unité du Pasteur de H. Tradition et rédaction, Paris 1992 [bibl.]).

3. Apologists. Justin (d. 165?) became a Christian (Acta Iustini 2,3) in the mid-2nd c., ca. 130 (Eus. HE 4,18,6; S. Heid, Art. Iustinus Martyr I: RAC 19, 813). He ran a school of Christian philosophy at *Rome (Acta Iustini 2,3); this was not a catechetical school (Ph. Bobichon). The first evangelization (prebaptismal catechesis) of a pagan was done by a layperson; a school of formation followed (1 Apol. 61,2). Justin's catechesis was addressed to Jews and pagans; with Trypho the Jew, he argues that the OT prophecies have been fulfilled in the NT in Christ (Dialogue with Trypho). With pagans his catechetical strategy is different. He says that the "Word . . . gives the seed" (spermatikos logos) (1 Apol. 5,4; 46,2.4); worship of the gods is worship of the devil (2 Apol. 5,3-4; S. Heid 837.842). He rejects the pagan myths (1 Apol. 54,1-4; 54,8), which he takes from pagan and Jewish writings (1 Apol. 54,8: Perseus; Dial. 70,1: Mithras). The facts about Jesus do not parallel the pagan myths. The pagans have imitated the Christian mysteries (1 Apol. 62,1: baptism; 1 Apol. 66,4). The teaching of Christ and of the prophets does not derive from Greek ideas (1 Apol. 23,1-6). For Justin, baptism is the washing for a new birth through the remission of sins (1 Apol. 61,6-13; 66; Dial. 13), by which the person, who before trusted in idols and *magic, is now consecrated to God (1 Apol. 14,2-3).

Baptism is the terminal point, "illumination" (phōtismos): the newly baptized is "illuminated" (1 Apol. 65,1), having left the darkness of paganism and Judaism. Christian symbolism refers to Christ, "the light of the world" (Jn 1:9), through baptism (Clem. Al., Paed. 1,26.32). "This washing is called illumination" (1 Apol. 61,12-13), which, in contrast with pagan mystery baptisms, produces an ontological/supernatural transformation (R. Turcan 141-143; G. Filoramo, Luce e gnosi. Saggio sull'illuminazione nello gnosticismo, Rome 1980; Id., Il risveglio della gnosi ovvero diventare dio, Rome - Bari 1990). Finally, in Justin, prayer "opens the doors of light" (Dial. 7). He was the first to describe the baptismal and Sunday eucharistic celebrations: the dies solis becomes in a Christian sense the day of light, of the *resurrection of Christ, arisen from the East (Lk 1:78): "We gather everyone together on the day of the sun" (1 Apol. 67,3). "In this way our life arises on Sunday" (*Ignatius, Magn. 9,1).

*Theophilus of Antioch (2nd half of 2nd c.) wrote the treatise Ad Autolycum which, though apologetic, is also catechetical/missionary (V. Monachino), not by its use of the term, but for its catechetical character: "Try . . . to meet with me more frequently, so that listening to the spoken word you can accurately learn the truth" (2,38). Its aim is the conversion of the pagan Autolycus, a catechumen in the broad sense, being a "rudis"—one to be instructed in the rudiments of the faith. It is an essential, not an exhaustive, catechesis, using an enculturated missionary strategy. The objects of Theophilus's catechesis are biblical/Jewish/Christian monotheism (as against pagan polytheism) and conversion to faith as the condition for "seeing" God "with the eyes of the soul" after purification from sin. Like the blind, "you also,

O man, have the eyes of your soul veiled by the cataracts [hypokechymenous: from hypocheomai, a medical term] of your sins and by your wicked deeds" (1,2). Unlike in the Bible, the theme of vision predominates (G. Kittel, "ἀκούω": ThWb 1 [1933] 216-227). A second image in Theophilus's catechesis is "the mirror of the soul": purity of *soul allows one to see God (1,2). A third image he uses is a "visual therapy" regarding conversion: "Entrust yourself to the physician (God) and he will operate [parakentēsei, from parakenteō: remove the cataracts from your eyes] on the eyes of your soul and your heart. . . . If . . . you live in a pure, holy and just way, you can see God" (1,7) (F. Bergamelli, Il linguaggio simbolico, 74-79; E. Kunz, "Glaubenslicht": LTK[3] 4,718-719); he uses images to express trust (peasant/earth, navigation/boat, patient/doctor: 1,8). The dogma of the *resurrection of the body, unacceptable to a Greek, is proposed by Theophilus with proofs arranged in an ascending "climax" from the inanimate world (seasons/days/nights), to the animate world (seeds/fruits), to the heavenly world (the moon, which decreases/dies/rises), to the human being (sickness/healing) (1,3): the whole universe bears the imprint of the resurrection, based for him on the biblical/Jewish/Christian concept of creation; the resurrection is a re/creation (2,26): "Do you not believe, O Autolycus, that the God who created you could also make you again?" (1,8) (on the creed in Theophilus, S. Sabugal, Io credo, 166-169).

4. Irenaeus. The context of his Adversus haereses (2nd half of 2nd c.) is the church's fight against *gnosticism. The work also aims to render neophytes firm in the faith and immune to the seductions of *heresy (N. Brox, Irenäus v. Lyon: RAC 18, 828). In his most recently discovered epideixis (RAC 13, 828-829) *Irenaeus presents his work Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching (Epideixis tou apostolikou kērygmatos) to Marcian (the work is indirectly addressed to the public) as *orthodox teaching against heretics (Epid., 99), "much material . . . in a few pages" containing "the basic lines of the body of truth," so he would have "in hand the proofs of the divine realities" (Epid., 1) (see E. Peretto, Ireneo di Lione, Epideixis. Antico catechismo degli adulti, Rome 1981, 25-26). The work's first part (3b-42a) treats, in connection with the regula fidei, the themes of *creation, fall, the beginning of salvation history, *incarnation and Christ's saving work. The second part (42b-97) presents a series of scriptural prophetic proofs for the preexistence of the Son of God, his birth as a man, his miracles, sufferings and glorification in view of a new people taken from among the pagans. The metaphor of the two ways also appears (Epid., 1). The work uses types of apologetical and catechetical texts (N. Brox: RAC 18, 829; G. Kretschmar, Katechumenat/Katechumenen I: TRE 18 [1989] 1-5). It is an "ancient adult catechism" (E. Peretto: subtitle) or a "catechism of primitive Christianity"; to call it the "oldest catechesis of the church" in a technical sense (P. Drews) seems exaggerated (N. Brox, Einleitung zur Epideixis: Fontes Christ. 8,1 [1993] 26-27 with notes 27). "We probably have here a daily catechesis" (ibid., 28). Moving from the gospel, catechesis has now become a narratio, a simple genre (Acts 7:2-53; 10:34-43), esp. in the Christian initiation of catechumens. It is based, with an anti-*Marcionite and antignostic objective, on the Bible's typological meaning, which assures the unity of OT and NT. Irenaeus refers the baptizand to the regula veritatis, which he receives from the church (V. Grossi, Regula veritatis e narratio battesimale in sant'Ireneo: Augustinianum 12 [1972] 437-463). The baptismal narratio explains that God wants to reestablish in each person the prototype of the first man; it extends from the creation to the resurrection (Irenaeus, Epid. 19-20.22-24.77.93-96). The Christian vision and catechesis are also distinguished from gnosis (G. Filoramo, Le scuole catechistiche, 559-585). Basic elements of baptism are light-darkness, life-death, truth-ignorance and error (O. Pasquato, Ireneo: J. Gevaert [ed.], 360-361). From the end of the 2nd c., preparation for baptism led to an organized and demanding catechumenate (O. Pasquato, K.: RAC 20, 437; M. Metzger - W. Drews - H. Brakmann, Katechumenat: RAC 20, 497-574) in which, with penitence, *fasting and various rites, catechesis played a principal role. The creed and the rite of traditio and redditio developed from the baptismal narratio with its three questions to the baptizand on faith in the *Trinity (see O. Pasquato, Catechese [Katechismus]: RAC 20, 463).

III. Third century.

1. In the East.

Clement of Alexandria* (A. Knauber, Ein frühchristl. Handbuch [1972] 311-334; R. Turcan, 150). The theme of Clement's Stromata is the formation and education of youth (Strom. 6,1,3), i.e., the conduct of life (politeia), "as it is awakened by katēchēsis, together with pistis, and makes the soul fit for the beginning of 'gnostic knowledge.'" In Strom. 6 he describes the gnostic's conduct. By katēchēsis Clement means "guidance in *ascetical fomation for a religious-moral orientation of life" (A. Knauber, 317). This basic instruction prepares one for an initiation into the mysteries of salvation and baptism. The Paedagogus is addressed to candidates for baptism (Paed. 1,1,1.12-24). Clement refers to Rom 10:17 and develops the biblical and classical motif of "listening" (10,96,2; 10,104,4). To believe and understand are a new way of hearing (ibid.), the basis of an instruction which, through Christ, infuses spiritual food for eternal life (Paed. 1,35,3; 1,36,4). Catechesis is elementary instruction which at the same time renders visible the Savior who is preached (kēryssōn kai katechōn: Paed., 5,6,37). At first, the terms katēchein and katēchēsis had a more limited meaning: we call "fathers" those who have instructed us in religion (hoi katēchesantes: Strom. 1,1,3).

Both prebaptismal catechesis (spiritual fasting and prayer; C. Nardi, Il battesimo in Cl. Aless., Rome 1984, 142) and baptismal catechesis can be recognized in Clement. It is not possible to believe and arrive at baptism without catechesis (Ecl. 28,3). Then follows the teaching of true gnosis (Ecl. 16,1). Key for Clement is the role of Christ as a break with idolatry and pagan customs (Protr. 8,77,1–12,123,2). Christ, the new *Orpheus, frees the catechumen from *evil (1,3,2). The Protrepticus transforms the deep dispositions of the catechumen (1,7,1-3); the word of the Paedagogus has the task of healing the passions and must result in a transformed life (Paed. 1,3,1-3): it is the stage between conversion-catechumenate and the perfect life (1,3,3). The purpose is to restore the person to likeness with God (1,9,1). But the personal level opens out onto the communal: the baptized form a new people (1,15,2). Baptism is perfection: "We attain perfection [teleioumetha] when, having received the Head, Christ, we are the church" (1,18,4). The whole process culminates in the *divinization of the person (1,98,3), who responds to God's love (philanthrōpia: 1,63,1.3) with love (antagapan: 1,9,1). The imitation of Christ now guides the spiritual growth of the baptized (1,98,2-3). V. Saxer, 65-99; O. Pasquato, Cl. Aless.: L. Boriello et al. (eds.), Diz. di Mistica, Vatican City 1998, 312-315; on the divinization of the Christian in the Fathers, see O. Pasquato, Padri: 365; on the meaning of "mystery" see Id., 959-964. On the so-called school of Alexandria, see W. Liebeschütz, Hochschule: RAC 15, 898-900 and C. Scholten, Die alex. Katechetenschule: JbAC 38 (1995) 16-37.

Origen (ca. 185–253). At *Caesarea, *Origen taught philosophy in its moral sense (Greg. Thaum., Discorso a Origene, ed. H. Crouzel: SC 148 [1969]). In Origen we find two levels of teaching (cf. Rom 14:2; 1 Cor 3:2) and two categories, the "simple" and the "perfect" (Com. Jo. 13,33.37; In Lev. hom. 1,4 [SC 286, 80]; In Num. hom. 27,1,2 [SC 461, 272]), with the lower level (literal exegesis) for the simple, and the higher level (spiritual or typological exegesis) for the perfect (In Lev. hom. 1,1.4 [SC 286, 66-70. 78-84]). The Bible is comparable to light and solid food (In Num. hom. 27,1 [SC 461, 270]; In Jos. hom. 9,9 [SC 71, 264]; In Hes. hom. 7,10 [352,272]; In Ez. hom. 7,10 [SC 71, 264]; M. Simonetti, Origene catecheta: S. Felici [ed.], Valori attuali, 93-95; Id., Origene: J. Gevaert [ed.], 474-475). A differentiated teaching also existed among the gnostics. In homilies to the people of Caesarea, Origen considered himself a presbyter/homilist: presbyter nominor et verbum Dei videor praedicare (In Jesu Nave, hom. 7,6 [SC 71, 212]). He had a podium set up from which he spoke to the faithful, "the perfect and the simple," the baptized and catechumens (In Lev. hom. 6,2 [71, 262-266]); In Ez. hom. 6,5 [SC 352, 224-226]; In Lc. hom. 8,2 [SC 87, 164-166]).

In the prebaptismal context, Origen gives to katēchēsis and katēcheō the usual meanings (C. Cels. 3,40; Or. 2,4 [GCS Orig. 2, 301-303]); esp. for baptismal katēchēsis: In 1 Cor comm. & 63 [JTS 10 (1909) 38,2.5]. In Origen the first phase of catechesis is moral, to believers and catechumens, and seems to take place in the daily morning homilies (Expos. in Ps. 118 [SC 189, 184]: ta stoicheia [elements], stoicheō, stoicheiōsis; In Lev. hom. 6,2 [SC 286, 274]: "Root out your habitual vices and extinguish your barbarian practices"). In light of the criteria of initiation and the Christian catechumenate, pagan life (ton ethnikon bion) should be abandoned, along with the mystery cults (H. Crouzel: SC 87 [1962] 294, note 2), gnostic tendencies and other gods in order to love our God alone (In Ex. hom. 8,4 [SC 321, 254-256]; Exhort. ad mart. 17 [GCS Orig. 1, 15-16]). Knowledge of the initial kerygma is deepened (C. Cels. 3,15; M. Dujarier, Breve storia, 40-43) in accordance with the precept "do not sow among thorns" (Jer 4:3), which Origen commends to those who teach (tois didaskousi) "so that they do not entrust the words of Scripture [ta legomena] to hearers before they have broken up the uncultivated soil of their souls" (In Jer. hom. 5,13 [SC 232, 310-304]; cf. In Num. hom. 11,3 [SC 442, 28-34]). Daily catechesis should lead catechumens to decide for a perfect moral life (In Jer. hom. 4, 3 [SC 232, 262-266]). Origen then expounds the basic content of Christianity connected with the creed (Princ. praef. 2-4 [SC 252, 70-74]). But his catechesis aims above all at the discernment of Scripture (In 1 Cor comm. & 63 [JTS 10 (1909) 38]: "Those who distinguish among different texts in Scripture [cf. 1 Cor 14:7] are no longer called catechumens but believers"). Origen advises not to be content with "being washed, as some are, but not unto salvation. They have received the water, but not the Spirit" (In Ez. hom. 6,5 [SC 352, 224-226]). Baptism for Origen has a visible face (water-sign: symbolon) and an invisible one (Holy Spirit/reality: mystērion) (H. Crouzel, Origene et la structure du sacrement: BLE 63 [1962] 82-83). Baptism (immersion/emergence) is the sacramental repitition of Christ's death/resurrection, reproducing its effect (In Ex. hom. 5,3 [SC 321, 156-160]; In Jer. hom. 19,4 [SC 238, 186-188]; cf. Rom 6:3-5). Sunday, celebration of Christ's Pasch, is the day of baptisms (R. Cabié, Le dimanche, 52). Finally, a distinct catechesis for neophytes does not seem to be identifiable in Origen.

Ps.-Clementines. The "romance" recounting the adventures of *Clement of Rome's journeys with Peter is divided into two genres, Homiliae (H) and Recognitiones (R) (B. Rehm, Clemens Romanus II: RAC 3, 197-206; M. Vielberg, Klemens in den ps.-Klement. Rekognitionen: TU 145 [2000]). The work as a whole seems to elaborate on Eastern catecheses of the first centuries. The Tripoli homilies (PsClem. Rom. hom. 8-11; Recogn. 4-6) combine the preaching of *monotheism with the polemic against pagan idolatry, emphasizing the need for baptism (B. Rehm, 200-201). The baptismal catechesis provides katēchein, parainein (A. Di Donna, La catechesi nelle Ps-Clementine, Diss., Rome 1992, 29 n. 77). The catechesis is divided into (1) admission into the Christian community (H 1, 15-16; R 1, 12-13); (2) the content, which is salvation history as a traditio/redditio (R 3, 3-4); in the central part, the Tripoli Trilogy with catechetical schema, Peter invites the pagans to lay aside their dirty garments to "take refuge in God" (H 8,22,2–8,23,3; 9,10-11; R 4,17). Pagan catechumens have need of persistent instruction (adsiduis disciplinis) to receive the word of truth (H 11,2,1-3; R 6,2,2-5). The Ps.-Clementines are an instruction manual for an educated pagan in search of truth, and his initiation into Christianity; they present in elementary categories the faith that the great church expounded in theological categories, thinking of converts in the manner of Jewish proselytes, and subjecting pagans to a longer initiation due to polytheism and idolatry (H 3,3-4).

2. In the West.

Tertullian (ca. 155–after 220). For *Tertullian, the presupposition for admission to baptism is a basic knowledge of the faith (G. Schöllgen, Ecclesia sordida?: JbAC ErgBd. 12 [1984] 279-280; A. Hoblaj, Catechesi ai catecumeni negli scritti di Tertulliano, Diss., Rome 1984). There is a demanding catechumenate (tirocinia adultorum: De paen. 6,17) of three years: Fiunt, non nascuntur christiani (Apol. 18,4; E. Bickel: Pisciculi, Festschr. F.J. Dölger [1938] 54-61). To accompany the Jew or pagan as they become christianus is the aim of the guide of catechumens (teacher), usually a priest (A. Hoblaj, art. Tertulliano: J. Gevaert [ed.], 636-637). The catechumenate takes place on the margins of the community's worship. Catechesis is gradual (Bapt. 18,1): at the precatechumenal stage, for Jews there is the law of Moses; for pagans, the axiom anima naturaliter christiana (Apol. 17,6); in the second stage the catechumen is initiated in the faith; baptism requires a perfect faith (Bapt. 18). "We are not submerged in the water to put an end to our sins, but because we have put an end to them, we are already washed, morally" (De paen. 6,17). After baptism at Easter, for a week the neophytes receive mystagogical catechesis. In De baptismo, a synthesis of homilies/catechesis and a type of future mystagogical catechesis, Tertullian refutes the *Cainite heresy, i.e., that faith is enough for salvation, without matter (water), which is evil (Traité du baptème [SC 35, 11]). The treatise focuses on the water: "On the mystery of the water of our baptism, . . . this little book will certainly not lack value." "We little fishes [pisciculi], after the manner of our Ichthys, Christ, are born in the water, and we are not saved without remaining in the water" (Bapt. 1,1-3a). In the first chapters, personal faith plays only a background role (P.A. Gramaglia, Tertulliano. Il battesimo, Rome 1979, 10). In the water, of itself of little account, God works with power: thus the sacramental theology of water. The idea is added of liberation (from the devil) through Christ (9,1). Tertullian has a double schema for baptismal typology: (1) water/fecundity (creation): Spirit/regeneration (baptism) (3,1; 5,7), with Stoic influences. Through the *epiclesis the water is the vehicle of the Spirit, the church is the ark (8,4) and the mother of the baptized (20,5), and through a man (the priest) we are reconciled with God. (2) Water/destruction: baptism/liberation (see 1 Cor 10:1-13): baptism is the symbol of Christ's victory over the *demons. Tertullian also associates baptism with the idea of a military oath (De scorp. 4,5; signaculum fidei). Finally, in De oratione (CCL 1,257-274) the Our Father (*Lord's Prayer) is the text/basis of initiation in prayer (De orat. 1,1; 29,1; V. Severus, Gebet I: RAC 8,1235). The Our Father becomes a baptismal rite for Tertullian as well (S. Sabugal, Il Padrenostro, 42-43; V. Grossi, Il contesto battesimale, 205-220). We turn to God as to a "Father" (V. Grossi). The traditio/redditio of the Our Father stands alongside that of the creed. Tertullian's De orat. will be a model for later Latin commentaries, esp. that of *Cyprian (O. Pasquato, Katechese: RAC, 20, 439-440).

Traditio apostolica. *Hippolytus of Rome (d. ca. 235) situates catechesis in a quite demanding catechumenate, between two examinations (C. Scholten, Hippolytus II [v. Rom]: RAC 15, 524-526), in which the catechumen (audiens) hears catechesis for three years (cathecumeni per tres annos audiant), given by lay teachers (didascali) or clergy (ch. 17, ed. Botte; V. Saxer, 221-232); prayer follows the catechesis. The context seems to be that of the morning liturgy of the Word, before work, with the faithful, but in a special room (A.G. Martimort, TA: DS, fasc. 99/101 [1991] 1136-1146).

IV. Fourth and fifth centuries. With the *Constantinian change and the peace of the church, the new Christian regime brought new pastoral problems. Catechumens, even children, were considered Christians by civil law (H. Karpp, Christennamen: RAC 2, 1135; A. Stenzel, art. Kindertaufe: LTK² 6, 158-160). Despite the urging of bishops, not a few, even those in Christian families, delayed baptism, not infrequently to the end of life ("clinical baptism"): "One desires not so much to be a Christian, as to feign being one" (Aug., De cat. rud. 5,9); "It is not enough to be conceived, one must be born to reach eternal life" (Aug., Ad Simplic. 1,2,29). "The ancient catechumenate disappears as a pastoral structure, yielding its place to a catechumenal 'status' more or less definitive" (G. Groppo, Catecumenato antico: J. Gevaert [ed.], 135). Preparation for baptism was concentrated in a "mini catechumenate" of competentes (= phōtizomenoi; at Rome: electi), or adult candidates, during *Lent. The same external forms now hid different realities—yet it is the golden age of catechesis (M. Sachot, 161-163). Within the unity of the catechumenal way, a threefold catechesis developed: dogmatic, with commentary on the creed (A. Sabugal, Io credo, passim) and the Our Father (Id., Il Padrenostro, passim); moral catechesis, the oldest (one's behavior is confronted with the Christian faith); mystagogical catechesis in Easter week, with explanation of the rites of the three sacraments received: baptism with laying on of hands, anointing or confirmation, Eucharist (J. Daniélou, La catechesi, 168-184; Ch. Jacob, "Arkandisziplin," Allegorese, Mystagogie. Ein neuer Zugang zur Theologie des A. v. Mailand: Theophaneia 32 [1990] 119-280). Rites multiplied, offering richer material to *typology and *mystagogy. A relation was established between mystagogical catechesis and the novelty of the creed: what mystagogy unveils in the rites, the creed expresses in words; typology predominates.

The place of teaching in this period—in which, esp. due to the increase in infant baptism, the institution of a catechumenate disappeared—became the family and the church, with catechumens and faithful together both in the liturgy and in celebrations of the word. Language in the West was simplified (sermo humilis) in response to the needs of catechesis. The sociocultural context, however, was *pagan. The division between East and West was accentuated, while the axis of Christendom moved from the Mediterranean to the north; dialogue between Greeks and Latins was replaced by dialogue between Romans and Germans. A dual-focused structure was established: church/emperor, in dialectic tension. From the 4th c. differences between the Eastern and Western liturgies were introduced, within the diversity of language and culture. Catechesis was only for adults: instruction on the truths of faith and morality for the unbaptized. There is no catechesis of children until the end of the 6th c. Parental catechesis takes place in the Christian family (see, among others, J. Chrysostom, De inani gloria [SC 188]; tr. and comm. by M. Gärtner, Die Familienerziehung: RAC 6, 547; O. Pasquato, I laici in G. Crisostomo. Tra Chiesa, famiglia e città, Rome ²2000, 129-132; 145-147). The splendid catecheses of the 4th c. took place in this context.

1. In the East.
Jerusalem: catechesis of the basilica. In the martyrium of the basilica of the Holy Sepulchre, *Cyril of Jerusalem, as bishop (348–387), held protocatechesis and the 18 baptismal catecheses for the illuminandi (phōtizomenoi); in the rotunda of the Anastasis he, or his successor John II (386–417), held the five mystagogical catecheses for neophytes (neophytoi) (CPG 3585-3586, 3622; RAC 17, 709 [bibl.]; A.J. Doval, Cyril of Jerusalem Mystagogue: The Authorship of the Mystagogic Catecheses, Washington, DC 2001; W. Slenczka 75-143). Nearly contemporary sources are the Itinerarium Egeriae (ca. 381–384) (RAC 17, 707) and the 4th-5th-c. Jerusalem Lectionary (RAC 17, 707), with a double canon of biblical readings which from time to time preceded pre/postbaptismal catechesis; the catechesis was based on the theme of the pericope selections. For Cyril of Jerusalem, the catecheses are a well-organized combination of many teachings, a systematic instruction on rebirth through baptism (Procatech. 1,5). His dogmatic catechesis (Cat. 6-18) comments on the Creed of Jerusalem with references to biblical prototypes, which all meet in Jesus Christ (Cat. 10,8.12). Moral catecheses are aimed at transforming pagan customs into Christian conduct (Cat. 1-5); mystagogical catecheses after Easter at Jerusalem lead from signs to the light of biblical typology, and from the liturgical rites (including that of the Our Father) to the mysteries. The psychological effect of surprise is valued, and a magical interpretation, proper to the pagan mysteries, is avoided (F.J. Dölger). Symbolism causes an explosion of reality (P.-Th. Camelot). It is a comprehensive catechesis of the Spirit: "You were called 'catechumen,' surrounded by an exterior sound [periēchoumenos]. . . . Now it is no longer an exterior but an interior sound that echoes [enēchē] within you, because the Spirit, who dwells within you, makes of your soul a divine dwelling" (Procat. 6; F. Bergamelli, Cirillo di G.: J. Gevaert (ed.), 156; O. Pasquato, Cirillo di G.: L. Boriello et al., Diz. di Mistica, 306-310).

According to Egeria (Peregr. 46,1-47,5), the cathecisis of baptizands, lasting several hours, included instruction on all the Scriptures, and esp. on the resurrection and on faith, in the sixth and seventh weeks of Lent; finally, the explanation of the creed, here also both carnaliter and spiritualiter. In the octave of Easter, all of the mysteries of the initiation which had just taken place were explained to the neophytes (W. Slenczka 99-104; V. Saxer, Cirillo e Giovanni di Gerusalemme, C. prebattesimali e mistagogiche, Milan 1994, 159 n. 22. For Gregory of Nyssa: M. Naldini, Introduzione a Gregorio Niss., La Oratio Catechetica Magna, Rome [2]1990, 6-9).

*Antioch: John Chrysostom. As a presbyter at Antioch on the Orontes (386–398), Chrysostom took part in the catechesis of initiation. Besides the famous catechesis to candidates for baptism (Homilies on Statues; Cat. II, more properly On Statues 21 [a. 387]; CPG 4464), we know of other homilies: in 388 he gave the catechetical lecture, parallel to In Gen. hom. 1-32 (SC 433) for the community, Cat. I 1-3 (ClavisPG 4460/2) in preparation for baptism. The homily to the community on Easter night Eulogētos ho Theos (Cat., I 4 = III 3; ClavisPG 4467) also served as an "admonition specifically to those who were earlier considered worthy of baptism" (In Gen. hom. 33,1 [PG 53, 305]; Cat. I 4 = III 3); it was soon translated into Latin, and Augustine already had a secondary, reworked version (J.-P. Bouhot: REAug 17 [1971] 27-41; W. Wenk, Zur Sammlung der 38 Homilien des Chrysostomus Latinus, Vienna 1988] 12-13). In Act. princ. hom. 1-4 (PG 51, 65-112; hom. 5 lost), was also given to a mixed public; in 388, it constituted or replaced the usual catechetical lectures of the octave of Easter. In one of the following years Chrysostom gave the lectures of the so-called series IIIa (CPG 4468-4472), during the pre-Easter penitential time (Cat. III 1-2), in the community feast on the eve of Easter (Cat. III 4), and in Easter week to neophytes and to the community (Cat. III 5/8). Antiochene practice at this time differed from that of Jerusalem, esp. in the customary combining (it seems) of postbaptismal catechesis with the community homily, and in the explanation to "baptizands" already before (but near) baptism, to deepen their faith, certainty and experience (see Cat. III 2,22-27 [SC 50 bis, 145-149]). Chrysostom's preaching, dogmatically based, has value especially for the conduct of life (O. Pasquato, Catechesi dottrinale e catechesi morale in GC.: F. Vattioni [ed.], Sangue e antropologia. Riti e culto, 2, Rome 1987, 1039-1111). The discourses are biblical-liturgical (M.L. Guillaumin). They are called "catecheses" because their content "must leave a lasting echo within the listeners" (Cat. II, 1 [PG 49, 231]). The most important baptismal figures are spiritual marriage (J.-P. Cattenoz, Le baptême mystère nuptial. Théologie de s. J. Chr., Venasque 1993) and the enlistment of soldiers (stratologia; W. Slencka, 211-218).

Catechesis is structured in accordance with relationship of faith-sacrament-life. Faith is necessary "for pagan and Jewish catechumens." It is expressed in Apotaxis and Syntaxis (Cat. III 2, 18-20 [SC 50 bis, 143-145]). The sacrament is an action of Christ based on divine condescension (R. Brändle: RAC 18, 467-468). In baptism, God responds to faith, not to the water (Cat. III 2,26 [SC 50 bis, 147-148]). John Chrysostom sees in Christ the mystagogue who initiates into the mysteries. He privileges sight: only "the eyes of faith" recognize the nature of baptism. He is unclear on original sin (Cat. III 3,6 [SC 50 bis, 154]). Having become a child of God, the newly enlightened possesses a new light always, becoming "faithful" (Cat. I [SC 366, 167]; O. Pasquato, La priorità dell'educazione morale in GC.: S. Felici [ed.], Crescita dell'uomo nella catechesi dei padri (età postnicena), Rome 1988, 191-199). From Christ's side flowed water and blood: the first a symbol of baptism, the second of the Eucharist (Cat. III 3,16 [SC 50 bis, 160]); Christ formed the church from his open side. There is a close relation between Eucharist and church (O. Pasquato, Eucaristia e Chiesa in GC.: EphLit 102 [1988] 240-258). In postbaptismal catecheses he reveals not mystagogy but morality. "If, then, the gifts are spiritual, so must our works also be (Cat. III, 4, 27 [SC 50 bis, 196]; O. Pasquato, Rapporto, 58-61). In 388 or 390 at Antioch, Chrysostom commented on the Our Father (In Matth. hom. 19, 4-6 [PG 57, 277-282] and Orat. dom. [PG 51, 44-48]; S. Sabugal, Il Padrenostro, 46; Id., Abbà, 93-94; J.-P. Cattenoz, Le baptême mystère nuptial. Théologie de s. Jean Chrys., Venasque 1993; O. Pasquato, Cris. Giov.: J. Gevaert [ed.], 629-631; Id., Giov. Cris.: M. Sodi - A.M. Triacca, Diz. di Omiletica, 232-238; Id., I laici in Giov. Cris; P. Allen, Severus of Antioch as a Source for Lay Piety in Late Antiquity: Historiam Perscrutari 711-721; Ph. De Roten, Baptême et mystagogie. En- quête sur l'initiation chrétienne selon S. Jean Chrisostome [= LQF, 91], Münster 2005).

*Antioch: Theodore of Mopsuestia. (P. Bruns, Den Menschen mit dem Himmel verbinden. Eine Studie zu den katechet. Homilien des Theodor v. Mops. = CSCO 549/Subs. 89, Lovanii 1995; S. Gerber, Theodor v. Mops. u. das Nicänum. Studien zu den katechet. Homilien, Leiden 2000; W. Slenczka, 255-271). From Theodore, *presbyter at Antioch from 383 and from 392–393 bishop of Mopsuestia (died 428), we have 16 catechetical homilies, discovered in a *Syriac version (1932), published in the original by R. Tonneau - R. Devreesse (ed.), Les homélies catéchétiques de Théodore de Mops. = ST 145, Vatican City 1949. They are divided into two parts: De fide (Hom. 1-10) and De mysteriis (Hom. 11-16), including the explanation of the Our Father (*Lord's Prayer) (Hom. 11). Of these, only homilies 15 and 16 (on the Eucharist) are postbaptismal and post-Easter. The published text is based on manuscripts reworked (P. Bruns 35) for an educated public, as a guide for catechesis. Starting from the ecclesiastical creed, Theodore explains the Christian faith to pagan listeners using philosophical concepts and categories (P. Bruns 36); he offers a more than rudimentary introduction to the Christian faith. His explanation of the sacramental actions rarely employs *allegory. For him, Christian theology is not below pagan philosophy—which he in general considers of little value—but rather introduces its listeners to the world to come (Hom. 1,3-4). The primary object of catechesis is God, one and triune: he is one (against polytheism: 9,3 and 16) and is Father; the Son is consubstantial with him (against the Arians: 2,14-15); and the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father (against the *pneumatomachi). He distinguishes between Christus/in carne and Christus/in Spiritu: in the former, the human is mortal and changeable; in the latter, immortal and immutable. (*Ephesus and *Chalcedon prefer the reality of being [which is more Greek] to the historical sense [which is more biblical] [J.M. Lera].) Christ is the perfect man (against *Docetism: 13,8). The human being is the image of God (N. El-Khoury, Der Mensch als Gleichnis Gottes: eine Untersuchung zur Anthropologie des T. von M: OC 74 [1990] 62-71), a free spirit (against Greek fatalism), destined for *divinization. Baptismal regeneration becomes a typos of the eternal birth of the resurrection of the dead (against the pagans). The Eucharist is linked to baptism (S. Zincone). For Theodore, in the liturgy there is an exchange of visible and invisible realities (O. Pasquato, T.: M. Sodi - A.M. Triacca [eds.], Diz. di Omiletica, 1548-1552).

For catechesis in *Constantinople, *Mesopotamia, *Alexandria and *Egypt, see H. Brakmann: O. Pasquato- Id., Katechese (Katechismus): RAC 20, 451-457.

2. In the West.

*N Italy: Ambrose. (B. Paredi, La C. di S. Ambrogio, Milan 1957; E. Dassmann, Die Frömmigkeit des Kirchenvaters Ambrosius v. M., 1965; V. Monachino, S. Ambrogio e la cura pastorale a Milano nel sec. IV, Milan 1973; Ch. Jacob, "Arkandisziplin"; C.A. Satterlee, Ambrose of Milan's Method of Mystagogical Preaching, Collegeville, MN 2002). A catechumen until 374, when he was named bishop, Ambrose imposed catechesis for all: there was a partial catechesis for competentes (candidates for baptism) and the baptized, available through the celebration of the liturgy throughout the year via homilies, usually based on the biblical readings of the day. A fuller, more complete instruction of catechumens on the faith took place in a private setting, which might be led by prepared laypersons. Competentes received special catecheses as a group from the bishop on moral teachings, episodes of the patriarchs and precepts of the book of Proverbs (Myst. 1,1), and before Easter an explanation of the creed (with prior dismissal of catechumens) (Ep. 76 [20], 4 [CSEL 82,3,109]). Following baptism at Easter were mystagogical catecheses for the neophytes, who also at times received instruction addressed to them in post-Easter homilies to the entire community.

Among Ambrose's writings relating to catechesis are the Explanatio Symboli, De sacramentis and De mysteriis. The Explanatio Symboli (SC 25 bis, 46-58) is an anonymous MS of an assembly of Ambrose's traditio symboli: an introduction by the bishop on the name (conlatio: summary) and origin of the creed; first recitation of it by the bishop and clergy with a general explanation on the *Trinity and *incarnation; the catechumens join in the second recitation (dicamus Symbolum) with a detailed explanation of each article; a third recitation follows, with the articles grouped in fours; the catechumens must learn it by memory, never write it, nor communicate it to the uninitiated: we are in the late 4th c., with the Roman Creed. The tradition of the creed is linked to that of De sacramentis. Concerning De sacramentis (Botte, SC 25 bis, 22-23), Botte (Expl. Symb. 1-9: SC 25 bis, 46-58) follows the excellent ed. of O. Faller (CSEL 73,7 [1955]). The date is from 380–390. Mystagogical catechesis by Ambrose is found in two works: De sacramentis offers a reworked shorthand MS, unpublished, of six genuine homilies from an Easter week between 387–391 (F. Probst, Die Liturgie des vierten Jahrhunderts, Münster 1893, 232-239, followed by other scholars). Its authenticity is demonstrated by O. Faller (CSEL 73,7, Prol. 20-21; Botte agrees [SC 25 bis, 14]). De mysteriis is a free reworking of the material of De sacramentis, resulting in an almost completely new work. The two works must be a few years apart. The initiation to prayer and to the Our Father remain unpublished (see Cain et Ab. 1,9,35). Post-Easter homilies with special attention directed to neophytes are in De Isaac vel anima (E. Dassmann, Die Frömmigkeit, 197; Id. [ed.], Ambrosius v. M.: Über Isaak oder die Seele - De Isaac vel anima: Fontes Christiani [in print]; Id., Die Christusfrömmigkeit des Bischofs Ambrosius v. M.: Historiam Perscrutari 653-672).

As for Ambrose's method, he recommends that catechists pay attention to the dispositions of the listeners. With pagans, the catechist must draw inspiration from *Paul's discourse at the Areopagus (see Katechese (= K.): RAC 20, 425); for Jews, from the Bible (In Lc 6,104-106 [CCL 14, 211-213]). To catechumens before baptism, and to listeners or readers, Ambrose speaks of sacraments only with veiled hints (Ch. Jacob 121-129), using sacramental allegory (ibid., 147). He descibes figures and events of the OT and NT, on the one hand, as prefigurations of Christ and the church and, on the other hand, as type and figure of the sacraments. The biblical typoi of the sacraments offer the basic framework for the presentation of the prophetic and mystical meaning of the OT and NT (Ch. Jacob 188; F. Bergamelli, Ambrogio di M.: J. Gevaert [ed.], 29-30).

*N Italy: Zeno. From the bishop of Verona (an African?) are 90 Tractatus in two books (CCL 22). Some of these were used in a liturgical context; some are baptismal/Easter or moral homilies (C. Truzzi, Zeno, Gaudenzio e Cromazio. Testi e contenuti della predicazione cristiana per le chiese di Verona, Brescia e Aquileia, Brescia 1985). Zeno's exegesis is typological. His homilies are rich in references to baptism, esp. for candidates to baptism and neophytes. In the liturgy of the Easter Vigil Zeno presents the sacramentum Passionis with many OT figures, and the sacramentum resurrectionis, prefigured by the paschal lamb and by Jonah. Zeno's catechesis refers to OT typlogies of baptism, esp. the crossing of the Red Sea (1,46; 2,26; cf. Ambrose, De sacr. 1,6,20). The new vine is a figure of the ecclesia mater, whose neophytes are novellae vites (tender shoots); the bishop, the rusticus (farmer; 1,11,3), who with his workers (presbyter; 1,41,3) cares for the catechumens with frequent preaching (1,37,10; Ambr. Ep. 20,14), esp. during Lent (1,19,2). The favorite theme is baptism as a new birth resulting from the marriage between Christ and the church (1,3,3)—in the light of liturgical symbolism, the womb is the church (1,55), the bosom is the church (gremium ecclesiae) (1,3,7) and the church is the alveum genitale (the generative canal) (1,49), the tomb and place of life (see Cyr. of Jer., Cat. 20,4; J. Plumbe, Mater Ecclesia, Washington 1943, 94-97). Hence the effects of baptism: regeneration and divine sonship; the neophytes become brothers, members of a people (1,24), they form the corpus Christi (1,55) and have begun an eternal life (1,46,3). Baptism is essentially a paschal mystery; initiation culminates with catechesis on the Eucharist (2,13,187; G. De Paoli).

Aquileia: Chromatius. (V. Cian, La catechesi aquileiese nel IV secolo, Trieste 1993). *Chromatius was an eminent representative of catechesis at *Aquileia (bishop 388–407/8; for his Sermons and Treatises, see Lat. text, tr., ed. G. Banterle, Bibl. Ambr., Milan 1989, 1991; S. Tavano: RAC Suppl. 1, 542-544; S. Döpp, art. Italia II: RAC 18, 1329-1330; D. Gorgnali, Il mistero pasquale in Cr. d'Aq., Udine 1979; G. Trettel, Mysterium e sacramentum in s. Cr., Trieste 1979; C. Truzzi, op. cit.; M.V. Pasian, Il cristiano secondo Cr. d'Aq., Udine 2000; G. Trettel, Linee di ecclesiologia nel pensiero di Cr. d'Aq.: Historiam perscrutari 673-687). Among the homilies (CCL 9A, 3-182) of Ambrose's friend, besides some for the community with baptismal and Easter themes (Serm. 34 [Epiphany] and 16-17A [Easter homilies]), mixed in here and there is catechesis for "catechumens" (Serm. 15 on Jn 13), competentes (Serm. 18 on Jn 3; Serm. 40 [expos. orat. dominicae]; cf. Katechese: RAC 20, 481) and neophytes (Serm. 14 on Jn 5; cf. Serm. 50A: RevBénéd. 91 [1981] 225-230: present. and text). The conflict with pagans and Jews is lively (extremely harsh against the latter) (S. Tavano, 542-543), the language vivid, direct and rich with figures. Exegesis of the biblical texts is secundum litteram (Serm. 1,1; 15,2; 29,3), as well as iuxta allegoricum sensum (Serm. 1,1; cf. 11,2; 12,4; 24,3). The baptismal theology is traditional: ablutio peccatorum nostrorum et renovatio . . . vitae salutaris [the washing away of sins and the renovation . . . of the life of salvation] (12,40). After baptism the baptized must preserve baptismal grace (servare gratiam baptismi) (Serm. 14,4; 19,2), letting himself be transformed by the grace of Christ: de immundo mundus, de profano fidelis, de impudico castus, de haeretico catholicus [from worldly to unwordly, from unfaithful to faithful, from unchaste to chaste, from heretic to Catholic] (Serm. 2,5) (Chr. of Aq., Catechesi al popolo. Sermoni, ed. G. Cuscito, Rome 1979).

*Aquileia: Rufinus. The Expositio symboli (CCL 20, 133-182), attributed to Rufinus (d. 411; S. Döpp, 1330-1331) and written at the request of a Bishop Laurentius for the use of bishops and presbyters, explains the creed used in his homeland of Aquileia, highlighting the passages in which it differed from the Roman Creed (Symb. 3-5.16.41). The symbolon is a conlatio, a summary of the preaching of the apostles (A. Merkt, Symbolum: RQA 95 [2000] 27; cf. Ambrose, Symb. 3 [K.: RAC 20, 459]; John Cassian, Inc. c. Nest. 6,3 [CSEL 17, 328]), the standard and signum or indicium—orthodox preaching—by which Christians were recognized; it was not to be written down, but memorized (Symb. 2); in its simplicity it was a model of catechesis (Symb. 1-2). The liturgical traditio and redditio symboli, as used at Rome (Aug., Conf. 8,2,5), defend the faithful against heterodox teachings that fall outside the letter of the Christian message, and from falsifying additions (Symb. 2-3). The above-mentioned purification texts are "for the instruction of those who are young in Christ" and are beginning the life of faith (Symb. 1; cf. 18.36): ad instructionem eorum, qui prima fidei elementa suscipiunt, openly referring back to their catechesis (see 14: o fidelis auditor). The work uses scriptural prophecies about Christ as proof against the Jews (9,17). Pagan myths are ridiculed (9), but he mainly combats the accusation of the absurdity of the Christian faith (see H. Brakmann, K.: RAC 20, 455). The Expositio was later transcribed more than once, esp. in *Gaul by *Venantius Fortunatus in his Expositio symboli (MG AA 4,1, 253-258). (M. Villain, Rufin d'Aquilée commentateur du Symbole des Apôtres: RecSR 32 (1944) 129-156; C. Riggi, Rufino catecheta, in Rufino di Concordia e il suo tempo 1, Udine 1987, 169-193; M. Simonetti, Rufino. Spiegazione del credo, Rome [3]1993, 29-32.)

Near Aquileia: A ps.-Augustinus (Anonimo Veronese). G. Sobrero [(ed.) Anonimo Veronese: Omelie mistagogiche e catechetiche, ed. critica e studio, Rome 1992] places near Aquileia and in the second half of the 5th c. a large number of ps.-Augustinian catechetical homilies from N Italy at the time after the Council of *Chalcedon. B. Capelle (Travaux Liturgiques 3, Louvain 1967, 82-91), dates them about 550; A.G. Martimort (rec. Sobrero: BLE 94 (1993) 155) suggests Verona, not Aquileia or Milan. For other Italian homilists (Gaudentius of Brescia; Maximus I of Turin; Peter Chrysologus of Ravenna), see H. Brakmann, K.: RAC 20, 464-465).

Dacia: Here Bishop *Niceta of Remesiana (d. ca. 414) wrote six books of baptismal catecheses for competentes (Gennad., Vir. ill. 22 [70 Bernoulli]; A.E. Burn, Niceta of Remesiana: His Life and Works, Cambridge 1905; C. Riggi, Niceta di Remesiana. Catechesi preparatorie al battesimo, Rome 1985; J.-P. Bouhot, L'"Instructio ad competentes" de Nicetas de Rémésiana, in De Tertullien aux mozarabes, Festschr. J. Fontaine 1, Paris 1992, 281-290). Known as Instructio ad competentes, the work is lost except for some fragments and the present Explanatio symboli in the second redaction (Aquileia; 6th-7th c.; J.-P. Bouhot [287] reduces the certain part of the text with respect to the ed. of A.E. Burn and K. Gamber: CPL 647). As themes of the individual books, Gennadius presents (1) how candidates should prepare for baptism (competentes: ad baptismum electi) (frg. 1s. 6 [6f Burn]), with an explanation of their *exorcism; (2) de gentilitatis erroribus (frg. 4, 41 [8 Burn]), against the veneration of heroes; (3) de fide unicae maiestatis, praise of the one God against the polytheists, perhaps with a defense of the consubstantiality of the Son and of the Holy Spirit (lost); (4) against genealogies (lost), clearly on fatalism (fate) and astrology (horoscope); (5) de symbolo (frg. 5,4 and 7 [8.53 Burn]) and Explan. symb. [38-50 Burn], a homily to competentes on the redditio symboli, with an exposition of the *Apostles' Creed; (6) de agni paschalis victima (lost, certainly a catechesis for neophytes; see Gaudenz. Tract. 2 [CSEL 68, 24-32]). Niceta's work constituted not so much a collection of homilies to competentes as a kind of manual for catechists of converts from paganism, esp. barbarians (see frg. 1 [PLS 3, 189-190]). Niceta recommends against the pagans examinations, exorcisms and knowledge of the profession of faith in God the Father, and against the Jews, knowledge of Scripture (Expl. symb. 9 [47 Burn]).

Spain. Bishop *Pacian of Barcelona (d. before 392; RAC 15, 659-660) battled an enduring paganism in Spain. His homily De baptismo (SC 410, 148-164) is important, treating, to a mixed audience of baptized and competents (Bapt., 1,1; cf. De paenit. 2,2; Tract. 11,1), of the new birth in baptism, with the purification of the baptized from the original guilt of Adam, by whom they had been subjected to death (Bapt. 1,3). The new birth implied a break with the habits and sins of paganism: idolatria, crudelitas, fornicatio, luxuria, etc. (Bapt., 6,5), and produced freedom from eternal death unto eternal happiness (Bapt., 6,6-7). (J.M. Núñez Moreno, Il De baptismo di Paciano di B., in S. Felici [ed.], Esegesi e catechesi nei Padri, 2, IV-V c. Rome 1994, 105-112; C. Granado: SC 410 [1995] 32-34, 297-306.)

Africa. At the time of *Augustine, the N *African church counted only "a few pagans" (Cons. ev. 1, 14, 21.20, 29.25, 39; Serm. 302, 19). Besides the baptized, the Christian communities were in part composed of catechumens (cathecumeni = audientes: Aug. Serm. 132,1). Baptism of children was practiced, and not just in sickness or mortal danger. Others were accepted as infants or as children with particular rites, esp. with the first signatio crucis and the administration of salt among catechumens, though their baptism took place later (Aug. Conf. 1, 11, 17; De anim. 1, 12). Instruction, therefore, took into account: (1) pagan and Jewish converts; (2) candidates for baptism, including children (Symb. 1,1), from Christian families; and (3) baptized infantes (S. Poque, Un souci pastoral d'Augustin, la persévérance des chrétiens baptisés dans leur enfance: BLE 88 [1987] 273-286).

a. Augustine. The catechetical manual De catechizandis rudibus (CCL 46; cathecismi liber unus: Possid. Indic. 10 3, 7 [ed. A. Wilmart: Misc. Agostiniana 2, Rome 1931, 179]), written between 400–405 at the request of the deacon *Deogratias, a catechist, is composed of two parts: (1) catechetical advice (De cat. rud., 5-22) and (2) two models for introducing catechesis (primis instructionis sacramentis: Conf. 8, 2, 4), a longer (for an idiota urbanus) and a shorter, "if haste is required" (De cat. rud. 24-50.51-55). It is aimed at rudes—new arrivals (accedentes), esp. pagan, among whom many, perhaps even half, were educated, the rest "illiterate"—who after the usual examination of their motives (De cat. rud. 9-10) and an introductory instruction by means of appropriate rites (exsufflatio, signatio, donatio salis; ibid., 13,50), were accepted into the catechumenate. Phases of the catechesis were as follows: account (narratio), the opening to hope (cohortatio) and the acquiring of joy (hilaritatis comparatio). Account (narratio): the whole of salvation history is presented using a comprehensive historical approach (narratio plena), highlighting essential facts (mirabiliora) and noting secondary facts only rapidly (3,5; P. Siniscalco, Christum narrare et dilectionem monere. Osservazioni sulla narratio del "De cat. rud.": Augustinianum 14 [1974] 605-623; L. Perrone, Confessio et narratio. Introduzione al De cat. rud. di s. Agostino: Salesianum 65 [2003] 161-172). Thus emerge the key moments of salvation history (articuli temporis), principal among them being the "Christ event"; the others are summarized, with emphasis on the continuity between OT and NT: "The OT veils the NT, and the NT manifests the OT" (4,8). The aim of *revelation and of the narratio is charitas, such that "your listeners, hearing would believe, believing *hope, and hoping love" (ibid.). The opening to hope (cohortatio): the "hope of the resurrection" (7,11). Salvation history thus goes from the creation to the resurrection (against the pagans). The connection between catechesis and life is established, the horizon widening to include universal history (19,31). The hope of the rudis is the risen Christ, the mover of history. Acquire joy (hilaritatis comparatio): joy, in place of ennui, is necessary to the catechist and the catechized. Augustine lays out six elements that oppose joy and six remedies (10-15) (O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 466; J.-P. Belche, Die Bekehrung zum Christentum nach des hl. Augustinus Büchlein, "De cat. rud.": Augustiniana 27 (1977) 26-69; 28 [1978] 255-287; 29 [1979] 247-279; 32 [1982] 42-87, 282-311; O. Pasquato, Agostino: J. Gevaert [ed.], 23-25; M. Payà Andrés, Contenidos de la catequesis agustiniana: Augustinus 43 [1998] 383-396).

Augustine's catechetical homilies were catechesis in action. In the Africa of Augustine's time, the place where catechumens properly so-called, per omne tempus, were instructed, quae fides et qualis vita debeat esse christiani, was through the reading of Scripture in the liturgy and through the homilies ad populum that were part of the "mass," up to the dismissal of the catechumens = audientes (Aug., De fid. et op. 6,9; see Serm. 212,2: per scripturas et sermones ecclesiasticos; Serm. 214,1; on the missa catechumenorum, see Serm. 49,8). Every year before Easter they were invited to inscribe their name for baptism (nomendatio ad baptismum; In Joh. tract. 10,10; 11,1.5). Candidates were then told that, after their profession of faith and baptism, not only would they listen to Scripture, but they would also understand its meaning (Serm. 132,1,1). After this communication the competentes (definition: Serm. 216,1) were catechized, exorcised and scrutinized (catechizantur, exorcizantur, scrutantur: De fid. et op. 6,9). Topics of instruction included the creed and moral catechesis. Augustine's Serm. 228,3 (PL 38, 1102) informs us of the catalog of catecheses to competentes linked to the liturgy, including outside of the usual liturgical service: (1) sacramentum symboli (quod credere debeant), (2) sacramentum orationis (quomodo petant), (3) sacramentum fontis et baptismi. Mainly instructed on (4) sacramentum altaris, however, were the infantes, neophytes who had just entered. (For an overview of Augustine's Lenten homilies and those during the octave of Easter, see SC 116, 352-365; cf. H. Brakmann, K.: RAC 20, 469-470; for the bibl. on (1), (2), (3) and (4) see Id., 470-472).

More specifically, catechetical praxis of various kinds can be found in these sermons. Directed to beginners, as seen above, are two examples in De cat. rud., 16-25; 26-27. Directed to catechumens are the sermons on the creed (traditio symboli; Serm. 212,1; 214,12) containing "briefly . . . all that you believe" (Serm. 212,1): Symbolum est breviter complexa regula fidei (Serm. 213,1); finally, against the pagans, finis sine fine erit resurrectio carnis (Serm. 213,9). The creed having been explained, memorized and written on the heart ("secret of the arcanum"), it is rendered, i.e., recited (redditio Symboli) before the bishop (for the De fid. et symb. [ed. J. Zycha: CSEL 41 (1990) 1-32], cf. E.P. Meijring, Augustine: "De fide et symbolo," Amsterdam 1987). To competentes was imparted moral catechesis so as to replace pagan behavior with Christian: "We scatter the seeds of the Word, you yield the fruits of faith" (Serm. 216,1), ut competentes competenter adolescite in Christo, ut in virum perfectum iuveniliter accrescatis (Serm. 216,7). Directed to neophytes (infantes, nati a Christo: Serm. 228,1), who have received the three sacraments, is mystagogical catechesis; they are told the history of the bread and wine (Serm. 227,13). Augustine comments 7 times on the Our Father to the competentes and the fedeli, an initiation to Christian prayer that replaces pagan prayer to the gods: after the redditio Symboli they receive the oratio dominica (traditio Or. dom.), during the first eucharistic celebration. Augustine also comments on the Our Father elsewhere (see S. Sabugal, Il Padrenostro, 46-47; Id., Abbà, 96-104; S. Poque: SC 116 [1966] 65-69). In the African church the Our Father developed in close relation with the creed and became a baptismal rite (Serm. 228,3). How one must pray (traditio/redditio: Or. dom.; V. Grossi) corresponds to what one must believe (traditio/redditio: Symboli). Added now to the combination faith-sacrament-life is that of faith-prayer-life. Augustine also encourages neophytes and faithful through mystagogical catechesis (O. Pasquato, Eucaristia e Chiesa in Agostino: EphLit 102 [1988] 46-63). For the faithful Augustine offers post-baptismal or ongoing catechesis, through discourses and with De agone christiano l.1, a manual for the faithful, in which he explains the creed and moral precepts, mentioning 18 errors against the faith, written in humili sermone, containing regulam fidei et praecepta vivendi (Retract. 2,3; J. Gliscinski, Doctrina de comunicatione interpersonali eiusque applicationes in arte catechizandi rudes apud s. Augustinum, Diss., Rome 1979).

b. Quodvultdeus. Some ps.-Augustinian catecheses to competentes are today attributed to *Quodvultdeus, bishop of *Carthage until 439 (P. Langlois, Africa II: RAC Suppl. 1, 202-203; Sermones 1-3 de Symbolo ad catechumenos [CCL 60, 305-334]); given after the great exorcism of the Easter eve examination, they are instructions on orienting one's life, with an explanation of the creed. Other catechetical homilies from Quodvultdeus include one given on Easter, Contra Iudeos, paganos et Arianos (CCL 60, 225-258); De accedentibus ad gratiam 1 (= competentes; CCL 60, 441-458), in which he polemicizes against pagans, Jews, *Arians and *Manichees; and one on the sacramentum fontis et baptismi, along with that of De cataclysmo (CCL 60, 409-420). (On the audience composed of faithful and candidates for baptism, see T.N. Finn, Quodvultdeus: The Preacher and the Audience: The Homilies on the Creed: SP 31, Louvain 1997, 42-58; H. Brakmann, K.: RAC 20, 472.) Finally, attributed to Quodvultdeus, only from 1964 (R. Braun), is The Book of Promises and Predictions (It. ed.: L. Dattrino [ed.], Rome 2003), a catechetical aid for the preparation of catechumens for baptism presenting a baptismal narrative from creation to the end of time (see Aug., De cat. rud.), written in 439 during his exile in Campania.

V. Sixth century. In the West, with the increasing general Christianization of countries and the large-scale baptism of barbarian populations (Germanization), the pastoral problems again changed and the history of ancient education ended (P. Riché, Le scuole e l'insegnamento nell'Occidente cristiano dalla fine del V secolo alla metà dell'XI secolo, Rome 1984 [Fr. orig. 1979] 17-51). "Pagan" is synonymous with "barbarian," excluded from the city of God and from urban civilization (see Cod. Theod. and Orosius, Historiae adversus paganos, I, prol. 9; P. Chuvin - P.F. Beatrice - J.-P. Massaut - M.-E. Henneau [eds.], La christianisation des campagnes 1, Brussels 1996, 9-35). Catechesis was ever more rarely directed at adult baptismal candidates, and ever more frequently at already baptized Christians, who, as godparents or parents, were responsible for the Christian formation of those baptized as infants. King *Clovis himself, before his baptism on Christmas Day at the end of the 5th c., was catechized by his wife *Clotilde and by Bishop *Remigius of Reims (Greg. of Tours, Hist. franc. 2,31) and formally accepted among the competentes (K. Schäferdiek, Germanenmission: RAC 10, 535-536). To Jews who wanted to convert, the Council of *Agde (506) imposed a catechumenate of eight months (can. 34 [CCL 148, 107]). Jews baptized by force without ecclesiastical catechesis were given obligatory additional instruction (Greg. Gt., Ep. 1,45 [CCL 140, 59]; R. Manselli, Gregor d. Gr.: RAC 12, 939-940).

1. Gaul. *Caesarius of Arles (d. 542) preached often, almost daily during Lent and Eastertide. His "sermons" were directed to a mixed audience, i.e., to those baptized as infants, to adult candidates for baptism and to Jews (Conc. Agath. a. 506 can. 34 [CCL 148, 207-208]; P. Mikat, Caesarius v. Arles und die Juden: VortrDüsseldorf G 345 [1996]), as well as to parents and godparents; and on the eve of Easter or on other solemn vigils, even to child catechumens. To these latter, it was the responsibility of the godparents, instructed by the bishop's catechesis, to explain the creed and the Our Father privately, i.e., in family catechesis (Serm. 13,2, 130,5; 200,6; 204,3; 229,6 Morin). Adult candidates (competentes) still received catechesis for the most part in the preparation for Easter and for baptism (Ordo legitimus baptismi: Serm. 200, 5). The Expositio orationis dominicae (Serm. 147) is a reworking of Augustine's Serm. 59 (K.: RAC 20, 470). Catechesis is purely trinitarian and christological, the language deliberately plain (sermo humilis: Serm. 4,26).

H.G.J. Beck, The Pastoral Care of Souls in South-East France During the 6th Cent., Rome 1950, 161-164; 167; 185; S. Felici, La catechesi al popolo di Cesario d'Arles: Salesianum 41 (1979) 375-392; Id., L'integrazione fra esegesi e catechesi in Cesario d'Arles, in Id. (ed.), Esegesi e catechesi, 2, Rome 1994, 183-197.

2. Spain. In De correctione rusticorum, *Martin of Braga transmitted to Bishop Polemius of Astorga a catechesis (praedicatio) for people who were already baptized but certainly not strong in the faith ("preaching to the peasants": C.P. Caspari, Martin v. Bragas Schrift De correctione rusticorum, Christianae 1883, XLIX; M. Naldini, Martino di Braga, Contro le superstizioni. Catechesi al popolo, Florence 1991; RAC 15, 672-673 [bibl.]; M. Simonetti, Longus per divinas scripturas ordo dirigitur. Variazioni altomedievali su un tema catechetico agostiniano: RomBarb 6 [1981-1982] 313-320; E. López Pereira, Cultura, relixión e supersticóns na Galicia Sueva. Martiño de Braga "De correctione rusticorum," La Coruña 1996; A. Lopez Calvo, La catequesis en la Galicia medieval, Martín Dumiense y el De correctione rusticorum: Estudios mindonienses 13 [1997] 509-523). The mentalities, feasts and customs of a persistent paganism should be abandoned and replaced with the faithful observance of the covenant concluded with God (pactum cum Deo), esp. the observance of Sunday. The preparation for baptism having been insufficient, he sought to make up the lack with later catechesis. Martin also worked to revive catechesis for baptizands: 20 days before their baptism the "catechumens," as prescribed by the "ancient canons," received exorcism and instruction on the creed (Conc. Bracc. II, can. 2 [81 Vives]). (De corr. rust. 15-19 was later used as catechesis for godparents in view of the baptism of children [C.P. Caspari, op. cit., CXXIII-V].)

VI. Seventh century. In the period of transition to the Middle Ages, baptism and catechesis took place under differing conditions. While in Christian lands practically the only people left to be baptized were infants born to Christian families (see P.-M. Gy, Du baptême pascal des petitis enfants au baptême Quamprimum, in Haut M.A., Festschr. P. Riché, La Garenne 1990, 353-365), the problem of conversion and baptism following the forcible entry of pagan peoples into the Roman Empire persisted elsewhere; at the same time missionary activity was being extended beyond the limits of the empire. The widespread practice of the baptism of children led to a simplification of the baptismal rites.

1. Spain. In early medieval Spain, despite infant baptism, there remained a considerable number of young people and adults to prepare for baptism (J.M. Hormaeche Basauri, La pastoral de la iniciación cristiana en la España visigoda, Toledo 1983). Prebaptismal and postbaptismal catechesis was therefore directed both to those responsible for the baptism and formation of children, and to converts from paganism. According to *Isidore of Seville the catechumen learns to abandon idolatry and to acknowledge only one Lord; the candidate is instructed on the sacraments, the regula fidei, baptism, confirmation and laying on of hands (De offic. 2,21-27 [CCL 113,95]). The silence on the preparation for baptism of Jewish converts is an indication that the new situation of forced baptisms did not allow the ancient tradition of baptismal preparation to be applied in these cases (W. Drews, Juden u. Judentum bei Isidor v. Sevilla. Studien zum Traktat. De fide catholica contra Judaeos [2001] 267-297, 529-530). On children and adolescents, see A. Sancho Andreu, Ritos de la infancia y la adolescencia en el antiguo rito hispánico: Psallendum, Festschr. J. Pinell i Pons = SA 105, Rome 1992, 221-229.

2. In general. Catechesis in the proper sense was increasingly directed at those already baptized: children and adults. The administration of the sacraments and instruction took place increasingly outside of episcopal churches, by rural parish priests (O. Pasquato, Parrocchia e liturgia nella tradizione: Riv. lit. 78 [1991] 183-236). Linked with catechesis, as in the East, was the catechetical role of images (O. Pasquato, Biblia pauperum, in F. Lever et al., La comunicazione. Il dizionario di scienze e tecniche, Rome 2002, 107-108; Id., Chiesa e immagini, in ibid., 191-195; G. Lange, Bild u. Wort. Die katechetische Funktionen des Bildes in der griech. Theologie des 6. bis 9. Jh., [2]1999). Formation in the family established itself as essential for the transmission of the faith, esp. by the parents, to whom was recognized a pastoris officium (Jonas Aurel., Inst. laic. 2,16 [PL 106, 197-199]). Ecclesiastical catechesis of children, together with their parents, continued in church in the Sunday liturgy, through the homily heard by all. Memorized formulas were important; godparents were required to know the Our Father and the creed. Homiliaries collected Late Antique baptismal catechesis, giving us knowledge of it.

3. Mission to the pagans. The catechesis of catechumens, for the most part illiterate, whose languages were unfamiliar to Irish-Scottish, Anglo-Saxon and *Frankish missionaries, could not have been more than a Grundkursus, a minimal Katechismus (A. Läpple, Kl. Geschichte der Katechese, 1981, 66-67; L. Csonka, Educare, 3, Zürich 1964, 90-92). The barrier between the liturgy and the language of the people favored a magical understanding of the liturgy. Mass baptisms followed on the conversion of the king. Instruction and formation were left to communitarian life after baptism (J.A. Jungmann, art. Katechumenat: LTK² 6, 53). *Columbanus the Younger, abbot of Luxeil and of Bobbio, catechized (610–612) a Roman-Germanic population near Lake Constance. His penitential book attests a severe catechesis for laypeople, in opposition to pagan customs (see C. Vogel, Il peccatore e la penitenza nel medioevo, Leumann [To] ²1988 [Fr. orig. 1969] 60-70). His disciple Gallus uses Augustine and esp. Martin of Braga as a model in preaching. Also dependent on these, besides Caesarius of Arles, is *Pirminius of Reichenau (d. 753) in De libris canonicis scarapsus, a kind of catechism (M. Simonetti, Longus, 322-327,331-338), with instructions to the newly converted. The Carolingian reform brought some reorganizations (O. Pasquato, Quale tradizione per l'iniziazione cristiana? Dall'età dei padri all'epoca carolingia, in Iniziazione cristiana degli adulti oggi, Rome 1998, 75-105; S. Keefe, Carolingian Baptismal Expositions: A Handlist of Tracts and Manuscripts, in U.R. Blumenthal [ed.], Carolingian Essays, Washington, DC 1983, 169-237; Id., Water and the Word: Baptism and the Education of the Clergy in the Carolingian Empire, 1/2, Notre Dame, IN 2002), as did the Spanish mission and that of the Jesuits in the modern period, with the institution of the so-called catechumenate houses. In the East, despite the spread of infant baptism, the basic lines of the ancient ecclesiastical preparation through catechesis survived in the regular liturgy (see P. Braido, Lineamenti di storia della catechesi e dei catechismi. Dal "tempo della riforma" all'età degli imperialismi, Leumann [To] 1991, 25-38).

G. Bareille, v. Catéchèse: DTC 2, 2 (1905) 1877-1895; J. Zerndl, v. Firmung. II: LTK 3, 1299; G. Bardy, L'enseignement religieux aux premiers siècles: Rev. Apolog. 66 (1938) 641-655; 67 (1938) 5-18; O. Perler, v. Arkandisziplin: RAC 1, 667-676; A. Turck, Évangélisation et catéchèse aux deux premiers siècles: Parole et mission 3, Paris 1962; T.M. Finn, From Death to Rebirth: Ritual and Conversion in Antiquity, New York 1997; Id., The Liturgy of Baptism in the Baptismal Instructions of St. John Chrysostom: Stud. in Christ. Antiquity 15, Washington 1967; J. Daniélou, La catechesi nei primi secoli, ed. R. Du Charlat, Leumann (To) 1969 (Fr. orig. 1968); G. Kretschmar, Die Geschichte des Taufgottesdienstes in der alten Kirche: Leiturgia 5 (1970) 145-273; E. Dassmann, Schriftverständnis u. religiöse Erkenntnis nach dem hl. Augustinus: Trierer Theologische Zeitschrift 87 (1978) 257-274; F. Bergamelli, Il linguaggio simbolico delle immagini nella catechesi missionaria di Teofilo di A., in S. Felici (ed.), Valori attuali della catechesi patristica, Rome 1979, 67-91; V. Grossi, Il contesto battesimale dell'Or. dominica nei commenti di Tertulliano, Cipriano, Agostino: Augustinianum 20 (1980) 205-220; O. Pasquato, Catechesi ecclesiologica nella cura pastorale di G. Cris., in S. Felici (ed.), Ecclesiologia e catechesi patristica, Rome 1982, 123-172; Id., Rapporto tra catechesi e liturgia nella tradizione biblica e patristica: Riv. lit. 72 (1985) 39-73; Id., Catecumenato antico (sec. II-IV). Punti nodali e qualità pastorale: Lateranum n.s. 60 (1994) 323-341; Id., Quale tradizione per l'iniziazione cristiana? Dall'età dei Padri all'epoca carolingia, in Iniziazione cristiana degli adulti oggi, Rome 1998, 75-105; Id., Spiritualità e preghiera nelle catechesi battesimali di Cirillo di G.: Riv. lit. 86 (1999) 375-392; Id., Quale iniziazione per pagani, gnostici e giudei?: Salesianum 53 (2001) 497-520; O. Pasquato - H. Brakmann, Catechese (Katechismus): RAC 20, 156, 422-496; M. Dujarier, Breve storia del catecumenato, Leumann (To) 1984 (Fr. orig. 1980); G. Groppo, entry Patristica (catechesi): J. Gevaert (ed.), Diz. di catechetica, Leumann (To) 1983, 482-485; M. Naldini, Catechesi patristica nel IV secolo: CCC 6 (1985) 57-76; V. Saxer, Les rites de l'initiation chrétienne du IIe au VIe siècle, Spoleto 1988; A. Olivar, La predicación cristiana antigua, Barcelona 1991; Ch. Jacob, Zur Krise der Mystagogie in der alten Kirche: Theologie und Philosophie 66 (1991) 75-89; M. Metzger - W. Drews - H. Brakmann, Katechumenat: RAC 20, 157, 497-574; G. Filoramo, Le scuole catechistiche e la gnosi, in Lo spazio letterario della Grecia antica, 1/3, Rome 1994, 559-585; J. Knupp, Das Mystagogieverständnis des Joh. Chrysostom: Benediktbeur. Stud. 4 (1995); G. Laiti, La catechesi nel catecumenato antico, in Iniziazione cristiana e catecumenato, ed. G. Cavallotto, Bologna 1996, 63-90; L. Zappella (ed.), Giovanni Crisostomo, Le catechesi battesimali, Milan 1998; W. Slenczka, Heilsgeschichte u. Liturgie. Studien zum Verhältnis von Heilsgeschichte u. Heilsteilhabe anhand liturgischer u. katechetischer Quellen des 3. u. 4. Jh.: Arb. zur Kirchengesch. 78 (2000); M. Pellegrino - A.M. Triacca, Padri e liturgia, in D. Sartore et al., Liturgia, Cinisello B. (Mi) 2001, 1404-1426; St. Augustine, De catechizandis rudibus. Prima catechesi cristiana, NBA 7/2, ed. P. Siniscalco, Rome 2001, 127-291; M. Dujarier, Devenir disciple du Christ. Cathécuménat et "discipulat": Historiam Perscrutari, Misc. O. Pasquato, Rome 2002, 521-537; J.-P. Bouhot, La tradition catéchétique et exégétique du 'Pater noster': REAug 33 (2003) 3-18.

O. Pasquato

CATECHUMENATE – DISCIPLESHIP

I. Catechumenate or discipleship? - II. Catechumenate/discipleship in its historical development: 1st c. - III. Catechumenate/discipleship is situated in the heart of the church's pastoral efforts: 2nd-3rd c. (before 313) - IV. Later evolution and changes: a catechumenate/discipleship of recovery: 4th-5th c. - V. In the national churches and in the barbarian kingdoms: 6th-7th c. - VI. Concluding summary.

I. Catechumenate or discipleship?
Anachronism of the term "catechumenate." It is generally thought that the term catechumenate goes back to the church's origins. It can be demonstrated historically, however, that in the first centuries the reality of an intense preparation of adults for *baptism was not referred to as the catechumenate, even if the terms catechesis and catechumen are frequent (see A. Hamman, Catecumeno [catecumenato], in DPAC I [1983], 627-629). Only from the Renaissance was catechumenate used in works on initiation to baptism in the early church. This emphasis on terminology is not insignificant; rather, it reflects a profound reality, very well expressed by a specialist on the subject, M. Dujarier: "the formation of converts was never perceived as coming from a particular institution, and even less from a marginal organization. It was in fact in her very womb that the Church-Mother had always exercised her maternity. Growth in faith does not come about in vitro. It is the work of the whole community, which proposes the Good News, forms new believers and receives them into her own life" (Devenir disciple du Christ. Catéchuménat et "discipulat": Historiam Perscrutari. Misc. O. Pasquato, Rome 2002, 521-537; here 521).

The particular emphasis that we, following the Fathers (as documented by Dujarier in his study cited here), want to give the term discipleship, as opposed to the usual term catechumenate, aims, first, to restore to ancient Christian initiation its true nature, i.e., that of a preparation for the three *sacraments of Christian initiation which takes place in the heart of the ecclesial community, and not mainly in the context of a different structure, i.e., an institutionalized catechumenate. This does not change the fact that for ancient Christian initiation there were, as we will show, particular moments and rites, but they were not the substance, so to speak, of the preparation itself. Second, the idea of discipleship adds the perspective of the Fathers, who see Christian initiation in the light of the biblical category of discipleship, which faithfully includes (and surpasses) the content covered by the category catechumenate. The category discipleship thus assures a faithfulness both in content and regarding the term itself. Third, it should be noted that discipleship refers also to the time "after baptism," when the neophyte is still a disciple, whereas catechumenate refers to nothing beyond baptism. In fact, all of life is lived as discipleship of Christ: the catechumenate is only a preparation to enter that life (ibid., 537; G.P. Peron, Seguitemi! Vi farò diventare pescatori di uomini [Mk 1,17], Rome 2000).

Presence and meanings of the category "discipleship" in the NT. Following M. Dujarier (op. cit.), we note how the verb mathēteuō means 'to be a disciple' (see Mt 27:57); in the transitive, it means to 'make disciple[s]' (Mt 28:19; Acts 14:21): it is a true initiation, resulting from knowledge and from a vital commitment to follow someone. In the passive, it means 'to be made a disciple': in the present, it means one who is becoming a disciple ('novice,' 'beginner'); in the past, one who has become a disciple (Mt 13:52). The active meaning of mathēteia (discipulatus, "discipleship") is the formation (training) of the disciple and the state of being a disciple (discipleship). It is more often used in the active sense, to form disciples (making disciples) (Dujarier, 524).

Presence and meanings of the category "discipleship" in the Fathers. Again referring to M. Dujarier (524-537), whose precise documentation attests to the perdurance of the idea of discipleship in the writings of the Fathers from the 2nd to the 5th c., by which he concludes historically that this was a true and proper Christian initiation, the catechumenate is understood as a period of initiation into discipleship, in which one takes on a way of life that involves the whole person. This could only happen in the midst of the church community, and necessarily had to continue after baptism: the baptizand is called to become what he has begun to be. The catechumenate has introduced him into discipleship, which must continue its development according to the Spirit throughout his life, so as to become ever more a child of the Father (ibid., 537).

II. Catechumenate/discipleship in its historical development: 1st c. 1. Descriptive definition of catechumenate/discipleship as a traditional category within discipleship. By catechumenate, from the neo-Latin catechumenatus and its modern derivation from catechumenus (katēchoumenos), is meant the process of formation in the church's forma vitae; in the ancient church it pertained to the reception of the three sacraments of Christian initiation, in view of Christian discipleship. At the conceptual level, catechumenate comes from the verb katēchein: in the active, "to instruct," in the passive "to listen." Moreover, the presence of the terms audire, audientes (akroaomai, akroōmenoi) indicates the class of catechumens (credentes) prior to their enrollment for baptism (nomendatio, onomatographia) and of one of the levels of penitence (B. Poschmann: RAC 2, 814). This set in motion a distinction of the class of the competentes (phōtizomenoi or illuminandi), members of the preparatory phase closest to baptism, through which they become fideles (neophytoi). Catechesis (katēchēsis) is clearly identified within this formative way of the community as a fundamental dimension (see O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 424-425), but as accompanied by the basic requirements of *conversion, *penitence, *ascesis and the respective rites (M. Metzger, Katechumenat, RAC 20, 497-498; for the pagan and Jewish parallels, see W. Drews, RAC 20, 498-506).

Initiation (typical of every religion) in primitive Christianity was aimed at introducing persons coming from *paganism or *Judaism to Christian discipleship, receiving the three sacraments of initiation, i.e., *baptism, *confirmation and *Eucharist. The catechumenate was a basic part of Christian initiation (D. Borobio, Catecumenato, in Liturgia, Cinisello B. [Mi] 2001, 361). The early church's effort in selecting and preparing candidates for baptism was substantial: a process of initiation, growth and apprenticeship through which the whole person was transformed, orienting his life in a radically new way toward the God of Jesus Christ and the church community (see B. Maggioni, Gesù comunicatore della fede . . . : Historiam Perscrutari, 513-520). The formation of converts was seen by the Fathers as taking place mainly in the bosom of the church-mother (M. Dujarier, Devenir, 521). The catechumenate/discipleship springs from the life of the church, whose maternity precedes the catechumenal organization and where the indispensable need to initiate new members is primary (Id., La funzione materna, 125-126). Born of a spontaneous movement of the community's life and considered a requirement of the church's mission, catechumenate/discipleship found its most typical forms in a process of adaptation to the various sociocultural and ecclesial situations, which moreover situated it among the paradigmatic expressions of the enculturation of the faith; it had little or nothing in common, however, with the forms of initiation to the pagan *mysteries. The Christian community's catechumenate/discipleship found seeds of inspiration in Jewish practice (G. Leonardi, Il metodo educativo della comunità ebraica e di Gesù . . . : Historiam Perscrutari, 483-491), but its contents were Christian.

2. At the roots of the catechumenate/discipleship (1st c.): the earliest Christian preaching (ca. 30–70). The NT does not offer a true and proper preparation for baptism and discipleship, but it does offer a content, a catechumenal process as lived truth; "the primitive Church admitted no one without preparation, without criteria, without assurances" (A. Laurentin - M. Dujarier, Il catecumenato, 68; C. Bissoli, Tracce catechistiche negli scritti del NT: Historiam Perscrutari, 467-481). Christianity was first presented on *Pentecost around the year 30 with the *kerygma or first apostolic (or Christian) preaching of *Peter (Acts 2:14-36). The initial kerygma is considered to have ended with the destruction of *Jerusalem (AD 70) and the distancing of Christianity from Judaism (G. Groppo, Predicazione apostolica: J. Gevaert [ed.], Diz. di Cat., 507). The first official message or kerygma had as its object Christ, died, risen, ascended and approved by the Father (Acts 2:32-33), with the aim of provoking in the nonbeliever an overall faith in God, revealed in Christ, through the word of witnesses to the *resurrection. The kerygma was first directed to Jews, then to pagans (by *Paul) (Acts 14:15-17; 17:16-34): this was the first stage of *evangelization. This was followed by further, deeper instruction according to various didactic methods (instruction or catechesis, hortatory discourse, narration of OT salvation history and of the facts or sayings of Jesus) focused on the moral life in connection with OT salvation history read in a christological perspective (C.H. Dodd), with the aim of introducing to discipleship the sequela Christi. Moral aspects were related to their doctrinal foundations; in this way the trinitarian-christological *creeds came about, from the perspective of salvation history. Moral instruction from Jewish roots, organized around the schema of the two ways (Didache 1,1; 5,1; Ep. of Barnabas, 18-20), later interacted with ethical teachings coming from *Hellenized Judaism, such as the so-called household codes (Eph 5:22–6:9; Col 3:18–4:1), and were completed by the sayings (logia) of Jesus. These approaches were developed in the 2nd c., an example of which may be *Irenaeus of Lyons's Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching (O. Pasquato, Ireneo: J. Gevaert [ed.], Diz. di Cat., 360-361; A. Orbe, Il catecumeno ideale secondo Ireneo, in S. Felici [ed.], Cristologia e catechesi patristica 2, Rome 1981, 15-24). After AD 70 a period of transition began which lasted until the mid-2nd c., which saw the first attempts at enculturation of the faith in a Hellenistic milieu, with the 2nd-c. Apologies and the edifying literature of the *apocrypha. Here we encounter criteria for admission to baptism: the church demanded specific qualities, making use of periods of verification which included listening to the judgment of the community. Thus, e.g., the choice of the first deacons (Acts 6:2-6), that of *Timothy as a preacher (Acts 16:2-3), of the bishop (1 Tim 3:2-7), the deacon (1 Tim 3:8-10; see *diakonia - diaconate), *widows (1 Tim 5:9-11). Admission to baptism, therefore, required not only faith in God the creator (as for the pagans) or in the God of the OT (as for the Jews), but also in the God of Jesus Christ (1 Th 1:9-10). The account of the baptism of the Roman centurion gives us a glimpse of the steps to baptism already at the end of the 1st c. (Acts 10:1–11:18): questiniong by the person in charge (Peter) (Acts 10:21), followed by the candidate's response (Acts 10:22), who asks to be admitted to catechesis (Acts 10:33). The request rests on assurances from sponsors (Acts 10:4, 22): only then does catechesis take place (Acts 10:34-43), focused on Christ, the one Lord (Acts 10:36-42). The aim of catechesis is to arouse an unconditional faith in Christ, in view of baptism (Acts 10:43). The authenticity of faith is attested by God, who sends the Spirit (Acts 10:44). Only then does Peter baptize Cornelius and the brothers: "And he ordered that they be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ" (Acts 10:48; V. Saxer, Les rites, 27-33).

III. Catechumenate/discipleship is situated in the heart of the church's pastoral efforts: 2nd-3rd c. (before 313). Preamble. It should be noted that the practices described were, not rarely, more ancient than the evidence we have of them. In any case, we note that admission to *baptism was more cautious than in the NT period. In fact, in this period, as an antidote to the moral decadence of the Christian communities and to cases of *apostasy in the period of *persecution, there was the introduction of a twofold examination, the first in the initial phase of orientation toward Christianity, the second at the act of enrollment for baptism. The phase of preparation for baptism was designed to last 2-3 years. The rejection of other religions by candidates for baptism was more clearly required, along with a personal renunciation (apotaxis, abrenuntiatio) of Satan. Since *pagan cults and rites were rejected en bloc, it is not possible to hypothesize the assumption by Christianity of extraneous religious rites during that period: words and figures borrowed from the pagan mysteries expressed different spiritual realities for Christians (R. Turcan, RAC 18, 142). The Christians explain possible similarities with foreign rites that entered into Christian worship as the inheritance of a common culture, or even as the work of *demons, though the greater antiquity of the Christian rites was asserted (Justin, 1 Apol. 62,1; Tert., Bapt. 5,3; cf. M. Metzger, RAC 20, 509-510).

1. 2nd c.: at the origins of the catechumenate/discipleship: the first witnesses (2nd half of 2nd c.). This was the first, and most authentic and serious, phase of catechumenate/discipleship. It is documentable from the 2nd half of the 2nd c., at the level of pastoral practice more than that of institutions, by the work of individual Christians engaged in an evangelization "of the surrounding area," "door-to-door." In the last decades of the 2nd c. we see a serious commitment on the part of the Christian communities to recruit candidates for baptism: the idea of training developed, combined with sponsors for those who intended to enroll in the catechumenate/discipleship to receive the three sacraments of Christian initiation: thus arose the tradition of godparents (M. Dujarier, Le parrainage, 37-39). At *Rome, ca. 140, a catechumenal way is documentable in the Shepherd of *Hermas, with indications of specific baptismal requirements: some candidates, represented by the rocky ground of the parable, hearers of the word of God and desirous of being baptized, as soon as they reflect on the holiness baptism requires, return to their evil passions (Vision III, 7,3). *Justin, a layman (ca. 100–ca. 165), in his 1 Apologia alludes to an instruction prior to baptism: "Those who are convinced and believe in the truth of the teachings expounded by us, and give promise of being able to live according to these maxims, are taught to pray, and to ask God with fasting for the remission of sins; and we too pray and fast with them" (61,2). The 1st-c. criteria for admission to baptism persist: repentance, since baptism is a "washing for the remission of sins" (66,1), faith in the church, a transformed life (66,1). The candidates are accompanied by the community, which prays and fasts with them (61,2); in this way they are introduced to communitarian worship, up to the rite of baptism and participation in the Eucharist (65-66). (For Irenaeus, see O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 430-432; Id., Ireneo, Diz. di Cat., 360-361.) At *Alexandria in *Egypt ca. 190–200, *Clement of Alexandria gives us glimpses of a preparatory period of at least three years from enrollment as catechumens (Strom. II, 96,1-2; cf. VI, 130,1: neokatēchētos; Paed. 1, 36, 2: ho neosti katēchoumenos). Preparation of the hearers of the word contributes to the enculturation of the faith: *Clement's Greco-Hellenistic culture must serve the instruction of catechumens (Strom. VI, 19,4). Prebaptismal catechesis is likened to milk, as the first nourishment of the spirit; postbaptismal contemplation to more solid food (Strom. V, 10,66). For him, catechumens (who are carnal) have the will to live as Christians, whereas the faithful (spiritual) have received the capacity to do so through the sacrament (Strom. II, 26,4-5). In both East and West, the requirement arose of a preparation and of a serious discernment of a *conversion that would transform one's life (Origen, In Lc. hom. 21), so as to be able "to gain access to faith, to enter into faith and to seal faith" (accedere, ingredi, obsignare) (Tertullian, De idol. 9,11; 24,3).

2. The golden age of the catechumenate/discipleship (3rd c.). In the West, a transition from private forms of preparation to a preparation in the midst of the church took place to such an extent that the catechumenate/discipleship was already structured at the beginning of the 3rd c., as attested at Rome ca. 215 by *Hippolytus's Traditio apostolica (B. Botte, La tradition apostolique de S. Hippolyte, 5th ed. [LQF 39, 1989]; SC 11 bis; C. Scholten, v. Hippolytus II [v. Rom]: RAC 15, 524-526; Ch. Markschies, Wer schreibt die sog. "Traditio Apostolica"?, in W. Kinzig - Ch. Markschies - M. Vincent, Tauffragen u. Bekenntnis [1999] 1-74 with bibl.). There is a conviction that conferral of the sacrament required adequate dispositions and sure guarantees; particularly required was a faith capable of transforming life so as to become true disciples of Christ. Here the catechumenate/discipleship is understood as one of the main and most serious duties of the church.

Following are the various stages of the catechumenate/discipleship in the Traditio apostolica. Entrance involves a first examination before those responsible, in which the godparents, responding to a threefold series of questions, must demonstrate the fitness of the postulants. The first series pertains to the motives of the conversion; the second to state of life, i.e., to family situation (married or no) and social condition (slave or free) (Tr. apost. 15); the third to trades or professions, which must be abandoned if they are incompatible with the Christian mysteries and which are at the root of the three capital sins (idolatry, homicide, impurity—this was the case, e.g., of one who ran a brothel, of sculptors or painters of idols, actors, prostitutes and homosexuals (16). The catechumenal period lasted three years, but less for the diligent (spoudaioi). In it the catechumens (katēchoumenoi) listened to catechesis (we have no indication of the program) given by didascalia (presbyters or laypersons) (19: sive clericus est qui dat doctrinam, sive laicus) with a mandate from the community or the bishop. The teachers were entrusted with the task of preparing and instructing the catechumens, beginning with prayer and the imposition of hands. They were also the guarantors of the moral conduct and dignity of the catechumens (18-20). It seems that the catechesis of these latter, also called credentes, took place during the liturgy of the word (audire evangelium; audire verbum: 20) with the faithful in the morning before work (41), in a reserved place (O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 440); the preparation was called "hearing of the Word" (Tr. apost., 15.17.20; Botte: this is the most important purpose). If there was a eucharistic celebration, they took part in the first part, receiving only a bread of exorcism, eulogia (26); the "prayer of the believers" and the kiss of peace were prohibited them (18.27). An appropriate amount of time was dedicated to initiation to prayer. The meetings closed with laying on of hands by the teacher (18-19) and with special prayers. Election was preceded by a second examination, at the beginning of *Lent, regarding their moral conduct (including assistance to the poor and care for the sick) during the catechumenal period, assessed by the didascalia and the godparents. The elect were chosen for a second type of catechesis, the hearing of the gospel, accompanied daily by laying on of hands for exorcism (20). In this way they were introduced into the immediate preparation for baptism, with admittance to the baptismal liturgy (20). The baptismal period seems to have coincided with the week prior to *Easter: in a place separate from the catechumens, the elect receive a daily laying on of hands and an exorcism; on Thursday they bathe; on Friday and Saturday they *fast. They are called by the bishop, who exorcises them, breathes on their face, signs them with the *cross on the forehead, ears and nostrils (20). On Saturday night they keep vigil with Bible readings and catechesis. At the cockcrow, the rite proceeds with the renunciation of Satan (diabolus, pompa, angeli eius) (apotaxis), anointing with *oil for exorcism (21), threefold question of faith (parents respond for infants), and the administration of baptism by triple immersion (J. Jüthner, s.v. Bad: RAC 1, 1140-1141). The bishop administers confirmation, followed by the entrance of the neophytes into the waiting assembly of the faithful, for common participation in the Eucharist (V. Saxer, op. cit., 109-119: Tr. Ap.) (for the councils, see RAC 20, 517).

At *Carthage, ca. 200, *Tertullian's De poenitentia and De baptismo (O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 438) present the order of baptism (E. Dekkers, T. en de geschiedenis der Liturgie, Brussels 1947, 164-173; A. Holbaj, Catechesi ai catecumeni negli scritti di T., Diss., Rome 1984; Ch. Munier [ed.], Tertullien. La pénitence [SC 316 (1984) 37-51]: penitence and catechumenate). Here we seem to find echoes of the Roman catechumenate. The Christian community is composed of the bishop, presbyters, deacons, lectors, widows and virgins; the laity is composed of the fideles (baptized) and the audientes (catechumens), who, at the time of Tertullian and of Cyprian, did not constitute a distinct group. The community was divided into two categories: the ordo ecclesiae (ecclesiastical ordines) and the laity, simple believers (plebs). The doctrinal and disciplinary treatise De baptismo provides information on Christian initiation and the baptismal liturgy at the beginning of the 3rd c. Liturgical practice was the theological place of doctrinal reflection. The church of Carthage, faced with many converts, opened the catechumenate/discipleship or "novitiate" (tirocinia adultorum) (Tertullian, De paen. 6,17). Access to the Christian mysteries required a careful preparation at least comparable to that of initiation to the demonic cults. A perfect faith is required for baptism (ibid.). "We are not immersed in the water to put an end to our sins, but since we have put an end to them, we are already washed morally" (ibid.). Demanding from the outset, the catechumenate/discipleship required a prior examination, attested by *Hippolytus (Tr. Ap. 16), to know the real intentions of postulants, novicioli or beginners. A rapid instruction on the great Christian truths and on basic moral requirements followed. Only then did the postulant become a catechumenus (catechumen), taken from the Greek (De praescr. 41; De cor. 2,1), or auditor and audiens (De poen. 6,14-15. 17.20; 7,1). For catechesis, there was the Christian doctor ('teacher')(De praescr. 3,5; 14,2); since not all doctores ('teachers') were presbyters (G. Schöllgen, Ecclesia sordida?: JbAC ErgBd. 12 [1984] 281), instruction must have also taken place outside of the liturgy. The catechumenate/discipleship took place for the most part on the margins of the community's worship: initiation into the mysteries of Scripture and systematic catechesis on the Christian truths, documented for us by the regulae fidei* present in Tertullian, criteria of *orthodoxy and symbol of ecclesiastical communion, aimed at making explicit the concise articles of the faith, wrongly interpreted by *heretics. There is no information on the dismissal of the catechumens, but it is supposed to have taken place after the homily (Ch. Salzmann). The number of catecheses depended on multiple factors (Bapt. 18), but we do not know their frequency or length. Catechumens had to recite prayers continually during Lent and confess their sins (Bapt. 20,1). Immediately before baptism catechumens were called ingressuri baptismum (ibid.); inituri aquam (De cor. 3,2); ante sunt perfecti cathecumeni quam edocti (De praescr. 41,4), and indeed they could then already be called christiani (Pass. Perp. 3,2 [SC 417, 106-108]). Regarding admission to baptism, Tertullian admonishes leaders, with Mt 7:6 (H.-J. Loth, v. Hund: RAC 16, 810-812) and 1 Tim 5:22, not to confer it prematurely (Bapt. 18, 1-6). For children, parvuli, celibates and widows of uncertain future, it is more useful (utilior) to confer it (*Bapt.*18, 1-6); also important is the baptism of blood (Bapt., 16,1-2) and of necessity (*Bapt.*18,14; Pass. Perp. 3,5) (F.J. Dölger). The date of baptism is Easter, and later Pentecost, though any time is appropriate, because all time belongs to the Lord (Bapt. 19). The apotaxis took place aliquanto prius before the bishop: renunciation of the pomps of the devil and his angels (pagan ceremonies, political dignities, applause of the masses, perjury, political fame, linked with idolatry) (De cor. 13,7; 3,3; De spect. 4,1.13; cf. J.H. Waszink, Pompa diaboli, in Id., Opuscula selecta, Leiden 1979, 288-316). After Easter baptism, to which Tertullian makes the first clear reference (Bapt. 19), the neophytes listen to a week of mystagogical catecheses, of which De baptismo provides a splendid example.

In the East (*Egypt and *Palestine), *Origen (ca. 240–250) says of himself that initially he was a daily catechist (Eus. HE 6,3,1). He distinguishes between entrance to the catechumenate/discipleship and the catechumenal stages. For beginners admitted to catechesis, entrance to the catechumenate/discipleship seems to have included the examination, as in Hippolytus: "At the beginning, when you wanted to be catechized, it was right to say to you: 'If you would like to serve the Lord, choose today whom you will serve.' And the catechist said to you: 'As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord!' [Josh 24:15]. And about your attitude toward God, you responded in turn to your catechists: 'We will serve the Lord our God and obey his voice'" (Exhort. ad mart. 17). The commitment assumed at the beginning of the catechumenate/discipleship was thus patterned on the dialogue of Joshua with the Hebrews at the time of the covenant of Shechem (Josh 24:14, 24), though Origen does not report the precise form of the rite. He confirms the examination: "The Christians, to the extent possible, begin by testing the souls of those who want to listen to them, and by forming them in private" (Contra Celsum 3, 51).

Regarding the catechumenal stages, Origen, who sees in the Israelites' crossing of the desert a figure of the life of the Christian, also sees symbolized there the catechumenal way from conversion to baptism, likened to the departure from Egypt: "When you abandon the darkness of idolatry, because you aspire to arrive at a knowledge of the divine law, you begin to leave Egypt." Entrance to the catechumenate/discipleship is seen in the crossing of the Red Sea: "When you are joined to the crowd of catechumens and have begun to observe the church's commandments, you have crossed the Red Sea." Finally, baptism is symbolized by the crossing of the Jordan to enter the Promised Land, which is the kingdom of God: "But when you arrive at the spiritual spring of baptism, . . . then, having crossed the Jordan, . . . you will enter into the Promised Land, that land where Jesus, after Moses, accepts you and becomes your guide in the new life" (In Jesu Nave, hom. 4,1).

From his homilies we can gather other texts on the catechumenate/discipleship, articulated in three phases. In the first phase, the catechumen is called to abandon pagan life and other gods to love only our God (In Ex. hom. 8,4): the catechumen is faced with a very specific demand (ibid.). He is accompanied by believers, perhaps the godparents (M. Dujarier, Le parrainage, 289-290). He is called to fear of God; only later is he admitted to community meetings, like athletes enrolled for a race (In Jer. hom. 3,3). It seems that these initial instructions are the daily teachings of the community, of the kind held before work in the morning, without the Eucharist, at Caesarea (In Gen. hom. 10,3 [SC 7 bis, 262-264]; In Jos. hom. 4,1 [SC 71, 148]; P. Nautin, Origène, Paris 1977, 391). To enter the catechumenate/discipleship and obey the ecclesiastical precepts is to cross the Red Sea and enter the desert, to listen to God's law every day (In Jesu Nave, hom. 4,1). He also explains the regula fidei* (Contra Celsum 1,7), following a practice different from that at *Rome, since he speaks frequently to the catechumens (In Luc. hom. 7). The daily instruction leads catechumens to a decision for a perfect life, a true discipleship (In Jer. hom. 4,3): baptism will thus be fruitful. In the second phase, Origen notes a progress in the catechumens, while the guarantors/sponsors of the baptism (Origen mentions relatives, neighbors or friends, who test those who will later enter; godparents derived from this practice [M. Dujarier, Parrainage, 218-236]) offer their guarantees/assurances (C. Cels. 3,51). In the third phase, the presbyter asks the spiritual fruits of penitence of those who want to receive baptism: charity, joy, peace, patience, goodness etc. (In Lc. hom. 22). For the first time, moral catechesis (nomos) is offered, in which context Origen also makes pastoral remarks, e.g., regarding the nonprogress of catechumens (In Ez. hom. 6,7), the return of many to sin after baptism: this is during the long period of peace after the persecution of *Severus. He longs for the authenticity of faith typical of the 2nd c.: "At that time the faithful were few, but truly faithful" (In Jer. hom. 4,3; M. Dujarier, Breve storia, 40). The soteriological priority, however, is on dogmatic catechesis (Logos), including the rejection of idols (In Ex. hom. 8,4 [GCS Orig. 6, 223, 14-16]), adherence to God the creator (perhaps the apotaxis follows), faith in the Messiah. There are indications of a longer preparation (In Jer. hom. 5,13 [SC 232, 310-311]; In Joh. comm. 6, 144 [SC 157, 144-145]). Origen makes a comparison to farmers, who await the fruits of the earth for three years (In Jer. hom. 5,13 [SC 232, 310-312]; In Lc. hom. 22,8 [SC 87, 306]). Thus the hearers (hoi akroatai) must submit to a three-year test of the stability of their conversion if they want to be accepted for the final preparation for baptism. They must root out habitual vices and restrain barbarian practices to receive the *Holy Spirit (In Lev. hom. 6,2 [SC 286, 272-278]; venite catechumeni, agite poenitentiam: In Lc. hom. 21,4 [SC 87, 295]). Thus a pedagogy (eisagōgē) for a deeper understanding of the kerygma itself is enacted, followed by frequent instruction (introduction to the Bible, to the regula fidei, i.e., creation, divine mysteries, *Christology, *anthropology) (O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 434-436). In a second phase, after the regular commitment to the long instructions, the catechumen receives the "creed of purification" (C. Cels. 3,51), i.e., he must preserve the purity of that truth which will bring him to perfect purification through baptism, i.e., initiation into teaching on the *Trinity (In Jer. hom. 4,3). Origen relates Lenten preparation to abstention from sins, malice, luxuries, bad words and shameful thoughts (In Lev. hom. 10,2 [SC 287, 138]) (H.J. Auf der Maur - J. Waldram, Illuminatio verbi divini-confessio fideigratia baptismi. Wort, Glaube u. Sakrament in Katechese u. Taufliturgie bei O., in Festschrift P. Smulders, Assen 1981, 41-95; V. Saxer, op. cit., 109-194; G. Cavallotto, Catecumenato, 57-69; M. Metzger, RAC 20, 511-512).

In summary, we note that the limited evidence of the 2nd-3rd c. present catechesis, from the late 2nd c., as essential, even if it is not yet clearly distinguished as catechesis aimed specifically at catechumens. The plan of the catechumenate/discipleship is clear: examination of candidates, apposite offices, exorcisms; but a certain autonomy of the individual churches led to a variety of rules, such as the rebaptism of *heretics and *apostates. The rigor of the catechumenate/discipleship did not prevent a vast apostasy during the persecution of *Decius.

IV. Later evolution and changes: a catechumenate/discipleship of recovery: 4th-5th c. The new historical context and its impact on the catechumenate/discipleship.

1. In general. With the "Constantinian turn" of the peace of the church (313), Christianity became first a sanctioned religion (already from 311 with *Galerius), then a privileged one with *Constantine and, finally, the religion of the state with *Theodosius I's edict De fide catholica (380). In a Christianized empire, in which it was easy, even for children, to become (registered) catechumens and faithful, the catechumenate/discipleship spread, but as a catechumenal status that often lasted until shortly before death. Not infrequently the catechumen wanted the title of Christian but not to become one: there were many catechumens, few converts. The reasons: the alliance between state and church led a catechumen to be considered (and called), for civil purposes, a Christian (only a baptized person was a "faithful") (Aug., Serm. 47, 17; Ambr., In Ps. 118, 20, 48-49; Cyr. of Jer., Cat. 17, 35-36); the severity of the catechumenate/discipleship inspired fear and put it in crisis: so, "one desires not so much to become a Christian, as to pretend to be one" (Aug., De cat. Rud. V, 9); "it is not enough to be conceived, one must be born to reach eternal life" (Aug., Quaest. ad Simplic. 1,2,2). On the other hand, preparation for baptism became less demanding, as can be seen from the reminder of the Council of *Nicaea (325) that for "the catechumen himself there is need of time and of a longer trial after baptism" (can. 2 and 14). The catechumenal institution was profoundly transformed; a two-stage formative path replaced the earlier demanding formation. The first was a preparation of some years (not infrequently until death) of evangelization. This formation was catechetical, via the Sunday homily during the eucharistic celebration, from which catechumens were dismissed at the end of the liturgy of the Word. The phase of conversion and entry into the faith was clearly reduced over time for the catechumenate/discipleship. One who desired baptism gave his name to be enrolled by the bishop in the church's register (in the West, nomendatio; in the East, onomatographia): this corresponds to the 3rd-c. rite of admission. *Egeria (4th c.) notes at *Jerusalem an examination of candidates' moral conduct by the bishop, involving their neighbors (Eger., Peregr., ch. 45). Those enrolled for baptism are called illuminandi in the East, competentes (i.e., those who petition together or proceed together) or electi in the West. The second step, more circumscribed and decisive, provided for a brief but intense period of formation, during Lent, of those enrolled for baptism. It included a prominent catechetical dimension, with apposite catecheses, complemented by the common Lenten homilies. The scripturally based instruction conveyed a moral-dogmatic catechesis, and not infrequently the explanation of the *Our Father/Lord's Prayer, as initiation to prayer (see S. Sabugal, Il Padrenostro nella catechesi antica e moderna, Rome [4]1994). The ascetical/penitential dimension was composed of *fasts, *vigils and *prayers, various abstinences, confession of sins, and charity toward the poor. Everything was aimed at the fight against the devil and the reform of habits (G. Cavallotto, Catecumenato, 275-277). A notable component of the liturgical dimension was the rite of exorcisms, for the most part daily, the battle against Satan, and the gifts of God. Exorcisms were sometimes dramatic and followed the daily Lenten instruction addressed to all the faithful (Aug., Serm. 216): the candidate, wearing only a gown, fasting, shivering from the night cold, unwashed, barefoot, on his knees, bows his head under the imprecations launched against the devil, and the exorcist breathes on his face (V. Saxer, op. cit., 99). Augustine reminds the neophytes of the scene: "You were as though ground up by the humiliation of the fast and by the sacrament of exorcism" (Serm. 227). For the West, *Niceta of Remesiana tells of a solemn exorcism, i.e., the scrutinium, the rite of *purification and examination, repeated three times at *Milan and at Rome on the Sundays of Lent (see V. Saxer, op. cit., 377). Toward the end of Lent, on different Sundays depending on the place, there was an explanation or traditio of the *creed by the bishop, recited then by memory in public by the candidate (redditio) (Eger., Peregr., 46; Aug., Conf. VIII, 2,5). Likewise, in various churches there was a "handing over" and "return" of the Our Father. This ended the preparation phase of the catechumenate/discipleship: the candidates were now initiated into the mysteries.

During the Easter Vigil there was a celebration, usually presided over by the bishop, of baptism, confirmation and participation in the Eucharist. The prebaptismal rites came first: the ephphatha; the renunciation of Satan and adherence to Christ, with the double gesture of turning to the *East toward the *light, as adherence to the faith, and turning one's back on the West, the place of darkness (Theod. of Mops., Cat. 13, intr.; Cyr. of Jer., Cat. 19,9); the *anointing with perfumed or blessed oil over the whole body; the blessing of the *water for the baptism. Then came the rite of baptism by triple immersion, accompanied by the formula in the threefold rhythm of the baptizand's adherence of faith to each of the persons of the *Trinity. In the pool, the baptizand participated in the mystery of the death and resurrection of Christ: "The salutary water was for you both tomb and mother" (Cyr. of Jer., Cat. mist. II, 5). The postbaptismal rites followed, variable according to the different traditions (Eastern, *African, *Roman, *Ambrosian, *Gallican, *Spanish, etc.): the laying on of hands together with anointing with chrism; the rites of the washing of the feet; the white vestment (for the bath); the lighted candle; the readings or songs, spectacular so as to make one understand the invisible effects and hidden meaning of baptism and confirmation. The lighted candle held by the neophytes as they entered the eucharistic hall suggested *eschatology, i.e., the "luminous procession that will lead you to meet the Bridegroom" (Greg. Naz., Orat. 45). With participation in the Eucharist the neophytes are fully inserted into the ecclesial community. Finally, the *mystagogical catechesis of Easter week introduces them, passing from the rites to the mystery they contain, to an understanding of what they had seen during the Easter Vigil. On Sunday initially in albis the neophytes leave aside their white vestments and their reserved places in the church to join the other faithful. The path continues with the mystagogical catecheses for the neophytes for one or more weeks after Easter, aimed at explaining and commenting on the rites celebrated in the Easter Vigil, opening the eyes of faith to the mystery hidden (the arcanum) beneath the rites, experiencing faith and the encounter with the believing community (D. Borobio, Catecumenato, 354).

With these structural changes, lay ministries diminished; they no longer spoke of the doctores audientium, as in the 3rd c., but of the great catechist-bishops (see O. Pasquato, I Padri educatori, 74ff.), of the deacons and presbyters who cared for the catechumens—a clericalization of the ministries attached to the catechumenate/discipleship. Moreover, what we can observe in the 4th c. attests that the bishops reproposed the principles of the *tradition, involving the link between faith and sacrament and life: the sacrament only saves one who has a life-transforming faith: "Faith receives its perfection from baptism, but baptism is based on faith" (Basil, On the Holy Spirit 18,28). "Simon Magus also drew near the washing: he was bathed in it, but not enlightened. His body was immersed in the water, but he did not open his soul to the light of the Spirit" (Cyr. of Jer., Protocat. 2). Despite the efforts of pastors, the true catechumenate/discipleship no longer existed. This is shown by a comparison of the archetype of the Trad. ap. and its later reworkings (between the 4th and 5th c.) with their archetype, Book 8 of the Apostolic Constitutions:* a gradual process of maturation of the initial decision of faith passed to a liturgical-pastoral institution, certainly useful, but of a clearly inferior quality (G. Groppo, Catecumenato, 136). However, if now the anxiety to gain neophytes seemed to predominate among pastors, this in turn provided a strong encouragement to baptism (rather than delaying it) for those whom they had prepared with an in-depth catechesis during the brief but intense Lenten period. The framework in which everything took place was faithfulness to the principle of two stages, one of catechumens, the other of illuminandi or competentes. The bishops, in any case, relied on an intensive prebaptismal preparation: a Lenten period or a mini-catechumenate. This was an attempt at a recovery of the formation process, which in the past was completed over two or three years (see R. Cabiè, L'iniziazione cristiana, 27-120). But if the catechumenate/discipleship had declined, catechesis itself was in its golden age. At the end of the period, the decline of the catechumenate due to infant baptism was already in evidence. Even during this period, due to the relative autonomy of the individual churches, the evidence of the catechumenate of one church is not valid for others; its history is that of the individual ecclesiastical provinces. Moreover, it remains uncertain whether the particular rituals actually existed or if they were simple interpretations of biblical texts (M. Metzger: RAC 20, 518).

2. In detail. In the East, in the area of Jerusalem, the main sources are the prebaptismal catecheses of Bishop *Cyril (mid-4th c.) and the Peregrinatio of Egeria (381–384; O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 442-445; M.E. Johnson, Reconciling Cyril and Egeria on the Catechetical Process in 4th Cent. Jerusalem: P.F. Bradshaw [ed.], Essays in Early Eastern Initiation = Grove Litug. Stud. 56, Bramcote 1988, 18-30, with bibl.; C. García del Valle, Jerusalén. La liturgia de la iglesia Madre, Barcelona 2001, 162-196 with bibl.). The catechumenate phase is the first phase. The catechumens participate in community liturgical meetings and receive a blessing before their dismissal (Eger., Peregr. 24,2.6-7). They are excluded (for the disciplina arcani: O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 459; *Arcanum, Discipline of) from the celebration of baptism and the Eucharist (Eger., Peregr. 25,2; 46,6; 47,2), but observe the periods of fasting (Cyr., Catech. 4,27). Egeria does not speak of special catecheses for them; they hear the homilies addressed to baptized and nonbaptized (Sunday, fast days, Wednesdays and Fridays of Lent), ordinarily preached by the bishop and by a number of priests (Eger., Peregr. 25,1; 26; 27,6). The baptizand phase—the members are called baptizandi, phōtizomenoi, competentes: "once you were a catechumen" (Cyr. of Jer., Catech. 1,4)—is the second phase, of 40 days (Cyr. of Jer., Protoch. 4). At the vigil of the beginning of Lent, a presbyter notes the names of those requesting baptism; the following Sunday before the bishop, presbyterate and other clergy, each (with sponsor, pater or mater, according to sex) undergoes the examination of their state of life and motives; if found without reproach, the bishop enrolls the catechumen's name (onomatographia); otherwise he is exhorted to return when he has reformed (Eger., Peregr. 45,1-4). The preparation that follows is presented as purification, penitence (fasts, works of charity), confession of sins and *illumination (Cyr. of Jer., Catech. 2, passim). The prebaptismal catecheses (cathecisis, Eger., Peregr. 46,2) take place during the first seven weeks of Lent; the eighth and final week (septimana paschalis/maior) is linked with Holy Week and Easter (Eger., Peregr.

27,1). During the exorcisms the baptizands' faces are veiled (for recollection: Cyr. of Jer., Protoch. 9). During the daily catechesis (of three hours) they sit in a semicircle around the moveable cathedra of the bishop in the nave of the church, which is closed, with the sponsors and other baptized present (Eger., Peregr. 46). The bishop explains the Scriptures for 40 days, starting from Genesis, first with literal *exegesis, then spiritual (O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 443); he also speaks of the resurrection (Eger., Peregr. 46,2). In the sixth week, when the creed is to be explained (primum carnaliter et sic spiritualiter: ibid., 46,3), the bishop does so privately (traditio simboli: accipient simbolum; cf. Cyr. of Jer., Catech. 5,12). At the end of the seventh week the creed is "recited" from memory (redditio symboli) by the candidates and godparents before the bishop's throne and his presbyterate (ibid., 46,5). The bishop concludes with an exhortation on baptism and to participation in the mystagogical catecheses of Easter week, which reveal its secret (Cyr. of Jer., Catech. 18,33). At the beginning of the Easter Vigil, in the atrium of the baptistery, baptizands renounce Satan and express adherence to Christ, turning to the West and to the East (Cyr. of Jer., Catech. myst. 1,2-11; 3,10). The neophytes are also initiated into the Lord's Prayer (ibid., 5,11-18) (cf. M. Metzger: RAC 20, 520-523; F. Bergamelli, Cirillo di G.: J. Gevaert [ed.], Diz. di Cat., 155-156).

Continuing in the East, in the area of Antioch, our sources are the Apostolic Constitutions (c. 380) (SC 320, 329: M. Metzger [1986] 89-97: Christian initiation; 336), the Catecheses of *John Chrysostom, presbyter (O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 447-449), and of *Theodore of Mopsuestia (RAC 20, 449-451; F. van de Paverd, Zur Geschichte der Messliturgie in Antiocheia u. Konstantinopel gegen Ende des 4. Jh.: OCA 187, Rome 1970; TH.M. Finn, Liturgy, 25-85; P.W. Harkins, Pre-baptismal Rites in Chrysostom's Baptismal Catecheses: SP 8: TU 93 [1966] 219-238; R. Kaczynski, Joh. Crysostomus. Catecheses baptismales 1: FCh 6, 1 [1992] 73-82: Christian initiation in Antioch; A. Cañizares Llovera, El catecumenado según Teodoro de Mops.: Estudios [= dei padri mercedari] 32 [1976] 147-193).

In the catechumenate phase, baptism is conferred on adults and minors (Chrys., Catech. III, 3,6 [SC 50 bis, 154]); deathbed baptism is sarcastically criticized (clinical baptism: Chrys., Catech. I 1,3-4 [SC 366, 118-122]) also because it offers *pagans grounds for objection against Christians (Chrys., In Act. hom. 1,7 [PG 60, 23-24]); the children of Christians, presented immediately to the presbyters and signed with the sign of the cross, were considered catechumens (Chrys., In 1Cor. hom. 12,7 [PG 61, 106]). The catechumens, like foreigners, were separated from the faithful (pistoi: "baptized"), but also called "our new brothers" (Chrys., Catech. I, 1,1 [SC 366, 112]). Recently converted candidates were called amyētoi (Chrys, Catech. I, 2,8 [194]); those near baptism phōtizomenoi. They cannot turn to God as his children (Chrys., In Mt. hom. 19 [PG 57, 280]). In church they occupy a place far from the altar (Chrys. In 2 Cor. hom. 2,5 [PG 61, 399]). Before the oratio fidelium and the Eucharist, they are dismissed with a special blessing (Chrys., In Mt. hom. 4,7.71,4 [PG 48, 666]; F. van de Paverd, op. cit., 139-164; Apos. cons. 8, 8,1-6). Instruction on the faith to the uninitiated (amyētoi) comes for the most part from frequent homilies in Lent during the community liturgical celebration, but also outside of the liturgy by godparents, as "spiritual parents" to their "spiritual children" (Chrys., Catech. III 2,15-16 [SC 50 bis, 141-142]; Theod. of Mops., Hom. 12, 14-16]). Catechesis normally lasted three years but could be less in cases of exemplary conduct (Apos. Cons. 8, 32, 16). Guides of the new candidates are at first deacons, then presbyters and the bishop (Apos. Cons. 8,32). The criteria of examination for entrance into the catechumenate/discipleship are mostly those of the Tr. Apost., though with modifications (see M. Metzger: RAC 20, 524-525).

Next we come to the baptizand phase. At the beginning of Lent the catechumens (including soldiers) are enrolled for baptism individually (Theod. of Mops., Hom. 12, 14) in the church's book (which corresponds to that of heaven), after examination of the candidate and the confirmation by the sponsor. The 30-day period of preparation leading up to baptism is described like that of a gymnasium, a battle against immoral habits such as obscene speech, attachment to luxury, entertainments (Chrys., Catech. I, 1,16-22 [SC 366, 144-160]; O. Pasquato, Gli spettacoli, 211-249: entertainments and moral life); a daily period of instruction in the morning (Chrys., Catech. III, 2,12 [139-140]); of exorcisms (barefoot, without tunic, listening to terrifying words, asking for liberation from evil) (Chrys., Catech. I, 1,7; 2,6 [SC 366, 124.188-190]); learning of the creed (Theod. of Mops., Hom. 12,25); rite of the apotaxis, renunciation of Satan and his pomps, and of the syntaxis, adherence to Christ, by which each baptizand concludes a pact (synthēkē) with Christ (registered in heaven) at the ninth hour on Good Friday; prayer with raised hands; and recitation of the creed (redditio symboli) (Chrys., Catech. I, 3,4-6 [SC 366, 226-234]). Immediately follows the anointing on the forehead by the bishop with the sign of the cross, with perfumed oil (myron), the mark of a soldier of Christ and a spousal sign, protection against Satan (Chrys., Catech. I, 3,7 [SC 366, 234]; RAC 20, 524) (see M. Metzger: RAC 20, 523-528; V. Saxer, op. cit., 241-296; G. Cavallotto, Catecumenato, 115-140; O. Pasquato, Crisostomo Giovanni: J. Gevaert [ed.], Diz. di Cat., 185-186; Teodoro di Mopsuestia, ibid., 629-631). For *Cappadocia and *Constantinople; *Syria (*Aphraates, *Ephrem, *Narsai); and *Alexandria and Egypt, see H. Brakmann: RAC 20, 528-536.

Moving to the West, in the area of *Milan our sources are *Ambrose's De Abraham I (CSEL 32/1 [1897] 499-564), Explanatio symboli (CSEL 73 [1955] 1-12), De sacramentis (CSEL 73, 13-85), De mysteriis (CSEL 73, 87-116; cf. O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 457-462) and texts from his other writings. In the catechumenate phase, instruction is basically the community liturgical instruction of the faithful, except for an introductory catechesis and that leading up to baptism. Documented also in the West is the dismissal of catechumens before the prayers of the faithful and the eucharistic liturgy (Ambr. Ep. 76, 4 [CSEL 82,3,109]). Ambrose's preaching is mainly moral (F. Bergamelli, Ambrogio di Milano: J. Gevaert [ed.], Diz. di Cat., 29-30). Here also, as in the East, many catechumens deferred baptism for fear, in the case of a grave sin, of incurring the severe penalties of penitential discipline. Ambrose invites reception of baptism beginning on Epiphany Sunday (nomen [suum] dare: Sacr. 3,2,12; Aug., Conf. 9,6,14: *Augustine with his son *Adeodatus and friend *Alypius; W. Harmless, Augustine and the Catechumenate in Milan, Collegeville, MN 1995, 79-96; cf. M. Metzger: RAC 20, 537). Enrollment for baptism corresponds to Jesus' miracle of the healing of the man born blind (Jn 9:6-7): it is an invitation to do *penance for one's sins (Sacr. 3,12).

Ambrose, like Chrysostom, presents the baptizand (competentes, electi) phase as an athletic contest (De Hel. 21,79 [CSEL 32, 2, 460]): the athlete (training, anointing with oil, suitable food, keeping chastity) is the model for the competente. The foundation and aim of catechesis is: "Every day we treated the issue of morality when we read the history of the patriarchs and the maxims of Proverbs so that, formed and instructed by them, you would become accustomed to enter the way of the Fathers and follow the path in obedience to the divine precepts so that, renewed through baptism, you would lead the kind of life that befits those who have been purified" (Myst. I,19). Traces of these biblical readings are in the early medieval liturgical books of the *Ambrosian rite (Milanese) (J. Claire, Le rituel quadragésimal des catéchumènes à Milan, in Rituels, festschr. P. Gy, Paris 1990, 131-151). Ambrose speaks of scrutinies (scrutamina) regarding bodily impurity, related to exorcism in view of the *purification of body and soul (Symb. 1 [SC 25 bis, 46]). On Palm Sunday in the basilica baptisterii, the traditio symboli took place along with the catechesis of the profession of faith (O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 458-459); Ambrose does not mention the redditio symboli; the traditio e redditio of the *Lord's Prayer were not practiced. On the day of baptism he recalls the abrenuntiatio, preceded by the rite of the ephphatha (Sacr. 1,2), to open the ears (to hear the question) and the mouth (for the response).

Moving to Rome and the surrounding area, *Marius Victorinus's statement about his memorizing the creed according to Roman usage and reciting it from a raised place before the whole community remains isolated (Aug., Conf. 8,2,5; S. Poque, Au sujet d'une singularité romaine de la "redditio symboli": Aug 25 [1985] 133,135-136). We have more information from papal documents on the celebration of baptism at the time of Easter and Pentecost, according to Roman custom (40 days after enrollment), of preparation for baptism with exorcisms, prayers, fasts (Siricius [384-398], Ep. ad Imerium episc. Tarraconensem [385]; prebaptismal exorcisms and anointings, three scrutinia (Siricius [?], Ep. 10,2,10-11); basic elements in Leo I, Ep. 16 (to the bishops of Sicily) (PL 54, 702). At Rome in the Tituli, the most original and ancient churches of Rome, the presbyters are the ministers of baptism and of its preparation but are limited to the urban zone (Lib. Pont. [Duchesne] I, 74, 164: life of Marcellus [308-309] and of Simplicius [468-483]; see M. Metzger, Évolution de la liturgie à Rome autour des 5^e^ et 6^e^ s., in Liturgiereformen, Festschr. A.A. Häussling 1= LQF 88, 1 [2002] 200-202, cit. by Id., RAC 20, 540).

For *Africa our main sources are Augustine and *Quodvultdeus (bishop of *Carthage, 437–439; for Augustine: O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 467-469 [bibl.]; for Quodvultdeus: H. Brakmann, RAC 20, 472-473 [bibl.]; W. Rötzer, Des hl. Augustinus Schriften als liturgiegeschichtliche Quelle (1930); V. Saxer, op. cit., 382-389; W. Harmless, Augustine and the Catechumenate, 107-299; cf. Africa II (literaturgeschichtlich), C. Christlich: RAC, Suppl. - Band I [2001]: A. e l'Africa, 188-196 (154-203: from Tertullian to Quodvultdeus).

First is the catechumenate (audientes) phase. In De cat. rud. the recipients are rudes, newly arrived (accedentes), especially pagans, including some highly educated, others (about half) illiterati, who after the usual examination of motives (De cat. rud. 9-10) and an introductory instruction by means of suitable rites (exsufflatio, signatio, donatio salis: De cat. rud. 13, 50) are accepted into the catechumenal way if after questioning they respond that they believe and want to conform their life to the Christian faith (De cat. rud. 26,50; V. Saxer, Les rites, 382-384). Augustine himself was accepted after his birth as a catechumen with the sign of the cross and with *salt (Conf. 1,11,17), as was the practice. His mother *Monica, the daughter of Christian parents who herself was baptized late, deferred his baptism, even after his serious illness as a youth (ibid.). Instruction of the audientes came from biblical readings and from the homily during the liturgical celebration, in which they took part until their dismissal, before the beginning of the eucharistic liturgy (O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 469; Aug. Serm. 359B [Dolbeau 2], 6: REAug 38 [1992] 66). In Augustine catechumens were also called "Christians" (Serm. 294, 13 [PL 38, 1343]), nearer now to the faithful (baptized), since they were consecrated with the sign of Christ and prayer with lifted hands, but they were still slaves, not sons (In Joh. tract. 11,3-4 [CCL 36, 111-112]; É. Lamirande, La signification de "christianus" dans la théologie de s. A. et la tradition ancienne: REAug 9 [1963] 228-233; Id., "Fidelis" et l'ecclésiologie de s. A.: Aug 41 [2001] 169-200). Augustine, who recalls the "discipline of the arcanum," refers it primarily to baptism and to the Eucharist (En. in Ps. 103, 14) as a stimulus to receive these sacraments (see M. Metzger: RAC 20, 541).

Next is the baptizand phase. Augustine calls them competentes, i.e., "those who together seek and aspire to the same thing" (Serm. 216,1,1 [PL 38, 1077]). Like Cyril of Jerusalem, Augustine (Serm. 205, 1 [PL 38, 1039]) and Quodvultdeus (Symb. 1,1,3 [CCL 60, 305]) liken this period, close to baptism and begun with the sign of the cross, to a gestation in the church's womb for a new sacramental birth. Among the baptizands were also children (Aug., Contra Julianum op. imperf. 4,7 [PL 45, 1343]), persons of the city (*Hippo and Carthage) and its surroundings; these latter had to go to the city and stay there for 40 days until Easter. Preachers exhorted the hesitant to have their names enrolled (Aug., Ep. 258,5 [CSEL 57, 609-610]). Competentes prepared with severity (*monastic influence?) for baptism, with a daily fast until nine (Aug., Ep. 54,9 [CSEL 34, 168]) and abstinence from wine, meat, baths and, for spouses, intercourse. Positively recommended were prayer, almsgiving, nocturnal vigils (Serm. 229A [Guelf. 7], 2 [PL Suppl. 2, 555]) and the hair shirt. On Holy Thursday they bathed, also for hygienic reasons (Aug., Ep. 54,10 [168]). On feast days the baptizands were the object of exorcisms and scrutinies aimed at freeing them from evil spirits (Aug., Serm. 216,6,6 [PL 38, 1080]). According to Quodvultdeus (Symb. 3,1,3 [CCL 60, 349]), the same rigor was employed at Carthage as at Hippo. Augustine also held a moral catechesis on the Christian's duties: "We scatter the seed of the word, you produce the fruits of faith" (Serm. 216,1), Ut competentes competenter adolescite in Christo, ut in virum perfectum iuveniliter accrescatis (Serm. 216, 7). He summarizes the catechesis to competentes, reminding them of his having explained to them the sacrament of the creed to be believed, that of prayer, and that of baptism; these all have been handed over to them (Serm. 28,3 [PL 38, 1102]). Two or three weeks before Easter he explains the creed (pactum fidei: Serm. 212,1; 214,12) (traditio), containing "breviter . . . all that you believe" (Serm. 212,1; Symbolum est breviter complexa regula fidei [Serm. 213,1]), which they must memorize within eight days in order to recite it (redditio); the same occurs for the "handing over" and "recitation" of the oratio dominica (O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 469-470). At the baptismal vigil each recites the creed before the whole community (Serm. 58,1,1 [PL 38, 393]). For Carthage, Quodvultdeus's competentes, perhaps in the Easter Vigil, are led before the whole community, barefoot and in penitential garments; a scrutiny (examen) is carried out, invoking Christ; in this way the devil, whom they had earlier spit upon, is cast out (Symb. 1,1,4-6 [CCL 60, 305]). Then comes the aversio of the devil (apotaxis) and the conversio (syntaxis) to God. Parents or others stood in for children and the dying (M. Metzger: RAC 20, 543; O. Pasquato, v. Agostino: J. Gevaert (ed.), Diz. di Cat., 23-25). In summary, in this period the communal liturgies were of primary importance, to which was added particular instruction, including that by lay teachers: from this derived the primacy of listening for catechumens. Penitential rites (e.g., the taking off of the tunic of skins, which was then placed under one's feet) were added for competentes in Lent, and scrutinies against the power of *demons. Catechesis varied from place to place, although the creed was always explained in secret. The consignment of the Lord's Prayer could take place before baptism, or during the octave of Easter (V. Saxer, op. cit., 381-416; G. Cavallotto, Catecumenato, 164-194).

V. In the national churches and in the barbarian kingdoms: 6th-7th c. The 6th c. saw the increasing division between *Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages, between the Eastern and Western churches, but it also saw the establishment of links between the institutions of the ancient church and those of the medieval church. With the barbarian kingdoms, the national churches were established, in which the catechumenate/discipleship gradually ceased as an institution, remaining almost solely as a collection of rites, which expanded and tended to be in close relation with the celebration itself of the sacraments of Christian initiation, conferred not only at Easter but also on other solemnities and on the feasts of the saints. The majority of those baptized were children, to whom the term catechumenus is often referred, leading to the new figure of the "godfather," who is no longer the guarantor of the baptizand's conversion but is his closest teacher. The godfather, therefore, had to know the credo, the Pater (*Lord's Prayer) and the Christian virtues (G. Groppo, Patristica (catechesi): J. Gevaert [ed.], Diz. di Cat., 485). Instruction for catechumens was addressed to all the faithful in the community liturgy. The ancient prayers, including some passages of catechesis, were collected in sacramentaries or collections of blessings.

In Africa, at the end of the 6th c., ps.-Fulgentius, in Serm. 78 (PL 65, 950: Ad competentes post traditum symbolum), compares the battle against demons of the initiatio Christiana to the ten plagues which forced Pharaoh to free Israel from Egypt (Ex 12:29). The first nine pertain to the competentes: enrollment of the name, daily prayer, fasts, nocturnal vigils, fearful exorcisms, prayers of the presbyters, traditio of the creed, orationis dominicae informatio, and renunciation of Satan and of the fallen angels. The tenth pertains to the profession of faith. African preaching (ps.-Chrys., Lat. coll. Morin, Serm. 30 [PL Suppl. 4, 825-831]) documents the rare practice of the traditio of Ps 23 (22) to candidates for baptism (to be memorized), with a solemnity comparable to that of the traditio of the symbolum and Pater (H. Brakmann: RAC 20, 473).

In *Gaul, *Caesarius of Arles (503–542) attests to a brief preparation for baptism with enrollment of the name, raising of hands and anointings (Serm. 200, 2 Morin). More often this is directed to competentes (those who ask together), who must pray to leave a place of the devil so as to enter God's temple (Serm. 200, 1-2). Conversio morum is stressed; with regard to baptism of children (infantuli), the parents must stand in for them (enrollment for baptism at the beginning of Lent, raising of the hands, anointing, regular attendance at liturgy, especially the week prior to baptism). Eight days before Easter is the traditio symboli to the competentes publice in ecclesia (Conc. agath., a. 506, can. 13 [CCL 148, 200]): the fideiussores, responsible to God for the formation of their (spiritual) children, must teach them the creed for the redditio, which the candidates do alone, if they are able; otherwise the fideiussores stand in for them (Serm. 130,5). The date of the baptism is normally the eve of Easter. As for Jews, the Council of *Agde (before 506) established a normal catechesis of eight months outside of the church (can. 34). The ps.-*Germanus of Paris (6th-7th c.) attests to the catechumenate/discipleship of pagans and Jews, linking it to the rites of the ancient church (Expos. liturg. 1,15; M. Smyth, La liturgie oubliée. La prière eucharistique en Gaule antique et dans l'Occident non romain, Paris 2003, 195; V. Saxer, Les rites, 505-525; cf. M. Metzger: RAC 20, 561-562).

In *Spain, the books of the "Mozarabic" liturgy are often a source: the Homilary of Toledo (mid-7th c.; CPL 3a. 1997; O. Pasquato: RAC 20, 482); the Antiphonarium of Léon (L. Brou - J. Vives, Antifonario visigótico mozarábe de la catedral de León = Mon. Hisp. Sacr. Ser. litúrg. 5,1, Barcelona 1959; cf. D. Borobio, Iniciación cristiana en la Iglesia Hispana de los siglos VI al X: Salmanticensis 42 [1995] 29-61, with bibl.); the treatises De ecclesiasticis officiis (CCL 113) of *Isidore of Seville and De cognitione baptismi (PL 96, 11-172) of *Ildefonsus of Toledo. They distinguish catechumens (audientes), vicini fidelium, non fideles, from competentes (who) iam petunt, iam accipiunt, iam catecizantur (Isid. Hisp., Eccl. off. 2,22,1-2; cf. RAC 20, 562). From these sources we know (1) the catechumens were dismissed before the Offertorium; (2) 20 days before Easter, from dom. vicesima (= 4th Sunday of Lent), the explanation of the creed (traditio) took place, as well as the exorcisms, insufflations, the offering of salt and anointings, with the public invited, on the previous Saturday, for the enrollment to baptism (nomendatio). Ildefonsus tells of a solemn and menacing exorcism (in tuba victoriae) by the bishop, the effetatio (De cogn. bapt. 25; 27-29); the procession over sackcloth of the penitent catechumens (De cogn. bapt. 21). Mentioned are the memorization of the regula fidei (*Apostles' Creed), to be recited daily (Homil. Tolet. 22 [PL Suppl. 4, 1950-1951]), the redditio symboli, personally for adults, through the parents and godparents for children, on Holy Thursday, and the traditio orationis dominicae, immediately after baptism (V. Saxer, op. cit., 531-557).

In and about Rome, a catechesis (catechizatio) for children (catechumeni, competentes or electi) takes up the traditional rites, including three scrutinia, traditio and redditio symboli; renunciation of Satan; and aperitio of the ears and nose: the children, who do not understand, are saved by the adults, who profess for them, just as they were damned by another's fault (according to the deacon John to the comes Senarius of *Ravenna: Ep. ad Sen. 7). A special importance is assumed here by the Sacramentarium Gelasianum vetus (containing the traditions of the city of Rome from before 680, with mid-6th-c. Greek texts) regarding preparation for baptism in Lent (see M. Metzger, Les sacramentaires = Tipologie des sources du M.A. occidental 70, Turnhout 1994, 81-106). Attested there are the formularies of the *Mass pro scrutiniis electorum, with a memento for the godparents to be named individually, just as with the reading of the names of the electi (competentes) in their own Hanc igitur. It begins with the announcement of the scrutinies (denuntiatio pro scrutiniis), which, occurring on the Monday of the 3rd week of Lent, proves that they were now done on weekdays (A. Chavasse, Le sacramentaire gélasien, Paris 1958, 159). The rites for the baptismal preparation of children are described; but there are also adult converts of Christian parents (ad caticuminum ex pacano faciendum: Sacr. Gelas. vet. 599 [93]), called indiscriminately catechumeni and electi (there was now therefore only one degree of preparation!); also, the symbolum was recited first in Greek, then in Latin. Adaptation of the liturgy to infant baptism is visible in the ordo of the Lenten readings of the city of Rome (A. Chavasse, Liturgie de la ville de Rome du 5e au 8e s. = StudAnselm 112, Rome 1993, 51-52; see P.M. Gy, Du baptême pascal des petits enfants au baptême quamprimum, in Haut Moyen Âge: culture, éducation et société, Mélanges P. Riché, Nanterre 1990, 353-365).

The traditions collected in the Gelasianum vetus and the new ordo of readings pass to the 7th c. in the Ordo romanus 11 (olim VII), which distributes the ritual for the preparation for infant baptism over seven scrutinia (during the weekdays of the 3rd, 4th and 5th weeks of Lent, with the last scrutiny on Holy Saturday morning). But if the regulation of baptism and the preparation for it in the West as far as Narbonne and Tarragona was influenced by the traditions of the city of Rome (A. Angenendt, Der Taufritus im frühen Mittelalter: Sett. StudAltMed 33/1, Spoleto 1987, 275-321; cf. RAC 20, 566-567), liturgical anarchy arrived at the beginning of the 8th c., compromising relations with Rome. This led to *Gregory II's interventions (716) in the churches of Bavaria, those of *Boniface (719 and 747 in the Council of Cloveshoe), and of his disciple Chrodegang, bishop of Metz (d. 766), who proposed the reform desired by king Pepin, and then those of Charlemagne (789: baptism secundum morem romanum), culminating in his inquiry to the metropolitans (811–812). Charlemagne's unitary plan for baptism failed, however, with a splintering of the rites of Christian initiation (O. Pasquato, Quale tradizione, 75-105; here 92-95).

VI. Concluding summary. Between the catechumenate/discipleship of the church and the pagan and Jewish milieu there are a few points in common (secret of the arcanum, a quality of acceptance, influence of the philosophical schools etc.), but they are of a different nature. The religious formation of the young in the family does owe something to Jewish practice. The 4th-c. Christian sources do not speak per se of catechumenate/discipleship as an institution, but concretely of catechumens and elect, instruction, rites (signatio, exorcisms, anointings etc.). The absence of an organic conception of all these individual parts indicates the nonexistence of a true and proper catechumenal institution. Gradually, however, "with the peace of Constantine the flood of new initiates demanded a stable organization, whose structure was defined in the course of the 4th c., the great age of catechesis" (A. Hamman, s.v. Catecumeno [catecumenato], Diz. patr. a.C., 627: the title of the entry is significant, in support of our opening position on "discipleship" drawn from M. Dujarier). A neutral term would be preferable, such as "time" (tempus [chrónos] audiendi verbum: Tr. apost. 17 [ed. Botte]). Regarding the length of the catechumenal period, a widespread negative judgment on its brevity should probably be reevaluated, given that candidates for baptism, both children and adults, often from Christian families, lived in an environment that was already less marked by paganism. This is true also for Jewish candidates, esp. from the 6th c. (see G. Scimé, Giudei e cristiani nei sermoni di S. Pietro Crisologo, SEA 89, Rome 2003; M. Metzger: RAC 20, 568-569; cf. M. Rubellin, Battesimo: Diz. Enc. del Medioevo, I, dir. da A. Vauchez - C. Leonardi, Rome 1998, 209-211).

G. Bareille, Catéchuménat: DTC, II,2, 1968-1987; P. de Puniet, Catéchuménat: DACL II, 2, 2579-2621; B. Botte, Aperitio aurium: RAC 1, 487-489; Id., Competentes: RAC 3, 266-268; K. Thräde, Exorzismus, RAC 7, 44-117 (esp. 76-100); R. Turcan, Initiation, RAC 18, 87-159; B. Capelle, L'introduction du catéchuménat à Rome: RTAM 5 (1933) 129-154; R. Busch, De initiatione christiana secundum s. Augustinum: EphLit 32 (1938) 159-179; 385-480; A. Chavasse, Le carême romain et les scrutinia: RecSR 55 (1948) 325-381; M. Dujarier, Le parrainage des adultes aux trois premiers siècles de l'Église . . . , Paris 1962; Th. Mertens, Histoire et pastorale du rituel du catéchuménat et du baptême, Bruges 1962; A. Stenzel, Il battesimo, Alba 1962; A. Turck, Aux origines du catéchuménat: RSPh 48 (1964) 20-31; A. Hamman, Le baptême et la confirmation, Paris 1969; I. Oñatibia, Actualidad del catecumenado antiguo: Phase 64 (1971) 325-334; P.-M. Gy, La notion d'initiation chrétienne. Jalons pour une enquête: La MaisonD. 132 (1977) 33-54; G. Kretschmar, Nouvelles recherches sur l'initiation chrétienne, La MaisonD. 132, 7-32; G. Groppo, L'evoluzione del catecumenato nella Chiesa antica dal punto di vista pastorale, in S. Felici (ed.), Valori attuali della catechesi patristica, Rome 1979, 29-49; J. Pijuán, La liturgia bautismal en la España romano-visigoda, Toledo 1981; M. Dujarier, Breve storia del catecumenato, Leumann (To) 1984; O. Pasquato, I Padri educatori alla fede, pastori e guide del popolo di Dio: Credereoggi 3 (1984) 74-95; J. Gevaert (ed.), Dizionario di Catechetica, Leumann (To) 1986; R. Cabié, L'iniziazione cristiana, in A.G. Martimort (ed.), La Chiesa in preghiera. Introduzione alla liturgia, III, Brescia 1987, 27-120; V. Saxer, Les rites de l'initiation chrétienne du Ier au Ve siècle . . ., Spoleto 1988; Th.M. Finn, Early Christian Baptism and the Catechumenate: West and East Syria, Collegeville, MN 1992; Id., Early Christian Baptism and the Catechumenate: Italy, North Africa, and Egypt, Collegeville, MN 1992; K. McDonnell - G.T. Montague, Iniziazione cristiana e battesimo nello Spirito santo. Testimonianze dei primi otto secoli, Rome 1993; C. Floristán, Il catecumenato, Rome 1993; P. Benoît - Ch. Munier, Le baptême dans l'Eglise ancienne. Ier-IIIe siècle, Berne 1994; Ch. Munier, Die Taufe in der alten Kirche: Traditio christiana 9, Bern 1994; O. Pasquato, Catecumenato antico (sec. II-V): punti nodali e qualità pastorale: Lateranum 60 (1994) 323-341; A. Laurentin - M. Dujarier, Il catecumenato. Fonti neotestamentarie e patristiche. La riforma del Vaticano II, Rome 1995, 49-129; G. Cavallotto, Catecumenato antico. Diventare cristiani secondo i Padri, Bologna 1996; M. Dujarier, La funzione materna della Chiesa nella pratica catecumenale dell'antichità, in Iniziazione cristiana e catecumenato . . ., ed. G. Cavallotto, Bologna 1996, 123-145; G. Laiti, La catechesi nel catecumenato antico, in Cavalotto, op.cit., 63-90; V. Saxer, I riti del catecumenato e dell'iniziazione cristiana nell'antichità, in Cavalotto, op.cit., 91-121; D. Borobio, Catecumenado para la evangelización, Madrid 1997; O. Pasquato, Quale tradizione per l'iniziazione cristiana? Dall'età dei Padri all'epoca carolingia: Iniziazione cristiana degli adulti oggi, Rome 1998, 75-105; P.F. Beatrice, Symbolum Fidei: Baptism and Creed in Early Christianity, in P. Allen et al. (eds.), Prayer and Spirituality in the Early Church, 2, Brisbane 1999, 43-65; M.E. Johnson, The Rites of Christian Initiation: Alcuin Club Coll. 76, Collegeville, MN 1999; W. Slenczka, Heilsgeschichte u. Liturgie: Arbeiten zur Kirchengeschichte 78 (2000); D. Borobio, Catecumenato, in Liturgia, eds. D. Sartore et al., Cinisello B. (Mi) 2001, 361-377; M. Dujarier, Devenir disciple du Christ. Catéchuménat et 'Discipulat', in Historiam Perscrutari. Miscellanea, O. Pasquato, Rome 2002, 521-537; C. Bissoli, Tracce catechistiche negli scritti del Nuovo Testamento, in Historiam Perscrutari. Miscellanea, 467-481; G. Leonardi, Il metodo educativo della comunità ebraica e di Gesù con i suoi discepoli. Continuità e innovazioni, in Historiam Perscrutari. Miscellanea, 483-511; B. Maggioni, Gesù comunicatore della fede. Indicazioni neotestamentarie per una nuova evangelizzazione, in Historiam Perscrutari. Miscellanea, 513-520; G. Laiti, Il discepolo spirituale interprete delle Scritture (Ireneo, Contro le Eresie IV, 33): in Historiam Perscrutari. Miscellanea, 539-556; O. Pasquato - H. Brakmann, Katechese (Katechismus): RAC 20 (2003) 422-496; M. Metzger - W. Drews - H. Brakmann, Katechumenat: RAC 20, 497-574.

O. Pasquato

CATENAE, BIBLICAL

I. Greek catenae - II. Eastern catenae - III. Latin catenae.

This term designates collections of exegetical passages on a book of Scripture put together by later compilers, who drew these passages from earlier, generally lost, exegetical works. Essentially anthologies of biblical exegesis, thanks to them we know, though only in fragments, the interpretations given by the Fathers on various texts of Scripture, interpretations which would not have reached us without the catenae. Biblical catenae are to be distinguished from the dogmatic and *ascetical-moral collections—which were also called catenae, incorrectly, as they were more properly *florilegia—and are much more akin to the collections of the scholia of classical and juridical works. But the term catena is also inappropriate for anthologies of biblical *exegesis; to those works the first compilers gave the more correct name of ἐκλογαί, ἐξηγητικαὶ ἐκλογαί, συναγωγὴ or συλλογὴ ἐξηγήσεων, παραγραφαί, in Latin excerpta or collectanea.

I. Greek catenae. In Greece, the first biblical catenae appeared at the end of the patristic era, after a period of intense production in the field of scriptural exegesis; the first compilers had an abundant quantity of material to choose from. The founder of the genre may be considered the rhetor *Procopius of Gaza, who in the mid-6th c. composed catenae of the Octateuch, the books of Kings, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the *Song of Songs. For the Octateuch, he collected such an immense amount of material that he himself made a compendium for it: he selected only one interpretation when the opinions of the various exegetes agreed, whereas, when they differed, he reworked them into a kind of continuous interpretation which included the words of all of them (τὰς ἀπάντων . . . φωνάς). Notable among Procopius's successors was Nicetas, metropolitan of Heraclea in *Thrace (11th c.), who composed catenae of *Job, *Psalms, the major prophets, the gospels and Paul's Epistles. For many other catenists we know only their names, without being able to specify the period in which they worked or the sacred books they chose; for most of them, we don't even know their names, as the large number of anonymous manuscripts testify.

Based on their format, the Greek catenae can be divided into three classes: marginal, two-column and alternate. The first class is the most common: the biblical text, written in larger letters, is at the center of the page, flush with the inner margin; around it are arranged, in the three outer margins, the exegetical extracts—more rarely, the extracts fill all four margins and the scriptural text is perfectly centered on the page. In two-column catenae, the sacred text and the extracts face each other in two symmetrical columns. In alternate catenae, the biblical text, which is set off by diple marks that are repeated in the margin of the manuscript, is followed by the exegetical extracts, uninterrupted on the entire page. Similar to the marginal class is a type of catena which is constructed within a commentary in another already-existing catena. For example, MS Reg. 44, at the center of the page, attests a commentary of Hesychius on the Psalms, and in the margins, a catena of fragments on the same biblical text; the beginning of Palat. 20, at the center of the page, contains a catena on Luke, and in the margins fragments of Nicetas on the same gospel. In the oldest catenae, the authors of the extracts are generally indicated, usually in red or in more conspicuous characters, their names wholly written out or sometimes abbreviated, which can here and there lead to errors. Double or triple attributions are also frequent, which demands of the editor of catenae texts a detailed and patient investigation to determine to which of the two or three exegetes the fragment should be assigned—or perhaps even that it belongs to none of them. The same process of verification must frequently also be applied to texts attributed to a single author, esp. in cases in which the various catenae differ as to origin; but even for a univocal attribution it is always wise to raise reasonable doubts. The catena tradition, in fact, much more so than the direct tradition, is exposed to manipulation and forgery. Over time, the early diligence in indicating the name of the author gradually diminished to the point where compilers and amanuenses omitted it entirely, creating difficult problems of attribution for editors. An evolution also occurred regarding the authors drawn upon. Early on, only two (or at most three) were chosen, one from the *Alexandrian school and the other from the *Antiochene, almost as if to offer the two senses, *allegorical and literal. Gradually, however, the number of authors increased, while at the same time the total number of extracts chosen decreased.

II. Eastern catenae. These catenae are in the *Syriac, *Armenian and *Coptic languages, translated from the Greek or compiled based on (or in additiona to) indigenous authors. A Syriac catena of the whole Bible was composed in the 9th c. by the monk Severus. We know of an even older catena (7th c.), of which the Syriac manuscript 852 in the British Museum is a copy; it is anonymous, like the later one known by the title Gannat būssāmē or "Garden of delights" (12th c.).

III. Latin catenae. This type of compilation was less popular among the Latins. Before the Carolingian renaissance we know of a St. *Victor of Capua (d. 553), author of Scholia, and of a Roman deacon John who, shortly later, composed an Expositum in Heptateuchum. With the Carolingian era came the formation of biblical commentaries using exegetical extracts from the Fathers, but even then the work of selection was carried out less carefully than by the first Greek catenists. There were few compilers, in fact, who, like Rabanus Maurus, took the care to systematically note the authors of the individual extracts. With the direct return to the Fathers that characterized the profound renewal of scholarship in the 12th c., like that of Peter Lombard's Sentences in dogmatic theology, so glosses circulated for the study of Scripture: a type of marginal or columnar catena, which also included brief explanations between the lines (glossa interlinearis). Peter Lombard himself composed glosses on the Psalms and on the Epistles of *Paul, using *Ambrose, *Ambrosiaster, *Jerome, *Augustine, *Cassiodorus etc. The most important of the glosses was the Glossa ordinaria in which, thanks to the school of Anselm or Ansellus of Laon (d. 1117), glosses by different compilers were brought together. As with Greek catenae, much work remains to be done on glosses. This is a huge work, though it is generally not as fruitful, since the Greek catenae generally bring to light unknown texts, whereas we possess the complete texts of the extracts from which the glosses are composed.

G. Karo - I. Lietzmann, Catenarum Graecarum Catalogus, Göttingen 1902; R. Devreesse, Chaînes exégétiques grecques: DBS 1, 1084ff. (which includes a detailed bibl.): these two works remain even today the most complete general resource. See also M. Geerard, CPG IV, Turnhout 1980 and Supplements; E. Mühlenberg, Katenen, TRE 18 (1989) 14-21; C. Curti, Eusebiana I. Commentarii in Psalmos, Catania 1982 (various earlier articles); G. Dorival, Des Commentaires de l'écriture aux chaînes, in Le monde grec ancien et la Bible, ed. C. Mondésert, Paris 1984, 321-383; Id., Les chaînes exégétiques grecques sur les psaumes: Contribution a l'étude d'une forme littéraire, Tomes 1-4 (Spicilegium Sacrum Lovaniense - Études et Documents 43-46), Leuven 1986; Patrologia V, 609-655 (ample treatment with rich bibl.). For the glosses: B. Smalley, La Glossa ordinaria: RecTh 9 (1937) 365-400; E. Bertola, La "glossa ordinaria" biblica ed i suoi problemi: RecTh 45 (1978) 34-78; J. Châtillon, La bible dans les Écoles du XII[e] siècle, in Le Moyen Âge et la Bible, eds. P. Riché - G. Lobrichon, Paris 1984, 163-198; LMA 2,44-45 and 50-51.

C. Curti

CATHEDRA

I. The cathedra Petri - II. The episcopal cathedra - III. The location and function of the cathedra in church buildings - IV. Examples of Christian cathedrae - V. The funerary cathedra.

Throughout antiquity the term cathedra meant the "sitting position"; cathedra in the sense of a "place to sit" is found only in *Hellenism and, more frequently, in the imperial era, without any particular meaning. The terms cathedra and throne and are often used as synonyms, with no difference in the meaning of the two terms.

I. The cathedra Petri. From the 3rd c. on one notes an evolution, beginning with *Cyprian of Carthage, which sees the cathedra as an expression or instance of apostolic or episcopal authority. According to Cyprian, the episcopal power (episcopatus vigor) and the authority of the cathedra (cathedrae auctoritas) authorize the bishop to take measures against those subject to the church who have behaved erroneously (Ep. 3,1,1 [CCL 3B, 9]; see also 17,2,1 [97]: honor sacerdotii . . . et cathedrae; Laps. 6: derelicta cathedra [from the bishop]). Cyprian also speaks explicitly of the cathedra una super Petrum Domini voce fundata (43,5,2 [205]). *Cornelius became bishop of *Rome at a time when—because of *Fabian's death—the locus Petri et gradus cathedrae sacerdotalis (55,8 [265]) was empty, and despite grave hostility he sat without fear on the sacerdotalis cathedra. The episcopal cathedra of Rome is the cathedra Petri, the ecclesia principalis, unde unitas sacerdotalis exorta est (59,14,1 [CCL 3C, 361]; G.W. Clarke, The Letters of St. Cyprian of Carthage 3 [New York 1986] 257f. [bibl.]).

Cathedra Petri is also the name of a liturgical feast. It is not entirely clear under what guise *Peter was proclaimed, during the feast on 22 February, natale Petri de cathedra. The date of the feast goes back to the *pagan feast of the Cara cognatio, which ended with a six-day meal in commemoration of the dead, the Parentalia. For this reason it is rightly held that the feast cathedra Petri originated as a *funeral banquet in memory of the apostle, which probably caused the date of his death to be forgotten. The feast is documented in the calendar of 354, and in two 5th-c. homilies (ps.-Leo Gt., Or. 14 [PL 54, 505-508; CPL3 1658] and ps.-Augustinus [D.G. Morin, Notes d'ancienne littérature eccl.: RBen 13 (1896) 343/6; CPL3 369]), as well as in complaints at the *Council of *Tours of 567 about the mishaps that occurred during the celebration of the feast (can. 23 [CCL 148A, 191, 458/67]; see also P.-A. Février, Natale Petri de cathedra: CRAI [1977] 514-531; H. Merkel, Feste u. Feiertage. IV: TRE 11 [1983] 117). In the 6th c., the Martyrologium Hieronymianum distinguishes between the feast of 18 January, when Peter's taking possession of the cathedra of Rome is celebrated, and the feast of 22 February, which refers to his cathedra at *Antioch (l.c. 162 with reference to Gal 2:11). The liturgical texts attribute a different character to the feast according to region: esp. in *Gaul there was the idea of a primacy of Peter in the sense of a preeminent position in the whole church; there was also a celebration of Peter's episcopate, limited to Rome (Klauser, Cathedra 165-172). *Perpetuus of Tours calls the feast Cathedra Petri: natale sancti Petri episcopatus, which may mean "day of the remembrance of the episcopate of St. Peter" (Greg. Tours, Hist. Franc. 10,31,6 [MG Script. rer. Mer. 1,1,530]). A less convincing opinion comes from Gussone 114, who refers to the hypothesis of D. Balboni (Natale Petri de cathedra: EphLit 68 [1954] 97-127), already refuted by Klauser, Cathedra 205-206: the feast commemorated Peter's ascent to the throne. (For other hypotheses on the origin and meaning of the feast, see Gussone 113.)

II. The episcopal cathedra. The idea of the conferring of the cathedra on the apostles led to the use of the term cathedra to indicate both the seat of bishops and presbyters, and their office. In this context there is no difference between cathedra and throne. The term cathedra as a seat of the clergy is first attested in the so-called *Muratorian fragment, usually dated to the late 2nd c.: sedente cathedra urbis Romae ecclesiae Pio episcopo (l. 75f; S. Ritter, Il frammento Muratoriano: RivAC 3 [1926] 253); here it is already used in a figurative sense. A seat covered with linen fabric is documented after the mid-3rd c. as an honorific right of the bishop (Pont., Vit. Cypr. 16, 6 [Pellegrino 172]).

III. The location and function of the cathedra in church buildings. According to the Didascalia apostolorum* 2,57,4 (Funk 160), the bishop's throne had to be located on the E side of the meeting hall, in the midst of the presbyters' seats. A cathedra can be used by the bishop in the secretarium (Sulp. Sev., Dial., 2,1,3). The cathedra is located in the apse (Paulin. Med., Vit. Ambr. 48,1). In conformity with canon 2 of the IV Synod of Carthage (398) (C. Munier, Les Statuta Ecclesiae antiqua, Paris 1960, 79; F.J. Dölger, Die Heiligkeit des Altars u. ihre Begründung im christl. Altertum: AC 2 [1930] 161f), the bishop must sit in ecclesia et in consessu presbyterorum sublimior, while intra domum . . . collegam se presbyterorum esse cognoscat, which means, according to Stommel 28, that bishops were prohibited from setting up a throne or throne room outside of the church. Augustine (En. in ps. 126,3 [CCL 40, 1858]) explains that bishops have a raised seat so as to watch over and care for the people (ut ipsi superintendant et tamquam custodiant populum). In a church at Uzala in *Africa, the relics of the martyr Stephen were placed in loco absidae super cathedram velatam, as related in the Mirac. Steph. 3 (PL 41, 835; CPL3 391) from the early 5th c. When the temple of Caelestis at Carthage was turned into a Christian church in 399, the cathedra was put in the place of the god's image (Quodv., Prom. 3,44 [CCL 60, 185]; R. Oehler, art. Karthago: PW 10 [1919] 2199; F.W. Deichmann, Carthago. Heiligtum der Caelestis: JDAI 54 [1939] 136 nr. 86; J. Christern, art. Karthago: RBK 3 [1978] 1164 nr. 13). The location of the cathedra could change, according to the *liturgy, from the apse to the center of the church, as described in the Peregrinatio Egeriae. *Basil of Caesarea sat in the church behind the curtain, and it was unusual that someone would be admitted to that area (Theodoret, HE 4, 19, 11). The Testamentum Domini (1,19) prescribes that the bishop's throne be set on the E side; beside it should be the seats (or benches) for the presbyters, with their space separated by a veil. When the patriarch *Macarius of Antioch was deposed during the third council in 680/81, his seat of honor (thronus) was thrown out (Lib. pontif. 1, 354 Duchesne; Gussone 87).

IV. Examples of Christian cathedrae. The oldest preserved Christian cathedra was found at Karapinar (Bekilli) in Phrygia, in an unspecified archaelogical context; it is dated to the 3rd c., based on the inscription on its front (W.F. Buckler - W.M. Calder - W.K.C. Guthrie, Monuments and Documents from Eastern Asia and Western Galatia [Manchester 1933] nr. 320 Taf. 65; A. Strobel, Das hl. Land der Montanisten [1980] 70f. 116f.). Very often Greco-Roman seats were reused in Christian contexts; the seats originally functioned as the place of honor in theaters. One of the few cathedrae produced in the early Christian period is the "Seat of St. Mark," made of alabaster in a 6th-c. Eastern workshop. A cavity under the seat and the two side-openings indicate that the "seat" functioned as a reliquary (E. Dinkler - E. Dinkler von Schubert, Art. Kreuz I: RBK 5 [1991] 131); its size suggests that it was also used as throne for the gospel book. Based on the monogram on the front, the ivory cathedra preserved in the Museo Arcivescovile at *Ravenna is attributed to *Maximian, bishop of Ravenna, and dated to the period of his episcopate (545–553; Volbach, Elfenbeinarb. nr. 140 Taf. 72/4; F.W. Deichmann, Ravenna, Geschichte und Monumente [Wiesbaden 1969] 1, 75f). As various mentions in the written sources suggest, the cathedra of Maximian was not necessarily an unicum. *Cyril of Alexandria made gifts of valuable ivory cathedrae to maintain sympathy for his role after the Council of *Ephesus of 431 (Collectio Casinensis 294: ACO 1, 4 [1922/23] 224f.). The ivory cathedra preserved in Bernini's bronze throne in the choir of St. Peter's, which was venerated as St. Peter's cathedra, has been almost unanimously recognized as the gift of Charles the Bald to Pope John VIII on the occasion of his coronation as emperor (M. Maccarrone et al., La cattedra lignea di S. Pietro in Vaticano [= MemPontAc 10, Vat. City 1971]; a different opinion is by M. Guarducci, Il trono di Massimiano Erculio e la cattedra di S. Pietro: BollArt 73 [1988] 52, 1-12).

V. The funerary cathedra. On the basis of the written sources, Klauser (43-60) formulated the hypothesis that, in funerary cult, the cathedra was the seat of the deceased person during the funeral banquet (ibid., 56); representation of the banquet of the deceased would have been the main idea behind the location of cathedrae (ibid., 57). In the sources cited by Klauser, an explicit relation between cathedra, funeral banquet and the deceased is postulated only by *Hesychius and *Photius; the cathedra is therefore documented only in texts from the 6th and 9th c. The burial cathedrae collected by Klauser are primarily from the Roman catacombs and are centuries earlier than the written sources, placed in ordinary cubicles and in the martyrs' tombs in the 2nd half of or late 4th c. They can probably only be interpreted as a symbolic reminder of the ancient custom of the funeral banquet near the tomb, since the catacombs, lacking light and ventilation, did not allow gatherings of visitors for this purpose. The funerary function of the cathedra is limited to a few monuments, and thus its role in the cult of the dead can be considered of little importance.

Th. Klauser, Die Cathedra im Totenkult, Münster 1927; N. Gussone, Thron u. Inthronisation des Papstes von den Anfängen bis zum 12. Jh. (Bonner hist. Forsch. 41), Bonn 1978; J. Dresken-Weiland, Kathedra: RAC 20 (2003–2004) 600-644, 656-682.

J. Dresken-Weiland

CATHERINE of Alexandria. The passio of which the saint is the protagonist lacks any historical basis, but it is the basis of the extraordinary spread of her cult. Written in Greek between the 6th and 8th c., it was translated into *Latin in the 9th c., and later into the various European languages. The account is set in the 4th c. and, along with the most trite *hagiographical commonplaces—noble birth, beauty, resistance to the most horrific tortures, miraculous liberation from her torturers, mass conversions, miracles of punishment—it contains some unique elements: the victorious debate of the learned girl with 50 wise *pagans, whom she converts and for which, in the Middle Ages, she was named patronness of students and philosophers (in particular of those at the University of Paris). According to the legend, after her decapitation, her body was transported by angels to Sinai (on a height called Gebel Katherin), then, on an unknown date, translated into the *monastery dedicated to her at the foot of that mountain. Later hagiographical texts introduce additional elements, e.g., some episodes regarding her childhood and her mystical marriage to Christ. Catherine has been correlated to a historical figure, the *pagan philospher *Hypatia, also an *Alexandrian, but who died at the hands of Christians.

In *iconography she is represented with one or more cogwheels, recalling the tortures to which she was condemned in the passio, by the emperor *Maxentius (piercing by large wheels with sharp points), from which she emerged miraculously unharmed; with a sword (in reference to her decapitation) or with a book, indicating her doctrine. Her feast is 25 November.

BHG 81-83b; BHL 1657-1700; BHO 26. A.P. Orban (ed.), Vitae sanctae Katharinae, Turnhout 1992, 2 vols. (CM 119-119A); E. D'Angelo (ed.), Pietro Suddiacono Napoletano, L'opera agiografica, Florence 2002, 117-146; BS 3, 954-978; G.B. Bronzini, La leggenda di S. Caterina d'Alessandria. Passioni greche e latine: Atti dell'Accademia Nazionale dei Lincei, s. VIII, 9 (1960) 257-416; Ph.B. Roberts, Stephen Langton and St. Catherine of Alexandria: A Paris Master's Sermon on the Patron Saint of Scholars: Manuscripta 20 (1976) 96-104; A.M. Valente Bacci, Sviluppo e diffusione della "Passio" di S. Caterina di Alessandria nell'area tedesca medievale: Quaderni Catanesi 6 (1984) 435-463; ibid., 7 (1985), 77-134; M. Ciai, L'iconografia di S. Caterina d'Alessandria negli affreschi di Pietro Coleberti da Piperno a Roccantica (1430): Alma Rome 30 (1989) 115-142; K.A. Winstead, Capgrave's St. Katharine and the Perils of Gynecocracy: Viator 25 (1994) 361-376; Il grande libro dei Santi. Dizionario enciclopedico 1, Turin 1998, 381-383; K.J. Lewis, The Cult of St. Katharine of Alexandria in Late Medieval England, Woodbridge – Rochester - New York 2000.

V. Milazzo

CATHOLIC. Noun and adjective meaning "universal." When referred to the church, the term specifies one of its most prestigious characteristics, that it is not national or local by foundation, but open to all. Believers in Christ who acknowledge the bishop of *Rome as the supreme authority are called Catholic. The same term designates the doctrine and rites promoted by the Church of Rome, distinguishing them from those of other Christian communities, which are called by particular names: the Greek Church, Russian Church, Coptic Church etc. In classical Greek, "catholic" already had the meaning of universal, total, general; from the 2nd c. it was used in a Christian sense by *Ignatius (To the Smyrnaeans 8,2), *Polycarp (Martyrdom 8,1; 16,2; 19,2), and in the 4th c. it became definitive, though *Cyril of Jerusalem still insisted on the geographical concept of catholocity (Catechesi XVIII). This ancient title, preserved by Christians who adhere to the form of faith proposed by Rome, derived from their consciousness of Christianity's originality, its overcoming of ethnic limitations and its offer of salvation to all without distinction.

As a designation for the universal church (Eus., Hist. Eccl., 4,15,15.39; 5,16,9; 6,43,3.11 etc.) the term is inexhaustibly rich, with a vast application: the benefits of divine providence are universal or particular (Clem. Alex., Strom 6,16,148; Orig., Hom. 3, 1 in Jer.; Proc. of Gaza, Ex. 4,11). It is a synonym for *orthodoxy, correct Christian doctrine, as opposed to *schism (Adam., Dial., 2,22; Counc. Nic., can. 19; Athan., C. Ar., 1,4; Syn., 2,11; Apol. sec., 25; Eus., Hist. eccl., 7,30; 10,6,1), and to *heresies from the 2nd c. (Clem. Alex., Exc. Theod., 46; Hipp., Haer., 5,16). It is used of orthodox Christians (Mart. Pionii, 19,4) as opposed to heretics (Epiph., Haer., 73,21). From the 4th c. it combines the two meanings of universal and orthodox faith, in the sense of the Catholic truth common to all those who had correct faith (Ambr. Aug., Ver. Rel., 5,9-6,10; Parm., 3,4,24; passim). In an *eschatological sense it refers to universal *judgment and universal *resurrection (Theoph. Ant., Aut., 1,13; Just., Dial. 81,4; Orig., Apoc., 30b; Iren., Adv. Haer., 4, 36, 4).

DS 86; A. García Diego, Katholikè Ekklesìa (El significado del epíteto "catholica" aplicado a la Iglesia desde San Ignacio de Antioquía hasta Orígenes), México 1953; P.M. Brek, De vocis "catholica" origine et notione: Antonianum 38 (1963) 263-287; J.N.D. Kelly, "Catholique" et "Apostolique" aux premiers siècles: Istina 14 (1969) 33-45; K. Wenzel, Katholisch, LTK 5, Freiburg i.Br. 1996, 1345-1346; Storia della Teologia, I. Epoca Patristica, eds. A. Di Berardino - B. Studer, Casale Monf. 1993, 307-320, 451.

E. Peretto

CATHOLICOS (Katholikos). Title of the supreme ecclesiastical authority in some Eastern churches. Among *Nestorians, Chaldeans and *Georgians it is synonymous with *patriarch, but in the Gregorian (Orthodox) Armenian church it is superior to patriarch. The Armenian church counts two catholicosates, that of Etchmiadzin (in Armenia) and that of Antelias (in Lebanon, where the ancient see of Sis in Cilicia was transferred); the patriarchates of *Jerusalem and *Constantinople are considered of lower rank.

M. van Esbroeck, Primauté, patriarcats, catholicossats, autocéphalies en Orient, in M. Maccarrone (ed.), Il primato del vescovo di Roma nel primo millennio: ricerche e testimonanze. Atti del symposium storico-teologico, Roma, 9-13 ottobre 1989 (Atti and documenti 4), Vatican City 1991, 493-521.

S.J. Voicu

CAVERN of TREASURES (CAVERNA THESAURORUM). A *Syriac *apocrypha whose present form comes from *Nestorian circles. It was written ca. 500 and from the 11th c. falsely attributed to St. *Ephrem. The work's nucleus probably derives from 4th-c. *Jewish Christian circles and is a reworking and Christianization of Jewish material. The text contains a summary of sacred history: creation of the world, creation of Adam and Eve, their sin and death, history of the patriarchs before the flood, history of Abraham and Moses, the judges and the kings, return from exile, and the Messiah. The text deals with various subjects, and the author has drawn on various sources and material. The title derives from the account itself, in which the first parents put gold, incense and myrrh taken from Paradise—the gifts of the three *magi—in the cave where Adam and the patriarchs went to pray, and where Adam's grave was located; his body, after the flood, was buried under Golgotha and purified by the Savior's blood.

The text is preserved in Syriac, *Coptic (fragments only), Arabic (two versions of the Syriac text, each different, probably redone by the *monophysites ca. 750), Ethiopic, *Armenian, *Georgian (from the 11th c.) and probably also in Greek.

The Cavern of Treasures is a text linked to other works of the Adam cycle, in particular with the Conflict of Adam and Eve and with ps.-*Clementine literature. The text was very popular and often used in chronicles and in other Syriac works. It was known by *Byzantine writers (John Syncellus, Cedrenus, Michael Psellos) and by Byzantine *apocalyptic (ps.-Methodius).

Editions: Su-Min Ri, CSCO 486-487/Syr 207, 1987; C. Bezold, Die Schätzhöhle, Lepzig 1888 (Arab version I); M.D. Gibson, Apocrypha arabica (Studia Sinaitica 8), London 1901; A. Battisti - B. Bagatti, La Caverna dei Tesori, Jerusalem 1979 (Arab version II, introd.); S.E. Robinson, The Testament of Adam, Chico, CA 1982 (Armenian version); C. Kourcikidzé - J.P. Mahé: CSCO 526-527/Iber 23-24, 1993.

Translations: Eng.: E.A.W. Budge, The Book of the Cave, London 1927 (from Syriac); Fr.: Su-Min Ri, op. cit.; J.P. Mahé, op. cit. (from Georgian); S. Grébaut: ROC 16 (1911) 72-84, 167-175, 225-233; 17 (1912) 16-31, 133-144 (from Ethiopic); It.: A. Battista - B. Bagatti, op. cit. (from Arabic); Ger.: C. Bezold, Die Schätzhöhle, Leipzig 1883; = in P. Riessler, Altjüdisches Schrifttum ausserhalb der Bibel, Heidelberg 1928 [1979] 942-1013, 1325-1326 (from Syriac).

Studies: A. Götze, Die Nachwirkung der Schätzhöhle: Zeitschrift Semitistik 2 (1923) 51-94; 3 (1924) 53-71, 153-177; Id., Die Schatzhöhle. Überlieferung und Quellen, Heidelberg 1922; J.B. Frey, DBS 1, 1928, 111-117; B. Bagatti, Note sull'iconografia di "Adam sotto il Calvario": Liber Annuus 27 (1977) 5-32; Denis 1, 30-36.

M. Starowieyski

CECILIA, martyr. According to the purely legendary passio (dated to the late 5th c., since it depends on Victor of Vita), Cecilia was a *Roman virgin of the noble family of the Caecilii. She was beheaded together with her fiancé Valerian and his brother Tiburtius, but we do not know under which emperor. She was buried in the catacomb of Callistus in a crypt retro sanctos of the 4th c., behind the crypt of the popes. It is certain that there was a titulus* in Trastevere, whose foundress was a certain Cecilia; the author intends to write a history of this title, identifying a certain Cecilia from the catacomb, believed to be a *martyr, with the foundress of the church in Trastevere. All this is not easily explained; the mention in the Mart. hier. (Romae Caeciliae [virginis]) perhaps indicates the day of the dedication of the Titulus Caeciliae, where in 545 Pope *Vigilius celebrated Cecilia's dies natalis (Duchesne LP 1, 297). 7th-c. *pilgrims visited the tomb of the virgin *martyr on the Appian Way (CCL 175, 308, 317, 337). In the 8th c. the cantantibus organis Cecilia virgo soli Domino decantabat of the legend, describing her wedding, entered the *liturgy as an antiphon: thus Cecilia became the patron of sacred music. Cecilia enjoyed great popularity; a number of Roman churches were dedicated to her. The oldest depictions of Cecilia are in the mosaics of S. Apollinare Nuovo at *Ravenna and in the Euphrasian basilica at Poreč; another is in Santa Maria Antiqua at Rome.

BHL 1495-1500; BHG 382; Verzeichnis 55; BS 3, 1064-1086; BBKL 1, 840-841; LCI 2, 456-463; LMA 2, 1343-1345; W. De Grüneisen, Sainte Marie Antique, Rome 1911, 514-516; C. Huelsen, Le chiese di Roma nel medio evo, Florence 1926 (repr. Rome 2000); F. Lanzoni, I titoli presbiterali di Roma antica nella storia e nella leggenda: RivAC 2 (1925) 195-257; H. Delehaye, Étude sur le légendier romain, Brussels 1936 (repr. 1968), 73-96; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 144-156; B. Kuhn-Forte, Handbuch der Kirchen Roms 4, Vienna 1997, 279-346; R. Aigrain, L'hagiographie, Brussels [2]2000, 149-150; 284-285.

S. Heid

CECROPIUS of Nicomedia (d. 358). *Homoiousian bishop of *Nicomedia; perhaps present at the *Council of *Sirmium of 351 which deposed *Photinus. One of the recipients of the synodal letter of the Council of *Ancyra of 358. Died in the earthquake which razed Nicomedia to the ground, 24 August 358.

DHGE 12, 41-42; H.C. Brennecke, Studien zur Geschichte der Homöer, Tübingen 1988; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God, Edinburgh 1988.

M. Simonetti

CELESTINE I (d. 432). Elected pope 10 September 422 in a quick election. During the ten years of his pontificate Celestine carried out a very intense activity. At *Rome he intervened decisively against the *Novatian Bishop Rusticus. He had the basilica of S. Maria in Trastevere restored, while on the Aventine S. Sabina was built with the financial backing of the Illyrian priest Peter. The Petrine ministry, based on the Roman interpretation of the canons of *Serdica, became even more important, though, as in the renewed case of *Apiarius, priest of Sicca Veneria, not always with happy results (v. Mirbt, n. 425). Above all Celestine tried to impose Roman influence on Narbonese and Viennese *Gaul, taking a stand against a hierarchy dominated by the monks of *Lérins and other *monasteries. As for the *ascetic party at *Arles, it was not a question of *Pelagianism but rather a rigorism incompatible with ecclesiastical discipline. Trying to recover his influence over the church of Marseille, in 431 he opposed the monks of that city, accused by *Prosper and *Hilary of a false doctrine of *grace, and defended *Augustine's authority on that subject (Ep. 21). The so-called Capitula Caelestini, added to this letter in the collections of decretals, were only composed after Celestine's death, probably by Prosper (DS 238-249). The sources exaggerate the importance of Celestine's missionary activity, but, by sending *Palladius to Ireland in 431, he did begin evangelization beyond the imperial frontiers. The *Nestorian controversy broke out during his pontificate. Consulted by both *Nestorius, whom he had previously answered about Pelagians who had taken refuge in the East (Ep. 6-7; 13), and *Cyril of Alexandria, he sided with the latter. In the Roman synod of 430 he condemned Nestorius's errors and instructed Cyril to take the necessary measures against him (Ep. 11-14). At the Council of *Ephesus, called by *Theodosius II for June 431, Celestine was represented by three legates who, arriving late, approved in his name the decisions taken under Cyril's leadership. Celestine himself, evaluating the synod's work in his letters to the East, declared that Peter had not abandoned them in their need (Ep. 25,9; cf. 22,6). No Roman bishop before him had so clearly affirmed the supreme authority of the apostolic see.

Died 27 July 432. Buried in the cemetery of Priscilla. Two spurious *Coptic homilies, In Gabrielem arch. (ed. Worrell, Coptic Manuscripts, New York 1923) and In Victorem (ed. Budge, Coptic Martyrdoms, London 1914, 49-73), are attributed to him.

CPL 1650-1654; PL 50, 417-458 (Coustant, 1721); PLS III, 18-20; ACO I/1, 7,125-137, 142-143; I/2,5-101. Other sources: Prosper of A., Epit. Chron.: PL 51, 594-595 and CPL 516-527; M. Mercator, Comm.: ACO I/5, 1,5-25; AASS Apr. 1 (1737) 543-547; DHGE 12,56ff.; BS 3, 1096-1100; L.I. Scipioni, Nestorio e il concilio di Efeso, Milan 1974, esp. 149-205; H.J. Vogt, Papst Cölestin und Nestorius, Festschrift H. Tüchle, Paderborn 1975, 85-101; O. Wermelinger, Rom und Pelagius, Stuttgart 1975, 244-253; C. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976, 1026-1043; 1347-1397; LTK[3] 2, 1246; RGG[4] 2, 413; LACL (2002) 135.

B. Studer

CELESTIUS (1st half of 5th c.). The main source of information on Celestius (also Caelestius, Coelestius) besides *Jerome (Ep. 133,5) and *Augustine (Gratia Christi 2,13), is *Marius Mercator. A jurist (auditorialis scholasticus) of the Roman aristocracy, perhaps like *Pelagius a British native (ODC) or like *Julian from Eclanum (?) (Marius Mercator), a eunuch from birth, he was one of the main spokesmen of the ideas of the Pelagian movement after the fall of *Rome in 410. Having fled to *Carthage after the occupation of *Rome in 410, he was accused before the Carthaginian clergy by the deacon *Paulinus of Milan on six points (in Aug., De gestis Pelagii 11,23; Marius Mercator, Commonitorium adv. haer. Pelagii 2; Commonitorium super nomine Coelestii 1, in changed order; PL 45,1681 and 1686-1687; Concilia Africae: CCL 149): (1) on the nature of death, whether it is natural or a result of Adam's sin; (2) on the *traducianism of Adam's sin in the human race, equating it to the *resurrection of Christ for the human race; (3) on the law which, like the gospel, allows one to reach the kingdom of heaven; (4) on the birth of babies in the situation of Adam prior to his sin. In Africa this last question led to two further issues: (5) a challenge to the *baptism of infants for the remission of sins, which contributed to the development of the *dogma of original sin (Aug., De peccatorum meritis et remissione deque baptismo parvulorum); and (6) the possibility or not of living without sin (Aug., De spiritu et littera; De perfectione iustitiae hominis). Celestius was condemned (Aug., Ep. 157, 3,22; De gestis Pelagii 62), a permanent condemnation which hung over him and the Pelagian movement in general. Every subsequent judgment on his work, as with those concerning Pelagius, in fact, went back to the Synod of *Carthage of 411, in which Augustine did not participate (Retr. 2,33).

Subsequent interventions regarding Celestius and his followers, besides those pertaining to the Pelagians, were the Council of *Diospolis of 415, two African councils of 416, the intervention of Pope *Zosimus, at first favorable but then against, in 417–418, the definitive condemnation at *Ephesus in 431 (cans. 1 and 4). After the condemnation of Carthage of 411, Celestius, unconvinced (Aug., Ep. 175,1; 176,4), perhaps went to *Syracuse to a certain Hilary (Aug., Ep. 157,3,22); in 413 he was at Ephesus where he seems to have been accepted among the *presbyters (Aug., Ep. 175,1 and 176,3), in 416 at *Constantinople and again at Rome in 418. Of his writings, besides a libellus brevissimus which spread rapidly, the most important attributed to him was the anonymous work titled Liber Definitionum or Definitiones (Aug., Ep. 157, 3,22; De perfectione iustitiae hominis; De gestis Pelagii 22,46; De pecc. orig. 22,25). Present studies allow us to attribute to Celestius a role perhaps equal to that of Pelagius in the Pelagian controversy between 411–418, and a capacity for dialectic (seen in the Definitiones) which led to the later rationalization of the Pelagian version of Christian teaching by Julian of Eclanum. The available evidence in fact speaks of the Celestians and the Pelagians, i.e., of two different strands of the same movement. Although his thought has not yet been entirely identified vis-à-vis that of Pelagius, he can be considered to be more rationalizing, and thus more logically organized. The emperors *Honorius and *Theodosius II sent a letter of warning to the bishops favorable to Celestius (Aug. Ep. 201,2).

Paulinus of Milan, Libellus Paulini diaconi adversus Caelestinum Zosimo episcopo datus, CSEL 35/1, 108-111; M. Mercatore, Commonitorium super nomine Coelestii: ACO I, 5/1, 65-70; Id., Commonitorium adversus haeresim Pelagii et Coelestii: ACO I, 5/1, 5-23; Y.-M. Duval, La date du De natura de Pélage. Les premières étapes de la controverse sur la nature de la grâce: REA 36 (1990) 257-283, puts it between 405–406 as a terminus ad quem. A dating which reproposes a reexamination of the text attributed to Celestius: A. De Veer, Le Dossier Célestius: BA 22 [Paris 1975] 691-692; G. Honnay, Caelestius, Discipulus Pelagii: Augustiniana 44 [1994] 271-302; G. Bonner, Caelestius: AugLex 693-698; and the Liber de fide attributed to Rufinus the Syrian (G. Bonner, Rufinus of Syria and African Pelagianism: Augustinian Studies 1 [1970] 31-47, in which is reexamined the article of D. Refoulé, Datation du prémier concile de Chartage contre les pélagiens et du "Libellus fidei" de Rufin: REA 9 [1963] 41-49; E. TeSelle, Rufinus the Syrian, Caelestius, Pelagius: Explorations in the Prehistory of the Pelagian Controversy: Augustinian Studies 3 [1972] 61-95); R. Dodaro, Note on the Carthaginian Debate over Sinlessness, A.D. 411-412: Augustinianum 40 (2000) 187-202.

V. Grossi

CELIBACY of the CLERGY. Until the start of the 4th c. no one mentions continence or celibacy imposed on deacons (*Diakonia - Diaconate), *presbyters or bishops by ecclesiastical law. But the opinion that the discipline of continence was introduced in the West only under Popes *Siricius and *Innocent does not seem well-founded. The roots of this ideal can be found at the time of the *apostles, when the ideal of *virginity and celibacy was already widespread; also according to *Tertullian (Exh. cast. 13,4), numerous members of the clergy chose this kind of life. The fact that the decretals of Popes Siricius and Innocent were accepted is itself a sign of this apostolic origin and of the great spread of the practice of continence among clerics in both West and East, though we have more evidence of it in the West.

At the origin of this precept is the evangelical and Pauline doctrine of celibacy, along with the influence exercised by Greek, *Platonic and *Stoic philosophy: in fact, continence was held in great esteem by the *pagans. With *baptism, Christians felt themselves better able to dominate their instincts. With respect to clerics, we must also bear in mind cultic continence, very widespread in many religions, esp. those of Greece and Rome, which obligated one to continence before performing the cultic acts. This ideal, therefore, already present in apostolic times, was increasingly strengthened and institutionalized to the point of becoming the norm.

A step in this process of institutionalization was the prohibition of *digamy, i.e., of a new marriage after widowhood. In accord with 1 Tim 3:2, 3:12 and Tit 1:6, a widowed member of the clergy could not remarry, and a remarried person could not be ordained. If we may believe the criticisms directed in the Philosophumena 9,12,22 against Pope *Callistus, this rule was not always observed. From the 4th c. many councils reaffirm it, sometimes extending it to subdeacons and even to lower clergy, as well as to women, who must be virgins when they marry members of the clergy. The Council of *Valence of 374 considers as remarried those who married for the first time as pagans; the 17th apostolic canon (Apos. con. 8,47,17), rather, takes into account only those marriages contracted after baptism. *Jerome (Letter 69,9) speaks of a bishop, already married as a pagan and remarried after baptism, and adds, doubtless exaggerating, that the "world is full of bishops in similar situations." Not all agreed with this line of conduct, however: according to *Theodore of Mopsuestia and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus in their *exegesis of 1 Tim 3:2 and Tit 1:6, the apostle did not forbid a second marriage to members of the clergy but asked them to be examples of fidelity to their spouses; we know that in *Syria in the 4th c. there were remarried bishops.

From the 4th c., other requirements were added to the above ideal. The Council of *Ancyra of 314, can. 10, allows the marriage of a celibate deacon only if he declared his intention of marrying at the time of his ordination; the Council of *Neocaesarea (ca. 314–325), can. 1, expels from the clergy a priest who marries. The Council of *Elvira (early 4th c.), can. 33, requires higher clergy married before ordination to observe continence with their wives. This rule was then imposed on the whole West at the end of the 4th c. by the decretals of Popes Siricius and Innocent, and repeated by numerous councils; texts differ, however, as to whether clergy may or may not cohabit with their wives. In the East, *Epiphanius (Panarion 59,4) sees continence as the normal state of the higher clergy (incl. subdeacons), even if married, but adds that "this is not the case everywhere." *Synesius of Cyrene, elected metropolitan of Ptolemais in Cyrenaica against his will, knows that he must separate from his wife (Ep. 105 to his brother). *Justinian, partly for economic reasons—to save church property—obliges bishops to remain celibate or put their wives in convents, and priests and deacons to live in chastity. The Council of *Trullo (691), accepting the preceding legislation on celibacy almost in its entirety, adds a novelty with can. 13: "Priests and deacons must abstain from relations with their wives only during times of ceremony," while absolute continence is explicitly forbidden. Bishops, on the other hand, must live without a family. This would be the point of departure between Eastern and Western practice. At the origin of this laxity may be the circumstance that, because of the nondaily celebration of Mass in the East, deacons and priests did not have to abstain permanently from their wives; in the West, such a rule could not have been introduced without the simultaneous elimination of the daily celebration of Mass.

R. Gryson, Les origines du célibat ecclésiastique, Gembloux 1970; H. Crouzel, Le célibat et la continence dans l'Église primitive: leurs motivations, in J. Coppens (ed.), Sacerdoce et célibat, Gembloux 1971, 333-371; C. Cochini, Origines apostoliques du célibat sacerdotal, Paris-Namur 1981; R. Gryson, Dix ans de recherches sur les origines du célibat ecclésiastique: RTL 11 (1981) 157-185; H. Crouzel, Mariage et divorce, célibat et caractère sacerdotaux dans l'Église ancienne. Études diverses, Turin 1982; C. Tibiletti, Teologia pelagiana su celibato/matrimonio: Augustinianum 27 (1987) 487-507; R. Cholij, Clerical Celibacy in East and West, Herefordshire 1989; P. Brown, The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity, New York 1988 (It. tr. Turin 1992); S. Heid, Zölibat in der frühen Kirche: die Anfänge einer Enthaltsamkeitspflicht für Kleriker in Ost und West, Paderborn 1997; B. Lang, Einsamkeit als Charisma: zum Ursprung religiös motivierter Ehelosigkeit im Christentum, in A. Assmann - J. Assmann (eds.), Einsamkeit, Munich 2000, 173-188.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

CELL. The old Latin word (from the verb celo) had many meanings: grotto, tomb, the individual openings in a beehive, small and usually poor room, servant's room, prison cell, wine- or grain-store. The term is found in Greek papyri from the 2nd c. AD (Papyr. Florent. 10, 7; Papyr. Lips. 102, II, 1; Papyr. Wessely: WS 24 [1902] 35; Papyr. Oxyrh. III 502, 55, 224). In *monastic language, starting in *Egypt, this Latin term was used to express one of the most characteristic elements of this way of life, the solitary but hospitable place in which the monk sought recollection, prayer, life with God (Ruf., H. mon. 1; Cass., Conl. 6, 15; Caes. of Ar., Reg. 23; Bened., Reg. 1. 22. 36. 53. 58). The singular fact that a Latin term should be used for a creation of Egyptian origin is explained by reflecting on the popular level of monasticism and on the popular value and content of that term.

ThLL 3, 759ff.; DIP 2, 744-745; ODC 311; LMA 9, 520-521; LTK 2, 987.

M.G. Bianco

CELLANUS of Perrona (d. 706). *Abbot of Perrona Scottorum (Picardy). A native of Ireland, he entered the *monastery of Perrona, where the incorrupt body of St. Fursey was kept (Bede, HE III, 19). We have some of his verses and a letter to Aldhelm of Malmesbury, later bishop of Sherborne, expressing homesickness for his native land (PL 89, 99).

CPL 1127; PLS IV, 2191; Kenney 306 (i); BCLL 643-644; W. Levison, Zu den Versen des Abtes Cellanus von Péronne: ZCP 20 (1933-6) 382-90 [repr. in Aus rheinischer und fränkischer Frühzeit, Düsseldorf 1948, 551-556]; Coccia, La cultura 318-320; Patrologia IV, 453-454.

E. Prinzivalli

CELSUS (2nd c.). Eclectic *Platonist philosopher, perhaps of *Egyptian origin, who wrote under *Marcus Aurelius. He lived at *Rome and got to know the contemporary movements of ideas, composing ca. 178 his True Discourse, the first anti-Christian polemical work. The work is lost; we know it only through the numerous textual citations, of unequal length, in *Origen's Against Celsus. Modern historians like Andresen have tried to free Celsus from Origen's image of him. The work first develops the attacks of a Jew against Christ (I-III, which perhaps uses a Jewish anti-Christian work), then attacks *Judaism, Christianity's source (IV-V). Celsus then accuses the Christians of having copied the sages of Greece (VI-VII), and finally criticizes the political stance of Christians, who exclude themselves from the city (VII, 62–VIII). Celsus opposed both Judaism and Christianity with "the ancient doctrine" in a traditional sense, that which "from the beginning has been known by the wisest people, by cities and by men" (Orig., C. Cels. I, 14).

He reproved Christianity for its novelty, which disturbed this tranquil inheritance. He accused Christians of attaching themselves to a faith they could not rationally justify, and of totally lacking any critical sense. In particular he considered Christ's *incarnation a contradiction of divine transcendence and the order that rules the world. Celsus's sources of information were obscure and limited. He knew fragments of Scripture and may have been replying to *Justin Martyr (Andresen; Q. Cataudella disagrees). For J. Schwartz, he influenced *Lucian and the *Letter to Diognetus. J.M. Vermander researched traces of him in the *apologists, *Tertullian (Apolog. 21), *Minucius Felix (Octavius 10-12) and *Theophilus (Ad Autol. III), which seemed to be replying to the True Discourse.

O. Glöckner, Bonn 1924; R. Bader, Stuttgart-Berlin 1940; W. den Boer, Leiden 1948; Critical bibl. in SC 225, 141-198; L. Rougier, Celse ou le conflit de la civilisation antique et du monde chrétien, Paris 1925; W. Völker, Das Bild vom nichtgnostischen Christentum bei Celsus, Halle 1928; Q. Cataudella, Celso e gli apologisti cristiani: NDid 1 (1947) 28-34; C. Andresen, Logos und Nomos, Berlin 1955; J. Schwartz, Du Testament de Lévi au Discours de Celse: RHPhR 40 (1960) 126-145; J.M. Vermander, De quelques répliques de Celse dans l'Apologétique de T., REA 16 (1970) 205-225; E.V. Gallagher, Divine Man or Magician? Celsus and Origen on Jesus, Chico, CA 1982; F. Mosetto, I miracoli evangelici nel dibattito tra Gesù e Celso, Rome 1986; M. Fédou, Christianisme et religions païennes dans le "Contre Celse" d'Origène, Paris 1988; Celso, Il discorso vero, ed. G. Lanata, Milan 1987 (It. tr. and commentary); G. Watson, Celsus and the Philosophical Opposition to Christianity: ITQ 58 (1992) 165-179; J. Granger Cook, The Interpretation of the New Testament in Graeco-Roman Paganism, Tübingen 1999; J.W. Hargis, Against the Christians: The Rise of Early Anti-Christian Polemic, New York 1999.

A. Hamman

CELSUS (3rd c.). We have a long letter from a Celsus, not better identified, to a recently ordained bishop named Vigilius (Ad Vigilium episcopum de giudaica incredulitate). The author translates into Latin the Dialogue Between Jason and Papiscus of *Aristo of Pella (lived mid-2nd c.), of which both the Greek original and the *Latin translation are lost. He makes the translation out of a concern for Jewish incredulity; in the letter, he addresses the possibility and conditions of their conversion through faith in Christ. He uses the testimonies of the *magi and of Simeon (ch. 3) and OT texts (chs. 4-6) to demonstrate that Christ is the awaited Messiah. Celsus's dedicatory letter is important for a knowledge of the content of Aristo's work, which relates how the "Christian Jew" Jason defeats the "*Alexandrian Jew" Papiscus in debate. Characteristics of the archaic Latin biblical text used suggest an *African origin; the frequent reference to *martyrdom supposes a period of *persecution, thus the 3rd c. Celsus asks Vigilius, who knows both languages, to correct his translation and to remember puer tuus Celsus.

CPL 67; CPPM II, 552; PL 6, 49-58; CSEL 3,119-132; cf. V. Saxer, in Storia del cristianesimo, ed. L. Pietri, Rome 2003, I 581.

A. Di Berardino

CELTIC. The Celtic language, Indo-European in origin, had its own evolution. In the Celtic lands in antiquity there were two vernacular linguistic groups: Gaelic (Irish, Scottish and Manx [from the Isle of Man]) and Brittonic Celtic, whose members were closely related, including the inhabitants of Wales and Cornwall, and the Bretons. The tribal groups that spoke these languages became Christian before or during the patristic age.

Very little evidence remains of the pre-English Christianity of *Britain or of the Christian practices of the Welsh, Breton, Cornwall, Pict and "Scottish" churches. It seems probable that during the *Roman occupation, Christianity was confined to the lowest classes, although it spread beyond the borders of Roman Britannia and among the more wealthy and military classes in the course of the 4th c. In the "Celtic" regions, the churches and *monasteries were able to stay autonomous in a way that was impossible for the churches under the centralized authority of *Rome. Their inspiration, pre-Benedictine, was based on the *Desert Fathers; *Martin of Tours also exercised a considerable influence. The heads of monasteries were typical *presbyter-*abbots (not bishops) who strongly prioritized missions. Their independence led to some eccentricities and to a strong attachment to their traditions. Both *Bede and *Aldhelm observe that the Celtic clergy considered the English to be *excommunicates, refusing to eat with them.

British delegates participated in the ecclesiastical councils of the period of Roman occupation (the Synod of *Arles in 314 and that of *Rimini of 359), but this participation ceased in the 5th and 6th c.

During the time of the Roman occupation of Britain, Roman missionaries converted Wales, which became thoroughly Christian through the work of Celtic missionaries in the following three centuries. Accounts of a *pilgrimage to *Palestine center on St. Teilo, bishop of Llandaff in the 6th c. St. Deiniol lived during this century and was considered the first bishop of Bangor. Also in the 6th c., St. Asaph became a disciple of Kentigern while exiled in Wales and later became head of the monastery and bishop of Llanelwy, later called St. Asaph. St. David (d. 601) was certainly a disciple of Iltut, a Breton soldier of fortune in the service of the king of Glamorgan, converted after meeting the Christian hermit Cadoc. David distiguished himself as the founder of monasteries in the tradition of the Egyptian desert. He may have participated in the Synod of Brefi in ca. 520, and it is said that he called a council at Caerleon (Lucus Victoriae) in 569, of which no texts survive. The Celtic bishops met *Augustine of Canterbury in ca. 603, but submission of the Welsh churches to the see of *Canterbury came about slowly a few centuries later. They remained turned toward the past, with strong regional characteristics, until the Norman conquest. For example, they did not adopt the general practice of the celebration of Easter, or other aspects of ecclesiastical discipline, until 768.

Christianity seems to have arrived in Scotland in the late 4th c. with the mission of St. *Ninian, who was influenced by Martin of Tours. St. *Colomba, also a Scot, came from *Ireland on a mission, using the island of Iona as a center (563–597). In the 7th c. his monks, guided by St. *Aidan, established a center at Lindisfarne to evangelize the N of England. The church of the Picts united under a single bishop not before the 9th c. The British church came to Brittany with the Christian refugees, whom *Gildas describes as fugitives from the country. Breton Christians had contact with the Irish from the 6th to the 9th c., esp. through *Columbanus. Only two late-Breton hymns are preserved from British, Welsh or Breton sources. A fragment of *Caedmon (pastoral poetry from the 7th c.) is preserved by Bede. *Allegories of animals were popular in the monastic tradition, as was *poetry on nature and on the monastic life (Mungo at Glasgow). The early Christian writers of *Ireland, much more significant for both quantity of production and influence, are treated individually in their respective entries. The vernacular tradition of the Irish church is extremely complex, and its importance is twofold: first, myths, sagas and poems have a strong *pagan flavor; and second, there is a literature connected to the rather important Hiberno-Latinity, which partially coincides with the Christian Latinity of Ireland.

Patrologia IV, ch. VI; M. Lapidge - R. Sharpe, A Bibliography of Celtic-Latin Literature, 400-1200, Dublin 1985; F. Kelly, A Guide to Early Irish Law, Dublin 1988; R. Sharpe, A Handlist of the Latin Writers of Great Britain and Ireland Before 1540, Dublin 1997; Th.O. Clancy - G. Márkus, Iona: The Earliest Poetry of a Celtic Monastery, Edinburgh 1995; B. Luiselli, La storiografia dell'Irlanda tardoantica e altomedievale: dalle tradizioni orali dei druidi alle tradizioni scritte degli intellettuali cristiani: Cassiodorus 3 (1997) 153-174; J. MacKillop, Oxford Dictionary of Celtic Mythology, Oxford 1998; B. Luiselli, La formazione della cultura europea occidentale, Rome 2003, 76-108; 137-156; 223-236.

G.R. Evans

CELTIC LITURGY. Under the name "Celtic *liturgy"—some scholars treat it together with the *Gallican rite—we find the liturgical sources (codices or fragments) produced or reproduced in Ireland during the 7th and 8th c. Actually, these documents do not represent a liturgy in the proper sense, i.e., they do not correspond to a fully defined and organized local rite. One of the main sources, the Bangor Antiphonary, copied in the late 7th c., reproduced a type of monastic office remotely inspired by the structure of the *Ambrosian office, with locally produced hymns, antiphons and prayers. Another characteristic source, the so-called Stowe Missal (late 8th c.), contains an ordinary of the pre-Gregorian Roman Mass, into which some distinctive litanies are inserted; then follow three formularies, for the feasts of the saints, for penitents and for the dead, corresponding to the *Gallican-*Hispanic structure of the eucharistic celebration. The last part of the manuscript—the slightest expression of a ritual—comprises an ordo baptismi and an ordo ad infirmum visitandum. The coordination of the Irish liturgical documents becomes still more difficult if we consider the Munich palimpsest to be among them: a *sacramentary composed with Gallican texts and some texts of Spanish origin, copied in Ireland in the mid-7th c., but to which was added a distinctive rewriting of the part of the Mass corresponding to the account of institution, and a strange post mysterium inspired by the *apocryphal Acts of St. Thomas. It seems difficult to sustain J. Hennig's thesis that the primitive Irish liturgy consisted of the ordinary of the Mass from the Stowe Missal, a vestige of the Roman liturgy brought by Bishop *Palladius, sent to Ireland in 431 by *Celestine I. Study of the liturgical sources and literary-doctrinal analysis of the texts, even those contained in small fragments, lead to a very different conclusion. The Irish church failed in its attempt to create its own liturgy—as was being done in the various Western churches—for lack of authors sufficiently expert in the use of Latin or learned in Mediterranean Christian literary culture. More than in euchological texts—the prayers of the Bangor Antiphonary are of some interest in content—the Irish church found its identity in the composition of hymns, in which their authors found a way to apply, even in Latin, the rhetorical canons of their traditional poetry.

F.E. Warren, The Liturgy and Ritual of the Celtic Church, Oxford 1881 (2nd ed., ed. J. Stevenson, Woodbridge 1987); Id., Antiphonary of Bangor, H. Bradshaw Society, London 1895; G.F. Warner, The Stowe Missal, H. Bradshaw Society 32, London 1915: E. Franceschini, L'Antifonario di Bangor, Padua 1941; J. Hennig, Studies in the Liturgy of the Early Irish Church: The Irish Ecc. Records 75 (1951) 318-332; A. Dold - L. Eizenhöfer, Das irische Palimpsestsakramentar im Clm 14429 der Staatsbibliothek München, Texte u. Arb. 53-54, Beuron 1964; K. Gamber, Libri liturgici celtici: Codices Liturgici Latini Antiquiores, Spic. Friburg. Subsidia 1, Freiburg [2]1968, I, 130-152; J. Pinell, Anámnesis y epíclesis en el antiguo rito galicano: Didaskalia 4 (1974) 1-130; Id., La liturgia celtica, in Anámnesis 2, Turin 1978, 67-70; M. Curran, The Antiphonary of Bangor and the Early Irish Monastic Liturgy, Dublin 1984; M. Lapidge, Columbanus and the "Antiphonary of Bangor": Peritia 4 (1985) 104-116; D.N. Power, Celtic Liturgy: Studia Liturgica 27 (1997) 1-32.

J. Pinell

CEMETERY

I. Origin - II. Typology - III. Development and organization of cemeteries - IV. Archaeological research.

In the ancient world the use of this word (coemeterium, κοιμητήριον) to mean a place of burial of the dead was proper to and characteristic of Jews and Christians. That it was alien to the *pagans is shown by the very rare literary texts in which it means a bedroom, or by the circumlocution used in pagan documents to describe Christian burial-grounds: "the so-called cemeteries" (τὰ καλούμενα κοιμητήρια) (Euseb., HE VII, 11,10 and 13). But in early Christian literature the term is customary and its etymology, from κοιμάω, to go to sleep, expressing faith in the resurrection of the dead as the certain waking from sleep, is often commented on (see, e.g., John Chrys., PG 49, 393). Various pagan poets also compare death to sleep, and sleep is symbolized in the decorations of some funeral monuments, but with no hint of the temporariness of this repose, which is obvious in the word dormitory. The early Christians expressed the same concept in the other frequent term depositio, a provisional depositary for the corpse awaiting restoration. Also, cemetery was not the only word for a Christian burial place. In *Africa the common Roman term area, or accubitorium, synonymous with cemetery, was used. At Rome and in the West generally, coemeterium almost always meant the whole burial ground, whereas in Greece and Asia Minor it could mean the individual tomb.

In regions where the type of ground made it possible, there were also underground Christian necropolises, now usually called catacombs. This name, first found at *Naples in the 9th c., originally belonged to a single Roman Christian cemetery on the Via Appia in the place called ad catacumbas, it seems because of a natural depression that can still be noted between the circus of *Maxentius and the present basilica of St. Sebastiano. The extension of the term "catacomb" to all Christian underground cemeteries took place esp. in the 16th and 17th c., when they were gradually rediscovered, whereas the galleries of St. Sebastiano had been accessible all through the Middle Ages. At the same time the strange belief began to spread that the catacombs had been the Christian communities' place of worship, of organization and even living place in the early centuries, when they were forced to hide by *persecution. Some literary documents, such as the imperial prohibition against entering the cemeteries (Acta proconsularia S. Cypriani 3: PL 3, 1498) or references to popes living in them (Duchesne LP I, 161, 207, 227, 305-306)—obviously meaning the attached sanctuaries above them—misled famous scholars of the past, and even today the legend is firmly rooted in the popular mind. Even without this fascination, the catacombs and early Christian funerary monuments in general are among the most important and often unique sources for our knowledge of the hierarchy, organization, beliefs, private life and public life of the primitive Christian communities.

I. Origin. Use by Christians of surface or underground areae for the burial of only the faithful, to the exclusion of others, goes back only to the last decades of the 2nd c., or at least only from that time do we have sure proofs of their existence. Our earliest literary reference is in *Tertullian (Ad Scap. 3), who speaks of the areae sepulturarum nostrarum that had aroused the hostility of the *pagan mob. The same author (Apolog. 39, 5-6) shows how the faithful financed the burial of the poor through a common fund fed by voluntary monthly offerings. Nor do any monuments go back to an earlier time: in fact, the progress of studies has modified the 1st-c. and early 2nd-c. dates frequently assigned in the past to products of early Christian funerary art. Even the recent discoveries of 1st-c. *Palestinian ossuaries displaying signs of Christianity (objects of lively debate by archaeologists) have not revealed the existence of community cemeteries of that era, but at most of individual Christian burials in common areae. At first this was the usual practice of Christians in all parts of the empire. At *Rome, it is well documentable in the necropolis beneath the *Vatican basilica, where the *apostle *Peter was laid, followed by other believers within or next to the mausoleums of pagan families. One of these families, the Julii, once converted, transformed their small funerary chamber by decorating it with Christian mosaics. St. *Paul was also buried in a pagan cemetery on the Via Ostia; the tomb of the Christian *Telesphorus was found in the pagan necropolis of Porto.

Sure signs of Christianity, though not yet made explicit in *epigraphy or artistic expressions like those formed in the course of the 3rd c., are identifiable in various tombs housed, from the time of *Trajan, in pozzolana quarries and on the slopes of the deep depression under the basilica of St. Sebastiano near the Via Appia. The most characteristic of these signs is the symbol of the fish, in Greek ΙΧΘΥΣ, whose letters form the acrostic Ἰ(ησοῦς) Χ(ριστὸς) Θ(εοῦ) Υ(ιὸς) Σ(ωτήρ), i.e., Jesus Christ, God's Son, Savior. In the Appia burial ground, the acrostic was scratched with a T-cross added between the first two letters, in a lower cell of the pagan mausoleum "of the Innocentiores," and sculpted or painted, with an anchor, in various epigraphs in nearby tombs. The fact that the Christians of the first two centuries dealt with the problem of burial by taking their dead to the common areae makes it hard to establish the origin of the Christian community cemeteries in many places. In particular, surface cemeteries were inserted into and quickly replaced pagan necropolises, and at first the typology of the tombs was no different. Even in underground cemeteries we can no longer see the clear division from the pagan world that was imagined by earlier archaeologists. Originally non-Christian family nuclei have been identified, e.g., in the catacomb of *Domitilla at Rome.

In the difficult study of the origin of the Christian cemeteries, we must doubtless take private charity into account. Wealthy converted landowners must soon have offered a way of resolving the burial problem of a church that, from the outset and in all countries, had chosen inhumation as more fitting their belief and their sensibility (Min. Fel., Oct. 34) rather than the easier and more economical method of cremation. To bury a large community's dead with dignity meant using a great deal of space, and we know that areae near great cities had high costs. G.B. de Rossi, the founder of Christian archaeology, showed that many Roman catacombs were originally tombs belonging to one family, showing signs of enlargements and uses that could be justified only if intended for the community. The very names preserved by some cemeteries—Domitilla, Priscilla, Commodilla, Maximus, Praetextatus, Traso, Ottavilla, Bassilla etc.—are hard to explain except by an initial possession by these people, or by their charitable free donation of the areae. Sometimes such an origin is expressly testified, as in the famous epigraph of the area of Evelpius at Cherchel (Caesarea) in Algeria. But certainly not all cemeteries were created in this way: many, esp. outside Rome, were clearly communal from the start. Even in the Roman catacombs, some very old nuclei are made up of a network of galleries originally with no rooms for family burials, hence created expressly for the community. Such, e.g., are the whole series of "comb" galleries reached from stair X in the catacomb ad duas lauros on the Via Labicana; the use of a vast pozzolana quarry in the cemetery of Priscilla; the nucleus "of the Flavii Aurelii" in the cemetery of Domatilla; and in the catacomb of Callistus, the nucleus which de Rossi called area prima, consisting of two long parallel galleries linked by transverse corridors. In a polemical work against Pope *Callistus (217–222), this last is called τὸ κοιμητήριον (Philosoph. II, 12,44): its collective ownership by the church is attested, as is its management by the pope through one of his deacons and its greater importance than the other cemeteries. Pope *Zephyrinus (199–217) was already buried there, as nearly all the popes of the 3rd c. would be. In this century the concept and practice of the community cemetery were definitively established, and at Rome, where the catacombs have preserved an abundance of pre-Constantinian regions and funerary monuments, it is possible to follow its sometimes grandiose developments and its organization.

The church, though not recognized by the civil authorities, profited from the Roman legislation that gave everyone, even slaves and executed criminals, the right of burial. In this way even Christian cemeteries were legalized, as is proven by the decrees of their confiscation during *Valerian's persecution in 258 and those of restitution by his son *Gallienus. Recognition by the civil authorities of the existence of Christian community cemeteries at the start of the 3rd c. can probably be seen in the reference given above by the author of the Philosophoumena, and in *Tertullian's reference (Ad Scap. 3) to the cry of the Carthaginian mob: areae non sint, "let the Christians have no cemeteries." Use of the community cemetery by the faithful, however, did not become strictly obligatory, though it was strongly recommended, as can be argued from *Cyprian, who deplored those who buried their children in pagan burial ground. While staying away from the latter, some families preferred, even after the peace of *Constantine, to have their own family tombs, not managed by the church authorities. The most famous example of this type of private burial was discovered in 1956 on the Via Latina in Rome. Begun in the first decades of the 4th c., it belonged to a small group of well-to-do families who wanted these architecturally elegant underground rooms, covered almost entirely with paintings. The many biblical themes chosen, esp. from the OT, are unknown in community catacombs, or treated in a way independent of the usual models. There are even scenes from pagan mythology, perhaps on tombs of unconverted family members, a liberty inconceivable in a 4th-c. cemetery dependent on the church authorities. These private hypogea are more numerous than was once thought. Besides the luxury and originality of their architecture and decoration, they are characterized by their antechambers, their small number of burials, and the absence of those religious arrangements or funerary utilities connected with the cult of the martyrs which would transform the community cemeteries from the 4th c. on.

II. Typology. Obviously Christians had to keep within the laws that regulated *funeral services in the *Roman world. Above all, tombs had to be outside inhabited areas, whose boundaries were legally fixed by an ideal line called a pomerium. In great cities like Rome this was enlarged more than once, so that earlier burials can be found within the line of a later pomerium. From the latter half of the 4th c., this very old law was often transgressed in provincial cities: entire Christian necropolises are found, esp. in *Africa, in the middle of inhabited centers.

The characteristics of the early Christian cemeteries are more marked and more easily recognizable in the catacombs. While the majority of sub divo ('open-air') cemeteries have been destroyed, underground funerary rooms, even when robbed, show an architecture, typology of tombs and often great wealth of decoration that clearly distinguish them from other monuments. We should not be astonished that the Christians developed subterranean excavation to such a degree. It occurred only in places where the nature of the ground allowed it, i.e., in volcanic regions or those rich in easily worked calcareous rocks. In such places the excavation of underground rooms for various uses long predated the coming of Christianity: as tombs among the Etruscans, very often for hydraulic or military use in Latium, and often created as cool places for recreation called cryptoporticos. Especially favorable for this purpose was "tufa," a soft clay that becomes hard as stone on drying, easily worked yet strong enough for quite large rooms. The majority of the catacomb galleries are dug in this tufa, which had no commercial value. The theory that Christian underground cemeteries were implanted in earlier chambers excavated for other purposes is totally unfounded. Only rarely did this happen, e.g., setting up tombs in abandoned hydraulic chambers, either unmodified, as in the catacomb ad vicesimum near Morlupo, or enlarging the passages, as in the central gallery of St. Giovanni at Syracuse. Another quite frequent use was that of arenariae, old pozzolana quarries which, esp. around Rome, extended over an immense distance. Either finding them in abandoned areas, or having them put at their disposal by landowners, the Christians dug tombs in them, though the curved and irregular walls did not really lend themselves to the rational and ordered use of space that could be attained from galleries dug specifically for the purpose. Sometimes the beginning of an early Christian cemetery in an arenaria or other unsuitable place was caused by the presence of a martyr's tomb, put there in time of emergency; such, e.g., at Rome, were the origins of the cemetery of Commodilla around the tomb of Sts. *Felix and Adauctus, the cemetery of Cyriaca near the tomb of St. *Lawrence and various cemeteries of the orbis christianus, created in stone or sand quarries, or, on the surface, in pagan areae as at *Corinth, or in poor districts.

Sometimes the type of rock in which underground cemeteries were opened has led to the supposition of preexisting quarries, as in the catacombs of St. Gennaro at *Naples, which have wide tunnels almost like those produced by the extraction of building-stone. But close study of the relative chronology of the various zones of the catacombs, and esp. of the way in which the rooms were cut in the rock, reveals that the intention was funerary from the beginning, while not ruling out commercial use of the resulting material. In more than one place this appears to have been extracted not haphazardly, but cut in large square blocks, from which smaller blocks suitable for building could be obtained.

Created by the Christians, the subterranean cemeteries reveal a typology that we may call characteristic, though not exclusive. Analogies occur in Etruscan tombs, where the known funerary rooms were often supplemented by short galleries with tombs set into the walls; a small cemetery with ambulatories just like those of the Christians has been found at Anzio, with objects dating it to the 3rd c. BC; Jewish catacombs have locules and arcosolia like the Christian ones we will now describe. Besides, the need for space would easily suggest the solution of underground galleries with tombs dug into the walls. Access was by a ladder or, more rarely, an entrance dug in the side of a hill. The ladder, called in *epigraphy and literary documents descensus, catabaticum, scala, generally had high and awkward steps, but better access did exist, esp. during the period of peace near venerated tombs, called introitus ad martyres, when great crowds of *pilgrims began to frequent the cemeteries. Such were, e.g., the grand staircase of the cemetery of Calepodius, that of the anonymous basilica of the Via Ardeatina, and that of the small hypogeum basilica of SS. Marcellinus and Peter. The width of the galleries dug at the foot of the entrances is proportionate to the nature and hardness of the rock: in the fragile tufa of Rome and Latium, it is generally from 80 to 150 cm.; elsewhere, as at Naples, Sicily and Malta, it reaches greater widths. In small catacombs in the country or in minor centers, the advance of the ambulatories is disorderly and without prearranged design, while in the necropolises of the great cities the galleries are straight and arranged to form various types of networks. The most common systems from the 3rd c. on are in the shape of a comb or a gridiron. In the former, a gallery was dug at the foot of the entrance, following its direction or at right angles to it; from this—the decumanus, as it were, of the necropolis—numerous galleries branch off at right angles on each side like cardines. In the gridiron system, ambulatories were dug corresponding to the confines of the land possessed above ground and were then joined by transverse galleries so as to exploit the whole area (the law permitted excavation only under the property). The galleries, called cryptae by the ancients, were initially two or three meters high, with ceilings generally flat but sometimes arched. The tombs were rectangular cavities in the walls, one above another, the same length as the bodies they were to receive and more or less deep.

This very simple tomb was called a locus, τόπος, nowadays a locule, and defined as monosomus, bisomus, trisomus, quatrisomus or polyandron according to the number of bodies it contained. A series of superimposed locules was called a pila, and generally contained tombs of the same length. The pilae of childrens' locules were by preference put at the angles of the galleries, for reasons of equilibrium. These little tombs are very numerous because of the high infant mortality and perhaps also because of the charity of the church, which took in exposed babies. In the 3rd c. the pilae were generally ordered, the loculi large and the spaces between them quite wide. In the 4th and 5th c., the use of the spaces was often chaotic, due to the accumulation of tombs and the insertion of childrens' bodies between already existing locules. The body was placed in the locule wrapped in a sheet, in whose folds lime was sometimes spread as an economical form of embalming. The locule was then closed with tiles or with one or more marble slabs carefully made fast with lime. In Jewish cemeteries it was more common to close them with a small wall, often plastered on the outside. A layer of plaster on the enclosing slabs is also often found in Christian catacombs, especially in the country. The name of the deceased was incised on the marble or painted with red lead or charcoal, or even just scratched in the lime. But most tombs remained uninscribed. To recognize them, relatives frequently embedded in the tomb the base of a cup, a fragment of a plate, a coin, an ivory figurine, a toy, a piece of pottery. Often they put a vase of spices or a clay oil lamp, corresponding to the flowers and lamps of modern cemeteries.

A richer form of burial is the arcosolium. In an arcosolium the enclosing slab is not vertical but horizontal and is surmounted by an arched niche (in earliest times, sometimes rectangular). Very often the arcosolium was decorated with frescoes. This type of tomb was used especially in cubicula, small rooms opening onto the sides of the galleries as family or corporate tombs, like family funerary chapels in modern Italian cemeteries. In some regions they were closed with doors and bolts, traces of which remain. Cubicles have the most varied forms: square, rectangular, apsed, round, polygonal. They seem to imitate surface mausoleums. They may be double (cubiculum duplex), sometimes even triple or quadruple. They have flat or domed ceilings (deep or shallow), cross vaults, barrel vaults. Often they are embellished with columns at the corners, with niches for lights, decorative cornices, shelves for the offerings and funeral meals. These meals were called refrigeria* and were characteristic of the cult of the dead among the pagans as well. In the cemeteries of various regions we find rooms set up for such commemorative rites: benches for the guests, wells and water channels, special round tables in the center of the rooms as at Malta, cathedrae as in the Coemeterium Maius of Rome, symbol of the invisible presence of the deceased at the meal celebrated in his honor.

Going underground allowed the development of huge cemeteries. Even when the areae possessed were still restricted, as in the 3rd c., space could be multiplied by deepening the galleries, which reached 5 or 6 meters in height, or by creating other levels above or beneath the original. The first choice was in fact made for the best layer of tufa, not that most close to the surface. For ventilation and light, vertical shafts were opened, called luminaria, which could pass through several levels and illuminate several rooms at once through bold embrasures. These light inlets impressed visitors, as we can read in the pages where *Jerome relates his youthful visits to the Roman cemeteries (Comm. in Ezech. XII, 40: PL 25, 375) or *Prudentius's verses in his description of the cemetery of St. *Hippolytus (Peristeph. XI, 153-168: PL 60, 547-548). Particular types of tombs in the underground cemeteries include oven tombs with locules dug perpendicular to the wall so that only the short side is visible; shaft tombs with a large number of tombs in the walls and often in the base of a shaft dug in the ground; the funerary dormitories of St. *Thecla at Rome, filled with hundreds of "capuchin" tombs one over another up to the ceiling and then walled up; the polysomous arcosolia characteristic esp. of Sicily, with as many as 20 or more arches side by side under a vault like a gallery; the "baldacchino" tombs of the island of Malta and E Sicily outside *Syracuse, made of a *sarcophagus dug from the rock and joined to the vault of the cubicle or of the ambulatory by four small columns at the corners; the window tombs very frequent in Malta and very rare elsewhere, which are little rooms with arcosolia or funeral benches inside, accessible only by a window about half a meter square, blocked after each deposition by a stone slab. There was also a great variety of tombs in surface cemeteries, which existed above every catacomb and functioned together with them or, more frequently, were the only type of necropolis in lands where the ground was unsuitable for excavation. Unfortunately the majority of surface cemeteries have been destroyed, and we know them more from literary or epigraphical sources than from surviving monuments. They were surrounded by an enclosure or marked out by boundary stones; they generally had graves dug in the ground (formae), often connected in a close network and deep enough to hold a dozen bodies on top of each other, separated by earthenware slabs, flat or sloping. More distinctive burials were those in terracotta, stone, marble, lead and, in some places, wooden sarcophagi. The decoration of marble sarcophagi was the beginning of early Christian sculpture. They were lined up along the enclosing walls, often under a roof (sub teglata), or in shrines, or in the mausoleums that are the characteristic buildings of sub divo cemeteries. During the period of peace, they formed extensive complexes attached to the cemeterial basilicas of the *martyrs. Special types of tombs in some regions are the vast fields of "capuchin" tombs as at Timgad, the stone chests once embellished with mosaics and inscriptions as at Tipasa, the semicylindrical masonry coffins (cupae, cupellae), or the humble burials inside pieces of amphora as at Tarragona.

III. Development and organization of cemeteries. One of the causes that most contributed to developing the Christian cemeteries and leading to profound changes in them was the cult of the *martyrs buried during the persecutions. The search for places nearest to the venerated grave, as if to guarantee protection and salvation, caused the opening of new galleries and cubicles in underground cemeteries, and the accumulation of mausoleums and tombs in cemeterial basilicas sub divo (i.e., in the open air). Such devotional tombs were called retrosanctos. For the less fortunate, more distant additions were made to the catacombs, also made necessary by the ever-growing numbers of the Christian population.

This period saw the assumption of great importance by the fossores, a corps of gravediggers first explicitly mentioned in 303, in the acts of requisition of the church of *Cirta but which must have existed from the beginnings of the community cemeteries, as appears from, e.g., ps.-Hippolytus (Tr. Apost. 40). They dug the underground chambers, laid out the areae above ground, and created and decorated the various types of tombs. They were specialized in their work and so were divided into categories; from the 4th c. they appear in the ecclesiastical hierarchy alongside ostiarii, custodians of churches and cemeteries. In the latter half of the 4th c., in necropolises with venerated tombs they arrogated to themselves the privilege of distributing the most sought-after places in exchange for payment: we have epigraphical evidence of this at *Rome and elsewhere, with contracts and even purchase prices. This abuse lasted into the first decades of the 5th c., but—the custom of underground burial finally ceasing at that time, probably through the intervention of church authorities—the fossores ceded their powers to other administrators whom inscriptions and literary sources call mansionarii, praepositi or presbyteri. At Rome, where there is a greater wealth of evidence, we see a return to that organization of the funeral service which, in its broad outlines, seems to go back to the pontificate of Pope *Fabian (236–250). The community was organized into districts called tituli (modern parishes), grouped in turn into seven ecclesiastical regions. To each region corresponded a particular extramural funerary region with some cemeteries. By the 5th c. many of these had become real sanctuaries. Profound changes had been made to ease access to the pilgrims who, since the pontificate of *Damasus (366–384), an enthusiastic promoter of the *martyrs, had begun to flock there. New entrances and luminaria were opened; roads built; oratories and basilicas built on the surface; and sometimes services such as hospices, baths and custodians' houses provided. The *Gothic wars in *Italy and political and military upheavals elsewhere contributed to making burials in cemeteries far from cities increasingly rare but did not disrupt the flow of pilgrims to the sanctuaries created in those places. Popes and bishops continued to restore them and encourage devotion. Guides were even written for visitors from distant lands: 7th- and 8th-c. examples of these survive in the itineraries of the Roman sanctuaries. These topographical documents are very valuable to archaeologists, because in the 9th c., after repeated sacks by the *Longobards (Lombards) and *Saracens, the sanctuaries were gradually abandoned and the relics of the martyrs translated within the city walls. That marked the end for all the catacombs and for some of the sub divo cemeteries: the churches above ground, no longer restored, gradually crumbled, and the entrances to the galleries disappeared under rockfalls and vegetation. A few decades after the last translation, the very existence of most of these places, once so famous and so frequented, was unknown.

IV. Archaeological research. In the Roman catacombs we can see signatures of sporadic visitors already in the 15th c., including those of the fellows of the famous Academy of Pomponius Leto. Systematic research was prompted by the chance discovery in 1578 of the cemetery of Via Anapo, near the Via Salaria, which aroused great enthusiasm among the learned. The paintings were copied and published, creating a desire to find more. Antonio Bosio (1575–1629) was the leader of these searchers; he alone discovered some 30 catacombs and, in particular, established the basis of scientific study by topographical analysis of monuments in the light of documentary evidence. Unfortunately, 17th- and 18th-c. archaeologists did not follow Bosio's topographical method: they started removing epigraphs and *sarcophagi to museums and churches and opened a great number of tombs as they searched for presumed bodies of *martyrs, whom they believed could be recognized by the presence of a vase with traces of vermillion. Local vinedressers completed the work of destruction by removing building material. Vast cemeterial regions then assumed the aspect of devastation in which today's visitor sees them. In the 19th c., G.B. de Rossi (1822–1894) resumed scientific research and traced the main outlines of Christian archaeology. His studies aroused a ferment of research, gradually extended to other parts of the ancient world. Today in all the nations of Europe, Mediterranean Africa and the Near East, the research and study of early Christian cemeteries makes up a very important part of archaeological excavations and publications.

Of the immense biography, we prefer to indicate works that provide an orientation, and which include further bibliographical indications: G. Ferretto, Note storico-bibliografiche di archeologia cristiana, Vatican City 1942; G. Bovini, Rassegna degli studi sulle catacombe e sui cimiteri "sub divo," Vatican City 1952; U. Fasola, Scoperte e risultati degli studi compiuti nel campo dei cimiteri cristiani antichi dal 1954 ad oggi: Atti VI Congr. Intern. Arch. Crist., Vatican City 1965, 13-33; P. Testini, Le catacombe e gli antichi cimiteri cristiani in Roma, Bologna 1966; Id., Archeologia Cristiana, facs. ed. with analytic index and bibliographical appendix, Bari 1980. Valuable bibliographical indications in the article by E. Josi in EC III (1949) 1617-1637. On pre-Constantinian cemeteries: U.M. Fasola - P. Testini, I cimiteri cristiani, in Atti IX Congr. Intern. Arch. Crist., I, Vatican City 1978, 103-157, 189-210. On fossores: E. Conde Guerri, Los "fossores" de Roma paleocristiana, Vatican City 1979. On recent studies and excavations in the cemeteries of the various countries of the orbis christianus: exhaustive bibliography in the 1980 facs. ed. of the cited volume of P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana, 802-813, ed. L. Pani Ermini: Topografia cimiteriale. In addition: F. Tolotti, Influenza delle opere idrauliche sull'origine delle catacombe: RivAC 56 (1980) 7-48; U.M. Fasola, Indagini nel sopratterra della catacomba di S. Callisto, RivAC 56, 221-278; A. Ferrua, Cimitero di S. Callisto: RivAC 57 (1981) 7-24; Id., Cimitero ad X della via Latina, RivAC 57, 24-31; P. Saint-Roch, La région centrale du Cimetière connu sous le nom de "Cimetière des saints Marc et Marcellien et Damase," RivAC 57, 209-251; M. Salvatore, Un sepolcreto altomedievale in agro di Rutigliano (Bari). Notizie preliminari, RivAC 57, 127-160; G.N. Verrando, Note di topografia martiriale della via Aurelia, RivAC 57, 255-282; H. Brandenburg, Überlegungen zu Ursprung und Entstehung der Katakomben Roms, in Vivarium. Festschrift Theodor Klauser zum 90. Geburstag, Münster-Westfalen 1984, 11-49; L. Reekmans, Spätrömische Hypogea, in Studien zur spätantiken und byzantinischen Kunst Friedrich Wilhelm Deichmann gewidmet, Mainz 1986, 11-37; J. Guyon, Le cimetière aux deux lauriers. Recherches sur les catacombes romaines, Vatican City 1987; F.W. Deichmann, Archeologia Cristiana, Rome 1993, 51-69; H. Brandenburg, Coemeterium. Der Wandel des Bestattungswesens als Zeichen des Kulturumbruchs der Spätantike: Laverna 5 (1994) 206-232; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, Strutture funerarie ed edifici di culto paleocristiani di Roma dal III al VI secolo, in Le iscrizioni dei cristiani in Vaticano. Materiali e contributi scientifici per una mostra epigrafica, Vatican City 1997, 121-141; Ph. Pergola - P.M. Barbini, Le catacombe romane. Storia e topografia, Rome 1997; V. Fiocchi Nicolai - D. Mazzoleni - F. Bisconti, Le catacombe cristiane di Roma, Regensburg 1998; D. Nuzzo, Tipologia sepolcrale delle catacombe romane. I cimiteri ipogei delle vie Ostiense, Ardeatina e Appia, Oxford 2000; var. aus., Catacombes romaines et italiennes (= Dossiers d'Archéologie, 278), Quétigny 2002; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, Elementi di trasformazione dello spazio funerario tra tarda antichità ed altomedioevo, in Settimane di Studio del Centro Italiano di Studi sull'Alto Medioevo, L, Uomo e spazio nell'alto medioevo, Spoleto 2003, 921-969; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, s.v. Katakomben: RAC, 20, 342-422 (with ample bibl.).

U. Fasola

CENOBIUM – CENOBITE (also Coenobium – Coenobite). From the Greek words κοινόβιον and κοινοβιώτης (κοινός + βίος = in commune viventes according to Isidore, Orig. 7,13,2, who derives it from Jerome, Ep. 22, 34). Cenobitic life was closely linked to *ascetic life. In the first three Christian centuries, but esp. after the ending of the *persecutions, Jesus' teaching and his invitation to vigilance, renunciation, death to self, taking up the cross after him, voluntary poverty, and virginity led to the birth and development of a significant spiritual movement, asceticism, first in the form of eremitism (*anchorism), and then of cenobitism, which spread everywhere from *Mesopotamia to *Gaul to *Ireland. Though recognizably influenced by the contemporary philosophical-spiritual atmosphere, it undeniably involved an authentic evangelical experience and a desire to return to primitive Christian ideals (see Acts 4:34ff.). If *Anthony (ca. 250–356), though not the first to seek solitude in the *desert, was the father of anchorism, *Pachomius was the first legislator and founder of cenobia (320, Tabennesi in the *Thebaid), the father of the koinonia, who found a balance between the individualism of the first Desert Fathers and a severely regimented community life. In the 4th c., *monasticism in *Egypt knew the anchorism practiced in the north (Nitria, Desert of the Cells (Kellia), where ascetics lived in individual cells and were bound together almost as a corporate institution), cenobitism in the south (Thebaid), which also served as a preparation for anchorism (Jerome, Ep. 22,36; Cass., De inst. coenob. 2,3,2), and some solitaries still further south, living a very austere life. Egyptian monasticism was a school for numerous visitors (*Eustathius, *Basil, *Jerome, *Rufinus, the two *Melanias, *Paula, *Palladius etc.), who spread its practices everywhere. The *Cappadocians had considerable influence in the ascetic and cenobitic movement of their time. Basil's mother, Emmelia, on the advice of her daughter *Macrina, retired to the family property of Annesi in Pontus (351) and there led a common life with noble ladies and their maids. Basil, basing his conception of life on the precept of charity, saw cenobitic life as the place where a synthesis could be made between βίος ἐρημικός and βίος τοῦ μιγάδος (see Greg. Naz., Or. 43,62). The Regula Magistri (1,2) and the Rule of Benedict (1,2) consider cenobites the genus primum of monks, the genus monasteriale almost par excellence, i.e., militans sub regula vel abbate, following a classification directly inspired by *John Cassian, who saw life together in submission to an *abbot as the full imitation of Jesus, who came to do the will of him who sent him (Regula M. 1,50-52).

Cenobium did not just mean a physical site of monastic life—like the term monasterium, which simply meant a habitation of monks, or even of just one monk or of those particular groups of monks called Sarabaites (Cass., Conl. 18,10)—but designated a type and a way of practicing monastic ascesis together with others who lived in the same place. Cenobites, then, were those who professed the highest, best and most complete form (de optimo genere monachorum) of monastic life and who trained in those gymnasia—the cenobia—to aspire to the heights of anchoritic discipline (Cass., Conl. 18,11) in a well-tried realism and realization of virtue.

A. Boon - L.Th. Lefort, Pachomiana latina. Règle et épître de s. Pachôme. Épître de s. Théodore et "Liber" de s. Orsiesius, Louvain 1932; Pl. de Meester, De monachico statu iuxta disciplinam byzantinam, Vatican City 1942; L.Th. Lefort, Œuvres de s. Pachôme et de ses disciples (CSCO 159), Louvain 1956; A. Vööbus, History of Asceticism in the Syrian Orient, II, Louvain 1960 (CSCO 197); A. de Vogüé, La communauté et l'abbé dans la Règle de s. Benoît, Paris 1961; J. Leroy, Le cénobitisme chez Cassien: RAM 43 (1967) 121-158; DIP 2, 761-764; A. de Vogüé, Vie commune et vie solitaire: La Règle de s. Benoît, t. VII, commentaire doctrinal et spirituel, SC 186 bis, Paris 1977, 75-99; S. Pricoco, L'isola dei Santi. Il cenobio di Lerino e le origini del monachesimo gallico, Urbino 1978; DIP 7, 1420-1428 (A. de Vogüé, Regole cenobitiche dell'occidente: DIP VII, Rome 1983, 1420-1428); var. aus., Dall'eremo al cenobio. La civiltà monastica in Italia dalle origini all'età di Dante, Milan 1987; P. Tamburino, Koinonia. Aspetti ecclesiologici del cenobitismo Pacomiano nel IV secolo, Rome 1989; T.G. Kardong, The Monastic Practice of Pachomius and the Pachomians: StudMon 32 (1990) 59-78; G. Jenal, Italia ascetica atque monastica, Das Asketen- und Mönchtum in Italien von den Anfängen bis zur Zeit der Longobarden (ca. 150/250-604), 2 vols., Stuttgart 1995; E. Wipszycka, Contribution à l'étude de l'économie de la congrégation pachômienne: JJP 26 (1996) 167-210; A. de Vogüé, Cenobita, Cenobitismo: Dizionario Enciclopedico del Medioevo 1, Rome 1998, 375; M. Migallah Dirias, La koinonía pacomiana come itinerario formativo alla vita comunitaria. Attualità dei principi educativi testimoniati negli scritti di Pacomio e dei suoi discepoli, Rome 2002; S. Pricoco, Il monachesimo, Rome-Bari 2003, 39-43, 57-63, 85-97.

M.G. Bianco

CENTESIMA, SEXAGESIMA, TRICESIMA, De. ps.-Cyprian sermon from *Africa, late 2nd to mid-3rd c. (for some scholars, early 4th); handed down in a small corpus of *Donatist writings in the 9th-c. codices Wirceburgensis theol. f. 33 and Monacensis 3739. Contains an *allegorical-moral exposition of the parable of the sower (Mt 13:3ff. and par.), in particular a spiritual *exegesis of the three numbers 100, 60 and 30, explained respectively as the prize of *martyrdom, of *virginity and of continence in marriage.

Martyrdom appears in a dual dimension: "imitation" of Christ's example and "spiritual combat" against flesh and blood, understood as demonic powers; but *ascetics imitate the six angels co-created with the Son of God, and they too fight against flesh and blood in a sort of "spiritual martyrdom." The just who intend to live according to their baptismal rebirth are shown the way of continence.

The hierarchical distinction of martyrs, *virgins and the continent was an integral part of a commonly held conception of the Christian life in the first half of the 3rd c., including in *Syria and *Egypt, as *Origen's valuable testimony, Com. Rom. 9,1 (on Rom 12:1-2), shows. This conception has archaic *Encratite connotations, which were accompanied by the frequent use of *apocryphal texts or of altered biblical citations, and familiar reference to theological ideas of clear *Jewish Christian derivation: e.g., a strongly *subordinationist angelomorphic *Christology which made God's Son one of the seven angels created from fire and subsequently raised to the dignity of Son; the martyrological exegesis of the parables of the drachma and the lost sheep, against which *Tertullian had earlier argued (Pud. 9,1-3 and 21-22); a pessimistic antisomatic anthropology, linked with the idea that the delictum primae nativitatis is canceled in baptismal remission. This latter is the earliest Western formulation known to us of the doctrine, based on the biblical testimonium of Ps 51:5, of sin contracted by each person at birth, which will become Augustine's originale peccatum (see P.F. Beatrice, Tradux peccati, 271-273).

CPL 67; Editio princeps di R. Reitzenstein, Eine frühchristliche Schrift von den dreierlei Früchten des christlichen Lebens: ZNTW 15 (1914) 60-90; PLS I, 53-67; J. Daniélou, Le traité "De centesima, sexagesima, tricesima" et le Judéochristianisme latin avant Tertullien: VChr 25 (1971) 171-181; Id., Les origines du christianisme latin, Paris 1978, 64-87; P.F. Beatrice, Tradux peccati. Alle fonti della dottrina agostiniana del peccato originale, Milan 1978, 271-273; Id., Martirio ed ascesi nel sermone pseudociprianeo "De centesima, sexagesima, tricesima": Paradoxos politeia, Studi in onore di G. Lazzati, Milan 1979, 3-24; Id., Il sermone "De centesima, sexagesima, tricesima" dello Ps. Cipriano e la teologia del martirio: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 215-243; Id., s.v. Perfezione: Il triplice frutto della perfezione cristiana in età patristica: DIP VI, Rome 1980, 1146-1150; PLSI, 53-67; J. Daniélou, Les origines du christianisme latin, Paris 1978, 64-87; P.F. Beatrice, Martirio ed ascesi nel sermone pseudo-ciprianeo "De centesima, sexagesima, tricesima," in R. Cantalamessa - L.F. Pizzolato (eds.), Paradoxos politeia. Studi patristici in onore di G. Lazzati (SPMed 10), Milan 1979, 3-24; Id., Il sermone "De centesima, sexagesima, tricesima" dello Ps. Cipriano e la teologia del martirio: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 215-243; Ph. Sellew, Five Days of Creation? The Origin of an Unusual Exegesis (Ps.-Cyprian De centesima §26): ZNTW 81 (1990) 277-283; J. Doignon, Pseudo-Cyprien, "Sermo de centesima, sexagesima, tricesima," in R. Herzog - G. Nauroy (eds.), Restauration et renouveau. La littérature latine de 284 à 374 après J.-C. (Nouvelle Histoire de la Littérature Latine 5), Turnhout 1993, 472-474 (bibl.); Ph. Sellew, The Hundredfold Reward for Martyrs and Ascetics: Ps.-Cyprian, "De centesima, sexagesima, tricesima," in M.F. Wiles - E.J. Yarnold (eds.), SP 36, Louvain 2001, 94-98.

P.F. Beatrice

CENTO. Latin term indicating a cloth sewn with pieces of fabric of different colors; as a literary genre, it meant a poetic composition made up of words, hemistichs and verses of another poet, reordered to express something different from the original. They were composed esp. with the works of Homer (Homerocentones) and Virgil (Virgiliocentones). *Tertullian writes: "Today we see a totally different tale issue from Virgil, in which the material is adapted to the verse and the verse to the material. Thus Osidius Geta has completely puffed up Virgil's tragedy Medea. And a relative of mine has, among other literary pastimes, expounded Cebe's Table in the words of the same poet. Those who, following centonical usage, unite in a single work many pieces taken here and there from Homer's poems are called Homerocentos" (De praesc. haer. 39,3-5). Centos were not so much works of art as works of technique and memory; the author's ability was shown by his restraint in interposing his own thoughts. Learning by memory had great importance in ancient education, and the centonists knew their models well.

Other Christian centos are known besides that of *Proba. According to *Isidore of Seville (Etymol. 1,39,26: PL 82, 121), a certain *Pomponius composed a short poem titled Tityrus in honor of Christ; in fact we possess a dialogue between the Christian Tityrus and the *pagan Meliboeus (Versus ad gratiam Domini: CPL 1481). Then there is the incomplete De verbi incarnatione (CPL 1482) by a 5th-c. imitator of Proba. The 116-verse De ecclesia (CPL 1483) is a short address to the faithful in church, perhaps by a certain Mavortius. There are Greek Homerocentos attributed to the empress *Eudoxia (d. 460) (see CPG 6025 with bibl.), and many short centos. The most famous is *Byzantine: the Christus patiens, of 2640 iambic trimeters (PG 38, 131-338), attributed to *Gregory of Nazianzus, a tragedy on Christ's passion in the style of Euripides, as the author writes in the prologue.

CSEL 16, 1 (1888) 609-616 (Pomponius); 615-620 (De verbi incarn.); 621-627 (De ecclesia); Centons homériques, SC 437, Paris 1998. Other editions: see Patrologia III, 259. F. Ermini, Il centone di Proba e la poesia centonaria latina, Rome 1909; A. Tuilier, La datation et l'attribution du Χριστὸς πάσχων et l'art du centon, Actes VI Cong. Int. Ét. Byz. I, Paris 1950-1951, 403-409; R. Lamacchia, Dall'arte allusiva al centone (A proposito di scuola di poesia e di poesia di scuola): Athens and Rome 3 (1958) 93-106; Patrologia III, 259 (ample bibl.); LACL 143-144; R. Lamacchia, Centoni: Enciclopedia Virgiliana, vol. I, Rome 1984, 733-737; J.L. Vidal, La technique de composition du Centon virgilien Versus ad Gratiam Domini sive Tityrus (Anthol. Lat. 719a Riese): REAug 29 (1983) 233-256; J.-M. Poinsotte, Les Juifs dans les centons latins chrétiens: RecAug 21 (1986) 85-116; A.M. Alfieri, La tecnica compositiva nel centone di Eudocia Augusta: Sileno 14 (1988) 137-156; G. La Bua, Esegesi virgiliana e poesia centonaria: A&R 38 (1993) 99-107; Esegesi, parafrasi e compilazione in età tardoantica, ed. C. Moreschini, Naples 1995; G. Polara, "I centoni," in G. Cavallo - P. Fedeli - A. Giardina (eds.), Lo spazio letterario di Roma antica. 3: La ricezione del testo, Rome, 1998, 245-275; G. Carbone, Il centone De alea. Introduction, text, translation, critical notes, commentary and appendix, Naples 2002.

A. Di Berardino

CEOLFRITH (642–716). Born in 642 in Northumbria of a noble English family, in 674 he was *abbot of the Monastery of St. Peter at Wearmouth and later, from 682, also of the twin Monastery of St. Paul at Jarrow. Ceolfrith worked to bring the Irish and Scots to the observance of Roman doctrine, also writing to the king of the Picts (Ep. ad Naitanum, in Bede, Hist. Eccl. V, 21: PL 95, 271-280) so that he would adhere to Roman Easter practice and preserve, with his people, the unity of the Catholic church. At Rome in 678 he found a large quantity of codices, among them a copy of the Vulgate, which he then had reproduced in England in three copies, two for the libraries of the *monasteries under him and one, very probably made at Wearmouth or Jarrow under Bede's oversight, to bring personally as a gift at the Confession of St. Peter. Died 716 at Langres as he was going to Rome with the third copy of the Vulgate (Codex Amiatinus).

CPL 1377; E.A. Lowe, English Uncial, Oxford 1960, Pl. VIII; B. Fischer, Lateinische Bibelhandschriften im frühen Mittelalter, Freiburg 1985, 9-21; K. Corsano, The First Quire of the Codex Amiatinus and the Institutiones of Cassiodorus: Scriptorium 41 (1987) 3-34; R. Marsden, The Survival of Ceolfrith's Tobit in a Tenth-Century Insular Manuscript: JTS 45 (1994) 1-23; I. Wood, The Most Holy Abbot Ceolfrid, The Jarrow Lecture 1995 (Newcastle-upon-Tyne 1996).

P. Marone

CERDO. *Gnostic *heretic, active at *Rome in the mid-2nd c. According to *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. I, 27,1), Cerdo arrived in the capital under Pope *Hyginus (138–142) and there taught *heretical doctrines, according to which the creator God, just and knowable, revealed in the law of Moses and the Prophets, is distinguished from the Father of Jesus Christ, good and unknowable. Still, according to Irenaeus (Adv. haer. III, 4,3), Cerdo, agreeing to do *penance and feigning repentance, was initially restored to the community but secretly continued to spread his teachings; again found guilty, he was finally definitively excluded from the community. This information, and a link of Cerdo with the Simonian heresy, are substantially confirmed by *Hippolytus (Ref. VII, 10,37; X, 19), who depends on Irenaeus. Irenaeus's attribution to Cerdo of the main doctrines of *Marcion, whom he makes merely Cerdo's disciple and continuator, with no originality of his own, seems more suspect and may be the result of a confusion, perhaps in Irenaeus's sources, or of an error in relating the list of the bishops of Rome to the appearance of individual heretics in the capital (see Harnack and Peterson). *Epiphanius (Pan. XLI, 1) and *Filaster (Haer. 44) say that Cerdo was a native of *Syria. Epiphanius attributes *docetist doctrines to him; ps.-Tertullian (Adv. omnes haer. 6) even attributes Marcion's NT canon to him. According to Agapius (Universal History, in PO VII, 511), Cerdo stated that the world was created by various divinities coming together, and denied the resurrection.

A. Harnack, Marcion. Das Evangelium von fremden Gott, Leipzig 1924 (Beilage II: "Cerdo und Marcion," 31-39); G. Bardy, DHGE, 12 (1953), col. 162-163; E. Peterson, Cerdone: EC III, 1313-1314; J. Quasten, Patrologia, vol. I, Turin 1975, 237; G. May, "Markion und der Gnostiker Kerdon," Evangel. Glaube und Geschichte, Festschrift G. Mecenseffy, Vienna 1984, 233-284; R.J. Hoffmann, Marcion and the Restitution of Christianity, Chico, CA 1984, 41-44; BBKL III, 1384-1385 (1992).

C. Gianotto

CEREALIS. Bishop of Castellum Ripense in *Africa, present at the dramatic debate ordered by the *Vandal king *Huneric between *Catholic and *Arian bishops in February 484. Wrote a Libellus contra Maximinum arrianum, in which various questions put by the Arians are resolved by the Catholics on the basis of the anti-Arian *trinitarian doctrine by now codified by long tradition and fully exploiting citations taken from Scripture, according to a polemical procedure typical of this era in Africa.

CPL 813; PL 58, 757-768; Moricca III, 1, 749-750, 968; PCBE 1, 207.

M. Simonetti

CERINTHUS – CERINTHIANS (1st-2nd c.). According to the Epistula Apostolorum (early 2nd c.), Cerinthus and *Simon Magus were considered among the pseudo-apostles (1 [12] and 7 [18]). Another old tradition says that the apostle *John fled from the baths at *Ephesus when he heard that Cerinthus was present in the building (Iren., Adv. haer. 3,3,4 and Euseb., HE 3,28,6). This came from the idea that Cerinthus was an astute *heretic who worked in Asia Minor, trying to undo the work of the apostles. At first Cerinthus was depicted as a typical *gnostic who held that the world was not created by God but by inferior forces, that Christ descended on the man Jesus and that the *angels were responsible for the law (Iren., Adv. haer. 1,26,1; Hipp., Philos. 7,33,1-2; ps.-Tertull., Adv. omn. haer. 3). When, in the 2nd c., John's Apocalypse was suspect in some circles for its millenarian ideas, the *orthodox writer *Gaius claimed that the Johannine writings were originally written by Cerinthus. Though *Hippolytus did not accept this idea (according to Dionysius bar-Salibi, d. 1171), subsequently it was generally held that Cerinthus had millenarian ideas. This was due esp. to *Eusebius (HE 3,28,1-6), based on his contemporary Dionysius. Eusebius was also the first to say that Cerinthus was the head of a group called the Cerinthians. *Epiphanius (Pan. 28) emphasized the tradition of Cerinthus's first appearance as a pseudo-apostle. According to him, Cerinthus should be held responsible for Paul's difficulties with the Jews and *Jewish Christians, since it was supposed that Cerinthus lived according to the Jewish law. This image of Cerinthus was followed by *Filaster (Div. haer. liber 26), who also knew the tradition that there was a law held to be given by angels (Iren.) and followed by the Cerinthians (Epiph.). *Augustine (De haer. 8), however, writes of Cerinthus as a Jewish Christian with millenarian ideas. This characterization was adopted by all who made use of Augustine.

Th. Zahn, Geschichte des neutest. Kanons, Erlangen 1888-1892, I, 1 (1888), 220-262; II, 2 (1892), 973-991, 1021-1022; RBi 30 (1921) 344-373; A.F.J. Klijn - G.J. Reinink, Patristic Evidence for Jewish Christian Sects, Leiden 1973, 3-19; LTK[3] 5,1402; B.G. Wright, Cerinthus apud Hippolytus: An Inquiry into the Traditions About Cerinthus' Provenance: Second Cent 4 (1984) 103-115; BBKL 3, 1387-1388.

A.F.J. Klijn

CHAD (Ceadda) (d. 672). Probably Northumbrian by birth, Chad—often confused with his brother Cedd—was educated and made his vows in the *monastery of Lindisfarne under the attentive guidance of *Aidan but spent part of his youth in *Ireland, where he studied with St. *Egbert (not to be confused with Egbert, archibishop of *York) in the monastery of Rathmelsige. Returning to his homeland, he helped his brother Cedd found the monastery of Laestingaeu (now Lastingham in Yorkshire), becoming its *abbot in 664. The same year, the priest *Wilfrid—appointed bishop of Northumbria with his see at *York after the death of Bishop Tuda of Lindisfarne—was sent to *Gaul to be regularly consecrated (incorrect observance of Easter and the chronic lack of bishops made a regular ordination impossible), but since he delayed his return, the king Oswiu decided to intervene personally, sending Chad to Archbishop *Deusdedit of Doruvernis to be ordained bishop in order to fill the vacant see. Deusdedit having died, however, Chad was appointed bishop by Wine of Wessex (pastor of the western Saxons of whom *Bede recounts episodes of simony; Hist. eccl. gent. angl. III, 7), coadjudicated by two Breton bishops of the *Celtic faction. Upon his return Wilfrid, now regularly ordained bishop according to *Roman custom, did not want to deprive Chad of his authority, as the latter was administering his diocese with great missionary zeal and exemplary conduct. However, during the apostolic visit to the whole of England by *Theodore—appointed new archbishop of Canterbury by Pope *Vitalian in place of the deceased Deusdedit—the irregularity became evident, and Chad voluntarily withdrew, with great humility, to the monastery of Laestingaeu, leaving the leadership of the diocese to the legitimate bishop. The same year, on the death of Bishop Iaruman of Mercia, the king of that province, Wulfhere, son of the *pagan Penda, asked Theodore to give him a new bishop for himself and his people; Theodore did not want to ordain a new bishop and appointed Chad as Iaruman's successor, after personally reordaining him according to correct Roman tradition.

Chad transferred the diocesan see to Licidfelth (Lichfield, "field of cadavers," so-called because according to an ancient tradition the remains of 1,000 British Christians, killed in a *persecution of *Maximian, were there) and built the episcopal church there; with seven other monks, he lived there as a monk to the end of his days. He died 2 March 672, and Theodore ordained Winfrith as his successor, who was a deacon during Chad's episcopate. His tomb at Licidfelth, first in the church dedicated to the Virgin and later transferred to the Church of St. Peter, quickly became a popular *pilgrimage destination because of the many healings and miracles which, according to Bede, occurred there. At the time of the Protestant Reformation his *relics were rescued by the Catholics and translated to the cathedral dedicated to him in Birmingham. A privileged source on his life and work is certainly Bede, who was instructed in Sacred Scripture by Trumberht, one of the monks who had been Chad's disciples.

Bede, Hist. eccl. gent. angl. III, 23,28; IV, 2,3; R.H. Warner, The Life and Legends of St. Chad, London 1872; DCB 1, 426-429; DHGE 12, 33-34; Vies des SS. 3, 31-34; BS 3, 1058-1059; LTK 2, 984.

M. Ghilardi

CHALCEDON

I. Historical outline - II. Council.

I. Historical outline. Bithynian city (Chalkedon, Kalchedon, today Kadiköy) on the Bosphorus opposite *Constantinople, founded by colonists from Megara in 685 BC (see Strabo, XII, 4, 2,563 C). It came under the *Persians in 387 and was later liberated by Alexander. Situated in a highly favorable position, it drew prosperity and well-being not so much from its own territory as from commercial traffic on the Bosphorus (which is why it paid a huge tribute to *Athens). It became a *Roman city in 74 BC when King Nicomedes IV of Bithynia bequeathed his kingdom to the Romans. It was severely sacked by the Scythians in the reign of *Valerian. Dionysius of Byzantium described the city's site (Geogr. Graeci Minor. II, 93, fr. 67). It had a bishop very early: a late Greek tradition says that its first bishops were *Paul's disciples Crescens and Tychicus: but the first known bishop is one Theocritus, 2nd-3rd c. After the *council of 451 it became an ecclesiastical *metropolis, though without suffragans; previously it had been dependent on *Nicomedia. *Monastic institutions flourished there: at the council of 536, ca. 40 monasteries were recorded, under the authority of Bishop Photinus. Bishops: Theocritus, Maris (325–362), Theodulus (at Constantinople, 381), Cyrinus (Socr., HE VI, 15), Philotheus, Eulalius (430), Eleutherus, Heraclian (500), Marcian (518), Photinus (536), Constantine (553), Nicetas, Probus (591), John (680–692).

A.H.M. Jones, The Cities of the Eastern Roman Provinces, Oxford [2]1971, 148-152 and 164-165; R. Janin, Chalcédoine: DHGE 12, 270-277. On the episcopal list, see M. Le Quien, OC, I, Parisiis 1740, 599-612; in particular, on the tradition regarding the first bishops, see J. Pargoire, Les premiers évêques de Chalcédonie: EO 3 (1899) 85-91, 204-209; 4 (1900) 21-30, 104-113; Fedalto 1,98 f.

M. Forlin Patrucco

II. Council. This, the fourth ecumenical council (451), was summoned by the emperor *Marcian, who had just succeeded *Theodosius II, on 14 May 451 for the following autumn. It was to resolve the arguments raised by the spread of *monophysitism, which had triumphed at the Council of *Ephesus of 449 but through proceedings so irregular as to arouse violent reactions, especially, but not only, in the East (i.e., at *Antioch) and from *Leo the Great. Leo was represented by a delegation presided over by *Paschasinus of Lilybaeum.

The council was originally convened at *Nicaea but was then transferred, at the emperor's wish, to Chalcedon, nearer to *Constantinople, and opened on 8 October in the church of St. *Euphemia, in the presence of more than 500 bishops and some representatives of the emperor. Paschasinus, who had been made president of the assembly at Leo's request, immediately brought a charge against *Dioscorus and other protagonists of the Council of Ephesus of 449. After the reading of that council's acts came the rehabilitation of *Flavian of Constantinople, its main victim, and a proposal to depose Dioscorus, *Juvenal of Jerusalem and other bishops with monophysite leanings. At the session of 10 October, in the absence of Dioscorus, the other accused and the *Egyptian bishops, the imperial commissioners proposed that debate be opened on the doctrinal questions and that a new formula of faith be reached. The proposal aroused perplexity, since Leo himself had requested that this question not be touched, and the Council of Ephesus of 431 had forbidden the use of formulas of faith other than that of Nicaea of 325. It was also clear that the assembly's opinions on the subject were very conflicting. Faced with the commissioners' insistence, they began by reading the documents relating to the christological controversy, including Cyril of Alexandria's texts and Leo's Tomus ad Flavianum, while Cyril's anathemata were passed over in silence. On 13 October they again took up the charge against Dioscorus, who was unanimously condemned and declared deposed. On 17 October they returned to the discussion of doctrine: they solemnly confirmed the Nicene Creed of 325, completed by that of Constantinople of 381, Cyril's letters to *Nestorius (only the second) and *John of Antioch of 433, and Leo's Tome; and rejected objections put forward by Egyptian bishops and monophysite monks. Juvenal of Jerusalem and the other accused bishops went over to the majority, abandoning Dioscorus to his fate. The doctrinal question was resumed amid great difficulties on 22 October, and after laborious discussions a new formula was approved: influenced by both the formula of union of 433 and by Leo's Tome, it was dyophysite in approach and proclaimed that in Christ, in a single prosopon and a single hypostasis,* the divine and human natures coexist, entire and complete, without mixture, transformation, separation or division, so that Christ is *consubstantial with the Father according to his divinity and consubstantial with us according to his humanity. On 25 October this formula was solemnly promulgated in Marcian's presence.

In subsequent sittings, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus and *Ibas of Edessa, condemned at Ephesus in 449, were restored, and problems over the relations between the different Eastern patriarchates were discussed. It was in this context that can. 28 was approved, which confirmed that Constantinople, the new Rome, took second place after Rome, despite the protests of the Roman delegates, to whom the ranking seemed detrimental to effective Roman primacy: in fact Leo would not subscribe to this canon. On these discussions the council closed, 1 November, once more in the emperor's presence.

ACO II; DTC 2, 2190-2208; Hfl-Lecl 2, 649-888; CGG 1, 243-418; R.V. Sellers, The Council of Chalcedon, London 1953; P.Th. Camelot, Ephèse et Chalcédoine, Paris 1962; L.R. Wickham, Chalkedon: TRE 7 (1981) 668-675; A.J. Festugière, Actes du concile de Chalcédoine. Sessions III-VI, intr. by H. Chadwick, Geneva 1983; A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche. 2/1. Das Konzil von Chalkedon (451). Rezeption und Widerspruch (451–518), Freiburg – Basel - Vienna 1986; J. Vogt, Ephesus. Konzil u. Synoden: LTK³ 3, 706 f.; E. Reichert, Nestorius: BBKL 6 (1993) 629-633; Id., Heresy and Orthodoxy in the Early Church, London 1991, nr. 18; R. Kirchschläger - A. Stirnemann (eds.), Chalkedon und die Folgen. Festschr. Z. 60. Geburtstag v. Bisch. Mesrob K. Krikorian, Innsbruck-Vienna 1992; A. de Halleux, Nestorius. Histoire et doctrine: Irénikon 66 (1993) 163-177; L. Perrone, L'impatto del dogma di Calcedonia sulla riflessione teologica tra IV e V Concilio Ecumenico, in A. Di Berardino - B. Studer (eds.), Storia della teologia, I, Casale Monf. 1993, 568ff.; W. Breuning, Chalkedon 2. Das Konzil von Chalkedon: LTK³ 2, 999-1002; J.W Need, Human Language and Knowledge in the Light of Chalcedon, New York 1996; P.-Th. Camelot, Storia dei concili II: Efeso e Calcedonia, It. tr., Vatican City 1997; J. van Oort - J. Roldanus (eds.), Chalkedon: Geschichte und Aktualität, Louvain 1997; M. Fedou, Chalcédoine (Concile), 451, in J.-Y. Lacoste (ed.), Dictionnaire critique de théologie, Paris 1998, 266ff.; A.M. Ritter, s.v. Chalkedon, Konzil von 451: RGG⁴ 2, 92ff.; A.M. Ritter, s.v. Chalcedonense, christologische Definition, ibid., 93ff.; A.M. Ritter, Das Konzil von Chalkedon, in C. Andresen - A.M. Ritter (eds.), Handbuch der Dogmen und Theologiegeschichte, I, Göttingen ²1999, 261-270; K.-H. Uthemann, Zur Rezeption des Tomus Leonis in und nach Chalkedon. Wider den dogmenhistorischen Begriff "strenger Chalkedonismus," SP 34, Louvain 2001, 572-604.

M. Simonetti

CHALCIS (Chalcis ad Belum). The settlement of Qenneshrin ("eagle's nest") was renamed Chalcis—a clear reference to the homonymous Greek city of Eubea—due to the Hellenizing colonial policy of Seleucus I Nicator (d. 281 BC). The city gave its name to the surrounding region (Chalkidiki) and is referred to by Pliny as "Chalcis ad Belum." Located at the center of a fertile area, the city acquired a certain splendor, as attested by the right conceded it to mint coins (AD 92?). The name Chalcis remains linked to that of the *Neoplatonist philosopher *Iamblichus, born there ca. 250. A disciple of *Porphyry, Iamblichus, recognizing the impossibility of attaining union with God through philosophy, broadly pursued *theurgy and *pagan religious practices as alternatives.

The history of Chalcis came to the fore when *Belisarius (d. 565), Emperor *Justinian's general, began the war against the Persians from there. Some years later, during the conflict between the *Byzantine emperor Phocas and the Persian *Chosroes II, the city fell into the latter's hands but was spared sacking upon payment of 200 pounds of gold.

The first information we have on the Christian presence at Chalcis goes back to the 4th c.; given its nearness to *Aleppo and *Antioch, however, it can be supposed that the new religion reached the city quite early. We know that Chalcis was an episcopal see from the mid-4th c., since its Bishop Magnus took part at a synod in Antioch (363). A letter of *Basil of Caesarea to the city's clergy (375) informs us that they opposed the pro-*Arian orientation of the emperor *Valens (Letter to the Chalcidians). During these same years (374–376), *Jerome stayed in the Chalcidian desert, studying Greek and Hebrew while practicing a harsh *ascesis. According to *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, various monks lived in the area. *Rabbula was from Chalcis, born there in the mid-4th c. After a *pilgrimage in the holy land, he left possessions and family to dedicate himself to the *monastic life but in 411 was called to lead the Church of *Edessa.

Noteworthy in the list of the bishops of Chalcis known to us is *Apringius, who took part in the Council of *Ephesus (431). His name is linked to that of Anthony, a *chorbishop of his who preached the *theopaschite *heresy at Antioch. News about a bishop from the chōra ("countryside") accords well with what we know of this area, where urban centers were very few relative to rural towns. Apringius was succeeded by Romulus, who subscribed to the encyclical of the Council of *Chalcedon, which does not seem to have been accepted by the whole Christian community of Chalcis: we know that during those years a *monophysite hierarchy arose alongside the *orthodox hierarchy. In fact the small city of Chalcis became an important *monophysite center, and the local *monastery offered a number of bishops to the church.

DHGE 12, 279-280; P. Canivet, Le monachisme syrien selon Théodoret de Cyr, Paris 1977, 185 f.; L. Padovese, Guida alla Siria, Casale M.to 1994, 65-67; Fedalto 2, 701.

L. Padovese

CHALICE. A particularly important religious element in the Jewish Passover meal (Pes. X, 1; Pes.b. 108b), a chalice is present in the NT texts relating Jesus' words at the Last Supper and from then on became part of every *eucharistic *liturgy. According to various witnesses (Athenag., Legatio 11; Iren., Adv. haer. I, 13,2; Tertull., Pud. VII, 10), chalices were normally of glass, but also of silver (Duchesne LP I, 143; Aug., En. in Ps. 113, Ser. 2,6) and gold (John Chrys., In Matth. I, 3). In the interpretations of the Fathers, the chalice is closely linked to the eucharistic wine: it is a symbol of the communion of the faithful with the *Holy Spirit (Ps. Hipp., Hom. in Pasch. 2, SC 27,119-121) and of their partaking of eschatological joy (Did., Com. Zach. III, 219). For *Ambrose, the rock out of which water flowed when touched by Moses's staff is a figure of the chalice touched by God's Word, which brims with water welling up to eternal life, of which God's people drink (Sacr. V, 3). For *Jerome, based on Mt 20:22; 26:39 and Ps 115:13, the chalice indicates Christ's passion (In Matth. III, 20,22), but this comparison is already found in Mart. Polycarp 14,2 and in Clement, who distinguishes between the chalice drunk by Christ, bearer of salvation, and that drunk by the *apostles and the faithful after them, a symbol of sufferings for the sake of the church (Strom. 4, 751-752; Paed. 1,46). For *Origen, the expression "chalice of salvation" is equivalent to "*martyrdom" (Mart. 29; 38).

P. Lebeau, La signification ecclésiologique de la coupe eucharistique d'après les Pères: SP 10 (1967) 366-373.

F. Cocchini

CHANT and ANTIPHON. In his treatise De Anima 9,4 (CCL 2, 792), *Tertullian writes: Prout scripturae leguntur, aut psalmi canuntur, aut allocutiones proferuntur aut petitiones delegantur. In the old *liturgy, then, at least at *Rome, singing was limited to the psalms. It is unclear, however, whether the whole psalm was sung. In *Augustine's time and in that of *Leo the Great, the lector read the psalm after the epistle and the people would sing a refrain taken from the psalm itself. This explains Augustine's words: Legenti respondentes cantavimus (In ps. 40 enarr. Sermo ad plebem I: CCL 38, 447). The psalm after the first reading seems to have been considered a reading. But gradually the need was felt to respond to the reading, and so the psalm became one of the many forms of responsorial chant. Other forms consisted of a simple acclamation, a poetic composition or a biblical canticle, esp. in the liturgy of the Word during the Easter Vigil.

The use of responsorial psalms was common in the time of Augustine and *Athanasius (Lodi, Enchiridion . . . Clavis, 70, 101-102). The antiphonal chanting of psalms was introduced in the 4th c. at Rome and *Milan from the Eastern liturgies. The psalm was divided between two choirs and was introduced and concluded by an antiphon drawn from the psalm itself. Later, the antiphon was also recited in the course of the psalmody. Benedict's Rule (ch. 14) speaks of antiphons ad ipsum diem pertinentes, which shows the existence of a collection of antiphons for the various liturgical feasts. The Roman liturgy has its collections of antiphons for Mass (antiphona ad introitum, antiphona ad offertorium and antiphona ad communionem), which indicates that psalms were sung at those moments of the Mass (Martimort, The Church at Prayer, 80-81, 113, 188-189).

An abbreviated form of responsorial psalm was the responsorium, which corresponded to the particular readings of the liturgy of the hours. Benedict's Rule (chs. 9-11) alludes to readings cum responsoriis suis, i.e., collections of responsoria drawn from the psalms and harmonized with the readings. In the 9th c. other forms of responsoria, not taken from the Psalms, appear: they were often "historical" in the sense that they commented on the feast and were taken from Scripture and from *hagiographical legends.

Outside the Roman liturgy the use of nonbiblical compositions of a poetic nature began earlier. Some Pauline epistles contain fragments of these liturgical hymns (see Wellesz, The Earliest Example). *Gnostics and *Arians used new compositions to propagate their own doctrines. *Ambrose composed several liturgical hymns in opposition to those of the Arians (Lodi, op. cit., 61). Because of the danger of *heresy, Rome remained reluctant until after the 11th c. to accept hymns into the liturgy, making an exception for the oldest hymns, such as the Gloria in excelsis and the Te Deum.

Benedict used the *Ambrosian hymns for the liturgy of the hours, though in 563 the Council of *Braga had condemned the use of hymns in the liturgy (Leclercq, Hymnes, 2911). The West had other renowned authors of hymns besides Ambrose: *Prudentius, *Sedulius and *Venantius Fortunatus (see Walpole, Early Latin Hymns).

In the East, hymnology flourished from the 4th c. Among the main composers were *Ephrem of Edessa and *Severus of Antioch. In the 6th c. the Byzantine liturgy introduced other forms of hymns, such as Kontakia and Canons, many of which were composed by *Romanus Melodus, *Andrew of Crete and *John of Damascus.

Th. Lamy, Sancti Ephraem Syri hymni et sermones, 4 vols., Mechliniae 1882-1902; H. Leclercq, Hymnes: DACL 6, 2 (1925) 2826-2928; E. Wellesz, The Earliest Example of Christian Hym- nodie: Ch. Quart. Review (1945) 34-45; P. Maas - C. Trypanis, Sancti Romani Melodi Cantica, Cantica genuina, Oxford 1963; S. Walpole, Early Latin Hymns, Hildesheim 1966; W. Christ - M. Paranikas, Anthologia graeca carminum christianorum, Leipzig 1971; A. Martimort, The Church at Prayer, the Eucharist, Shannon 1973; E. Lodi, Enchiridion Euchologicum Fontium Liturgicorum, Rome 1979; Id., Enchiridion Euchologicum Fontium Liturgicorum. Clavis methodologica cum commentariis selectis, Bologna 1979; F. Rainoldi, Il canto come dinamismo della parola: Bible and Liturgia 3, Padua 1993, 121-150; A.M. Triacca, Canto-musica e celebrazione. Riflessioni teologico-liturgiche per l'approfondimento della loro relazione: Not 30 (1994) 633-647; J.M. Joncas, Musical Elements in the Ordo Missae of Paul VI, in Handbook for Liturgical Studies, vol. 3, Collegeville 1999, 210-212, 238-239; E. Costa, Canto e musica, in Liturgia (Dizionari S. Paolo), Cinisello B. 2001, 302-328.

A. Chupungco

CHARISMS. In the NT the term χάρισμα, besides meaning in a general way a "gift" or "present" of χάρις, i.e., of divine *grace (Rom 5:15-16; 6:23; 1 Cor 7:7; 2 Cor 1:11; 1 Pet 4:10), acquired a more precise technical meaning in Rom 12:6 and 1 Cor 12–14, where it came to designate the distinctive gifts of the Spirit to the Christian communities. Without going into details on the number and description of the charisms indicated by *Paul (for this, see Allo 320-339), suffice it say that they, though all in the same way gifts of the Spirit, can be divided into two categories: truly extraordinary gifts, not corresponding to any precise hierarchical function in the community, such as "speaking in tongues," working miracles and healing; and gifts enabling their recipients to govern, assist, teach etc. This distinction helps us understand the subsequent developments of Christian reflection on charisms.

Texts relating to charisms in the Apostolic Fathers are few; like the *apostles, they claimed to speak through the *Holy Spirit (1 Clem. 63,2; Ign., Philad. 7,1). *Ignatius wrote to the Christians of *Smyrna that they "lack no charism" (Smyrn., intr.). More interesting are the observations in the Shepherd of *Hermas (Mand. 11,7-9) and the Didache* (11,7,12), where we start to see the problem of the distinction between true and false charisms, esp. with respect to *prophecy.

Among the *apologists, *Justin Martyr maintains, like Ignatius, that the Christians lack no charism and that the προφητικὰ χαρίσματα have been transferred from the Jews to the Christians (Dial. 82,1); a little further on he observes that "even today it is possible to see among us women and men who possess charisms of the Holy Spirit" (Dial. 88,1). *Irenaeus develops the theme of charisms, esp. in polemic against *gnostics and *Montanists. The use of charisms by the gnostics was contested both because it did not occur according to the methods admitted by *orthodoxy (Adv. haer. I, 13,4; II, 31,2), and because gnostics derived their powers not from God but from *magic arts. Similarly he refutes the Montanists because they considered themselves the exclusive trustees of the charism of prophecy and exercised it outside the church (Adv. haer. III, 11,9). Irenaeus also seems to consider the charisma veritatis, which the church has received from the apostles and handed on to their successors, as a gift of God, whose recipients can be recognized by their exemplary and spotless life (as earlier in the Didache and in Hermas's Shepherd). *Apollonius—a contemporary of Montanus, cited by *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE V, 18,1-14)—maintained the falsity of the Montanist prophecies, not because he doubted the existence of this charism, but because they exercised it in untraditional ways (i.e., reveling in ecstasy or accepting cash rewards, as the anonymous author cited by Eusebius, HE V, 16,7, maintains).

In short, the 2nd-c. Fathers attest to the belief in the presence of charisms in the church of their time (see also Tertull., Apol. 23; Ad Scapul. I, 2-4; Exhort. Cast. 4) but, under the inducement of antiheretical polemic, they seek to establish the limits and conditions on the basis of which orthodox charisms may be distinguished from those claimed by *heretics.

Later, reflection on charisms developed in several main directions: (1) Charisms (esp. those in the first category mentioned above) came to be seen more and more as a privilegium ecclesiae primitivae. *Origen, e.g., while maintaining against the Jews the persistence of miracles among the Christians (C. Cel. II, 8), also maintains that the signs of the Spirit, numerous in Jesus' time and after his *ascension, seem to have become less frequent later (C. Cel. VII, 8). *Gregory of Nazianzus (In Iob XXIV, 2) expresses doubts on the existence of charisms in the church of his time. For *John Chrysostom (In Inscrip. Actuum Apost. 2: PG 51, col. 80) and then *Gregory the Great (Hom. XXIX, 4: PL 76, col. 1215), these manifestations of the Spirit belong to the apostolic church, but with the spread and success of Christianity they had exhausted their function. (2) The charisms whose existence continued to be admitted were those relating to service, possessed by persons belonging to the ecclesiastical hierarchy. (3) Where charisms were not identified solely with service and its distinct functions, there was a tendency to see *monasticism (with particular reference to the virtutes of the viri Dei) as the privileged locus of their manifestation.

A place apart in the conceptual elaboration of charisms belongs to *John Chrysostom, who does not consider charisms an exclusive privilege of the ecclesiastical hierarchy or of *monasticism, maintaining—esp. on the basis of 1 Cor 12:7—that each Christian has been given a particular gift of the Spirit.

M. Lauterburg, Der Begriff des Charisma und seine Bedeutung für die praktische Theologie, Gütersloh 1898; H. von Campenhausen, Kirchliches Amt und geistliche Vollmacht in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, Tübingen 1953, [2]1963; G. Hasenhüttl, Charisma. Ordnungsprinzip der Kirche, Freiburg 1969 (It. tr. Bologna 1973); A.M. Ritter, Charisma im Verständnis des Johannes Chrysostomos und seiner Zeit, Göttingen 1972; J.R. McRay, Charismata in the Second Century, SP XII (TU 115), Berlin 1975, 232-239; D. Grasso, I carismi nella chiesa. Teologia e storia, Brescia 1982; M.A. Williams, The Life of Antony and the Domestication of Charismatic Wisdom, in Id., Charisma and Sacred Biography, Chambersburg 1982, 23-45; B.N. Wambaq, Le mot charisme: NRTh 97 (1975) 345-355.

A. Monaci Castagno

CHARITO. Born at *Iconium (Lycaonia), *confessor of the faith under *Aurelian (270–275). On *pilgrimage in *Palestine, he was captured by brigands, who died soon afterward, enabling him to found (330) in their cave the *laura of Pharan near Jericho, with the attached church, which he dedicated under Bishop *Macarius I of Jerusalem (314–333); then that of Duka in the *desert of Jericho; and finally that of Suka near Bethlehem. His life was characterized by labors, psalmody, hospitality, rigorous *fasting (a single meal with bread soaked in water and a little salt) and many miracles. Died ca. 350. The anonymous biography (shortly after the mid-6th c.), based entirely on oral traditions, was used with few changes by Simeon Metaphrastes (PG 115, 900-917).

G. Garitte, La vie prémétaphrastique de S. Chariton: Bull. de l'Inst. hist. belge de Rome 21 (1941) 5-50; DHGE 12, 421-423; LTK 2, 1030; Beck 203, 467; BS 3, 791-792.

A. De Nicola

CHASTITY. According to *Isidore of Seville's etymology (Et. 10,33), castus is the term indicating those qui perpetuam libidinis abstinentiam pollicebantur. The virtue of chastity is not exclusive to a particular state of life, but is an element of every state: *virginity, marriage, celibacy. Its value was appreciated in the ancient Greco-Roman world (which knew virgins and celibates: the Vestals, the priests of Eastern religions in Asia Minor, philosophers dedicated to the study of wisdom), in Buddhism and in ancient *Judaism (the Essenes were celibate, according to *Philo, *Josephus and *Pliny the Younger). The NT teaching (Mt 19:11-12: chastity for the kingdom of heaven) and Pauline preaching (chastity as an undivided heart to please God, 1 Cor 7:34) made chastity a significantly attractive force in the first centuries of Christianity, distinguishing it from the concept held by the highest moral philosophy.

In the 2nd c. the invitation to a radical chastity was present in ecclesiastical preaching and in *Encratism and gnosis, though the latter were in danger of abandoning St. *Paul's balance between flesh and spirit, between marriage, virginity and celibacy. *Athenagoras's A Plea for the Christians presents virginity as one of the finest realities of the Christian life ("There are many men and women who have grown old without marrying in the hope of belonging more to God," 33), and marriage as the place of the reproduction and defense of life (Suppl. 35), being so convinced of its indissolubility that remarriage is a "respectable adultery" (Suppl. 33). *Clement of Alexandria defends marriage against the *gnostics, elevating it beyond sexual union and procreation to a spiritual and religious union between husband and wife, who are united by God (Strom. III, 10,68). To overcome the passions, *Origen asks for perpetual mortification of the flesh and renunciation of marriage, though he does not reject it entirely (In Num. hom. 24,2). *Novatian, proclaiming the benefits of chastity (De bono pudicitiae), states that whoever practices it "has restored his own freedom" (11). *Tertullian, influenced by *Montanism, seems to consider marriage as a legitimate vice against which he exalts virginity and continence. *Ambrose (De vid. 4, 23) distinguishes a triple virtue of chastity: the first conjugal, the second widowed, the third virginal; to talk of and exhort to one of these does not exclude or imply inferiority in the others. *Augustine presents models of these different "types" of chastity: Joseph, Susanna and Mary (Serm. ed. Mai 136,2); and *Jerome offers *Paula as a model in his own time of married and widowed chastity (Ep. 108,15). Chastity is "remaining in Jesus Christ in the flesh and in the spirit" (Ign., Ad Eph. 10,3); it must be guarded, leaving no room for evil desires (Hermas, Mand. 4,1,1); it makes us "neighbors" of God (Orig., Hom. in Levit. 11,1; John Moschus, Prat. 152). It requires a will that strives and obtains from God the gift of chastity through a seriously dedicated life (Jerome, In Mt. 3,19,11), in a struggle with the devil and the passions to conquer the person's very nature (John Clim., Scal. par. 15). The warning not to make chastity an occasion for pride pervades all the writings of the Fathers over the centuries (from 1 Clem. 38, 2 to Jerome, Ep. 22, 3 and Aug., Virgin. 37, 38).

From the start, *monasticism saw chastity as an incontestable and universal reality against which the devil's temptations are focused; chastity is the way to obtain ἀπάθεια, but without God's gift and humility, not only does it benefit no one, but it is even harmful to those who practice it. It is a virtue in continual growth, and the monk, receiving it as a gift from God, makes daily progress until he reaches maturity in it (Cass., Conl. 11,7; 12,7). Chastity makes the soul the place where God dwells, such that there is no good work that is not born of a chaste heart (Greg. Gt., Mor. 21,12,19). In Alcuin (d. 804) (De virtut. et vit. 18) we find this same broad meaning of chastity as a virtue to be applied to all states and all moments of human life (omnibus enim castitas semper necessaria est).

DIP 2, 644ff.; P.T. Camelot, Les traités "De virginitate" au IV^e siècle: EtCarm 31 (1952) 273-292; E. Metz, La consécration des vierges dans l'Église romaine, Étude d'histoire de la liturgie, Paris 1954; M. Aubineau, Les écrits de S. Athanase sur la virginité: RAM 31 (1955) 140-173; M. Bernards, Speculum virginum. Geistigkeit und Seelenleben der Frau in Hochmittelalter, Cologne 1955; J.G. Ziegler, Die Modifizierung der Tugend der Jungfräulichkeit unter dem Einfluss der Antiken Philosophie, Würzburg 1959; M. Agterberg, Ecclesia-Virgo. Étude sur la virginité de l'Église et des fidèles chez saint Augustin, Louvain 1960; C. Tibiletti, Verginità e matrimonio in antichi scrittori cristiani, Turin 1969; V. Grossi, La verginità negli scritti dei Padri. La sintesi di S. Ambrogio: gli aspetti cristologici, antropologici, ecclesiali, in Il celibato per il Regno, Milan 1977, 131-164; P. Pisi, Genesis e phthorà: le motivazioni protologiche della verginità in Gregorio di Nissa e nella tradizione dell'enkrateia, Rome 1981; C. Tibiletti, Verginità e matrimonio in antichi scrittori cristiani, Rome [2]1983; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Enkrateia e antropologia. Le motivazioni protologiche della continenza e della verginità nel cristianesimo dei primi secoli e nello gnosticismo, SEA 20, Rome 1984; Ch. Munier, Matrimonio e Verginità nella Chiesa Antica, It. tr. Turin 1990; P. Brown, The Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity, New York 1988, It. tr. Turin 1992; S. Elm, Virgins of God: The Making of Asceticism in Late Antiquity, Oxford 1994; T.M. Shaw, The Burden of the Flesh: Fasting and Sexuality in Early Christianity, Minneapolis 1998.

M.G. Bianco

CHILD. In ancient Christian literature this word was used in two senses: on the one hand to express a theological idea, and on the other according to the everyday meaning of the times. As a theological expression it indicated the first period of humanity's history or of the church's earthly life and was also a symbol of the perfect person. In the Greco-Roman world the division of human history into seven parts was well known, and it was compared to a human life by the *Stoics. Some 4th-c. *Fathers were inspired by these two conceptions and spoke of salvation history in more or less the same way. Thus *Gregory of Nyssa (Or. in Chr. res.: PG 46, 672), *Jerome (Comm. in Ez. 38, 1), *Ambrose (Ep. 18, 21) and esp. *Augustine (Gen. Man. I, 32,35; Civ. Dei XV-XVI). *Tyconius (Doctr. Christ. III, 35, 51) provided the idea that inspired Augustine, who divided human or salvation history into seven epochs, according to the phases of a human life; the first, which is like childhood, lasted from the creation until Noah and included two parts, infancy and childhood (Civ. Dei XVI, 43). Conversely, in *Clement of Alexandria the end of humanity's earthly life—that is, the epoch of the church—is like childhood, because Christians are clothed with the new man (Eph 4:24) and live in the springtime of eternal life (Paed. I, 5,20,4).

The child as a model of the perfect man is suggested in the words of Jesus (Mt 18:3) and in Paul's letters (Gal 4:7), but childhood does not have a positive sense in Pauline theology (1 Cor 13:11): it does not express the perfect, mature man, as previously in *Philo (Gnilka, Aet. spin., 208). This idea was highly favored in *gnostic texts and in Clement of Alexandria's theology. According to the Gospel of Thomas, "an old man does not hesitate to ask a baby of seven days about the place of life" (Gos.Thom., log. 4). In gnostic thought the child generally represents a person who is a complete stranger to sensual temptations, without earthly ambition, and for whom sexual difference is no longer important; such a person could be considered a monad, androgynous. A very similar expression is in the *apocryphal Psalter: "The elderly with grey hair are instructed by children. Six-year-olds teach old men of 60" (Psalt. 192,2-3); a similar formula is in the *Ophites (Hipp., Haer. V, 7,20), or in the *Manichees (Alex. of Lycopolis, De plac. Man. 24).

Clement of Alexandria also valued this idea, but changed it, removing the gnostic character. In his theology childhood as the model of perfection has two aspects: (1) before God the person must always remain a child in simplicity, humility and complete abandonment (Paed. I, 5,16-17); the theme of spiritual childhood in relation to God has remained one of the central themes of Christian spirituality; (2) having commented on the passages from Paul, Clement distinguishes between the child and the youth. The child is one who is led by the law, and so Paul wrote: "when I became a man, I put aside childish things" (1 Cor 13:11); the youth is one who is fed by Christ. Youth in Christ is perfection (Paed. I, 6,34,2-3); it does not mean a lack of intelligence and knowledge (Paed. I, 3,16,2; I, 6,21,1), but as young people are nourished on milk, so Christians are nourished on Christ (the final hymn of Paed. III). Another idea common in both Christian and *pagan antiquity for illustrating perfect human behavior was the so-called puer-senex, according to which a young person's value depended on the maturity of his or her habits and virtues. An observation from Tobit in the Vulgate illustrates this: nihil tamen puerile gessit in opere (Tob 1:4). The inspiration for this idea in the Christian context were the exemplary youths of the Bible: David, Daniel, Tobias; in the pagan world it was the heroes of Greco-Roman literature: Telemachus, Drusus. The idea of puer-senex was well known in the classical authors (Cic., Cato 71; Corn. Ruf., Ep. 4,17,6; Plin., Ep. 6,26,1), or in funerary inscriptions; it was equally rich in the Christian context: in *hagiography (Athan., Vita Ant. 1), in the moral works of the Fathers (John Chrys., Hom. in Hbr 7,3; Ambr., Hom. in Ps. 36,59), esp. in the literature on *monasticism (Pall., Hist. Laus. 17,2), and in Christian epitaphs (Greg. Naz., Epit. 6,15). The concept of puer-senex applies only in a broad sense to the word child and is rather more linked to the second phase of human life, adolescence.

The line between childhood and adolescence was set by the Stoics at 14 years, although the first period of a human life was divided into two parts: (1) the first seven years, when the child does not participate in the Logos, the principle of rationality, whereas in the second part of this period, (2) from the seventh to the fourteenth year, this principle of rationality develops. In the first period the child is entrusted to the mother or nurse and the pedagogue. In these first steps of its education, the difference between pagan and Christian children amounts to nothing more than the fables and stories used, prayers, and particular customs. In the 4th c. the great pastoral Fathers counsel parents and educators on the formation of children (John Chrys., De inan. gl. 19,1; 73,2-3).

In antiquity the first seven years were unimportant for education, except in some exceptional cases: Plato thought elementary education should begin at six years (Leg. I, 643), Aristotle at five (Pol. 7,1336), Chrysippus at three (in Quintilianus I,1,16). Elementary studies normally began at seven, whether in private or public schools or in the family. Instruction and education were not joined in antiquity. The first was delegated to the teacher, the second to the nurse and the pedagogue, who accompanied his little master to school and helped him in his studies. Poor children had little possibility of studying and could not attain highly qualified positions: e.g., *Eunomius the *Arian was the son of a peasant, and to avoid being one himself he was able to learn stenography, becoming the secretary of Bishop *Aetius (Greg. Nys., C. Eun. 1,50); or they could raise themselves with the help of a benefactor, like *Augustine, who continued his studies thanks to the wealthy *Romanianus (C. Acad. II, 2,3). The children of slaves could study according to the needs or intentions of the master. In methods of teaching and study there was little difference between Christians and non-Christians: Christian professors followed *pagan programs both before and after *Constantine, with Christian elements gradually being added, e.g., prayers at the beginning and end of lessons (Hymns of Clement of Alexandria, Paed. III, 34). In this regard we have a very important archaeological find: the notebook of a young Christian student of 4th-c. *Egypt, different in nothing from a *Hellenistic manual of the same period or of previous centuries: the same mythological names, the same sentences and moral anecdotes, but with unmistakable Christian signs: the invocation "Blessed be God" placed at the top of the first page and a monogram *cross carefully traced at the beginning of each page. We can suppose that Christian teachers in elementary schools were numerous before Constantine (Apos. Trad. 16; Tert., De idol. 10); well known among them were *Origen's father, *Leonides, and Origen himself, who started a grammar school at age 17 (Euseb., HE VI, 2,15).

Children's games in antiquity were simpler than those of today; nor did ancient educators have any concern for articulating a theory of education. Toys found in the tombs of Christian or pagan children are the "perennial games" in which the youngster uses up excess energy, discovers and disciplines his motor reactions, and imitates in his own way adult activities: trinkets, dolls, horses, little place settings for snacks or tools for gardening, carts, balls.

The life and circumstances of children depended on their parents and masters; no law explicitly defended them. Christianity sought through its moral influence to eliminate inhuman practices against children, radically defending human life both before and after birth (Didache 2,2; Ps.-Barn. 19,5; Apos. Con. VII, 3,2; Athen., Leg. 35,6; Tertull., Ap. 9,6-8); it raised its voice against the cruelty of parents or masters (Eph 6:4), helping out where possible. Christians opposed the practice, widespread in antiquity, of exposing children: if one did not want to raise a newborn, the child was exposed in a particular spot in the city, at Rome on the banks of the Tiber or near the Columna Lactaria in the Forum Holitorium, where anyone could pick him up and use him for their own interests, either educating or selling him as a slave. In ancient Christian literature, *Hermas wrote that this had happened to him (Vis. I,1,1). Christians took in these exposed children to save them, though often they could do nothing more than bury them, as the tombs of many children and inscriptions in the catacombs attest (Diehl II,142-143); in some cases consecrated virgins (Aug., Ep. 98) or benevolent wealthy families educated them. They were called alumnus, proiectus, stercorius, kopron, threptos. After Constantine, laws began to protect these abandoned children, defending them as free persons (CJ VIII, 52,3-4). Later it was largely *monasteries that assumed the burden of educating these children, establishing conditions for their admission to a convent; orphans were accepted unconditionally (Basil, Reg. Maior, 15).

In the oblatio, which appeared in the 4th c., for a variety of reasons—poverty, religious motives, difficult situations—parents offered their children to God's service, the biblical precedent being the story of the young Samuel (1 Sam 1:1–3:21). At the beginning of the Middle Ages the most common way of educating exposed or abandoned children was begun: in 787 Dateus, archpresbyter of *Milan, donated a house near the church of S. Salvatore to protect them: the first brephotrophium.

From the 2nd half of the 4th c. the Fathers encouraged monastic education for all youths, at least for a few years, to strengthen them in virtue prior to their secular career. Monastic education was different from ancient education and was typically Christian; in it we can see the foundation of our modern form of education. Like today, instruction and human formation were inseparably woven together, the teacher and the spiritual director being the same person.

Oblatio: DACL 12, 1857-1877; M.F. Berrouard, Enfance spirituelle, III. Les Pères de l'Église: DSp 4, 696-714; E. Josi, Alumni: EC 1, 946-948; G. Vitetti, Brefotrofio: EC 3, 51-53; V. Maconi, Esposti: EC 5, 614-615; Id., Infanzia abbandonata: EC 6, 1930-1932; A.P. Frutaz, Oblati: EC 9, 22-26; H.I. Marrou, Histoire de l'éducation dans l'Antiquité, Paris [6]1965; A. Luneau, L'histoire du salut chez les Pères de l'Église. La doctrine des âges du monde, Paris 1964; Ch. Gnilka, Aetas spiritualis, Bonn 1972; W.A. Strange, Children in the Ancient World, the New Testament, and the Early Church, Carlisle 1996; J.-P. Pettorelli, Péché originel ou amour conjugal? Note sur le sens des images d'Adam et d'Eve sur les sarcophages chrétiens de l'antiquité tardive: RecAug 30 (1997) 279-334; T.S. Millar, The Orphans of Byzantium: Child Welfare in the Christian Empire, Washington, DC 2003.

G. Ladocsi

CHILPERIC I, king (530–584). King of Neustria on the death of his father *Chlothar I (561), he quickly conceived expansionist projects against his brothers Charibert, Guntram and Sigebert. A strong and unscrupulous personality, he was nevertheless dominated by Fredegund, the notorious concubine he married after the strangling of his wife Galaswinth, daughter of the *Visigothic king Athanagild. The misdeed provoked the armed intervention of Sigebert, brother-in-law of the murdered woman, which ended with Sigebert's murder. According to the black picture painted by *Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. VI, 46), Chilperic renewed the atrocities of *Nero and *Herod. Particularly irritating were his ambitions in speculative theology, which led him to compose a short treatise on the *Trinity, displeasing to the *Frankish episcopate even in its appearance of *orthodoxy. He even dared to forbid, by edict, the naming in prayers of the three divine persons; he made baptism compulsory for Jews. He thought himself diminished, both in power and in property, by churchmen, which explains his aversion to them, and which nonetheless—given a certain cultural education which even *Venantius Fortunatus recognized in him (Carm. IX, 1), and his own conviction of being a poet—did not prevent him writing some sacred hymns (on St. Médard, Advent, contempt of the world etc.), after the manner of *Sedulius but in verses betraying a grave ignorance of classical meter. Though a nonconformist by nature, through this literary activity he aligned himself with some contemporary monarchs and aristocrats who attached equal importance to ecclesiastical and to secular culture. He also attempted phonetic innovations, which he imposed on schools, intending to reconcile the written and spoken languages, which increasingly diverged and led to the appearance of new neo-Latin idioms. He was murdered after a hunting party by a killer hired by Fredegund or by her rival Brunhild, Sigebert's widow.

CPL 1520-1532a; MGH Poet. lat. IV, 2; C. Meunier, Grégoire de Tours et l'histoire morale du centre ouest de la France, Poitiers 1946; B. Vetere, Strutture e modelli culturali nella società merovingia, Galatina 1979, 155-164 and passim; J.W. George, Poet as Politician: Venantius Fortunatus' Panegyric to King Chilperic: Journ. of Med. Hist. 15 (1989) 5-18; LMA, 1825.

L. Navarra

CHINA. *Arnobius of Sicca, around AD 300, attests that the Christian message had been preached in China; *Cosmas Indicopleustes attests again to this later (6th cent.). But much earlier than Arnobius himself, *Bardesanes of Edessa, in the Liber legum regionum composed in the 1st half of the 3rd cent. AD, suggests that in his day there were Christians among the Seres, that is, the Chinese. For he says that Christians are in every land he has described, and that of the Seres is among these, farther than *Persia and Kushan, where, as he overtly states, there were Christians in his day. Indeed, Bardesanes's description of the Seres' customs is highly positive, just like his description of the Brahmans: "The Seres have as laws not to kill, not to fornicate, and not to worship idols. And in their whole land there are no idols, no prostitutes, no one who kills a man, nor anyone who is killed." This is also why Bardesanes could not include China in the list of the countries in which Christians avoided the abominable deeds of non-Christians ("Neither do our brothers who are in Gaul marry men, nor do those who are in Parthia take two wives . . . nor do our sisters who are among the Gelians or the Kushan have intercourse with strangers, nor do those who are in Persia marry their own daughters, nor do those who are in Media flee from their dead, or bury them while they are still alive, or give them as food to dogs, nor do those who live in Edessa kill their wives who commit fornication, or their sisters, but they separate themselves from them and hand them to God's judgment. Nor do those who live in Hatra stone thieves, but in whatever land they are, and in whatever place, local laws cannot separate them from the law of their Christ"); for in China, in his own description, non-Christians did not commit abominable acts. But his words are quite inclusive: "The new race of us, the Christians, whom Christ established in every land and in all regions," of which Bardesanes has just spoken, beginning precisely from China. If the Liber reflects Bardesanes's words faithfully, seeds of Christianity might have entered China by the end of the 2nd or beginning of the 3rd c. AD (Bardesanes died in AD 222). A tradition, mentioned by Ebedjesus, even connects the first evangelization of China with St. *Thomas, the *apostle of Parthia and India, related with Edessa. While this legend cannot be verified, the Eastern *Syriac matrix of the evangelization of China is attested with certainty for the 7th c.

Before treating the sources for the 7th c., however, it is worth observing that archaeological evidence suggests that Christianity in fact entered China much earlier, between the 1st and the early 3rd century, under the Eastern Han dynasty (AD 25–220). These discoveries still need further study, but if confirmed they would strongly support Arnobius's statement and even Bardesanes's hint; the end of the Eastern Han dynasty and the death of Bardesanes coincide almost perfectly. One archaeological datum is that in Luling (China), during the Ming dynasty, under Emperor Hongwu (1368–1398), a big iron cross came to light with verses carved on it and a precise date: "the ninth year of Chi-wu, Eastern Wu," corresponding to AD 246. This refined Christian handicraft and poetry suggests that Christianity had been present for some time in China at that date.

Moreover, several carved stones going back to the Eastern Han period show apparently Christian motifs, such as (possibly) the Nativity with the *Magi, twice in two distinct carvings, and clearly the association of a lamb and a fish—neither of these frequent in traditional Chinese iconography—or of a lamb and a phoenix, or of two phoenixes and a fish, symbolizing the *resurrection and Christ. The decorative stele with the phoenixes and the fish is dated to AD 86. Other representations seem to concern the story of *Adam and Eve, and the depiction of heaven and hell: the tree of life with two phoenixes and, below, two serpents enchained. There are also other separate representations of serpents enchained or imprisoned. These portraits are very different from the traditional positive description of dragons in Chinese art and culture. A bronze vessel with the clear representation of two fishes and five loaves of bread, associated with the Chinese word for "offering" or "sharing," also belongs to the Eastern Han period and was probably used for the Eucharist. Many more stone carvings from the same period are extant in China and might hold further surprises.

If, as the archaeological evidence analyzed so far and Arnobius (and perhaps Bardesanes) indicate, the Christian message had reached China already in the 2nd c. (or even at the end of the first, as the stele with the phoenixes and the fish may suggest), then it is probable that it did so through a Syriac mission, on the Silk Way, and that the gospel it brought was that of Matthew, the only one for which the patristic tradition explicitly attests an original composition in Hebrew or Aramaic and the only one that recounts the visit of the Magi to Bethlehem. This is also the same gospel that *Pantaenus is reported by *Eusebius of Caesarea to have found already present in India when in the 2nd half of the 2nd c. AD he went there from *Alexandria, upon the request of some Christians who were already established in India, but wanted a more perfect instruction by that learned teacher. If germs of Christianity were in India at the very least by the end of the 2nd c., this makes it more probable that the Christian message was first preached in China under the Eastern Han dynasty.

Furthermore, a tradition, per se unverifiable, of the Chinese of Chang'an, is in line with the probably Christian artifacts of the Eastern Han period. It relates that in AD 64 (while *Nero was reigning in the Roman Empire and *persecuting the Christians in *Rome) the Chinese emperor Ming-ti sent envoys to the West to learn more about a great prophet who had appeared there. The envoys met two Christian missionaries who were exactly on their way to the Chinese court and remained at court for six years until their death. During their stay there, they left a writing and Jesus' logia. The latter, again, is a description that is very close to that of the primitive Semitic Matthew in 2nd-c. Christian tradition.

Sure evidence of Christianity in China, however, emerges only in the 7th c. The gap between the 3rd and the 7th c. might be explained by the obstacle posed by the Sassanids in Persia meanwhile, and by the closure of the trade rout through Turkestan. Christians in China could not keep in contact with the Syriac church, which very probably was the mother church of Chinese Christianity. This is manifest in the 7th c.: the evidence for Christianity in China comes from the Eastern Syrian Church, traditionally but infelicitously called "*Nestorian." It is probable that it depended on the patriarch of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon, the so-called *catholicos. A three-meter stone slab, improperly known as "Nestorian Stele," discovered in 1625 and now kept in the Provincial Museum of Xi'an, was erected in the capital of the Tang empire, Chang'an (the ancient name of Xi'an), in AD 781. It bears a bilingual inscription, in Chinese and Syriac, titled "Memorial of the spread of the Luminous Religion [Jing Jiao, the Chinese name for Christianity] coming from Syria into China," which describes how Christianity spread and flourished throughout China in the 7th and 8th c. In AD 635, under the patriarchate of catholicos Yeshuyab II, after the Tang had conquered Turkestan, thus opening again the old trade route to the West, the Eastern Syrian monk Alopen headed a Christian mission that reached the Tang capital. The inscription lists the names of a great deal of Persian (Eastern Syrian) missionaries and includes a compendium of the doctrines of the Syriac church. This shows that the Syriac church of the East was the mother church of Chinese Christianity.

The emperor T'ai-tsung, or Taizong (627–649), studied the Christian Scriptures that Alopen had brought, realizing "their propriety and truth and specifically ordered their preaching and transmission." He wanted them translated into Chinese; he deemed Christianity "excellent, vivifying," and "indispensable," and allowed its diffusion in China. The stele reads as follows: "The Persian monk Alopen, bringing a scriptural religion, has come to present it in our capital city. If one studies the meaning of his religion, it is mysterious, wonderful, immediate, producing understanding, establishing essentials, for the salvation of creatures and the benefit of humanity. It ought to spread throughout the empire." A church and a monastery were built in Chang'an at the expenses of the court. A portrait of the emperor in the church indicated that it was under imperial protection. The church is still mentioned in the Chronicle of Chang'an in 1076, when it probably still existed. Many manuscripts discovered in northwestern China speak of Christianity in China in the 7th and 8th centuries. In one of these, stemming from ca. 800, is a hymn addressed to the Christian *Trinity. After the Arabs invaded Persia in 636, many Persians of high rank, even the emperor, fled to China. Christian missionaries from the eastern Syrian church accompanied Arab embassies to China on Arab sea and trade routes as interpreters and advisers.

The following emperor, Kao-tsung, or Gaozong, continued his predecessor's policy of support to Christianity and allowed Christian churches to be built in every province of China. Christian doctrine was adapted to the philosophical language of Confucianism, just as in the Greco-Roman world it had mainly adopted the language of *Platonism (and, partially, *Stoicism). The so-called Sutra of Jesus Christ endeavored to present Christianity to the Chinese, highlighting that Christianity was in perfect harmony with the ancient Chinese traditions, since it endorsed filial piety and loyalty to the state. After Kao-tsung's death, one of his wives, favorable to Buddhism, persecuted Christianity (690–705). The stele also alludes to this period. Peace returned to the church under Hsuan-tsung (712-756).

It seems that Christianity, likewise, is attested in Tibet from the 5th to the 7th c. Indeed, in the 8th c. the catholicos *Timothy I described the Christian community in Tibet as one of the most important of the Syriac church of the East and established that the election of another bishop was necessary for it.

Between 712 and 781 new missionaries arrived, *monasteries were restored, and the name for Christianity was changed from "the Persian religion" to "the Syrian [Ta-ch'in, or Dachin] religion" by imperial order. This was a strategic move, aimed at liberating Christianity from any association or even confusion with other "Persian" religions such as Zoroastrianism or *Manicheism, and also from any idea of affiliation to an extraneous political power. Christian missions to China indeed had arrived from the Syrian, and Syriac-speaking, Church of the East, represented by the *patriarch-catholicos of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon. Just as in Edessa, *Mesopotamia, and Persia, in China, too, the liturgical language of Christianity was Syriac. Notably, it was also the liturgical language of Christianity in India, which seems to have had the same matrix.

However, also because of the hostility of Buddhist, Confucian, and Taoist leaders to Christianity, and the interruption of the connection between Christianity in China and its mother church in Mesopotamia, in 845 the emperor Wu-Zong forbade Christianity as well as all extraneous religions, such as Buddhism and Zoroastrianism. The fact that the state confiscated the considerable properties of these religious groups suggests that the decision was also taken for financial reasons, given that it was a period of severe economic crisis. It seems that one Christian community resisted in China even after 845 and kept its own patriarch. In 986 a monk reported to the catholicos that Christianity was extinct in China and there was only one Christian left. This may be an exaggerated statement; however, it indicates a grave crisis. Christianity would flourish again in China in the 13th/14th century, when the Chinese church depended again on the east-Syrian catholicos. The names of important Christian leaders were also Syriac: a Chinese was elected patriarch with the Syriac name of Yaballaha III (1281), and close to this time a monk called Rabban bar Sauma traveled from Beijing to Rome to support the project of a crusade of Chinese and Mongolians against the Mamelukes.

J. Foster, The Church of the T'ang Dynasty, London 1939; S. Brock, The "Nestorian" Church: A Lamentable Misnomer, in Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 78 (1996) 23-36; Lupus Roh, Research into the First Christian Evangelization of China, Augustinianum, Rome 1999; Wang Wei-fan, Christian Spirit in Ancient China, in Jinling Theological Review 2 (2001), 25-27; Wu Liuhua, Xuzhou Han Stone Carvings, Beijing 2001; I. Ramelli-C. Dognini, Gli Apostoli in India, Milano 2002; P. Jenkins, The Lost History of Christianity: The Thousand-Year Golden Age of the Church in the Middle East, Africa, and Asia, and How It Died, New York 2008, 64–68; I. Ramelli, Bardaisan of Edessa, Piscataway 2009; Id., Early Christian Missions from Alexandria to India, in Augustinianum 51 (2011) 221-231; Id. (ed.), Bardaisan on Free Will, Fate, and Human Nature, forthcoming from Tübingen.

Ilaria Ramelli

CHLOTHAR I, king (d. 561). Youngest of the four sons of *Clovis I and *Clotilde. In the division of the Frankish kingdom following Clovis's death (in 511), his portion was the territories and cities of N *Gaul, with capital at Soissons. An ambitious man, on the death of his brother Chlodomer he annexed part of his kingdom (*Tours and *Poitiers) and was often in conflict with his other two brothers. In 534, with his brother Childebert, he conquered the Burgundian territory; in 556 he took Provence from the *Ostrogoths. On the deaths of Theudebald I (555) and Childebert (558), he became the sole king of the Franks, reigning from Trier. Chlothar forced Bishop *Nicetius of Trier into exile, but he was able to return to his see after the king's death (561). Chlothar had his rebellious son, Chram, killed; feeling guilty for this, he went to Tours to ask pardon at the tomb of St. *Martin but died soon after. In 531 he had married the pious *Radegund, who some years later withdrew to Poitiers and founded a *monastery there, between 552 and 557.

M. Oldoni, Gregorio di Tours, La storia dei Franchi, Milan 1981 (Latin text and It. tr.); DHGE 18, 15-17; LMA 2, 1869-1870; G. Palermo, Venanzio Fortunato, Vite dei santi Ilario e Radegonda di Poitiers, Rome 1989; I. Wood, The Merovingian Kingdoms (450-751), London 1994; Y. Hen, Culture and Religion in Merovingian Gaul, A.D. 481–751, Leiden 1995; Franks and Alamanni in the Merovingian Period. An Ethnographic Perspective, ed. I. Wood, Woodbridge 1998.

A. Di Berardino

CHLOTHAR II, king (584–629). Son of *Chilperic I (d. 584) and Fredegundis, who had Bishop Praetextatus of Rouen killed by a hit man. Only 4 months old at his father's death, he reigned under the tutelage of his mother and his uncle Guntram, king of the *Burgundians, in the NW part of *Gaul (Neustria), while in the E his cousin Childebert II ruled over the territory which began to be called Austrasia; in 595 Childebert died, poisoned by Fredegundis. Defeated by Childebert's sons in 599/600, Chlothar II had to cede part of his territory, which he partially reconquered some years later. He later became sole king of the *Franks (613), except for S Gaul, which was in the hands of the *Visigoths; he thus reconstituted *Clovis's kingdom. *Desiderius, future bishop of Cahors (630), for a time served at his court as chaplain and archdeacon. In 614 Chlothar II convoked an important council at Paris, the most important of the Merovingian period, in which 77 bishops from throughout his kingdom participated (SC 355, 509-525). Following their deliberations, on 18 October he published a decree reproving and modifying some of their decisions, though recognizing episcopal jurisdiction; he ended unjust taxes. In 626/627 another council met at Clichy (SC 355, 524-547), which considered itself the continuation of that of Paris of 614. Chlothar II died at Paris on 18 October 629 and was buried in the Church of St. Vincent, which would later become Saint-Germain-des-Près.

Ps. Fredegar, Chronicon, MGH, SS Rerum Merovingiarum 2, 1888, 1-193; DHGE 13, 17-20; LMA 2, 1870-1871; O. Pontal, Histoire des conciles mérovingiens, Paris 1989; I. Wood, The Merovingian Kingdoms (450-751), London 1994; Y. Hen, Culture and Religion in Merovingian Gaul, A.D. 481-751, Leiden 1995; Franks and Alamanni in the Merovingian Period: An Ethnographic Perspective, ed. I. Wood, Woodbridge 1998.

A. Di Berardino

CHORBISHOP (chorepiscopus). Literally "bishop of the chōra," i.e., the countryside, thus a suburban bishop (in villages, in suburbs, among nomadic populations). The ancient city, including during the time of the *Roman Empire, retained some characteristics of the city-state, with a more or less vast territory dependent on it; bishops normally resided only in the inhabited centers recognized as cities, and the entire extraurban territory was under him, without subdivision of the diocese. In the larger dioceses the pastoral figure of the chorbishop arose from the late 3rd c. in Asia Minor, but it also spread to other regions, such as *Syria, *Mesopotamia, *Arabia, *Egypt and *Armenia, i.e., in regions where the municipal system was less extensive.

The first known chorbishop is Zoticus, of the village of Comana (Pamphylia), called "village bishop" (Eusebius, HE 5,16,17); next was the *martyr Athenogenes during *Diocletian's persecution in 303, in the *Cappadocian village of Pedachtoe. Some 15 chorbishops were present at the Council of *Nicaea, all from Asia Minor and Syria. Since this ministry varied according to place and time, it has long been discussed whether the chorbishop was always a bishop, or only sometimes, or never. Current opinion holds that he was a bishop who could exercise all of the related functions but who in reality was limited by canonical legislation, which in the course of the 4th c. intervened increasingly to specify their functions, subordinating them to the bishops of the cities. The Council of *Ancyra of 314 establishes: "A cleric must not be ordained by a chorbishop without the consent of the bishop. Chorbishops may not ordain presbyters or deacons, but neither can presbyters of the city without the written permission of the bishop of each diocese" (can. 13). Not long after, the Council of *Neocaesarea in *Pontus (can. 14) mentions them but does not further specify their function. That of *Antioch of 341 (can. 10) delimits their function at length and says: "Though they have received the ordination proper to bishops," they can ordain subdeacons, *exorcists and lectors. At the Council of *Serdica of 343, ordination of bishops is prohibited in villages where a presbyter would suffice (can. 6). *Basil of Caesarea had some 50 chorbishops in his dependency, spread throughout his vast diocese of Cappadocia, to whom he writes a letter on the selection of clergy and their requirements (Ep. 54; for the number, see Gregory of Nazianzus: PG 37, 1060). The canons of Laodicea are from these years, and they establish that "bishops must not be installed in villages or in the countryside, but only visitors. Regarding bishops already established in those areas, they must not do anything without the consent of the bishop of the city. Likewise, presbyters cannot do anything without the consent of the bishop [of the city]" (can. 57). Therefore, though the chorbishop had episcopal powers, his authority was reduced to a dependency on the bishop of the city, i.e., he was like a periodeuta. The two institutions, chorbishop and periodeuta, responded to the same needs of a vast diocese in which there were Christian villages. From the 5th c., chorbishops decreased in number, but they were present at the ecumenical Councils of *Ephesus (431) and *Chalcedon (451). *Nicaea II (785) allows them only the ordination of lectors (can. 2), with express authorization. There were chorbishops among the *Nestorians until the 13th c., and in the Orthodox Church of Syria and among the *Maronites they still exist.

In the West we do not have the term, but something like it exists; e.g., Antoninus of Fussala, ordained by *Augustine, exercised that ministry, since the territory of the diocese of *Hippo was quite vast and in some villages *Punic was spoken. The prescription of the Council of Serdica, that in the countryside a presbyter was sufficient (can. 6), was adhered to; thus bishops should not be ordained for small centers (Leo Gt., Ep. 12,10: PL 54, 654). The letters of Popes *Damasus (Jaffé 244) and *Leo the Great, which speak of chorbishops, are from a later period. In the early 5th c., an Eugraphus is chorbishop at Manastirine (Salona; DACL 3,1444); in *Gaul the first known case is from the Council of *Riez of 439, when a bishop was downgraded and given that title (DACL 3,1443). The ministry of the chorbishop flourished esp. among the *Franks, since the dioceses were very vast and chorbishops became very important. *Willibrord and *Boniface had chorbishops for missionary service. In the early Middle Ages they appear as auxiliary or coadjutor bishops. In the East, e.g., among the *Coptic Christians and other confessions, the chorbishop did not have episcopal character; in the large dioceses he was a collaborator of the bishop, but could be ordained bishop later.

Joannou, Index, cols. 61-62; Hfl-Lecl 1,1197-1220 (= DACL 3,1423-1452); DDC 3, 686-695; LTK[3] 2,1090-1092; LMA 2,1884-85; F. Gillmann, Das Institut der Chorbischöfe in Orient, Munich 1903; Th. Gottlob, Der abendländische Chorepiskopat, Bonn 1928, repr. 1963 (rec. of Fr. Gillmann: AKKr 108 [1928] 712-723); R. Amadou, Chorévêque et periodeutes: L'Orient Syrien 4 (1959) 233-240; M. Clément, La collégialité de l'épiscopat dans l'Église maronite: POC 15 (1965) 307-332; A. García y García, Historia del derecho canónico, I, Salamanca 1967, 373-375; R. Kottje, Isidor von Sevilla und der Chorepiskopat: Deutsches Archiv 28 (1972) 533-537; G. Dagron, Entre Village et cité: la bourgade rurale des IV[e] siècles en Orient: Koinonia 3 (1979) 29-52 (esp. 44-47) (now in La romanité chrétienne en Orient, London 1984, n. VIII); O. Bucci, Episcopato delle campagne e corepiscopi: Atti dell'Acc. Costantiniana, IV, Perugia 1981, 97-163; D. Feissel, L'évêque, titres et fonctions d'après les inscriptions grecques jusqu'au VII^e siècle: Actes du XI^e Congrès inter. d'archéologie chrétienne, Rome 1989, I, 801-828; P. Maraval, La passion inédite de S. Athénogène de Pédachthoé en Cappadoce (BHG 197b), Brussels 1990; C. Scholten, Der Chorbischof bei Basilius: Zeit f. Kirch 103 (1992) 149-173; O. Bucci, Il Corepiscopato nella storia della Chiesa, Rome 1993.

A. Di Berardino

CHOSROES, kings
I. Chosroes I - II. Chosroes II.

I. Chosroes I (Chusro, Χοσρόης) Anosharvan ("of the immortal soul"). King of the *Persians (531–579). After the Mazdakite insurrections under his father Kavadh, Chosroes, appealing to the nobility and clergy, introduced sound reforms to consolidate political power. In the interests of the nobility, he imposed rigid differentiation of social classes, sanctioned by religious authority. An administrative reform based on centralization strengthened royal power; a new tributary organization, in connection with *Diocletian's fiscal reform, served the same end. A new military organization was based on the cavalry, supported in case of necessity by the structures of the state. Mazdakism was suppressed and the Zoroastrian church was restored; at the same time Christianity spread increasingly. A significant *Byzantine influence was followed by an Indian one. When *Justinian closed the Academy of *Athens in 529, its members were welcomed at the court of Ctesiphon. The "perpetual" peace concluded between Chosroes and the Byzantine emperor in 532 was broken in 540 by the Persians, who advanced as far as *Syria, reaching the Black Sea via the Caucasus. By paying high tributes, *Justinian obtained a truce and finally, in 562, a 50-year peace treaty.

II. Chosroes II Aparwez (Aparviz) (591–628). Nephew of Chosroes I, he may have been a Christian. With Byzantine help he eliminated his rivals in the Persian aristocracy and consolidated his power, which led to exceptional results against Byzantium. In ca. 604 he began his advance on Syria and *Egypt; in 616 he conquered the Nile valley, which remained under Persian rule for ten years. More than once the Persian armies reached the outskirts of *Constantinople, until in 627 *Heraclius annihilated them near Nineveh. Chosroes was then toppled by a palace plot, tried and condemned to death. His execution inaugurated a period of anarchy.

A. Christensen, L'Iran sous les Sassanides, Copenhagen ²1944 (repr. Osnabrück 1971), 363-496; S. Brock, Studies in Syriac Christianity, London 1992; D. Brodka, Das Bild des Perserkönigs Chosroes I. in den "Bella" des Prokopios von Kaisareia, in Studies of Greek and Roman Civilization, J. Styka (ed.), Krakow 1998, 115-124; P. Riedlberger, Die Restauration von Chosroes II, in Ancient Iran and the Mediterranean World, E. Dabrowa (ed.), Krakow 1998, 161-175; var. aus., Storia del Cristianesimo. Religione, politica, cultura, 3, Rome 2002, 1013-1035.

J. Irmscher - C. Dell'Orso

CHRISTIAN – CHRISTIANITY. "Christian" was the name first given to Christ's followers at Syrian *Antioch (Acts 11:26; cf. 26:28; 1 Pet 4:16): it designates anyone who professes the doctrine proclaimed by Jesus Christ. As an adjective it describes whatever has any bearing on the person and work of Jesus Christ, and the rites, symbols and institutions deriving therefrom. Though the reason for the name assumed at Antioch remains unclear and its meaning uncertain, two facts seem evident: the followers of Jesus of Nazareth appeared to *pagan eyes as a group distinct from the Jews, and the name "Christ" was raised in popular consideration to a common name, blotting out its original sense as a title. Yet on the lips of the Antiochenes it probably did not have a very positive sound. At *Rome its sense was certainly pejorative (Tacitus, Annales XV, 44; Suetonius, Claudius 25). While in the canonical and some subapostolic writings the Christians are called "saints, elect, faithful," in the Acts of the Martyrs to declare oneself a Christian was a profession of faith and the name had become current. Since from the name "Christian" the *apologists drew positive expositions of the connection between the philological meaning of the word "good, beneficent" and their style of life, *Marcionite gnosis was not slow to propose a tendentious interpretation: "Christians" were the adherents of the "good" God (i.e., the Marcionites), in contrast with the *orthodox, who in *Syria were called *Nazarenes, adherents of the Jewish messianism connected with the one from Nazareth.

P. de Labriolle, Christianus: ALMA 5 (1929-1930) 69-87; A. Ferrua, Christianus: CivC 1933, II, 552ff.; III, 13ff.; Id., Christian: EC IV, 909-910; H. Leclercq, Chrétien: DACL 3, 1464-1478; E. Peterson, Christianus, in Miscell. Giov. Mercati, I (ST 121), Vatican City 1946, 355-356; O. Montevecchi, Nomen christianum, in Paradoxos politeia. Studi patristici in onore di Giuseppe Lazzati, Milan 1980, 485-500; I.N. Bremmer, Christianus sum: The Early Christian Martyrs and Christ, in Eulogia, Mélan. Bastiaensen, Steenbrugge 1991, 11-20; Ch. Pietri, L'usage de "Christianos" dans l'épigraphie, in Christiana respublica, Rome 1997, 1583-1602.

E. Peretto

CHRISTIANITY and CLASSICAL CULTURE

1. The Christian message, first propagated in the cultural milieu of *Palestine—scarcely open to Greco-Roman culture—soon came into contact with that culture through Jews of the Diaspora who maintained links with Palestine and through the journeys of evangelists to Asia Minor, Greece and *Rome. Some of the best-known missionaries came from *Hellenized regions, esp. *Paul of Tarsus. His letters contain occasional citations of *pagan poets and judgments on their religious and moral attitudes (Rom 1:18-32; 1 Cor 1:17–2:16; 3:18-20; 15:33; Col 2:8; Tit 1:12) and speeches (Acts 14:15-17; 17:16-34). We will not attempt here to investigate possible influences of Greek thought on Paul and other NT writers, such as *James and *John.

2. The earliest, biblically inspired Christian literature (the so-called Apostolic Fathers; NT *apocrypha; compositions of an ecclesial, homiletic or poetic nature) contains only rare, weak traces of or references to classical culture.

3. This culture is strongly present, however, in varying degrees and with differing assessments, in the 2nd-c. Greek *apologists. The Preaching of Peter, while chiding the Greeks for their ignorance of God, insists on concepts familiar to *Stoicism and *Platonism. *Aristides (writing in the reign of *Hadrian, 117–138, or *Antoninus, 138–161), reviewing the religious beliefs of barbarians, Greeks, Jews and Christians, has confidence in the power of reason and the achievements of *philosophy and, while condemning its religious errors and moral disorders, appreciates Greek culture as a whole. The philosopher and *martyr *Justin, writing in the mid-2nd c., cites poets and philosophers (primarily Plato) who deeply influenced him and extols philosophy, his conception of which is deeply religious. He sees the presence of the Word in the form of "seed" in the best pre-Christian and even contemporary philosophers, which explains (together with their "borrowings" from the Bible) their consonance with the Christian message. Justin's disciple *Tatian refers frequently to classical culture, condemning it totally in all of its expressions, while fully exploiting the stylistic resources provided by traditional schooling. *Athenagoras, writing ca. 177, cites numerous pagan writers (mostly, it seems, secondhand) and shows their influence here and there. While recognizing the limitations of the poets' and philosophers' religious ideas, he sees in them "a certain conformity [sympatheia] with divine inspiration," which explains their considerable achievements in the domain of truth and their nearness to Christian thought. *Theophilus, bishop of *Antioch (ca. 180), frequently cites *pagan authors in his three books Ad Autolycum, rejecting with contempt all aspects of their culture. The *Letter to Diognetus, however, despite its negative judgment on pagan philosophy, proposes Christian/pagan relations on a plane of peaceful coexistence, with Christians accepting the social reality of which they formed a part and which they were called to leaven with the yeast of the gospel.

4. With *Clement of Alexandria (ca. 150–ca. 230), Christianity took a decisive step in its relations with classical culture. Clement knew it profoundly and was able to engage it with pioneering ardor, moderation, openness to human values, and literary ability, putting contemporary culture, primarily philosophy, at the service of the Christian word in his Protrepticus, Paedagogus and Stromata. The work of *Origen (ca. 185–ca. 254) extends to much wider fields than those we are considering here. His attitude to pagan culture, of which he had a profound knowledge, is particularly evident in the apologetic Contra Celsum, and in the more properly theological De principiis (i.e., "of the fundamental truths of faith"), where he attempts to elaborate revealed data with the help of philosophy, not without some risk to *orthodoxy.

5. The number and stature of the *Fathers of the 4th c., the golden age of *patristics, obliges us to concentrate on a few outstanding figures. *Basil of Caesarea (ca. 330–379) addresses this theme in his Address to the Young on the Way to Draw Profit from Pagan Literature, where, drawing on Plato and Plutarch, he points out the elements of that literature which can serve the education of the young. His friend *Gregory of Nazianzus (ca. 329–390), who studied classical culture for a long time, esp. at *Athens, shows his appreciation of classical culture particularly in his attentive care for literary form in his 45 Orations and in his poetry and letters. Basil's younger brother *Gregory of Nyssa (ca. 332–394) sees the disciplines which constituted the cultural heritage of his time as having a propaedeutic function for the understanding of the Christian word, drawing especially on philosophy in his attempts to speculate on revealed data.

6. In the Latin world, where relations with classical culture matured more slowly, we find attitudes similar to those encountered in *Greek Christendom, despite the differences in environment and in individual personalities. In the mentality of the Latins, more attentive to concrete problems (including the institutional aspects of Christianity) and to historical events, attitudes to classical culture were deeply influenced by three centuries of *persecution and opposition by pagan society. We see this in *Tertullian, who shows implacable hostility to every aspect of pagan culture, especially in the effects of social life. Fearing that a conciliatory attitude might be seen as approval of the idolatrous worship that pervaded every aspect of pagan life, he (unlike the *Letter to Diognetus) advocated for Christians an isolation that became ever more difficult as they increased in number. In the doctrinal field, his De testimonio animae proclaimed the uselessness of the attempts made by most of the earlier apologists to show the consonance between the natural theology of Christianity and the doctrines of pagan poets and philosophers, claiming that openness to Christianity was something spontaneous, innate to the *soul not led astray by prejudice. This did not prevent him using, with all his originality and vigor, all the means of expression taught by the schools, the common heritage of contemporary culture.

In *Minucius Felix the contents of Christian belief crop up only in a few hints, while in his theodicy and natural ethics he makes wide use of philosophical elements, drawn esp. from Cicero and Seneca. These are also his preferred models, not uninfluenced by the archaism then in vogue in literary form. We see the same conformity to formal tradition in *Cyprian, the rhetor who, converted to Christianity and made bishop of *Carthage (248–258), was completely taken up with the needs of his pastoral ministry and uninterested in cultural problems. *Arnobius of Sicca (d. ca. 327) took a different attitude: in the seven books of his Adversus nationes, rich in information from good sources on pagan belief and worship (esp. in *Africa), he gives considerable prominence to philosophical currents, esp. Platonism, contesting their value, since reason is incapable of reaching the *truth. He too molded his literary style on the traditions of the schools, with a profuse, emphatic style not lacking in vigor and originality. *Lactantius lived in an age (ca. 250–320) when Christianity, by now widespread even in intellectual circles, had to measure itself against pagan culture. In his Divinae institutiones he sought to defend his religion systematically, with constant use of rational investigation, in polemic against philosophy. He was called the “Christian Cicero” for his perfect style, modeled on the best authors and cultivated in the firm conviction that in this way he was helping the Christian cause. Between his death and that of *Leo the Great (461), Christian literature reached its greatest splendor in both East and West. It was marked by, among other things, a more serene openness of the Christian consciousness to the values of classical culture, which, even amid the lingering residues of traditional diffidence, began to be distinguished from the religious content of paganism. We should bear in mind that, in the East and in the West, young Christians and pagans were formed in the same cultural environment, since there were no schools run by Christians or for Christians (except for the *catechumenate, which was strictly religious in scope). Here we can only give quick glimpses of a cultural movement that was growing broader and deeper, with the emergence of personalities of great importance in the Christian world.

Poetry did not hesitate—with *Marius Victorinus (born ca. 300), *Hilary of Poitiers (ca. 315–368), *Ambrose (ca. 340–397), *Prudentius (born 348), *Paulinus of Nola (ca. 359–431)—to take as its model the language, imagery and meters of the classical tradition, enlisted to express a new conception of life. Classical culture left visible traces in Ambrose, in certain veins of *Neoplatonist philosophy and above all in his effort to imbue with a Christian spirit his presentation of a morality owing a large debt to the dictates of ancient wisdom, integrated with and elevated to the teaching of the Bible. *Jerome (ca. 347–420), while dedicating his whole work as a writer to the service of the Christian cause, shows the imprint of the culture he had deeply assimilated and then consciously renounced, in his references to the classics and especially in his mastery of literary form. The speculative elaboration of revealed data reached its apex in *Augustine (354–430), finding nourishment in the study of philosophical problems, which had earlier helped him in the difficult journey toward Christian faith. The history of the pagan world, primarily the Roman, offered him the subjects for meditation, in the light of faith, in the City of God. Not forgetting the art of the word, in which he had been trained so well and which he had taught, he recognized the importance of this discipline for one who proclaims the Christian message, though he bent his style to the demands of his thought.

Still later, the fascination of classical culture made itself felt in writers more concerned with formal elaboration, especially the poets. Three authors deserve mention for their conscious activity in this field. *Boethius (ca. 480–524) was the most distinguished continuator of the classical tradition cultivated in a Christian spirit, in translations, commentaries and original works of various kinds. Classical erudition and study of the Bible and Christian tradition engaged the activity of *Cassiodorus (ca. 485–ca. 580). *Isidore of Seville (ca. 560–636) is considered as marking the end of the patristic age and opening a new page of cultural history. He assiduously collected and ordered secular and religious elements, contributing in large measure to the transmission to posterity of the patrimony of ancient culture in its various expressions.

7. Even a cursory examination of the relations between classical culture and Christianity should take account of aspects other than the literary, though this is obviously of prime importance and better known. The field of behavior, for example, in which Clement of Alexandria shows considerable interest in the Paedagogus, and especially that of the moral life, which particularly concerned pastors of souls: in the 5th c., *Salvian of Marseille contrasted the rampant corruption of morals among "Roman" Christians with the *virtues practiced by the barbarians. And the figurative art of the Christians could be profitably investigated to examine the influence of the classical tradition on it. These subjects would require a development beyond the scope of this article, but it seems opportune here to give an overall view of the subject, pointing out its basic lines and touching on some of the more important problems (see final bibl.).

The documents of Greek and Latin *patristics faithfully mirror the stages through which reflection on the Christian message passed during this period, not just in its internal clarification and articulation, but also in its relationship to the society in which the Christians lived and operated, in varying numerical proportions at different times and places. The more Christianity spread beyond *Palestine, the less could its conception and presentation fail to be influenced by contacts with the Greco-Roman world, making use of whatever cultural categories seemed compatible. At first the pagan world was present to educated Christians as a religiously different and opposed reality, though as yet they took no conscious stand in comparing its ideas and life with their own ideas and program of life. Literary form carried on the genres and style of the Bible, not without sporadic influences from *Hellenism. The Greco-Roman world, to which the great majority of men who left a trace in the culture of the first centuries belonged, presented the young religion with a heritage of thought and literary form accumulated through centuries, humus in which the new civilization was destined to grow. With the Apologists, who generally came from the pagan intellectual class, Christianity confronted Roman and Hellenic culture not just as belief and moral practice but also as a vision of the world which tried to elaborate the data of revelation in a rational way. It involved a necessarily polemical position, but one which took very different attitudes in different writers, from implacable repudiation of every aspect of pagan culture to attempts to recognize, salvage, purify and develop the values of which it was the bearer. This process would continue, profiting from a deeper knowledge of classical culture, esp. philosophy, and a refinement of method, in the writers of the 3rd, 4th and 5th c. While persisting in polemic against the philosophy and rhetoric of the pagan world on which they willingly drew, they presented themselves as perpetuators of a literary tradition that they intended to use as a vehicle for the new word; and the experience acquired by some, in long familiarity with the classics and in patient scholastic exercise, enabled them to appear as heirs of a cultural heritage which they considered, duly purified, as still valid and relevant. In the final period some Latin writers were particularly engaged in collecting and transmitting the elements of classical culture, not without comparing them with Christian values.

8. Judgments differ on the interpretation of the relations between classical culture and early Christianity. For some scholars, from the moment when the Christian message was accepted by men educated in Greek philosophy, it began to undergo a process of Hellenization that would draw off its innermost meaning and finally distort it, as happened in Clement of Alexandria and Origen. Others reduce this influence to essentially external factors, maintaining that under the identity of terms and formal motifs is concealed an essentially different thought; or that, at any rate, the effort to present Christian concepts according to philosophical categories—for apologetic ends and through the natural need for scientific systemization—left intact the awareness of the originality of Christian content. While it seems we must reject the thesis of a radical Hellenization of Christianity, we must take into account for each author not just his explicit declarations but also his whole attitude, without always pretending to a perfectly ascertainable consistency. Even among those who decisively denied any value whatsoever to pagan thought, some were undeniably influenced by it, e.g., Tatian for his whole metaphysical system, *John Chrysostom for the Stoic-Cynic motifs present in his conception of moral life. There were particularly enlightened Fathers who took care to separate those elements of the pre-Christian (or even contemporary) heritage they considered acceptable from those they decisively rejected; think, e.g., of Justin, Basil, Ambrose and Augustine. Then there was a formal aspect, which, after the very earliest expressions of Christian literature, it can be said that no writer escaped; the degree of influence was measured by each one's education, opportunities and zeal, but the models were the same for all. Finally, we should not forget that fund of values common to any form of true humanism, however imperfect, on which it was not difficult to reach agreement; Christianity, accepting these values, worked to purify and develop them.

For fuller assessment, see the conclusion of Letteratura greca cristiana, 3rd ed., Nuova Un. St. 29, Rome 1978, 183-206, also taking Latin patristics into account (as in Letteratura latina cristiana, 4th ed., Rome 1973). The relations between classical culture and early Christianity have been studied in those Fathers who are among the most important in this aspect. Bibliography can be found in the articles on these Fathers. I cite here two exemplary works: H.-I. Marrou, Saint Augustin et la fin de la culture antique, Paris 1938, with "Retractatio," 1949 (It. tr. Milan 1994); J. Fontaine, Isidore de Séville et la culture classique dans l'Espagne Wisigothique, 2 vols., Paris 1959. General works include: C.N. Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture, Oxford 1940; H.-I. Marrou, Storia dell'educazione nell'antichità, tr. from Fr., Rome 1966 (2nd ed.); H. Hagendahl, Latin Fathers and the Classics, Göteborg 1958. F.J. Dölger's periodical, "Antike und Christentum," Münster in Westfalen 1950 (6 vols. and supplement) is dedicated to this problem. It is continued under Th. Klauser's direction in "Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum," from 1958, and its supplements. But the most important undertaking is that of Th. Klauser in the "Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum," Stuttgart (more than 20 volumes have come out since 1950).

RAC 2 (1954) 346-362; TRE 3, 50-99; LMA 1, 710-715; LTK[3] 1, 755-759; H.-I. Marrou, Saint Augustin et la fin de la culture antique, Paris 1938; H. Frohnes - U.W. Knorr (eds.), Kirchengeschichte als Missionsgeschichte 1, Munich 1974, 247-310; J. Daniélou, Messaggio evangelico e cultura ellenistica, Bologna 1975; A. Grillmeier, Mit ihm und in ihm. Christologische Forschungen und Perspektiven, Freiburg 1975, 423-488; E.A. Judge, "Antike und Christentum": Towards a Definition of the Field. A Bibliographical Survey: ANRW 2, 23, 1 (1979) 3-58; M. Simonetti, Cristianesimo antico e cultura classica, Rome 1982, [2]1990; P. Steinmetz, Untersuchungen zur römischen Literatur des zweiten Jahrhunderts nach Christi Geburt, Wiesbaden 1982; A. Quacquarelli (ed.), Complementi interdisciplinari di Patrologia, Rome 1989, 185-221; G. d'Onofrio (ed.), Storia della teologia nel medioevo 1, Casale Monf. 1996, 37-105; E. Valette-Cagnac, La lecture à Rome. Rites et pratiques, Millau 1997; B. Studer, Schola Christiana. Die Theologie zwischen Nizäa und Chalcedon, Paderborn 1998; M. Fiedrowicz, Apologie im frühen Christentum, Paderborn 2000; W. Geerlings - C. Schulze (eds.), Der Kommentar in Antike und Mittelalter, Leiden 2002; G. Hafner, Cassiodor - ein Leben für kommende Zeiten, Stuttgart 2002; L. Pietri (ed.), Storia del Cristianesimo 1, Rome 2003, 766-825.

M. Pellegrino - S. Heid

CHRISTIANS and JEWS

I. The process of separation - II. The controversy between Jews and Christians - III. Imperial legislation and Judaism - IV. The Byzantine period and Judaism.

I. The process of separation. Born in a Jewish environment, Christianity could not remain there forever. *Jewish Christians, faithful to the law and the observances, soon found themselves in an ambiguous situation: their conscience forbade them to deny their faith in Jesus Christ, while the religious leaders of the nation condemned that faith and classified Jesus' followers as minim. (For orthodox Judaism, minim are the followers of any sectarian movement, guilty of grave lapses against the moral or ritual law, or betrayers of the hope of Israel.) The Jerusalem Christians took no part in the Jewish war; according to *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE III,5,3), they had earlier abandoned the city, to settle in an area of Peraea called Pella. Some of them settled there permanently; but what was the reception of those who returned to the Holy City after those events? It is a fact that in ca. 90, Patriarch Gamaliel II inscribed the *Nazarenes as first among the minim, in the prayer of the 18 petitions (Goppelt 157). Hence they were even excluded from the public prayer recited in the name of the whole assembly, though at first they could take part privately and in silence. Many Talmudic texts (difficult to date) attest the presence of Jewish Christians expelled from the synagogal offices or classified as poshe Israel (rebellious Jews). The Second Jewish war (132–135) certainly aggravated the rift that had been created between Judaism and Jewish Christianity. After the triumph of the church, the situation of Jewish Christians became even more precarious: rejected by their ethnic brethren, they were considered heretics by members of the great church (Simon 233-239), the majority of which consisted of elements converted from *paganism, and whose break with Jewish orthodoxy was total from the end of the 1st c. For their part the Jewish authorities organized a vast struggle, mainly throughout their Diaspora, to combat this dynamic and enterprising rival, which presented itself as the true heir to the promises of Israel. Jewish proselytism exerted itself to neutralize the effects of the Christian mission (see Mt 23:15). Strong in their privileged legal status, the Jews invited the Christians too to escape the pressures by rejoining the synagogue (Passio Pionii, 13) but do not seem to have gone so far as to provoke or favor the persecution of the Christians by the Roman authorities (Munier 153-156).

II. The controversy between Jews and Christians. From the 2nd to the 4th c. this controversy was conducted on theological and biblical levels. A wealth of literature attests to its intensity. It is composed of various literary genres: treatises, homilies, collections of testimonia, debates etc. The greater part of these writings unite apologetic and doctrinal exposition of the Christian religion with criticism of Judaism. Chronologically, however, one notes a certain evolution: the defensive genre prevails up to the 3rd c.; the authors of the 3rd and 4th c. write more to prove the superiority of the Christian faith; finally come works containing invectives against the irreducible obduracy of the Jews. For the pre-*Nicene period we should mention, above all, the *Epistle of Barnabas; *Aristo of Pella, Dialogue Between Jason and Papiscus About Christ; *Miltiades, Against the Jews; *Apollinaris of Hierapolis, Against the Jews; *Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho the Jew; *Hippolytus (?), Demonstration Against the Jews. To the golden centuries of *patristics belong *Eusebius of Caesarea, Proof of the Gospel (CPG II, 3487; Quasten 2, 344); *Eusebius of Emesa, Against the Jews (see Jerome, De vir. ill. 91, lost; Quasten 2, 352); *Diodore of Tarsus, Against the Jews (lost; Quasten 2, 403); *Epiphanius of Salamis, Panarion (CPG 3745; Quasten 2, 391; it lists Judaism and its various sects among the heresies); *John Chrysostom, Eight Homilies Against the Jews (CPG II, 4326 and 4327; Quasten 2, 471 and 455-456); *Severian of Gabala, Against the Jews on the Bronze Serpent (CPG II, 4207; Bardenhewer 3, 364); *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, Against the Jews (lost, Quasten 2, 550; the fragment of CPG 6212 is not his); *Nestorius, Homily Against the Jews (CPG II, 5695, fragments); *Basil of Seleucia, Against the Jews (CPG III, 6656, 38 is not genuine: Quasten 2, 531); ps.-Eusebius of Alexandria, On New Moons and Sabbaths and on Not Listening to the Voices of Birds (CPG III, 5516; Bardenhewer 4,88); ps.-Gregory of Nyssa, Testimonia adversus Iudaeos (CPG II, 3221; PG 46,193-233); ps.-John Chrysostom, Against the Jews, Gentiles and Heretics (CPG II, 4506; PG 48,1075-1080); and some homilies of *Aphraates (PS vol. I, Paris 1894).

It goes without saying that the works of the *Fathers are rife with anti-Jewish polemic. But we must not confuse, as is too often done, theological argument aimed at demonstrating the error of Judaism and the truth of Christianity with anti-Semitism proper and "training in contempt of the Jews" (Simon 488-495). Among the themes that nourished this controversy, the main one was *Christology, the essential element of Jewish-Christian dialogue. Rabbinic Judaism professed a strict *monotheism, while Christian theology, from the apostolic age, affirmed and professed the divine sonship of Jesus. The opposition of the two faiths on this point is decisive, and it would be useless to try to minimize it. The second theme debated between Jewish scholars and Christians was that of salvation, which for Jews lay in the necessity of the law and of the observances. From the apostolic age, Christians professed that the death and *resurrection of Jesus Christ had freed humanity from sin and inaugurated a new religious order; this claim was irreconcilable with orthodox Judaism's scrupulous veneration of the Torah. The disputes concerning the true Israel were no less hard-fought. While the first Christian generation saw God's new people born through the aggregation of the gentiles to the Jews, the *Apologists considered this increasingly as a substitution, which would eventually oust the one in favor of the other (Justin, Dial. 123,7). The writers of the great church expressed ever more strongly that its members were the true Israel, which received the inheritance of the old Judaism, now rejected because of the infidelity of its members and because of the death of the Just One.

III. Imperial legislation and Judaism. Detached from paganism, the empire joined the church closely with itself and put the power of the state at the service of *orthodoxy. The growing imperial favor toward *Catholicism had its counterpart in a progressive alteration of the status of Judaism. From official neutrality, the state passed rapidly to discriminatory measures: curbing of Jewish proselytism, protection of Jews converted to Christianity (CTh 16,8,1), interdiction of mixed marriages (between Christians and Jews), exclusion of Jews from some public offices, restrictions occasioned by patriarchal jurisdiction etc.

This phenomenon grew vigorously in the 5th c. Controls and restrictions by the civil power multiplied (Simon 155-162), thus encouraging abuse and violence against the persons of Jews and the goods of their communities (Simon 264-274).

L. Goppelt, Les origines de l'Église, Christianisme et Judaïsme aux deux premiers siècles, Fr. tr. Paris 1961; M. Simon, Verus Israël, Étude sur les relations entre Chrétiens et Juifs dans l'Empire romain (135-425), Paris [2]1964; Ch. Munier, L'Église dans l'Empire romain, Paris 1979, 145-168; H. Schreckenberg, Die christlichen Adversus-Judaeos-Texte und ihr literarisches und historisches Umfeld (1.-11. Jh.), Frankfurt a. M. [3]1995; P.C. Bori, Il vitello d'oro. La radice della controversia antigiudaica, Turin 1983; R.L. Wilken, John Chrysostom and the Jews: Rhetoric and Reality in the Late 4th Century, Berkeley - Los Angeles 1983; A. Linder, The Jews in Roman Imperial Legislation, Detroit 1987; Cristianesimo e Giudaismo, eredità e confronti: Augustinianum 28 (1988) 5-460; D. Flusser, Judaism and the Origins of Christianity, Jerusalem 1988 (It. tr. Il Giudaismo e le origini del Cristianesimo, Genoa 1995); A.M. Rabello, Giustiniano, ebrei e samaritani alla luce delle fonti storico-letterarie, ecclesiastiche e giuridiche, 2 vols., Milan 1987-1988; J. Dunn, Partings of the Ways Between Christianity and Judaism and Their Significance for the Character of Christianity, London - Philadelphia 1991; F. Blanchetière - M.D. Herr, Aux origines juives du christianisme, Jerusalem 1993; L.H. Feldman, Jew and Gentile in the Ancient World, Attitudes and Interactions from Alexander to Justinian, Princeton 1993; Anti-Semitism and Early Christianity: Issues of Polemic and Faith, C.A. Evans - D.A. Hagner (eds.), Minneapolis 1993; M. Goodman, Mission and Conversion: Proselytizing in the Religious History of the Roman Empire, Oxford 1994; S.G. Wilson, Related Strangers: Jews and Christians 70-170 C.E., Minneapolis 1995; L.V. Rutgers, The Jews in the Late Ancient Rome: Evidence of Cultural Interaction in the Roman Diaspora, Leiden 1995; M.S. Taylor, Anti-Judaism and Early Christian Identity: A Critique of the Scholarly Consensus, Leiden 1995; Early Christian Thought in Its Jewish Context, J. Barclay - J. Sweet (eds.), Cambridge 1997; L.V. Rutgers, The Hidden Heritage of Diaspora Judaism, Louvain 1998; P. Schäfer, Judeophobia: Attitudes Toward the Jews in the Ancient World, Cambridge, MA 1998 (It. tr. Giudeofobia: l'antisemitismo nel mondo antico, Rome 1999); Giudaismo e Antigiudaismo: Annali di storia dell'esegesi 16/2 (1999); R. González Salinero, El antijudaismo cristiano occidental (siglos IV y V), Madrid 2000; J. Neusner - B. Chilton, Jewish and Christian Doctrines, London - New York 2000; Verus Israel: nuove prospettive sul giudeocristianesimo, atti del colloquio di Turin (4-5 novembre 1999), eds. G. Filoramo - C. Gianotto, Brescia 2001; G. Scimè, Giudei e cristiani nei sermoni di san Pietro Crisologo, Rome 2003.

Ch. Munier

IV. The Byzantine period and Judaism. The Byzantine period counts numerous writings against the Jews. Two historical events in particular called the Greeks' attention to them. In the Persian wars, followed immediately by the Arab conquest, the Jews appeared as an ethnic group, which gave serious reasons to suspect their loyalty to the empire: hence the forced conversions of Jews to Christianity, against which especially *Gregory the Great reacted. Then followed the polemic against iconoclasm, which found cordial support among the Jews. We should mention ps.-Gregentius, Dispute with Herbanus the Jew (CPG III, 7009; Bardenhewer 5,25; Beck 386 and 407); ps.-Leontius of Byzantium, Book on the Heresies, Action II (CPG III, 6823: attributed to Leontius Scholasticus; Beck 375-376; Altaner 547); *Leontius of Neapolis, Five Discourses Against the Jews (CPG III, 7885, fragments; Bardenhewer 5, 139; Beck 456); *Anastasius the Sinaite, who wrote against the Jews, but the Dispute with the Jews is not his (CPG III, 7772; Bardenhewer 5, 43; Beck 443); *Jerome of Jerusalem, Dialogue on the Holy Trinity Between a Jew and a Christian (CPG III, 7815: fragments; Bardenhewer 5,47; Beck 447-448); *John of Damascus, Reply to the Jews (CPG III, 8092; Beck 479); *Theodore Abu Qurra, Dispute with a Jew (PG 97, 1529-1533 opusc. X; Bardenhewer 5,65; Beck 488); and Nicephorus II, patriarch of Constantinople, who wrote a book against the Jews, probably lost (R. Janm, DTC 11,454; Beck 490). To this period also belong some anonymous and pseudonymous works: the 137th Question of ps.-Athanasius to Duke Antiochus (CPG III, 7795: little more than a collection of testimonia), Dialogue of Athanasius and Zacchaeus (CPG II, 2301), Dialogue of Timothy and Aquila (CPG III, 7794: set in Alexandria at the time of patriarch Cyril), Doctrine of the Newly Baptized James (CPG III, 7793: set in *Carthage: the Jew James, forcibly baptized at the time of *Heraclius, embraces Christianity interiorly after long and exhaustive talks with other truly converted Jews; Beck 447), The Trophies of Damascus (CPG III, 7797; composed toward the end of the 7th c. in Arab-ruled Damascus; Beck 448), Dialogue of the Jews Papiscus and Philo with a Monk (CPG III, 7796; this dialogue was used by ps.-Anastasius the Sinaite, cited above; Bardenhewer 5,47).

For the following Byzantine centuries, the most representative anti-Jewish polemical works are from Arethas, bishop of *Caesarea (9th/10th c.; Beck 593; the dialexis is in Arethae scripta minora, ed. L.G. Westerink, Lipsiae 1968, I, 27 1-278); Nicetas Stetatus (11th c.; M.Th. Disdier, DTC 11,483; Beck 537; unpublished); Simeon the Euchaite (11th-12th c.; J. Gouillard, DTC 14, 2940; Beck 643; unpublished); Theophylact the Bulgar (11th-12th c.; R. Janin, DTC 15,537; Beck 651; unpublished); Nectarius of Casole (12th–13th c.; Beck 670; unpublished); Theophanes III of Nicaea (14th c.; M. Jugie, DTC 15,514-515; Beck 746; largely unpublished).

There are many more unpublished texts (also for the patristic era, e.g., CPG III, 7799-7802 and CPG Supplementum, 7793-7804), so that it is not possible to give a summary of all this literature. Yet the themes dealt with are always the same: to demonstrate to the Jews, through citations from the OT, that Jesus is the Messiah predicted by Scripture and the true Son of God, but without this affirmation's destroying Jewish monotheism; that the whole economy of Christ (including his second *parousia) conforms to the prophecies; that consequently Jewish worship has come to an end, and the church is the true people of God and heir of the messianic promises. Naturally not all the works cited cover all these points: the homilies in particular develop only a few of the themes. The most complete treatments are found in the dialogues, which were the literary form most cultivated but whose characters are generally of little importance. The dialogue quite often concludes with the conversion of the Jew, who asks for baptism and further insight into Christian truth. The scriptural texts cited are many, and some of them recur frequently: the connections between them sometimes lead us to postulate collections of testimonia or dependence of one work on another. Moreover the innumerable biblical passages, always cited at length, have considerable importance of their own for the history of the text of the LXX or of the NT; the interpretation made of them makes its contribution to the history of *exegesis.

Patrologia V, 339-340; H. Schreckenberg, Die christlichen Adversus Judaeos: Texte und ihr literarisches und historisches Umfeld (1-11 Jh.), Europäische Hochschulschriften, Reihe 23, Teologie, Bd. 172, Frankfurt a. M. [3]1995.

A. De Nicola

CHRISTOLOGY. Jesus' messiahship was immediately understood by the newborn church as going beyond the dimension of the Messiah foretold by Jewish tradition ([the Lord's] anointed, Χριστός, Christ) in the sense that, though in his real humanity he could suffer and die, he was also revealed in that transcendence by which he was considered a partaker in the same reality—as the Son of God, himself God (Paul, John, Hebrews)—by which the world was not only redeemed but also created. From this conviction two questions arose: if Christ is God, how is his divinity reconciled with that of God the Father, given the traditional *monotheism inherited from *Judaism? And how are the divine and human dimensions reconciled in his person? These questions were ignored only by certain groups of radical Jewish Christians who, in the light of traditional messianism, considered Christ a mere man endowed with particular divine charisms, the true prophet (ps.-Clementine). Called *Ebionites, they were already considered *heretics in the 2nd c.

Other circles, strongly influenced by Jewish Christianity, tried to express Christ's transcendence by depicting him (and the *Holy Spirit) in angelic form, sometimes with the traditional traits of the archangels *Michael and Gabriel. We should note, however, that "in fact the word angel has an essentially concrete value and designates a supernatural being who manifests himself. But the nature of this supernatural being is not determined by the word itself, but by the context. The term [angel] represents the Semitic form of the designation of Christ and the Holy Spirit as spiritual substances, 'persons'" (J. Daniélou, La teologia del giudeo-cristianesimo, 217). In these contexts, in which as a rule Christ tended not to be defined as Son of God in the strict sense, he was, in fact, though closely associated with the Father's transcendence, made into a divine being of lower rank. In circles in which Jewish influence mingled with that of *Hellenism, Christ's transcendence could be presented through the concept of spirit (pneuma), understood not just in the (*Stoic) sense of a divine substrate or substance in which Father, Son and Holy Spirit participated but also as a personal name of Christ qua deus, identified at times with the Holy Spirit (*Hermas). Finally, in other texts, Christ is considered the real Son of God tout court and the name Logos is sporadically attributed to him (ps.-Barnabas, *Ignatius). In the late 1st c. and first decades of the 2nd c. all these themes appear, sketched rather than systematically developed, and at times mingled somewhat incoherently (Hermas).

*Gnostic reflection advanced research on this point: behind the mythological trappings and the tendency to multiply divine beings (aeons) in relation to their functions (so that *Valentinians divided Christ's functions between five *aeons: Nous, Logos, Man, Christ, Savior), we can see in the most Christianized forms of gnosis (Valentinians, *Basilideans) the concept of Logos, preexistent Christ, emanated by the Father and hence inferior to him, crafter of all later development and of the history of the divine and human worlds.

The dualistic mentality of the gnostics denied any possibility of salvation of the material world and hence to the human body. Consequently, on the basis of the conviction that Christ assumed only what he redeemed, the gnostics denied that he assumed a real body in the *incarnation: some considered his body a mere appearance; others allowed it more substance (the Valentinian "economic Christ") but ruled out any real materiality (*docetism).

The definition of Christ qua deus as Logos of God, put to such good use by the gnostics, was picked up by the various Catholic theologians active between 160 and the end of the 2nd c. And if *Irenaeus, writing against the gnostics, voluntarily abstained from "reckless" speculations on the deity, *Justin, *Tatian, *Theophilus and *Athenagoras felt no such restraint and, while avoiding the mythologizing excesses of the gnostics, like them felt the influence of the *Middle Platonism of the time, which put a minor deity (sometimes several) as intermediary between the supreme and transcendent God and the world. They conceived the divine Logos (which is also the Wisdom and image of God: Pr 8:22-25; 1 Cor 1:24; Col 1:15—though, like the gnostics, Irenaeus and at times Theophilus identified Wisdom with the Holy Spirit) as ab aeterno impersonally immanent in God and generated by him ante tempus to provide for the creation and government of the world. As proceeding from the Father, he is the Son of God and himself

God, even though inferior to the Father, and is personally distinct from him (though the term persona was not yet used in a technical sense) but not separate from him. He sums up in himself the whole relationship between God and the world: he created it, rules it providentially, redeems it and will finally judge it. His redeeming action is not confined to the *incarnation but unfolds gradually and progressively through the economy of the OT, from the very moment of Adam's sin (Irenaeus). In this sense Justin, Irenaeus and the others mentioned above consider the Logos to be the subject of the OT *theophanies, God's appearances to the patriarchs and to *Moses in human, angelic or other form, and this conception remained dominant until after the mid-4th c. The theophanies of the Logos culminate in the incarnation, which the Logos-theologians conceive in a completely real way, in polemic against gnostic *docetism. They share with the gnostics the concept that Christ, becoming incarnate, assumed all that he saved; and since he saved man's body as well as his spirit and soul, he must have assumed a real body as well as a human spirit and soul (Irenaeus, *Tertullian, *Origen). These theologians present the redemptive function of the incarnation under various aspects, not mutually exclusive but often complementing each other: Christ taught; he offered himself as a model for imitation; by the accessibility of his assumed human form he accustomed men by degrees to make contact with his divinity; he became man so that man could become God (Irenaeus). As Adam united—that is, *recapitulated in himself all of humanity in sin—so Christ *recapitulated, united all in himself in *redemption ("physical" theory of redemption). The specific act of redemption was Christ's death, a *sacrifice *expiating the sins of all people, often seen as a *ransom paid to the devil, who held humanity in slavery because of sin. Even among Catholics (Origen) we find sporadic echoes of the gnostic presentation of Christ's death as a trick played on the devil: the Logos concealed his divinity in human appearance so that the devil, not knowing his true nature, should put him to death and, through death, be deprived of the dominion he exercised over humanity.

The Logos-Christology continued to develop in the late 2nd and the 1st half of the 3rd c. (*Hippolytus, Tertullian, *Clement of Alexandria, Origen), in polemic against the *monarchians. The latter accused their opponents of introducing a genuine ditheism derived from Greek philosophy and sought to safeguard the monotheistic conception of God, considering Christ either as a mere man, albeit endowed with exceptional divine gifts, assumed as Son of God after the resurrection (*adoptionists) or as a mode of manifestation and operation of the Father who, in the aspect of a Son, became incarnate and suffered on the cross (*patripassians, *Sabellians). In dispute with these opponents, Hippolytus, Tertullian and, later (mid-3rd c.), *Novatian explored the terms of the Logos-Christology, making clear that the distinction between Father and Son did not compromise the divine unity, conceived by Tertullian as a single divine substance in which Father, Son and also Holy Spirit participated. The distinction within the unity was brought out by the use of the term prosōpon (Hippolytus), persona in Latin (Tertullian, Novatian), attributed to the Father and the Son and, by Tertullian, to the Holy Spirit. This christological approach was developed further by Origen. Against the monarchians, he further stressed the distinction between the Logos and the Father, which he brought out by using the term hypostasis (= "individual subsistent reality"); he avoided portraying the unity as deriving from a divine substance in which the divine hypostases participated, because he saw the danger of conceiving the divine generation as a division of the divine substrate into two parts, and preferred to speak of a dynamic unity of Father and Son, a unity of willing and acting; he presented the Father's generation of the Logos as an eternal and continuous generation, by which, from eternity, the Son incessantly receives divine life from the Father. In presenting the Logos-Christ's teaching activity, Origen took up and developed the traditional themes of Jesus' death as expiation and ransom while stressing in a completely new way the presence of the Logos in the heart of every person, particularly every Christian; in this sense he saw the Logos as continually adapting to each person's ever-changing spiritual conditions, so as to be always able to act on him in the most effective way, persuading and never coercing his freedom, using his assumed humanity to prepare human beings to approach his divinity. To bring out this changeable relationship and, more generally, the different ways in which Christ operates in the world, Origen made able use of the many scriptural names traditionally attributed to him: Logos, Wisdom, Image, Justice, Life, Light, Shepherd, Way, Door etc.

The Logos-theologians, while vigorously affirming, against the gnostics, the integrity of the human nature assumed by Christ, were less concerned with examining the manner in which divinity and humanity were united in him: Tertullian spoke of two substances united but not confused in Christ's person, such that each substance keeps its own properties and Christ acts both as man and as God (Adv.

Prax. 27,11-12). Origen, who platonically considered human *souls, including Christ's, as preexistent to their respective bodies, to which they were united at the moment of their creation, conceived such a close union, in Christ, of divine Logos and assumed humanity (first soul, then body) that he formulated the principle of communicatio idiomatum: by virtue of the union, the characteristics of the divinity can be predicated of the man, and the characteristics of the humanity can be predicated of God: "In fact we say that the Son of God died by virtue of that nature which could taste death" (Princ. II,6,3).

The conflict between monarchians and Logos-theologians continued in the East in the 2nd half of the 3rd and early 4th c.; the latter predominated, but polemical requirements sometimes led them to stress the inferiority of the Logos to the Father (*Dionysius of Alexandria), even more than Justin, Tertullian and Origen had done. On the occasion of an important episode in this conflict, the deposition of the adoptionist *Paul of Samosata from the see of *Antioch (268), we catch our earliest glimpse, among Paul's mainly Origenian opponents, of the christological conception known as Logos/sarx ("flesh"), according to which the Logos was incarnate in a human body without a soul, the functions of the soul being assumed by the Logos itself. The origin of this christological conception is obscured by lack of evidence: given the rapid reaction of *Alexandrian circles against the Origenian doctrine of the preexistence of souls (and so also of Christ's) before bodies, it is possible that this was carried so far as to deny even the presence of a soul in Christ. In any case, there is no doubt that the roots of this doctrine lay in the undervaluing of the importance of Christ's humanity compared to his divinity, which was a constant of Alexandrian (= Origenian) Christology. In fact the Logos/sarx Christology spread in the areas dominated by Alexandrian influence (*Egypt, *Palestine, part of Asia Minor), while in *Syria and elsewhere it came into conflict with the Christology of Asiatic origin which attributed great significance to Christ's human component (Irenaeus); in the West it remained unknown.

In polemic against monarchianism and against certain materialistic conclusions of Asiatic Christology, *Arius (ca. 320) stressed the *subordinationist tradition of the Logos-theology to the point of making the Logos a God distinctly inferior to the Father, extraneous to his nature and created by him for the sake of the subsequent creation of the world. To uphold this doctrine, Arius also relied on the results of the Logos/sarx Christology; indeed, the absence of a human soul in Christ allowed him to attribute tout court to the Logos the human passions that the gospels attest in Christ—anguish, fear etc.—and therefore to consider his divine nature as being of lower rank than that of the Father, the one supreme God. Among his opponents, only *Eustathius of Antioch, heir to the Asiatic Christology, criticized his Logos/sarx model, affirming the presence of a human soul in Christ: in fact those anti-Arians who were formed at Alexandria (*Alexander, *Athanasius) shared Arius's christological approach, even if only implicitly. *Athanasius never formally denied the presence of a human soul in Christ, but he could not assign any function to it, and he attributed all of Christ's human characteristics to the body, to sarx, alone. The Arian controversy gradually moved away from its initial christological dimension to a more broadly *trinitarian one, so that its outcome (one divine substance articulated in three hypostases of equal eminence and dignity) does not directly concern us here. We need only say that, to contest Arian statements about the passibility of the Logos's divine nature, their opponents tended to distinguish clearly, in Christ's actions, between what belonged to the weakness of his humanity and what was derived from the power of the Logos. Especially in the area influenced by Antioch, where the integrity of the man assumed by the Logos was traditionally affirmed, the distinction, anti-Arian in function, between Christ's divine and human components was particularly stressed (*Diodore of Tarsus), with the risk of distinguishing in him two subjects, the man and the Logos, and therefore two Christs.

This danger was noticed especially by *Apollinaris of Laodicea (last decades of the 4th c.), who realized its implications for *soteriology: by distinguishing too clearly between the man Jesus and the Logos, we exclude the latter from the death on the cross, i.e., from the supreme redemptive act, whereas Athanasius had maintained against the Arians that only God could redeem humanity from Adam's sin. To obviate the risks inherent in this divisive Christology, Apollinaris went back to and developed the Logos/sarx type of Christology: the Logos, by assuming a humanity without soul (or, more precisely, without nous, the soul's rational faculty) and using it as an inert instrument (organon), achieved a single nature in the union, i.e., a single principle of willing and acting: the nature of the incarnate God-Logos is one. In this way the divine Logos was intimately united to the human body in its passion and death, though per se incapable of suffering and death. Apollinaris preached Christ's unity to the detriment of his assumed humanity, and the criticisms of his opponents (*Epiphanius, *Diodore, *Gregory of Na-zianzus, *Gregory of Nyssa) focused on this point. They objected, on the basis of the axiom "Christ assumed all that he redeemed," that to redeem the complete person, body and soul, from sin, Christ must have assumed a humanity complete in soul and body; and to the one nature which Apollinaris derived from the union, they opposed the distinction of two natures, united but not confused. In the Antiochene area of influence, toward the end of the 4th c., *Theodore of Mopsuestia in particular sought to investigate the question, clearly distinguishing Christ's two natures against Apollinaris but seeking to formulate their unity more precisely than had been previously done in his milieu. He spoke of two whole and complete natures that were united without being confused in a single prosōpon, or person. (To evaluate this formula, we must bear in mind that the Greek prosōpon had never lost its original meaning of "form, external appearance.") In fact Theodore, despite this unitive formula, continued to distinguish too clearly between the divine and human operations in Christ, in effect predicating in him two subjects, corresponding to the two natures.

Apollinaris's doctrine was condemned at *Constantinople in 381, and the condemnation forced the Alexandrian theologians to renounce the Logos/sarx christological model. But from *Cyril of Alexandria's works predating the *Nestorian crisis (428), we can see that this detachment was more apparent than real: Cyril speaks of Christ's whole humanity but continues, in the post-Origenian Alexandrian tradition, to subordinate it to the Logos so that it is still just the passive instrument through which the latter operates in the world. The Apollinarist crisis aroused only marginal interest in the West, where the christological formula that predicated two complete natures of Christ united but not confused in a single person, used earlier by Tertullian, was imposed without too much difficulty (see the episode of *Leporius and *Augustine).

When the Antiochene priest Nestorius was elected bishop of Constantinople (428), the Antiochene and Alexandrian Christologies had for some decades been confronting each other from very distant positions: the one gave significance and autonomy to Christ's human nature to the point of de facto predicating two subjects in him, compromising his unity; the other ensured his unity by making the Logos the sole subject, with the result of reducing the humanity to a passive instrument of the Logos. Nestorius continued Theodore's formula predicating a single prosōpon in Christ, but in fact he held the two natures so distinct as to not admit the communicatio idiomatum affirmed by Origen: hence his aversion to the title Mother of God (Theotokos*), traditionally given to Mary, and preference for the title Mother of Christ (Christotokos). Cyril considered the union of natures in Christ according to prosōpon too weak and extrinsic, and substituted for it a union according to hypostasis, a much stronger term to indicate the unity of the subject; he spoke of a unity of nature in Christ and adopted the formula "one single nature of the incarnate Logos," claiming that we can speak of two natures in Christ only before the union, i.e., only in theory, because the union produced a single nature, corresponding to a single hypostasis, i.e., a single subject and center of will and activity. In this single nature resulting from the union, Cyril kept the properties of the divinity and of the humanity very distinct, but this was not enough to make his formulations acceptable to the Antiochenes, who considered them Apollinarist in tone. In fact the pact of union of 433, which reconciled Cyril with the Antiochenes after the condemnation of Nestorius at Ephesus in 431, was just a compromise, to which Cyril submitted only for political reasons, sacrificing the most characteristic points of his doctrine: the formula affirmed the union in Christ of two natures, without confusion, in a single prosōpon, and defined Mary as Mother of God.

*Eutyches's resumption (448) of *monophysite formulations (a single nature of Christ resulting from the union) reopened hostilities, which this time saw the active intervention of the West, in the person of *Leo the Great, to support the Antiochene dyophysites: the pope's Tomus ad Flavianum was the basis of the formula of *Chalcedon (451), which affirmed two natures in Christ, united but not confused, whole and complete, so that Christ is homoousios with the Father according to his divinity and homoousios with human beings according to his humanity. The union of the two natures is in a single prosōpon and a single hypostasis. The formula met the demands of the Antiochenes to safeguard the integrity of the two natures in the union and of Cyril to bring out the unity of subject resulting from the union by the use of hypostasis and not just prosōpon. As such it was accepted in the West and by the Antiochenes, but rejected by the monophysites, who considered the affirmation of two natures in Christ after the union to be Nestorian.

The progress of the conflict saw the monophysite doctrine articulated in variant forms, many of which effectively sacrificed the integrity of Christ's human nature in the union. The most important (*Severus of Antioch) recovered the radical aspects of Cyril's doctrine, affirming that in Christ a single nature resulted from the union and that only in theory could one speak of two natures before the union; but in this one nature the characteristic properties of divinity and humanity continued to subsist without confusion, so that Christ is *homoousios both with the Father and with human beings. This doctrine, essentially orthodox while refusing to admit two natures resulting from the union (verbal monophysitism), brought out better than the Chalcedonian formula the presence of a single subject in Christ and therefore the participation of the Logos in his passion and death, without actually suffering and dying in the divine essence. In any case, the distance between the two formulations was not great, and if the dispute was not made up it was because it was by now too complicated by political, cultural and national factors.

In the first decades of the 6th c., under *Justinian and partly through his initiative, the Catholics worked out a variant of the Chalcedonian doctrine (*Neochalcedonianism) which sought to meet monophysitism halfway, not just for political reasons but also out of awareness of a need to bring out Christ's unity still more than the balanced symmetry of the Chalcedonian formula had done. So into that formula was inserted the expression unus de Trinitate passus est, circulated by the Scythian monks at the beginning of the 6th c. Though interpreted in a Chalcedonian sense (the Son suffered in the flesh), this formally drew attention to the participation of the Logos in Christ's passion; and above all the Chalcedonian formula was interpreted in the light of the most characteristic aspects of Cyril's doctrine, thus also admitting the formula "a single nature of the incarnate Logos," obviously with due clarifications to make it compatible with the affirmation of the two natures, which neither could nor would be renounced (*John Maxentius, *John of Caesarea, *Justinian, *Leontius of Jerusalem).

The claims of Neochalcedonian Christology were accepted at the Council of Constantinople of 553 and so imposed on all Catholic Christendom, even in the West, where Chalcedonian doctrine in the strict sense clearly received greater consent; but they were insufficient to disarm monophysite hostility. The last attempt to meet the monophysites halfway was the doctrine of *monoenergism and monothelitism (1st decades of the 7th c.): since the monophysites affirmed in Christ one hypostasis, one nature, and one will and operation, this doctrine, while affirming two natures in Christ, made his willing and acting originate not from the two natures but from the hypostasis, i.e., the subject, which is single, so that a single will and a single operation, divine and human, originate from it. This doctrine was opposed not just by the monophysites but also by many Catholics, who saw it as too great a concession to monophysitism. Meanwhile the political motivations that had decisively influenced the various Catholic attempts to reach an understanding with the monophysites decreased when *Egypt and *Syria, the strongholds of the *heretics, passed under Arab rule. The condemnation of monoenergism and monothelitism at the Council of Constantinople of 680–681 put an end to the christological controversies, confirming the decisions of 451 and 553, expressions of a Christology which had sought to harmonize the conflicting demands of safeguarding both the integrity of Christ's divine and human components and his unity of subject, demands considered nonnegotiable for a right understanding of the Christian message of salvation.

J. Barbel, Christos Angelos, Bonn 1941; CGG I-III; J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, London 1958 (It. tr. Bologna 1972); A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition, I: From the Apostolic Age to Chalcedon, London - Oxford 1975; Id., Mit ihm und in ihm. Christologische Forschungen und Perspektiven, Freiburg 1975; P. Smulders, Dogmengeschichtliche und lehramtliche Entfaltung der Christologie, in Mysterium salutis III/1, Einsiedeln 1970 (It. tr. vol. 5, Brescia 1971, 493-597); J. Liébaert, L'Incarnation. Dès origines au concilie de Chalcédoine, Paris 1966; J. Daniélou, La teologia del giudeo-cristianesimo, Bologna 1964; M. Simonetti, Note di cristologia pneumatica: Augustinianum 12 (1972) 201-232; L. Scipioni, Nestorio e il Concilio di Efeso, Milan 1974; A. Orbe, Cristología gnóstica, I-II, Madrid 1976; E. Bellini, Su Cristo. Il grande dibattito nel quarto secolo, Milan 1977 (collection of texts); TRE 16, 726-772; 17, 1-42; J. Gnilka - A. Schilson, Christologie: LTK 2, 1164-1174; Christology: ODC 336-338; R.A. Norris, The Christological Controversy, Philadelphia 1980; J. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche. 2/1: Das Konzil von Chalkedon (451). Rezeption und Widerspruch (451-518), Freiburg-Basel-Vienna 1986 (It. tr. vols. 1-2/1, Brescia 1982-1996); G. Strecker, Das Judenchristentum in den Pseudoklementinen, Berlin ²1981; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318-381, Edinburgh 1988; A.J. Hultgren, New Testament Christology: A Critical Assessment and Annotated Bibliography, New York 1988; A. Gilg, Weg und Bedeutung der altchristlichen Christologie, Munich 1989; J. Grillmeier - T. Hainthaler, Jesus der Christus, cit., II/2: Die Kirche von Konstantinopel im 6. Jahrhundert, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna 1989; J. Grillmeier - T. Hainthaler, Jesus der Christus, cit., II/4: Die Kirche von Alexandrien mit Nubien und Äthiopien nach 451, Freiburg - Basel - Vienna 1990; A. De Halleux, Nestorius. Histoire et doctrine: Irénikon 66 (1993) 163-177; M. Simonetti, Studi sulla cristologia del II e III secolo, Rome 1993; M.O. Boulnois, Le paradoxe trinitaire chez Cyrille d'Alexandrie. Herméneutique, analyses philosophiques et argumentation théologique, Paris 1994; J.A. McGuckin, St. Cyril of Alexandria: The Christological Controversy: Its History, Theology and Texts, Leiden 1994; A. Orbe - M. Simonetti (eds.), Il Cristo. I, Testi teologici e spirituali dal I al IV secolo, Milan ³1995; M. Simonetti (ed.), Il Cristo. II, Testi teologici e spirituali in lingua greca dal IV al VII secolo, Milan 1990; R. Sturch, The Word and the Christ: An Essay in Analytic Christology, Oxford 1991;

A. Orbe, La teologia dei secoli II e III. Il confronto della grande chiesa con lo gnosticismo, It. tr., Rome 1995; C. Vidal Manzanares, El judeo-Cristianismo palestino en el siglo I, Madrid 1995; G. Uríbarri Bilbao, Monarquía y Trinidad. El concepto teológico "Monarchia" en la controversia "monarquiana," Madrid 1996; B. Meunier, Le Christ de Cyrille d'Alexandrie. L'humanité, le salut et la question monophysite, Paris 1997; M. Simonetti, Teologia e cristologia dell'Egitto cristiano, in A. Camplani (ed.), L'Egitto cristiano. Aspetti e problemi in età tardo antica, Rome 1997, 11-38; S.C. Mimouni, Le Judéo-christianisme ancien. Essais historiques, Paris 1998; M. Simonetti (ed.), Hippolytus, Contro Noeto, Introduzione, Bologna 2000.

M. Simonetti

CHRISTOPHER, martyr. Christopher's existence may be admitted because of the antiquity of his cult, attested by Mart. hier., and on the basis of the inscription of the deposition of his *relics in the church dedicated to him in Bithynia (at *Chalcedon) in 452 (AASS Nov. 2, 2, 396). His feast is 9 May in Synax. Eccl. CP, 24 July in the *Naples calendar, 25 July in Mart. hier. (in Licia civitate Samon natale sancti Christofori), which is the basis of his other attestations in the West. According to the Mart. hier., the cult originated in *Lycia. The Passiones from the 8th c. and later are a collection of unlikely events. Reprobus, a supposed giant cynocephalus, was baptized at Samos and from then on was called Christopher (regarding human giants in antiquity, see Phlegon, De mirabilibus, 11-19). After many tortures Christopher died a martyr whose life would not be forgotten. In the 13th c. the etiological legend of the "Christ-bearer" developed in German lands. Some have mistakenly wanted to see in Christopher the christianization of the *pagan cult of Anubis, or even of Heracles, who carried Eros.

BHG 308-311; BHL 1764-1780; BHO 190-192; Díaz 431; BS 4, 349-364; BBKL 1, 1012-1014; LCI 5, 496-508; Handwörterbuch des deutschen Aberglaubens 2, 65-75; W. De Grüneisen, Sainte Marie Antique, Rome 1911, 516-517.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

CHRISTUS PATIENS. This drama in freely constructed iambic trimeters, modeled on Euripides and considered "the Christian tragedy par excellence" (Tuilier), is a *cento. Long thought almost unanimously to be a late *Byzantine (12th-c.) work, it is now attributed with good reason to *Gregory of Nazianzus. In the manner of ancient theater, the action unfolds in a dramatic trilogy: Christ's passion and death, burial, *resurrection. Analysis of the work brings out the author's *orthodoxy, clearly anti-*Apollinarist, and his ability to express distinct speculative-theological positions in dramatic language. Besides Christ, the most prominent protagonist is *Mary, his mother, heroically participating in the Son's saving *sacrifice. An elaboration, in an apologetic tone, of a literary genre and texts of *pagan antiquity, the Christus Patiens is "the adaptation and the work of a thinker, a theologian and an artist" (Tuilier).

PG 38, 133-338; Grégoire de Nazianze, La Passion du Christ. Tragédie, SC 149, Paris 1969; Gregorio Nazianzeno, La Passione di Cristo, F. Trisoglio, Rome 1979; V. Cottas, Le drame de Grégoire de Nazianze Christos Paschon, in Le Théatre à Byzance, Paris 1931, 197-249; F. Trisoglio, La Vergine Maria come protagonista del Christus patiens: Marianum 41 (1979); Id., Forme e sviluppi del monologo nella tragedia classica e nel Christus patiens: Civiltà Classica and Cristiana 1 (1980) 7-48; I. Giudice Rizzo, Sul Christus Patiens e le Baccanti di Euripide: SG (Siculorum gymnasium) 30 (1977) 1-63; F. Trisoglio, L'uomo di fronte a Dio nella tragedia greca e nel "Christus Patiens," Genoa 1983; G.J. Swart, A Historical-Critical Evaluation of the Play Christus patiens, Traditionally Attributed to Gregory of Nazianzus, Univ. of Pretoria 1990; F. Trisoglio, San Gregorio di Nazianzo e il Christus Patiens: il problema dell'autenticità gregoriana del dramma, Florence 1996; Kentron 13/1-2 (1997) with some of the papers given at the international colloquium on the "Christus patiens," Caen, June 1989; K. Pollmann, Jesus Christus und Dionysos: Überlegungen zu dem Euripides-Cento Christus Patiens: JÖByz 47 (1997) 87-106; F. Trisoglio, Ricchezza di "humanitas" nel "Christus patiens": Orpheus 18/1 (1997) 80-111; Id., La Theotokos quale "signora" nel Christus patiens: Sileno 23 (1-2) (1997) 225-241; A. Tuilier, Grègoire de Nazianze et le Christus Patiens: à propos d'un ouvrage récent: REG 110/2 (1997) 632-647.

M. Naldini

CHRODOBERT, duke (d. 674). Bishop of *Tours from 653 (or 664) to 674. We know little of him: he may have been referendary to Dagobert I in 630 and a high court official. Audonius of Rouen sent him a draft of the Vita Eligii of Noyon for him to correct, with a letter showing that the three were friends. Chrodobert also wrote a letter to the *abbess Boba dealing with the case of an adulterous nun, invoking ecclesiastical legislation (probably the Council of Orléans of 541) and the auctoritas of Scripture. The letter is important evidence not only of the customs of the time but also of the "prehistory," before the 8th c., of the cult of Mary Magdalene in France.

CPL 1307; PL 54, 1424-1426; MGH, Leges, sect. V, Formulae, 494-496; CCL 117, 496-502. R. Sprandel, Der merowingische Adel und die Gebiete östlich des Rheins, Freiburg 1957, 16; F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich, Munich - Vienna 1965; V. Saxer, Les origines du culte de sainte Marie Madeleine en Occident, in Marie Madeleine dans la mystique, les arts et les lettres. Actes du Colloque international, Avignon 20-21-22 juillet 1988, Paris 1989, 33-47 (esp. 39-40); S. Sato, Chrodebert concéda-t-il le premier privilège épiscopal pour Saint-Martin de Tours? Une problématique méconnue, in Haut Moyen Âge. Culture, éducation et société. Études offertes à Pierre Riché, Paris 1990, 171-182; Patrologia IV, 350.

V. Milazzo

CHROMATIUS of Aquileia (335/340–407). From ca. 370 a member of the clergy of *Aquileia, one of the most important junctions of transit between East and West. As a close collaborator of Bishop *Valerian he took part in a local synod in 381, directed by *Ambrose, which condemned so-called Western *Arianism (Illyricum). Bishop of Aquileia from 387, he was very active pastorally and worked for the peace of the church, e.g., in the controversy between his old friend *Rufinus and *Jerome, and in the matter of *John Chrysostom. Before his death in 407 he experienced the terrors of the Gothic invasion. The written deposit of his preaching, which came to light only in 1975, includes more than 40 sermons and 61 homilies on the gospel of Matthew. In exegetical texts Chromatius demonstrates a profound knowledge of the Bible and of the African tradition. The homilies on Matthew were not composed for liturgical use but for spiritual formation in *ascetical circles. They seem to be influenced by ps.-Jerome, Expositio quattuor evangeliorum. Since the discovery of Chromatius's considerable literary heritage, there have been many studies of him, of his exegetical method and of his references to the *liturgy of Aquileia.

CPL 217-219; A. Hosté, CCL 9 (1957), 371-447; R. Étaix - J. Lemarié, CCL 9A (1974); 9A suppl. (1977) (cf. J. Doignon, RSPh 63 [1979] 241-250); SC 154 and 164; G. Banterle, Op. Ambr. Milan 1990; J. Lemarié, Italie. Aquilée: DSp 7, 2162-2165; D. Corgnali, Il mistero pasquale in Cromazio di Aquileia, Udine 1979; G. Cuscito, Cromazio di Aquileia e l'età sua, Padua 1980; Chromatius Episcopus 388-1988, Trieste 1989; C. Jäggi, Aspekte der städtebaulichen Entwicklung Aquileias in frühchrist. Zeit: JbAC 33 (1990) 158-196; LTK[3] 2, 1184; M.A. Mascari. Zeno, Gaudentius and Chromatius: The Dynamics of Preaching in Northern Italy, Washington, DC 1996; R. Rapisarda, Continuità tra Antico e Nuovo Testamento: Augustinianum 40 (2000) 291-302; LACL (2002) 147; D.J. Font i Palma, La relación "Pascua-primavera" en Zenón de Verona, Gaudencio de Brescia y Cromacio de Aquileia, Rome 2003.

B. Studer

CHRONICLE of Edessa. Anonymous work of obvious Edessan origin covering from 132/131 BC, when *Edessa became capital of the new kingdom of *Osroene, until AD 540. Shortly after the latter year, the chronicle was continued by a *Chalcedonian author of *dyophysite tendencies. For the earliest period it is generally limited to brief information, whereas from 303 (the destruction of the walls of Edessa) it becomes more detailed. The chronicler seems to base himself primarily on the sources, both ecclesiastical and secular, of the archives of Edessa; he often allows us to date events with great precision, which confers a great historical value on the small work. He also used some literary works, e.g., the chronicle attributed to *Joshua the Stylite.

Baumstark 99-100; BO I, 388-417; Duval 178-179; Patrologia V, 422; L. Hallier, Untersuchungen über die Chronik von Edessa, Leipzig 1892 (text with German tr.); Guidi, Chronica minora I (CSCO 1), Paris 1903 (facs. ed., Louvain 1955), 1-13; W. Witakowski, Chronicles Edessa: Orientalia Suecana 33/35 (1984/1986) 487-498.

K. den Biesen

CHRONICON PASCHALE. Name commonly given to a document titled in the sole MS (Vatican. gr. 1941, X c.) "Epitome of the years from Adam . . . to the 20th year of the reign of *Heraclius . . . and of Heraclius, the new *Constantine, his son in the 18th year of that reign, third indiction" (= 630). The prologue (1st half of the 7th c.) deals with the theological basis for determining the date of *Easter in conformity with the *Alexandrian tradition and with the decisions of the Council of *Nicaea and, reviewing the different festive cycles, announces a mathematical method for making theological truth coincide with historical accuracy, as a demonstration of the harmony between faith and history. Then follow the chronological tables, furnished with historical notes, from the creation of the world to the year 628 (the work, rewritten in more than one place, is thus mutilated). The computations are by Olympiads, consular fasti and indictions. The anonymous author must be considered the coiner of the so-called proto-*Byzantine era.

L. Dindorf, Bonn 1832; PWK III, 2460-2477; DACL 3, 1553-1555; V. Grumel, La chronologie (Traité d'études byzantines 1), Paris 1958, 26-232 (p. 78, reproduction of Trochos IV); J. Beaucamp - R. Bondoux - J. Lefort - M.-Fr. Rouan - I. Sorlin, Temps et Histoire. I. Le prologue de la Chronique pascale: Travaux et mémoires 7 (1979) 223-301 (Fr. tr. of the prologue 228-258; in appendix, ed. of trochoi I and II, judged heterogeneous, and the letter of Theophilus of Alexandria to Theodosius I added to the original work); M. Whitby - M. Whitby, Chronicon Paschale 284-628 AD (TTH 7), Liverpool 1989; Patrologia V, 63, 105, 107-108, 346, 409; RGG[4] 2,344.

D. Stiernon

CHRONOGRAPHUS ANONYMUS. In the late 19th c., the noted Egyptologist W. Golenischev acquired an illustrated papyrus from a Gazan antiquarian; the papyrus, probably copied in a *monastery of Upper *Egypt during the first half of the 5th c., contains a Chronographus anonymous. This work shows strong similarities to the Greek model of the Barbarus Scaligeri*.

Unfortunately we have only a brief fragment, contained on a single sheet of illustrated papyrus (P. Berol. 13296), of the original Greek of the Barbarus Scaligeri; nonetheless, based on the text and the illustrations present in both papyri, a surprising similarity between the two works has been noted. The depictions of saints and of the walls of *Constantinople in the Greek fragment of the Barbarus are similar to the descriptions of the months; of the places and figures of the OT; of emperors, kings and patriarchs; and of John the Baptist and Christ in the Golenischev papyrus. Also, the exemplum of the Barbarus was about sixty pages in length, like the text of the Golenischev papyrus. On the basis of this affinity, it can be hypothesized that the direct source of the Chronographus anonymous was a lost Alexandrian chronicle, to which the original text of the Barbarus also referred.

Editions: CPG 5540; A. Bauer - J. Strzygowsky, Eine alexandrinische Weltchronik, Text und Miniaturen eines griechischen Papyrus der Sammlung W. Golenischev, Denkschriften der kaiserlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Phil.-histor. Klasse 51, Bd. 2, Vienna 1905.

Studies: H. Gelzer, Sextus Julius Africanus und die byzantinische Chronographie; 2. Die Nachfolger des Julius Africanus, Leipzig 1885, repr. New York 1967, 316-329; Bauer - Strzygowsky, op. cit.; F. Jacoby: PWK 6,6 (1909) 1566-1576; L. Bréhier: DHGE 6 (1932) 593; R. Klein: LMA 4 (1989) 156; E. Jeffreys - B. Croke - R. Scott, Studies in John Malalas: Byzantina Australiensia 6, Sydney 1990, passim; ODB 1, 253.

P. Allen

CHRONOGRAPHY – CHRONOLOGY. The term chronography designates a historical narration in chronological order and, more rarely, the study of chronology. Chronology indicates (1) the discipline that considers historical events in their temporal relations and seeks to fix their exact position in the sequence of time, (2) the temporal order in which particular facts happen, and (3) a work that recounts events using the criterion of temporal succession. To discern the meanings of these two words in modern languages will help us to better understand the way in which the Christians of the first centuries saw both the order and the doctrine of time.

Among the oldest evidence is that of *Theophilus of Antioch. In book 3 of Ad Autolycum (24-28), written soon after 180, the author, following the method of Jewish *apologists, aims to demonstrate the antiquity of the Christian religion and esp. of the sacred books received from the *synagogue. To this end he expounds a chronology of world history from creation to the death of *Marcus Aurelius (180), over an arc of time calculated as 5695 years, 6 months and 15 days. For the Christian point of view, Sextus *Julius Africanus's five books of Chronicles (Χρονογραφίαι), written after 221 and surviving only in fragments, must have been of great importance. In them, biblical events and events from Greek and Jewish history were arranged in parallel, from the creation to the fourth year of *Heliogabalus (221). Following an already established opinion, he held that the world would last 6,000 years before its final phase—which would be the millennium of Christ's reign—and that at the time of Christ's birth 5,500 years had passed. In the same period and on the basis of similar computations, *Hippolytus wrote his Chronicles (Χρονικῶν βίβλιοι), which seem to have been inspired by Julius's work and by the chronological section of *Clement of Alexandria's Stromata (I,109-136). It is interesting to note that Hippolytus too composed his work in response to *eschatological and *millenarian expectations, aroused in various Christian communities by just such chronological calculations.

At the start of the 4th c. (or perhaps earlier) *Eusebius of Caesarea wrote his Chronicon: though lost, we can reconstruct it from a 6th-c. *Armenian translation, *Jerome's *Latin version and many excerpts transcribed by later chronographers. In the first part (Χροναγραφία), Eusebius expounds the chronological systems of the Chaldeans, Assyrians, Hebrews, Egyptians and Greeks. In the second, he presents a series of synchronous tables (Χρονικοὶ κανόνες) in parallel columns, giving the most important events of universal history, including those of sacred history, with references to different computi (years from Abraham, whose birth was fixed at 2016–2015 BC; Olympiads; years of Rome, dynastic dates). His work was distinguished from its predecessors by the good quality of his chosen sources, a more marked philological and historical sensibility (he no longer began with Adam but with historically ascertainable persons and events) and a more prudent eschatological vision (abandoning millenarism). Less than a century later, while staying in *Constantinople in ca. 380, Jerome discovered it, understood its importance and translated it into Latin, partially rewriting and expanding it: indeed, after translating the first part he introduced many new facts into the later parts, especially relating to the West, for which his work was intended; he also brought the Chronicon up to date as far as 378, the date of *Valens's death. Thus there developed in early Christian literature, both Eastern and Western, the historical narrative in which events were registered simply in order of succession: a minor literary genre, but one which constituted the necessary skeleton for more complex historical narrative. (Not by chance did Eusebius, on the basis of his own Chronicon, construct his Historia ecclesiastica for the centuries after Christ's coming.) Later times thus found basic models to which they could look when compiling universal chronicles and indispensable points of reference for the broad delineation of humankind's past (e.g., the Chronicles of *Sulpicius Severus, *Prosper of Aquitaine, *Hydatius, *Marcellinus Comes, and again *Cassiodorus, *Victor of Tunnuna, *Marius of Avenches, *Isidore of Seville and *Bede, for the West; and for the East, the universal chronicles of *Panodorus and *Annianus, *Hesychius of Miletus and *John of Antioch, or of *John Malalas or George Syncellus).

At this point we must put in better perspective the character and significance of the many ancient works de tempore by recalling an important collection of sources and acts, known as the Chronography of 354* from the year in which it was completed, though some of its constituent texts were immediately continued and brought up to date. This work, illustrated and probably compiled by Furius Dionysius *Philocalus, Pope *Damasus's calligrapher, comprises a series of different historical-chronographical elements, some of them non-Christian in character: a list of consuls—faithful and complete—up to 354; an *Easter canon, calculated from 321 to 412; a list of prefects of Rome from 254 to 354, with the consular fasti relating to the same period; a list of Roman martyrs, with date, name and usually the place where each one was laid or where his liturgical station was celebrated (Depositio martyrum*); a list of the commemorative days of the Roman bishops from *Lucius (254) to Julius (352), giving the place where each one's liturgical station was celebrated (Depositio episcoporum); the list of bishops of *Rome from *Peter to *Liberius (for whom only a date of consecration [352] is given) (Liberian Catalogue); the consular fasti, cited in two versions; a universal chronicle—composed in 334—with continual reference to biblical history (Chronicon Horosii), a revision and continuation of Hippolytus's Chronicle; a chronicle of Roman kings, dictators and emperors up to *Licinius (d. 325); and a description of Rome by districts. The book's usefulness to citizens, and no less to visitors, of the Urbs is evident; it still has considerable historical, erudite, topographical and antiquarian importance, and it was widely used and very popular with many ancient writers. In some ways it can be considered a precursor of the medieval chronicles with their marked interest in the minute exposition of particular facts, which distinguish them from the universal chronicles mentioned above.

To these we must now turn to evaluate their contribution to the formulation of the new Christian *historiography. They constituted the preliminary work which allowed Christian historians to explain to the *pagans the scriptural vision of history, to demonstrate the antiquity (and novelty) of the religion they professed, and to correlate the facts of secular history with those of historia salutis. But the Christian chronographies also allowed ecclesiastical teachers to delineate with greater certainty, particularly for simplices and rudes, the grandiose course of the divine providential plan for humanity (see the two examples of historical exposition in *Augustine's De catechizandis rudibus [16,24ff.]). As Momigliano notes, "Unlike pagan chronology, Christian chronology was also a philosophy of history," so that "the convert, in abandoning paganism, was compelled to enlarge his historical horizon: perhaps for the first time, it occurred to him to think in terms of universal history." Moreover, in what we may call a total vision, the end of the world was also considered along with secular events. "Chronology and eschatology were conflated to form a single whole" (A. Momigliano, Il conflitto tra paganesimo e cristianesimo nel IV secolo, It. tr., 95-96). The same matrix gave rise to systems of chronological computation connected with new historiographical theories. The requirement was that of gathering and illustrating the history of salvation, which broke through the horizons of local histories even while becoming incarnate in historically determined facts and events. Suffice it to recall here the theory of the age of the world and its link with chronological calculations. It took many forms but had one intention. Taking the days of creation (Gen 1:1) to represent the time of the world, many ancient authors spoke of six periods, to be followed by a seventh, which for some authors was the millennium of Christ's reign, for others eternal life (each period would last 1,000 years, according to Ps 90:4: "A thousand years in [the Lord's] sight are but as yesterday"). Elsewhere four ages were emphasized (of idolatry, of the law, of the gospel, of the *parousia) in the light of a progressive and ordered dimension of God's plan; or else two ages, assuming the earthly *incarnation of the Word to be the center of history.

Still more ways of calculating time and scanning the periods of human history were developed in the first centuries. Among them was that which, well-known in the pagan world, took its name from a particularly important historical event. In this case the term "era" was used (from late Latin æra, "number," "figure"). Years were counted from this event, so that earlier or later facts could be ordered chronologically. The expression "era of *Diocletian" was particularly popular in the East: facts were ordered from the start of Diocletian's reign (284). It was used in *Egypt, where it particularly established itself, by *Cyril of Alexandria (in his Easter tables), but it also occurs in the West, in *Ambrose (Ep. 23) or, later, in *Bede. From the 7th c. it became the "era of the martyrs," in memory of the Christians who suffered the last and cruelest persecution under Diocletian. Much more famous and lasting was the "Christian" or "vulgar" era, introduced by the Scythian monk *Dionysius Exiguus (d. ca. 545). In compiling the table of Easter cycles which he made to continue Cyril of Alexandria's work beyond 531, he computed the years no longer from Diocletian but from the birth of Jesus Christ (which he fixed, erroneously, as 25 December in the year 753 from the foundation of Rome)—a choice which clearly expressed an essential moment of the previous models. This way of summing up chronology gradually spread, first among chroniclers, then in public documents from the 7th c., in imperial documents from the 9th c., in pontifical acts from the mid-10th c. To mention just one more, the "*Byzantine era" had considerable popularity from the 7th c., throughout the East and in S Italy. Roughly following a calculation known from earliest times, it fixed the creation of the world at 5508 BC, making 5509 the first year of the new era.

A dating method starting from 38 BC was common in *Spain; it became general in the 6th-7th c., in the Western provinces, through the *Visigoths, who also used it in *Africa and the part of *Gaul which they occupied; for this reason it was called Gothic, but it is better known under the name Hispanic (Spanish or Caesar) era. It was used by *Hydatius and by *Isidore of Seville; it disappeared in the 13th-14th c.

Indication on editions of Latin works de tempore, in CPL 2249-2323, 502-518; Altaner 170-171; 232-238. For Eastern chronographies, see ibid., C. Traselli: EC 4, 1010-1011, s.v. Cronologia; C. Traselli - A. Pratesi: EC 5, 462-64, s.v. Èra; The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century, ed. A. Momigliano, Oxford 1963 (It. tr. Turin [2]1971 [the essay cited in the text is titled Storiografia pagana e cristiana nel secolo IV d.C.]); A. Luneau, L'Histoire du salut chez les Pères de l'Église. La doctrine des âges du monde, Paris 1964; Mito e storia tra paganesimo e cristianesimo. Le età del mondo in fonti antiche, ed. P. Siniscalco, Turin 1976 (all the contributions cited above contain copious bibliographical information); R.S. Bagnall, Consuls of the Later Roman Empire, Atlanta, GA 1987; W. Adler, Time Immemorial: Archaic History and Its Sources in Christian Chronography from Julius Africanus to George Syncellus, Dumbarton Oaks 1989; S. Muhlberger, The Fifth-Century Chroniclers: Prosper, Hydatius and the Gallic Chronicler of 452, Leeds 1990; B. Croke, Christian Chronicles and Byzantine History, 5th-6th Centuries, Aldershot 1992; R.W. Burgess, Studies in Eusebian and Post-Eusebian Chronography, with the assistance of W. Witakowski, Stuttgart 1999; P. Siniscalco, Un modulo storiografico fortunato: le età del mondo dall'epoca patristica al Medioevo, in var. aus., Il Battistero di Parma. Iconografia, iconologia, fonti letterarie, ed. G. Schianchi, Milan 1999, 321-350; W. Adler - P. Tuffin, The Chronography of George Synkellos: A Byzantine Chronicle of Universal History from the Creation, Oxford 2002.

P. Siniscalco

CHRONOGRAPHY of 354. Title given to a vast and luxurious illustrated codex written at *Rome in 354 by Pope *Damasus's calligrapher Furius Dionysius *Philocalus, who compiled and illustrated more than a dozen preexisting documents, each with its own history. It was dedicated by the author to a wealthy Christian named Valentinus (whose name appears on the frontispiece). A copy of it was made in the Carolingian period, from which others were made in the 16th and 17th c.; the richness of the illustrations made the copying task difficult. The codex can be divided into two sections: the first, illustrated, contains texts regarding Roman civic life (Christian elements are lacking); the second, with no illustrations, contains texts on aspects of imperial Roman civic and Christian life. (Typically *pagan elements are omitted, though some historical and legendary references are made.)

Its essential content includes: (1) a list of the Natales Caesarum, which begins with the month of January and includes emperors beginning with *Augustus; (2) an *astrological section, i.e., on the signs of the *zodiac; (3) the official calendar of the city of *Rome: the individual months with indications of the days, imperial anniversaries, feasts, spectacles, lucky and unlucky days, ludi and circenses, and the astrological week; (4) a complete, accurate list of the consuls up to 354, indicating the year according to the Varronian system, with suppression of the names of usurpers; (5) an *Easter table from 312 to 411, based on *Hippolytus's lunar cycle of 84 years; (6) a list of the urban prefects from 254 to 354; (7) the Depositio episcoporum for the years 255–335 (from Pope *Lucius to Pope Sylvester), i.e., the days and places of commemoration of the bishops of Rome; two other names were added to this list: Mark, 7 October (336), Julius, 12 April (352); (8) the Depositio martyrum: a list of *martyrs commemorated at Rome with the date, name and place of burial or that where the liturgical station was celebrated; *Callistus is the oldest martyr recorded, and the list begins with the feast of Christmas, 25 December; (9) the list of the bishops of Rome from Peter to Liberius (Liberian Catalog)— for the latter, only the year of consecration (352) is given; (10) other documents, whose inclusion in the original copy is uncertain: a Notitia of the regions of the city of Rome, a universal chronicle (Liber generationis) and a chronicle of the city of Rome (Chronica Urbis Romae).

T. Mommsen, Chronica Minora 1, 13-148; A. Degrassi, Inscriptiones Italiae, 13: Fasti et elogia, fasc. 2: Fasti Anni Numani et Iuliani, Rome 1963 (best ed.); T. Mommsen, Über den Chronographen vom Jahre 354, in Gesammelte Schriften, 7, Berlin 1909, 536-579; J. Strzygowski, Die Calenderbilder des Chronographen, Berlin 1888; R. Valentini - G. Zucchetti, Codice topografico della città di Roma, 2 vols., Rome 1942; A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damsiana, Rome 1942, 21-35; PW 3/2, 2477-2481; H. Stern, Le Calendrier de 354. Étude sur son texte et ses illustrations, Paris 1954; Id., Les calendriers romains illustrés: ANRW II, 12,2 (1983), 431-475; Ch. Pietri, Roma christiana, Rome 1976; M.R. Salzman, On Roman Time: The Codex-Calendar of 354, Berkeley 1990; RAC 19, 1177-1191; G. Binder, Der Kalender des Filocalus. Eine illustrierte Ausgabe des römischen Festkalenders aus dem 4. Jahrh. n. Chr., in Der Kalender, ed. W. Geerlings, Paderborn 2002, 61-83.

A. Di Berardino

CHRYSIPPUS (ca. 410–479). Native of *Cappadocia, educated in *Syria, with his brothers Cosmas and Gabriel he went to *Palestine in ca. 428 to make up the first group of disciples who created the *laura of St. *Euthymius. After having been its bursar, he and Gabriel were ordained priests of the Anastasis at *Jerusalem, ca. 456; in 466 he replaced Cosmas, now *metropolitan of *Scythopolis, as Staurophylax (keeper of the relics of the Holy Cross). For these details see *Cyril of Scythopolis's Life of Euthymius, Schwartz's index, p. 280. A homily by Chrysippus on the Virgin has been much studied (CPG 6705, ed. M. Jugie, PO 19, 336-343; cf. R. Caro, La homilética mariana griega: Marian Library Studies 3, Dayton 1971, 211-226); three more homilies survive, on St. John the Baptist, St. Michael and St. Theodore (CPG 6706-6708), which show him to be a follower of *Hesychius. His *Christology is *Chalcedonian, but not very firmly (see L. Perrone, La Chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, 227-228).

A. Olivar, La predicación cristiana antigua, Barcelona 1991, 168-169; Patrologia V, 259-260; Marienlexikon 2,59; Testi mariani del primo millennio, ed. G. Gharib, I, Rome 1988, 602-609.

J. Gribomont

CHRYSOGONUS, martyr. The historical martyrologies put this saint on 24 November at *Rome, the manuscripts of Mart. hier. at Rome or at *Aquileia. Chrysogonus was in fact a *martyr of Aquileia; we know only his name, though his cult is attested very early in that city. The Roman feast, also included in the Leonine, Gelasian and Gregorian *Sacramentaries, probably commemorates the dedication of the Titulus Chrysogoni at Trastevere, which already existed in the 5th c. The founder of this Roman titulus* was made into a martyr by adapting the Passion of Chrysogonus of Aquileia to him, and 24 November became the date of his death. According to the legend of Anastasia, Chrysogonus instructed that saint in the faith and was beheaded at Aquileia under *Diocletian. The churches of Rome, *Ravenna (mosaic of S. Apollinare Nuovo) and *Milan include Chrysogonus among the martyrs of the canon of the *Mass. In the 8th c. the *Frankish king *Pepin the Short considered Chrysogonus his personal protector.

BHL 1795-1797; AB 102 (1984) 176; BS 4, 306-308; LCI 5, 511-512; F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia, Faenza 1927, 866-871; F. Lanzoni, I titoli presbiterali di Roma antica nella storia e nella leggenda: RivAC 2 (1925) 195-257; M. Mesnard, La basilique de saint Chrysogone à Rome, Vatican City 1935; H. Delehaye, Étude sur le légendier romain, Brussels 1936 [repr. 1968], 151-171, 221-249; E. Donckel, Ausserrömische Heilige in Rom, Luxemburg 1938, 20-23; V.L. Kennedy, The Saints of the Canon of the Mass, Vatican City [2]1963, 136-138; V. Saxer, L'hagiographie ancienne d'Aquilée: MEFRA 92 (1980) 373-392; J.-C. Picard, Le souvenir des évêques, Rome 1988, 580-582; B. Kuhn-Forte, Handbuch der Kirchen Roms 4, Vienna 1997, 365-401.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

CHRYSOSTOM. See *JOHN CHRYSOSTOM

CHURCH and EMPIRE. Though the first term, church, is clear—indicating the society founded at the beginning of our era by Jesus Christ, which unites communities of Christians around the same faith—the second, empire, can be understood in either a broader (to the extent of becoming synonymous with the ancient world) or a narrower sense, equivalent to state (to use a modern term not applicable to antiquity, for which words like civitas or res publica would be more correct). The relationship may also be considered either on the level of political doctrines or on that of historical facts. Here we will confine ourselves to outlining some of the major fault lines of what is undoubtedly a vast and complex problem. The distinction between "political" and "religious"—a distinction which does not imply any conflict or incompatibility between these two spheres—can be traced to the teaching of Jesus (Mt 23:15ff.). Paul, in a famous passage in Romans (Rom 13:1ff.; see also 1 Pet 2:13ff.), told Christians to submit to the established authorities, "for there is no authority except from God, and those that exist have been established by God"; Jesus, when Pilate pointed out his power of life and death over him, replied: "You would have no power over me unless it had been given you from above" (Jn 19:11). Christians, therefore, affirmed their loyalty and recognized the rights of authority, which make up the very basis of the society in which human beings, by God's design, find themselves; but at the same time they observed a precise hierarchy of values, which saw authority as being at God's service for the good of people (Rom 13:4). This vision, constantly repeated and followed during the very early centuries (as the 2nd- and 3rd-c. *apologists clearly show), provoked a series of reactions by imperial authorities and *pagan society. To understand this reaction we must remember that, by this proposal, Christianity rejected the religious and social customs on which the ancient world was founded; it did not follow the mos maiorum, the veterum instituta, and by doing so it refused to acknowledge the sacred character of the civitas, seat of the gods who protected it, and rejected its worship, which was both a civil and religious function, exercised by the magistrates in their capacity as priests.

Besides disavowing the nomos (a term designating the recognized principles, foundation of a venerable and glorious tradition), the Christians appeared also to be enemies of the logos, opposers of the paideia, in which so much of the wisdom handed down by the ancients resided, and followers of an uncritical and irrational faith. Hence arose the oldest accusations leveled against them, of being a race of people who followed a new and detestable superstitio, wicked and immoderate (see, e.g., *Tacitus, Annales XV, 44,4ff.; *Pliny the Younger, Ep. X, 96,8), and who with a stupidity bordering on madness spread an unreasonable belief (see *Marcus Aurelius, Meditations 11,3). To illustrate this deep and serious conflict, we need only compare works like *Celsus's True Discourse (Ἀληθὴς Λόγος) and *Origen's Contra Celsum. (Celsus's work is lost, but Origen gives many citations from it.) The danger constituted by the new religion provoked at least three types of reactions by the pagans: (1) the attempt to reabsorb those who were outside the patterns of a world rich in glory and tradition through dialogue, confrontation and persuasion; (2) the effort to marginalize the adversaries who opposed the status quo, through contempt, irony, sarcasm or accusations of all sorts; and (3) at times repression by the public authorities, to the extent of arrest, torture, trial and execution of Christians, at other times indulgence or compromise, as if to signal the ineffectiveness of the other methods. Hence the alternation of periods of persecution with periods of toleration and the intensification and radicalization of the *persecutions at times when change loomed in the attitude toward the Christians of a "culture" shared by the general public: the first general edict especially attacking Christians goes back to the time of *Decius (249). (A passage in the Historia Augusta ascribing a similar provision to *Septimius Severus in the early 3rd c. [Spartianus, Sept. Sev. 17,1] is rejected by some critics.)

Beginning in the mid-2nd c., Christians responded to the pagans on the cultural level by apologetic, represented by *Quadratus, *Aristides, *Justin, *Tatian, *Athenagoras, *Theophilus, and later, *Clement of Alexandria and Origen, all writing in *Greek; and *Tertullian, *Minucius Felix, *Cyprian and *Arnobius of Sicca in *Latin. On the existential level, they replied by nonviolence (to use a modern expression): the faithful witnessed to Christ by sacrificing their lives. A real *spirituality was born, with two strong points: negatively, the rejection of idolatry in any form; positively, the sequela of Christ, "the faithful witness" (see Rev 1:5), as shown clearly by the acts and passions of the *martyrs (with due caution as to their age and historical reliability) or the exhortations to martyrdom.

With the Edict of *Galerius—published 30 April 311—and then with *Constantine and his successors, the situation changed radically: Christians were allowed freedom to meet and worship; their properties, confiscated by the imperial treasury or acquired by others, were returned. Furthermore, from the first years of his reign, Constantine issued a series of legislative provisions favoring the Christian communities, which gradually tended to confer a special status on them. Particularly significant were those (from 319 on) introducing moral requirements along the lines of the gospel message into Roman law, without ruling out the influence of older pagan legal traditions. This was one sign, among others, of the change which took place over a very few years in the church-empire relationship; another sign was imperial donations, which often took the form of largesse to individual churches.

*Eusebius of Caesarea interpreted and theorized the Constantinian change in an ingenious way: in the relationship between the Father and the Logos—seen in the light of *subordinationism—he saw the image of the relationship between the Christ-Logos and the emperor, suggesting a link between Christ's work, preparing the final kingdom for the Father, and the emperor's contribution to the growth of Christ's kingdom on earth. He pointed out that, from its foundation, the Roman Empire had exercised a providential function to the benefit of Christianity, and he emphasized a continuity between Augustus and Constantine (an idea expressed in previous centuries: e.g., by *Melito of Sardis [in Eusebius, HE IV, 26,7] or by Origen [Contra Celsum 2,30]). Eusebius was convinced that the Roman-Christian Empire was an image of both heavenly Christian society and the pilgrim church—i.e., that the empire, becoming Christ's kingdom on earth, and Christianity, becoming a universal church, would give rise to a substantial unity (though this would involve a distinction of duties: bishops in the religious sphere, magistrates in the civil sphere). Responsibility for and care of the church was therefore incumbent on the emperor (see, e.g., Eusebius, Laus Constantini 2,5). Eusebius thus proposed a political theology which, variously judged, remains an indispensable point of reference for understanding the history of church-empire relations in the following centuries.

Apart from *Julian's brief reign (361–363), which marked the full restoration of a political paganism, most of Constantine's successors followed the path he had traced, starting with *Constantius II, an *Arian who tried forcibly to impose his belief on all the Christian communities, persecuting whoever opposed his designs, orthodox or pagan: more than ever, the emperor was arbiter and judge in church affairs. This led to a reaction by some bishops (Dionysius, Eusebius, Lucifer, Paulinus), who admonished him that the empire did not belong to him but to God, who had given it to him, and exhorted him not to mix the things of the civitas with those of the church. In this way they distinguished causa civilis from causa religionis. In subsequent decades *Gratian (375–383) and *Theodosius I (379–395), both Catholics, took many measures in favor of the orthodox against the Arians and pagans. Gratian abandoned the imperial title (traditional since Augustus) of pontifex maximus; Theodosius, by the edict of February 380, enjoined his subjects to profess the Catholic religion. Through the troubled events of those times, which are impossible to follow here, a line previously represented by *Athanasius, *Hilary of Poitiers, or *Basil of Caesarea and now revived, e.g., by *Ambrose of Milan, came to be held more consistently in the church: in matters of faith, the bishops must judge the emperors and not vice versa, and the church cannot submit to the res publica. This prevalent (though not unanimous among Christians) line claimed the church's freedom and independence to exercise its own functions, and, indeed, in due course—in ever clearer opposition to Eusebius's principles—demanded the subordination of the sovereign to the church in spiritual matters. We see particular affirmations of this by Popes *Felix II (483–492) and *Gelasius (492–496). At the start of the 5th c. *Augustine, too, with his criticism of the pax Augusti in De civitate Dei, aligned himself against the political theology of which Eusebius had been the greatest architect. This did not mean the historical disappearance of this vision, still less the end of its concrete realization, as is shown by the history of the Roman Empire in the East, established after Theodosius's death in 395 and destined, unlike the Western empire, to live on for another thousand years. There, Eusebius's conception found its most coherent and radical manifestation in *Justinian (527–565): one empire, one church, led by one emperor. In this light, the earthly basileia was the image of the heavenly kingdom; the sovereign was the image of the Father and vicar of the Christ-Logos king; and his function was that of earthly representative and interpreter of the God who rules the universe with justice and goodness. The fate of the Christian West was very different, in a historical scene dominated by the rapid disintegration of the social, economic, bureaucratic and military fabric in the storm unleashed by the barbarian invasions. The West seems indeed to have been influenced by a form of *apocalyptic Judaism which opposed the king to the prophet; nor had it likely forgotten the pagan senatorial criticism of the imperial cult: so there is nothing surprising in the pope's opposition to the emperor or even in the rise of the theory of the two powers, which, though not the only one to hold the field, remained alive all through the Middle Ages.

Leaving aside the treatment of the problem outlined in histories of the church and of Christianity, specific bibliography is very abundant. Our choice here is necessarily limited and does not satisfy many aspects of a wide and complex question: R.W. - A.J. Carlyle, A History of Mediaeval Political Theory in the West I, Edinburgh - London [2]1927 (It. tr. Bari 1967); E. Peterson, Der Monotheismus als politisches Problem. Ein Beitrag zur politischen Theologie im Imperium Romanum, Leipzig 1935; K. Voigt, Staat und Kirche von Konstantin dem Grossen bis zum Ende der Karolingerzeit, Stuttgart 1936; J.A. Straub, Vom Herrscherideal in der Spätantike, Stuttgart 1939; P. Brezzi, Cristianesimo e Impero Romano, Rome [2]1944; W. Durant, Cäsar und Christus. Eine Kulturgeschichte Roms und des Christentums von den Anfängen bis zum Jahre 325, Bern 1949; H. Grégoire, Les persécutions dans l'Empire Romain, Brussels 1951; O. Cullmann, Der Staat in Neuen Testament, Tübingen 1956; J. Moreau, La persécution du christianisme dans l'empire romain, Paris 1956; J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'Empire Romain (IV[e]-V[e] siècle), Paris 1958; Kirche und Staat: Staatslexikon der Görresgesellschaft, IV, Freiburg i.B. 1959, 991ff.; H. Rahner, Kirche und Staat im Frühen Christentum. Dokumente aus acht Jahrhunderten und ihre Deutung, Munich [2]1961 (It. tr. Milan 1970); W.H.C. Frend, The Roman Empire in the Eyes of Western Schismatics During the Fourth Century, A.D., in Misc. Historiae Ecclesiasticae (= Bibl. de la Revue d'Hist. Ecclés. 38), Louvain 1961, 9-22; G. Pilati, Chiesa e Stato nei primi quindici secoli. Profilo dello sviluppo della teoria attraverso le fonti e la bibliografia, Rome 1961; M. Sordi, Il Cristianesimo e Roma, Bologna 1965; W. Affeldt, Die weltliche Gewalt in der Paulus Exegese. Röm. 13, 1-7 in Römerbriefkommentaren der lateinischen Kirche bis zum Ende des 13. Jahrhunderts, Göttingen 1969; J. Speigl, Die Römische Staat und die Christen. Staat und Kirche von Domitian bis Commodus, Amsterdam 1970; var. aus., La fine dell'Impero d'Occidente, Rome 1978; K. Aland, Das Verhältnis von Kirche und Staat in der Frühzeit: ANRW II, 23, 1 (1979) 60-246; Ch. Munier, L'Église dans l'Empire romaine (IIe-IIIe siècle). Église e cité, Paris 1979; L. De Giovanni, Chiesa e Stato nel Codice Teodosiano. Saggio sul libro XVI, Naples 1980; M. Sordi, I Cristiani e l'Impero romano, Milan 1984; var. aus., L'Église et l'Empire au IVe siècle, Fondation Hardt 34, Geneva 1989; M. Hadas-Lebel, Jérusalem contre Rome, Paris 1990; var. aus., L'Impero romano-cristiano. Problemi politici, religiosi, culturali, ed. M. Sordi, Rome 1991; H. Inglebert, Les Romains chrétiens face à l'histoire de Rome, Paris 1996; G. Jossa, I Cristiani e l'Impero romano. Da Tiberio a Marco Aurelio, Rome 2000; P. Siniscalco, Il cammino di Cristo nell'Impero romano, Rome - Bari [4]2000; L. De Giovanni, L'imperatore Costantino e il mondo pagano, Naples 2003.

P. Siniscalco

CHURCH BUILDINGS

I. Historical account - II. Description of the basilica - III. Liturgical arrangements in the church - IV. The baptistery - V. Various annexes - VI. Particular forms of church building.

I. Historical account.

1. The names of the church building. The first Christian meeting places, up to the peace of the church (312–313), are little known. The allusions of 1st- and 2nd-c. texts undoubtedly refer to private premises, more or less prepared in advance, to which we conventionally give the name domus ecclesia. From the 3rd c. more specific terms appear: ecclesia (which meant an assembly before designating a meeting place), basilica (a Greek term, originally "royal building," used from the end of the Republic to designate large rooms used for legal hearings and other activities near the forum), aula (courtyard, later a large covered room: the term aula regia was the emperors' audience chamber on the Palatine, whence the term "aulic," applied to whatever concerned imperial ideology or ceremonial). African documents relating to *Diocletian's persecution show that in 303 the Christians possessed basilicae at Aptunga and Cirta. Christian terminology sometimes distinguished ecclesia from basilica. In *Gregory of Tours, e.g., in the 6th c., ecclesia systematically designates the bishop's church in the city, while basilica refers to cemeterial churches outside.

2. The first meeting places. Concrete evidence from before the period of *Constantine is rare. In the 19th c. it was believed that the first Christians met in the catacombs, but it is certain that places of worship present there are late and stem from the development of *pilgrimages to the *martyrs buried there. Searches were later made beneath the urban churches of *Rome, called tituli and distinguished by a personal name in the genitive (e.g., Titulus Equitii), and some thought they could identify churches set up in the houses of those persons who had donated their property to the church (Kirsch's theory). In fact the earlier buildings beneath these churches vary greatly and have no specific layout; so this theory has now been abandoned (see esp. Ch. Pietri). The one building clearly attributable to a Christian community and datable with certainty, since the town was destroyed in 256 by the *Sassanid Persians, is the "house of the Christians" at *Dura Europos on the Euphrates frontier of the empire: a large room with no specific form was used for meetings, but we can already recognize a baptistery with a font surmounted by a canopy and a symbolic mural decoration. In the region of the "limestone massif" of N Syria, we can also follow, at Qirq-Bize, the progressive transformation of a dwelling into a Christian church.

3. The Constantinian period: appearance of the "Latin basilica." From the peace of the church, places of worship, now public, rose everywhere, sometimes architecturally daring, esp. when the emperor was financing the construction, as at Rome (episcopal church of the Lateran, martyrial churches of St. Peter in the Vatican and St. Paul's Outside the Walls) or in the Holy Land (reliquary churches of the holy places of Christ's life at Bethlehem and *Jerusalem). Hence the hypothesis of the sudden birth of a new type called the "Latin" or "Constantinian basilica," epitomized by St. Peter's, known to us from plans and elevations made at the time of its destruction and replacement by the present building (and from partial excavations conducted inside the Confessio), or by St. John Lateran, whose structures are partly preserved despite modernization. The first basilica with an exact date, 324, is that partly excavated in the 19th c. at Orléansville (now El Asnam on the Chéliff in Algeria): it has five aisles but is provided with two apses at the extremities of the central aisle, though these are not contemporary; so it does not represent the ideal type (see N. Duval, Basiliques à deux absides). Another very old monument, built by a Bishop Theodore who attended the Council of *Arles in 314, but not precisely datable, is the episcopal church of *Aquileia in N Italy, consisting of two rectangular rooms, parallel and divided into three aisles by a small number of supports but with no apse: here too the type of building is not the classical basilica, and the two-roomed complex raises the problem of the origin and raison d'être of double churches (see below). Also attributed to the Constantinian period are many churches associated with the mausoleum of a martyr or a member of the imperial family in the Roman cemeteries: S. Agnese near S. Costanza, S. Lorenzo, SS. Pietro e Marcellino, the Basilica Apostolorum beneath the present S. Sebastiano. These great three-aisled buildings are called "circiform," since the side aisles are extended around the apse like the tiers of seats at the rounded end of a circus, and it has been asked whether the central aisle was covered. We see that at the start of the 4th c. the typology of Christian buildings was not at all rigid.

4. The problem of origins: the civil basilica. The architects of the Renaissance, who first raised the question of the origin of the Christian basilica, were unaware of this variety. They naturally thought to derive it from the Roman civil basilica. This theory was later refuted, since for a long time no civil basilicas transformed into churches—indisepensable for a demonstration—were found. In the last 50 years such reutilizations have been found, e.g., at Leptis Magna and Sabratha (Libya), Tipasa (Algeria), Bolsena (Italy) etc.; but in any case they are late since, save to avoid destruction, there was no reason to modify the function of these buildings, which were indispensable for municipal life.

5. The Hellenistic-Roman house. The great excavations of Pompei and Herculanum drew attention to the Hellenistic-Roman house, and the fashionable theory at the beginning of the 20th c. maintained, under the pretext that the Christians first met in private houses, that churches were derived from the Roman house (atrium or peristyle + tablinum [main axial room] and alae [lateral annexes] = atrium + three-aisled hall; or else atrium = nave and main room = apse). Though we know many cases of churches installed in rooms of aristocratic houses at Rome (e.g., the "basilica" of Junius Bassus) or in the provinces (e.g., Qirq-Bize, see above; Mactar in Tunisia), it is evident that the transformation from private house to public building is not a natural procedure for the architect; moreover, on the technical level the typology is completely different.

6. Pagan and Jewish places of worship: the "funerary basilica." Meanwhile, since the classical Greco-Roman temple, intended to house the divine statue rather that the whole congregation, could not be a prototype (though, after being abandoned, large temples were often used as churches and small ones as baptisteries), attempts were made, in the name of the kinship of all Eastern religions, much studied between the two world wars, to compare the Christian basilica to the meeting places of the *mystery religions, which sometimes have a vaguely basilical form: the mithraea of the Persian god *Mithras, long a rival of Christianity, or the Roman hypogeum of Porta Maggiore, attributed by J. Carcopino to a Pythagorean sect. But their dimensions, uses and technical characteristics differ profoundly. Knowledge (esp. since Sukenik's work) of Palestinian *synagogues, which sometimes show a basilical plan (e.g., at Capernaum), led some to ask whether the synagogue might not have influenced the Christian meeting place through Jewish-Christian mediation; but the dates of these buildings have since been brought forward and, to the extent to which they are contemporary with well-characterized churches, the influence may turn out to be in the opposite direction. At the time of the Second World War, C. Picard's discovery of the "basilica of the Juvenes" at Mactar in Tunisia and the Danish architect Dyggve's study of the martyrial churches of Salona in Dalmatia and the *pagan heroon of Calydon in Greece made fashionable the theory of derivation from the pagan funerary basilica, a theoretical monument in which a number of tombs would be exposed to the veneration of visitors. From the example of Marusinac at Salona, Dyggve hypothesized an evolution from the sacred tomb preceded by a porticoed courtyard (basilica discoperta) to the classical basilica, a theory demolished by the reexamination of the Salona building (undoubtedly a classical basilica) and one which seems hard to accept on the technical level (transition from an uncovered space to a covered building). As for the Mactar "funerary basilica," this is a late church, perhaps installed in the main room of a house: the tombs served as an altar base and were brought there by Christians (see N. Duval, Églises à deux absides).

7. The imperial palace—city and camp. Also fashionable at the same time (and still) was the idea of a Constantinian initiative, related to the growing interest (probably caused by the rise of totalitarian ideologies) in the theory of imperial power. The hypothesis was that Constantine might have given his architects his own house as a model to accommodate the king of heaven. The inexact etymology given by *Isidore of Seville in the 7th c., who derived the term basilica from a royal dwelling, seems to agree with this theory. Since then some have sought to find the origin of the Christian basilica in a standard plan of the imperial palace of the late empire, which they thought to recognize in Diocletian's retirement residence at Salona (Split) in *Dalmatia, in that attributed to *Maximian (or his son *Maxentius) at Piazza Armerina in Sicily, in *Theodoric's palace at *Ravenna as reconstructed by E. Dyggve on the basis of the famous mosaic of S. Apollinare Nuovo, and in various other secondary monuments, since the plan of the great residential palaces is not known for *Constantinople, *Milan, *Nicaea, *Antioch, and only very partially—if the identification is exact—for *Trier and *Thessalonica. It has been ascertained that this standard plan is a myth. We have objected that the split plan did not contain a reception room in the axis of the "peristyle" (basilica discoperta, according to Dyggve) and that court ceremonies had no raison d'être there (Urbs, 1961-62). I have demonstrated that the Ravenna mosaic, like many images of the time, showed the palace under the aspect of a Christian basilica, a fact that is now reversing the theory of derivation (Cahiers archéologiques, 1965). And the villa of Piazza Armerina was certainly not built for an emperor. Other theories related to the previous ones deserve only a mention, since they are even more unlikely: the theory that, on the pretext that the church was sometimes evoked as the heavenly Jerusalem, it derives from a town plan in which the imperial residence was situated at the end of an axial boulevard, or the theory that likens the basilica to the arrangement of a military camp, where the praetorium was placed at the end of the main avenue.

8. Conclusion: the Christian basilica in contemporary Roman architecture. In fact all these theories seem pointless: the Roman architect of the 4th c. already had available to him a type of building intended for assemblies, i.e., the basilica, which was commonly adapted to other uses and was not just an annex of the forum. All that was needed was to modify the plan and in particular to arrange it on an axis, with a focal point provided by the altar or sacred tomb, to suit the requirements of worship (whereas the prototype required no special orientation). The only hesitation would have been between two methods of roofing. As well as the trussed basilica, there had been built in at least one isolated instance—the basilica of Maxentius or of Constantine at Rome—a large vaulted hall of the type commonly used for the frigidara of public baths. This type of roofing, requiring competent engineers and skilled labor, was adopted by Christian architecture for large buildings only very late and with a different plan. Who took the initiative of choosing and modifying the plan? The clergy or the emperor? It is hard to say. But to the extent that the great Constantinian foundations utilized public or legally protected lands (e.g., the Vatican cemetery) and required considerable imperial financial subsidies, intervention by court architects is likely, at least for the main cities and in the Holy Land. Yet we have seen that the buildings constructed in that period were of various types in Rome itself, and the differences are even more marked from one region to another (see below).

II. Description of the basilica.

1. The quadratum populi. If we keep to the theoretical model, the nucleus of the Christian church building, from the peace of the church, was a rectangular hall generally with three aisles, completed by an apse which was originally of the same width as the main aisle and had the main entrance opposite it. Sometimes the main hall is given the name quadratum populi. The largest churches had five aisles (e.g., the great Roman basilicas) and sometimes even more (up to seven or nine for some phases of the great churches of *Carthage and *Tipasa in *Africa). The number of aisles depended not just on the dimensions but also on the strength of the supports used. In N Africa, for example, there were many relatively small five-aisled churches (e.g., that of Orléansville). Various small single-aisled churches are also known, esp. in eastern Europe. The nave was normally much wider than the aisles (the ideal proportion is 2:1), but regional schools show many variations. The supports, resting either on a continuous sill (stylobate) or on separate foundations (surmounted by a flat stone, called an "underbase," under the base), were ordinarily columns, often reused, esp. at Rome. But there are some regions where pillars, either constructed of cut stone or sometimes monolithic, were substituted for columns. Many variations are known: columns attached to pillars (e.g., the type of *Tebessa in N Africa), double columns (very frequent in Tunisia), columns of stuccoed brick, columns made from stacked pieces etc. The column was surmounted by a classical capital, often reused. Specific types were subsequently created, adapted for arches on columns by the addition of an "abacus" or "superabacus," then the monolithic "impost-capital" and then the pyramidal capital. Above the columns the architrave of classical architecture (retained where numerous decorative trabeations were available, at Rome and Constantinople) was normally replaced by the arch, in brick or stone, which allowed wider spacing of the supports and resisted vertical pressure better (transmitting it to the supports).

Roofs of basilicas were generally trussed: beneath a double-sloping roof, an extra story was added to the nave by building walls above the supports; these walls were pierced by windows permitting direct illumination of the nave, hence the name "clerestory." The arrangement of the trusses is clear from the imprint of beams in the walls, where they are preserved (e.g., in Syria and Asia Minor) by the 6th-c. trusses still in loco in the Church of St. Catherine on Mt. Sinai and by graphic evidence, like the cross sections of Old St. Peter's at Rome. In these we can see that each pair of side aisles was covered by one single-sloping roof, but in other five-aisled churches a clerestory above the outer colonnades is possible: in such cases we may suppose that the ceiling was masked (e.g., when texts allude, as at S. Apollinare Nuovo, Ravenna, to the "gilded sky"). The ceiling was sometimes, in N Africa and *Spain, made of terracotta slabs forming coffers, a great many examples of which have been found. The roof itself was normally made of tiles arranged in the Roman style, flat tiles with their edges covered by semitubular tiles, terminating toward the outer margin in antefixes, sometimes decorated with relief motifs (known in Africa and Gaul). Some prestigious buildings were, like some temples, covered with lead or bronze (hence the allusion to golden roofs). It is practically certain that, in regions where timber was rare and the climate suitable (e.g., N Africa), some parts were covered with a terrace of masonry or terracotta bricks. We also know in Syria, and probably in the Negev, a series of basilicas covered by great stone slabs. On the short sides of the hall, the roof of the nave ended in a triangular pediment which could be emphasized by acroteria at the corners and center, as in temples, or by a cross. Above the side aisles some churches had galleries open toward the nave and accessible by inside or outside stairs (see below: matroneum).

2. Orientation. The position of the apse determined the orientation of the whole building. On this point we find great regional variations. At Rome and in proconsular Africa—Byzacena and Tripolitania (Tunisia and part of Libya)—many of the oldest buildings have the apse at the west. Orientation seems to have been imposed on N Africa in the Byzantine period, at which time various churches saw their liturgical arrangements reversed. (This was sometimes the cause of a second apse being built: see below.) Elsewhere eastern orientation is far more frequent and is the rule in the E Mediterranean, but in Cyrenaica—an intermediate zone—basilicas facing west are as numerous as those facing east, for no apparent reason. Finally there are anomalous orientations, e.g., north-south, where buildings were adapted to topographical situations.

3. The apse. The apse was generally semicircular inside (actually a semicircle completed by flat segments). In the case of simple rooms of small dimensions, it could be rectangular. We find, esp. in Egypt, some cases of trilobate apses. For some (e.g., at Concordia Sagittaria in N Italy) it was a case of extending, by adding aisles, an originally detached tribolate building which served as a martyrium. Finally we note some examples of internally polygonal apses (e.g., S. Bertrand-de-Comminges in France). Externally the form differs considerably according to region. In Italy and Greece the apse generally projects outward, but it can also be enclosed in a quadrangular block, externally semicircular or even polygonal, something which becomes frequent from the 5th c. in N Italy, on the Adriatic and all over the E Mediterranean and is typical of Constantinopolitan architecture. In some regions of Syria, N Africa and sometimes in Spain, a rectilinear "chevet" plan (at ground level, not raised) prevails, in which the apse is framed by two secondary rooms, connecting with it or not, which complete the rectangle. These rooms are often given the name "pastophories": sometimes a distinction is made between the diakonikon (service room for clergy) and the prothesis (premises for collection of offerings). This terminology corresponds to an Eastern liturgy, confined in time and space, and cannot always be extended to this tripartite plan, whose justification is primarily architectural. Indeed, the side rooms did not have a fixed function: in N Syria the righthand room was frequently turned into a martyrium; in N Africa and Spain the baptistery was sometimes put there. We must distinguish this tripartite "chevet"—single apse and side rooms—from another tripartite type, later and particularly Eastern, with three projecting apses corresponding to three aisles. This type recurs in early medieval Western architecture. The height of the apse also varies according to region, depending on liturgical needs and architectural uses. In Italy, Spain, Greece, Lebanon and Cyrenaica, the floor is on a level with the aisles or slightly raised. The discrepancy is made up by steps at the front or at the two sides and is much greater in N Syria and in Africa. Beneath the apse, esp. when the difference in height is considerable, are sometimes crypts, whose purpose can vary (cult of martyrs, funerary, sometimes even baptistery). This custom would become general in the West in the Carolingian era (see below). The wall of the apse, which in N Africa is generally windowless, in Greece, Italy and Syria is pierced by windows, which sometimes form a genuine clerestory, as at S. Giovanni Evangelista, Ravenna. The roof of the apse is usually a semidome made of concrete, of squared shaped stones, or of light materials (vaults of terracotta tubes embedded and bound together by plaster at Ravenna, Rome, Grado, in Sicily and in N Africa), resting on an arch often called a "triumphal arch," which in turn rests on two great side columns, or in a wall-partition supported by four columns with three unequal arches. The vault may be protected by a roof or, as often happens in Africa, simply coated outside with a layer of whitewash like the domes of Muslim mosques.

Some (mosaic) images exist which show towers framing the apse. At Aquileia and in a whole series of churches in the N Adriatic area, there is no apse at all (see below).

To these elements, essential to the makeup of the Christian basilica, other parts may be added whose existence depends on regional customs or particular requirements.

4. Avant-corps: vestibule, narthex, atrium. The façade of the basilica generally has one or more main entrances; in small buildings a single opening is possible, but more often we find a door corresponding to each aisle; the façade is provided with windows and oculi high up, which are sometimes the only source of direct illumination for the side aisles when the sides have no windows. Some churches of Greece, Syria and Asia Minor have preserved their façades entire, and it is possible to observe such apertures. In some cases in Syria, and perhaps in the Balkans, we find a monumental façade outlined by two corner towers, whose exact height cannot now be determined (e.g., Qalb Lozé) and whose use may vary (decorative, defensive or even staircase towers to reach the galleries, e.g., a single tower in front of the façade of the church of the Byzantine citadel of Haidra in Tunisia). Some Roman façades—S. Maria Maggiore and SS. Giovanni e Paolo—seem to have been open with arcades at ground level, doubtless because preceded by a vestibule. In some regions, e.g., N Syria, the main doors may be at the side because of the existence of a lateral courtyard (see below).

Many churches are preceded by a simple porticoed façade or by a vestibule or by a transverse room integrated into the body of the building. In, e.g., N Africa the vestibule and the portico are much more frequent than the atrium. In the E Mediterranean, esp. in the Balkans, at Constantinople and in Asia Minor, at the entrance to the church we frequently find a transverse room which often connected via a large subdivided opening (tribelon) with the quadratum populi. The narthex may have had a liturgical function in these regions, since it was there that the unbaptized (catechumens) took part in the divine office. The term narthex must not be applied to mere vestibules existing in the same place in other regions. It sometimes happens that this transverse room is double: in such cases we distinguish the exonarthex, which may be a mere vestibule, and the esonarthex, or narthex proper. The ends of the narthex or vestibule sometimes have the form of an apse, as also in civil architecture. In at least two cases, on the island of Brae in Dalmatia and at Apollonia in Cyrenaica, one of these apses is provided with sedilia and so undoubtedly had a liturgical role.

The great churches of Rome and Italy, Greece and the Balkans, Asia Minor and Palestine, often have a frontal courtyard or atrium, an uncovered space surrounded by porticoes, sometimes with an extra story. But the frontal atrium is exceptional in Syria (in one region of N Syria the courtyard is at the side) and rare in N Africa (except for the great churches of Carthage which had them in their phase of maximum development). The quadriportico is the ideal, but the peristyle may be incomplete, without E or W side. The E side, in front of the façade of the church, may be distinguished by being at a higher level (i.e., that of the basilica) or by a more monumental character (larger columns), as in the so-called Rhodian peristyle in houses, or by being partly enclosed in sections of wall which restrict passage, in which case it plays the role of a vestibule and is commonly given the name "exonarthex, contested by, e.g., P. Lemerle. The uncovered space may be protected, at least partially, by gates barring the intercolumnar spaces. In the center there was often a fountain or pool like those in the center of house peristyles, the best-known example being the pool with a column crowned with a pinecone in the center of the Vatican atrium (cantharus). It could be laid out as a garden, like the peristyles of Roman houses, whence the name paradisus. We know some cases of an atrium (Philippi, Stobi in Macedonia) whose W side was a monumental nymphaeum, a cascade of water like that found in contemporary houses (e.g., at Stobi, Syrian Apamea, Ostia). Some atria are not quadrangular but, like that of Damous el Karita at Carthage or the Lechaion at Corinth, end in a semicircular portico in front of the church. The atrium may even be preceded by another courtyard or by monumental propylaea, as existed, e.g., at the Vatican, at Gerasa in Jordan and at Tebessa in Algeria.

5. The transept. Between the aisles and the apse is sometimes inserted a transverse element, which exists in the great churches of Rome and is called a transept. With respect to the totality of known early Christian buildings, its geographical distribution is very limited, though in the 19th c. it was thought, on the model of Old St. Peter's, to be an intrinsic element of the Latin Christian basilica. It was much more widespread in the East, esp. in Aegean architecture, than in the West. It is important to distinguish the transept proper from the cruciform plan, which will be examined separately. In its plan, the transept may stop at the lateral façades or, more frequently, go beyond them. It generally ends in a straight wall but, esp. on the Adriatic coasts (as at Dodona and Paramizia), we know a number of cases where the arms of the transept end in apses. Generally we can distinguish three types of plan: (1) the "undivided" or "continuous" transept, where the colonnades stop at the height of the transverse aisle and where no architectural division is involved; (2) the "compartmental" (generally tripartite) transept, where partitions, organized in various ways (resting on massive pillars or on a colonnade of different rhythm from that of the aisles), extend as far as the apse, the division of the quadratum populi into compartments; and (3) the "enveloping" or "cross" transept, where the colonnades carry on, enclosing the central space and extending the aisles around the enlarged nave. Then the junction of the roofs poses various problems. The first type normally involves a double-sloping transverse roof. In the other two there may be a raised central element at the crossing, such as a lantern with trusses or sometimes a cupola (see below). The tables of comparative models in A. Orlando's handbook may be consulted on this point. The raison d'être and function of the transept have aroused endless debate but seem to vary according to cases. At the Vatican and in the great martyria, it may be connected to the need of pilgrims to circulate in order to approach the holy tomb or *relics. But it also existed in urban churches. In Greece the arms of the transept seem in some cases to have replaced (with suitable alterations) the service rooms for the clergy or for the collection of offerings. It is better to conclude with P. Lemerle that the transept corresponds more to an occasional amenity than to an actual necessity, but analysis remains open.

III. Liturgical arrangements in the church. The main difference between contemporary meeting rooms and Christian basilicas is due to liturgical needs influencing internal layout rather than to architectural technique. Yet here too the variety of local customs meant the absence of a single type of layout.

1. The position of the altar. The main element of a church intended for community meetings for the eucharistic synaxis was the altar (which was of course inside the building, while the pagan altar of sacrifice was in front of the temple), but altars very soon appeared also in cemeterial churches or churches dedicated to a martyr. Alternatively, the custom of placing the relics of one or more saints in or near the altar of an urban basilica also spread quickly, particularly in Africa. This deposition of relics became an essential element, no doubt at first the only element, of the dedication of churches, which explains why the patronage of saints replaced more neutral designations: ecclesia or basilica or sometimes an adjective taken from the builder's name. In a church devoted to the cult of a martyr, the altar was linked with the position of the tomb or cenotaph, whose vicinity was sought (sometimes by supposition), as in the Vatican basilica. In an urban basilica, the position was in principle freer and depended on the desired relationship between clergy and congregation. We observe great regional variety and, contrary to what was held at the time of the liturgical reforms of Vatican II, the usage of the early Christian period can provide no rule either for layout or for orientation, since in one and the same region we note that the priest sometimes turned his back on the congregation and sometimes faced them, at least in the few cases where his position is confirmed by sure material evidence. In general the altar was rarely, as it has been in Western churches until recently, in the apse, which usually accommodated the clergy, whence the name presbyterium (see below). The only exceptions are represented by small chapels and by two or three regions: NW Syria, where the altar was often in the raised apse, sometimes against the back wall; Spain, where the altar was situated, at least in the 5th c., at the center of the apse, which was generally not raised; and sometimes Dalmatia. The most frequent position, esp. in the Aegean, the Balkans, Syria, Palestine and Italy, was in line with the apse or slightly forward of it, on a podium, at the same level as the apse or in a small enclosure connected to it. In N Africa and sometimes in the N Adriatic, the altar could be in the middle of the nave in an enclosure which was either separate or connected to the apse by a corridor, but in time we notice in Africa a tendency to bring it closer to the apse, as in the previous type.

2. The form of the altar and the ciborium. It is quite clear that the Christian altar is directly derived from the Roman dining table. Its appearance is often so similar that it is difficult to distinguish them in museums and archaeological repositories without a sure place of origin or specific sign and inscription. The most common form was the rectangular marble slab with molded margins (thus the surface was not flat), nearly always resting on four feet, sometimes more in the case of large tables, at an average height of one meter. But other forms were also used, like those adopted in late dining rooms where couches were arranged in a semicircle: the semicircular or circular form. This form has wrongly been named "Coptic," because the first examples found were still in use in the churches of Egypt. Examples have now been found throughout the Mediterranean. One particular category, which may or may not have been an altar, was decorated with sculpted motifs on the border. Another had molded lobes on the upper part, forming something like fixed plates (a custom perpetuated in a series of Romanesque altar tables in SW France). These marble slabs nearly always rested on small columns of the same material, with base and (simple) capital carved in the same stone, fixed on a base of masonry or stone or in the floor. The execution of these tables and their accessories was carried out in the great imperial quarries of the E Mediterranean (Proconnesus, Thasos etc.) and were widely exported as far as the extreme West. Besides this common form, we find altars with one foot, resting, e.g., on a column shaft (a type preserved esp. in medieval Spain). There were also "block altars," in which the table rested on a stone chest which could enclose relics, generally open on one side to allow them to be seen and, if necessary, touched. A variant of this type was in common use in the 6th c. at Ravenna and in the N Adriatic. There could also be "cippus altars," where the table was supported by a massive stone block (sometimes with a niche cut out for a reliquary). It often happened that pagan cippi and funerary altars were used as bases, e.g., in S Gaul or at Mactar in Tunisia. Finally we should mention the "tomb altar," where the flat surface was placed directly over a sarcophagus, as sometimes in the catacombs. The altar was usually covered by a light structure, a ciborium or canopy, which generally also protected the priest's place (which can thus be determined). It often happens that altar bases and supports are found, generally on a square plan. Upper parts are known only in the form of fragments but can be inferred from the form of the coping (flat, conical, pyramidal) of the early medieval ciboria of Italy or Dalmatia.

3. Relics: crypt, loculus, confessio, martyrium. We have said that the altar could surmount or mark the position of one or more holy tombs or of a mere cenotaph (commemorative monument). This was above all the case of St. Peter's in the Vatican and the majority of martyrial buildings. In N Africa burials are often found under or in proximity to the altar: in most cases we cannot say whether the tomb motivated the construction of the altar or vice versa (burial ad sanctos). It was soon sought to make the burial accessible to sight and touch, either through a simple conduit (at the Vatican) or in a pit under the altar (often called a confessio) or in a room beneath the apse, when there would be built, to make possible at least the sight of it, an opening provided with a grill of metal, wood or stone, often called fenestella confessionis: some inscribed and decorated examples of these have been found. At Rome and in Italy, crypts intended to permit direct pilgrimages to the holy tomb, flanking the foundations of the apse (annular crypt), do not seem to predate the 6th c. (St. Peter's), but earlier crypts have been found, esp. in Africa, which seem to be intended for venerated burials (Dougga in Tunisia, Djemila in Algeria) and sometimes organized for pilgrimages with a complex route (Djemila). But in general the relics, which were rarely bones but more often "material" mementos like earth or an impregnated cloth, and which were enclosed in one or more caskets (generally a box of precious material enclosed in a coffer of stone, marble or terracotta), were under the altar slab (not inside it, as has been the case since the Middle Ages). The position varied according to the type of altar and the region. The coffer might be inside the molds in block altars, inside the support in one-footed and cippus altars, usually in the base (often in Africa), but sometimes under the base in an inaccessible cavity (sometimes in a column shaft or a stone hollowed out to receive it). The cavity was larger and became a "relic pit," which could have a stair for access (though not for the public), mainly in Dalmatia, Greece, Constantinople, Asia Minor and Palestine. It sometimes took on the appearance of a baptismal font (esp. cruciform) and may be confused with it (e.g., at Iunca in Tunisia).

In contrast to the modest-sized casket, originally not visible, at least not entirely, was the reliquary in the form of a sarcophagus, called an "oil reliquary," sometimes of large dimensions and made to be exposed and accessible to the public. It had either a single hole at the top for the introduction of brandea (strips of cloth to be impregnated) or one hole at the top and one at the side, which allowed the circulation of liquid (usually oil), which was collected after passing over the relics and taken away in containers (ampullae-eulogiae). These great reliquiaries were particularly frequent in Syria and were separate from the altar: they were exposed in a room specially set aside as a martyrium, to the right of the apse in the limestone massif of NW Syria, to the left in Apamene. The same arrangement sometimes seems to be found in Asia Minor, Lebanon, Palestine and as far as Cyrenaica, where we see reliquiaries exposed to the public (e.g., in niches) in the rooms or lateral apses of the presbytery. The veneration of relics in places further from the apse involves analysis of the functions of annexes (see below).

4. The sedilia of the clergy. Even in cemeterial churches, celebrations supposed the collective presence of a fairly numerous clergy, for whom fixed sedilia were created at least from the 5th c. and doubtless even before. These were generally one or more benches, arranged in ascending tiers as in a theater, above footrests, and commonly called synthronos or synthronon. The bishop, who could also be provided with a throne outside the cathedral church and his episcopal city, sat on a prominently placed cathedra, higher and made of more sumptuous material, which could be integrated with the collective sedilia. The most common type was the semicircular synthronos backing onto the wall of the apse and dominated by an axial cathedra. It was much more frequent than was once thought since, when made of light material, sometimes largely of wood, it has left few traces, e.g., mere slots in the wall for beams (in Cyrenaica). For a numerous clergy or when a raised chair occupied an unraised apse, the steps could reach a great height and were sometimes provided with an empty space or a service corridor which allowed circulation under the benches (well-preserved example in St. Irene, Constantinople).

In Greece and neighboring regions, but also sporadically in Syria-Palestine and once in Africa (Sbeitla), the steps were sometimes arranged on a rectangular plan, in front of the apse and at the sides of the altar. This "rectangular type" seems older than the semicircular type from the observations made both in Greece and at Sbeitla, where the two forms coexisted or succeeded each other.

In N Syria, where the main altar was in the apse, the clergy could not be placed there; they sat on a semicircular platform surrounded by a sedile usually connected to a pulpit, in the center of the nave, sometimes at a great distance from the apse and facing it. It is wrong to give this particular type of bema (tribune) the name of "Syrian ambo" (J. Lassus, G. Tchalenko), even if it partly played the role of an ambo: it was essentially a synthronos taken out of the apse and turned back to front. In Spain, another region where the altar was in the apse, the clergy were grouped in a presbyterium outside the apse. According to liturgical texts and archaeology, this was an enclosure in front of the apse, but no fixed sedilia have been found. In the areas dependent on the patriarchate of Aquileia or influenced by that metropolis (N Adriatic, E Alps, Salona in Dalmatia), churches were long built without apses. Near the back of such churches we find semicircular sedilia, either separate or connected to the altar enclosure. These "free sedilia" are known mainly from traces of foundations. Whether they were completed by a light vault, a sort of internal apse, we do not know. Sedilia or fragmentary benches are also found in apses (e.g., at Iunca in Tunisia). Synthronoi can be found in chapels attached to churches, in side apses (e.g., at Iunca) and in apses at the ends of the narthex (see above). Esp. in Greece and the Balkans, we often recognize benches along the walls of the aisles or in the rooms. But in this case they were no longer intended for the clergy.

5. The ambo. For preaching and reading, some regions of the Christian world used a raised tribune or ambo, placed in the middle of or facing the congregation, which may also be called a bema (platform, a term sometimes also applied to the altar platform or to that on which the priests sat), pulpitum (pulpit, reading table), etc. In any case the ambo was unknown in Africa W of Tripolitania, where the bishop seems to have spoken from the apse, and in Spain, where the clergy were in the enclosure in front of the apse. It was rare in Syria-Palestine, in the classical sense of the term, but in N Syria its function was linked to that of the presbyterium in the semicircular exedra of the nave, generally given the name of "Syrian ambo" (see above).

The ambo's place in the nave and its distance from the altar enclosure varied. It could be on the axis of the nave, sometimes far forward. This was so in Hagia Sophia (central plan), where a gallery joined it to the choir (see below, solea), and other churches in Constantinople, Asia Minor and the Greek islands. This arrangement occurs sporadically also in the West (Boppard, Trier, Geneva, Lavant in the Tyrol etc.). In other regions it was out of the axis, either irregularly (Tripolitania) or consistently, as, e.g., J.P. Sodini has established for the Balkans; in S Greece (Achaia), it was more often to the N of the nave (i.e., to the left in an oriented church); in the N Balkans, it was generally to the S (i.e., to the right). In Palestine and Cyrenaica too, we find ambos connected to the altar enclosure and projecting from it slightly or not at all. Finally, we know some cases of double ambos, either probably successive (e.g., Philippi in Macedonia, where we often see a small ambo linked to the choir and another external ambo, of classic type), or contemporary (e.g., one on each side of the "choir," as would frequently happen in medieval Italy); it seems that in some buildings the ambo could be replaced by one or more lecterns (e.g., the double table at the entrance to the choir in S Palestine and W Galilee).

The ambo could be a small platform, sometimes monolithic and very slightly raised, with two or three access steps. The most common Greek type was an oval platform (sometimes supported by small columns), enclosed by cancelli (see below) and completed by two access stairs to the W and E. The Ravenna type was much taller, thus allowing important sculptural decoration on one or two faces of the "body." At *Thessalonica and in *Macedonia we find a rare "fan" type with raised and curved tribune, completed by two stairways, also round (an example famous for its sculpture is St. George's in the Istanbul Museum). A round, monolithic and more soberly decorated type exists in Asia Minor. The plinths cited in the West, the only ones preserved, are also semicircular or almost circular. The pulpits of medieval or modern churches differ little in role and in form from ancient ambos, but the latter generally consisted of marble slabs joined together. These slabs, like those of cancelli, were mass-produced in specialized marble quarries, esp. those of Proconnesus and Thasos, and widely exported.

6. Enclosures and barriers, choir, cancelli and solea. The great variety of liturgical arrangements described implies differences in the internal organization of the churches: it was a matter of protecting the places reserved for religious objects: main altar, venerated tomb, sometimes another center of worship, e.g., a martyrial altar; places for those who performed the service, i.e., the clergy, and, if necessary, for other privileged categories of the congregation; and of ensuring a connection between them that was protected from the movements of the crowd. If necessary, these spatial partitions involved differences in level (raised or unraised apse, altar platform, ambo). The specialized literature speaks fairly indifferently of the raised parts of the bema, which may refer to the apse, the altar table or the ambo. The protection sometimes added to the raised part generally consisted of a barrier one meter high called a cancellus, but it could assume a monumental character, particularly in the façade of the choir, and consist of a colonnade (generally of posts with or without a monolithic baluster, with arcades or newels or an architrave). It was this type of façade, which could be supplemented by hangings, that the Greeks called templon and the Italians pergola (well represented in N Italy or in medieval Dalmatia); it was the ancestor of the Orthodox iconostasis. When the barrier was low, it could be of wood (generally, except in Egypt, only the imprints remain) or metal or stone. The most common type was made of newels with various terminations (spheres, balls, cones, cubes etc.) and with a system of panels, decorated or not, slotted in. The same type served as a balustrade in the tribunes. The decoration of the marble slabs, mass-produced in the eastern quarries (Proconnesus, Thasos etc.), was stereotyped in the 5th and 6th c., and numerous examples remain in loco (Constantinople, St. Mark's in Venice) or in museums. More decorative models are known, e.g., esp. the openwork panels preserved in the Museo Nazionale di Ravenna. The barriers were interrupted naturally by entrances closed by doors, generally of metal, or by chains. There were upright cancelli in the apse, esp. when this was raised, and around the space reserved for the altar. The most common type was a quadrangular enclosure the width of the apse and set in front of it, with an axial opening (generally to W) and two side openings permitting passage across. But this enclosure could be separate from the apse and very far away when the altar was in the center of the nave. In this case a corridor, protected by two barriers, would provide a link. This type of enclosure is usually called a "choir," from the name given to the group of cantors (chorus) who took part in the liturgy—which is ambiguous since the choir sometimes occupied an enclosure distinct from that of the altar (e.g., in Spain)—or sometimes a "sanctuary" (a name also given by some to the apse). A corridor, generally called by Italian specialists a solea (from the name given at Hagia Sophia, Constantinople, to the bridge joining the enclosure wall to the ambo) sometimes led off from the altar enclosure. In effect, there was sometimes a corridor which ensured the link between the choir and an ambo in the axis. But a short corridor might be intended only to protect the axial entrance to the choir, while a long corridor could ensure the link either with the main door for processions (a case not archaeologically proven) or with a second center of worship (see below: double apses). Finally, there are cases of double enclosures, the second one of equal length (examples in Lebanon) or slightly less wide than the altar enclosure. This secondary type is well attested in Roman churches and is usually called schola cantorum, since the clerics responsible for the sung part of the *liturgy were placed here from the early Middle Ages on. The organization of the church could be much more complex still. It often happened that the altar was protected either inside the choir by a second enclosure (between the columns of the ciborium) or outside the choir; other enclosures delimited sectors perhaps reserved for privileged categories (an African inscription speaks of cancellus virginum: for consecrated virgins?); in Africa, Greece and Spain, we also see cancelli completely cutting off the aisles from the nave, which seems reserved for the movements of the clergy.

7. Distribution of the congregation in the church. Tribune and matroneum. There has been much discussion of the distribution of the congregation in the church, particularly concerning the cancelli and tribunes or galleries (see above). The texts are uncertain and too vague and mostly list categories of clergy or of those associated with them (consecrated virgins and widows), perhaps implying a material division. Many authors admit a separation between men and women, adducing material evidence for it, e.g., the existence of two decorated side doors of different size in some N Syrian churches; the presence of tribunes said to be reserved for women as in the ceremonial of Constantinople and for this reason called matronea; or the multiplication of cancelli. These indications are insignificant. Tribunes were unequally distributed: frequent in Greece and Asia Minor, they were rare elsewhere and appeared in Rome only in the 6th c. In some cases, as in the citadel of Haidra (Tunisia), they may have had the purpose of increasing the capacity of a small building or one in which much of the nave was occupied by liturgical enclosures. Some multiple cancelli were due to the complexity of liturgical requirements (see above) or are simply inventions based on badly interpreted evidence (e.g., Dermech I at Carthage). Study of the distribution of burials in churches (e.g., at Haidra) does not allow us to confirm any division of the congregation by sex.

8. Secondary installations. Besides the essential elements listed above, the texts (Liber pontificalis for Rome) and archaeological finds show how the layout of churches could, from a relatively late date, involve several altars (see below: double apses) or at any rate secondary installations such as offering tables. (Discovery of numerous fragments of different tables is frequent.) Some funerary churches can contain mensae martyrum, in Africa, or simple funerary mensae, tables accompanied by benches for the agape* (in Africa and the Balkans). We must not forget that the church building could serve many uses: place of refuge, of banquets held for the poor, or seat of councils and synodal assemblies. We may also mention some rare cases of holy water stoops or alms boxes (to which some texts give the erudite and uncommon name of gazophylacium).

9. Votive offerings—lighting. Literary (Liber pontificalis again) and iconographical evidence and archaeological finds also allow us to describe the utensils, either purely votive and decorative or for the lighting that hung from ceilings and vaults. The usual instrument for lighting early Christian churches was the "crown of light" (corona lucis, polycandelon) which consisted of a series of lamps (usually glass bowls) supported by one or more metal circles (see the lamps of mosques or Orthodox churches). These utensils, sometimes of precious metal, could be combined with or supplemented by votive crowns, Christian symbols or metal inscriptions.

IV. The baptistery.

1. Baptistery and cathedral. In the primitive church, *baptism was reserved to the bishop and was generally given to adults at an advanced age, sometimes at the point of death (the famous case of Constantine), and was generally by immersion. Often, in consequence, some have wanted to identify a cathedral by the discovery of a baptismal font. This conclusion has now been superseded. The multiplication of rival sects each led by a bishop explains how more than one "cathedral" could be found in the same city. (Rivalry is particularly well attested in the East, the Balkans, Italy and Africa for the *Arian heresy, and Africa for *Donatism.) It also seems that, very early on, numerous urban churches belonging to the same community, cemeterial or monastic churches, and rural churches (e.g., in Spain), may have simultaneously had baptisteries.

2. Position of the baptistery. The baptismal font was not generally in the church, as it was from the Middle Ages. The few exceptions (e.g., Bulla Regia in Tunisia) must be explained by a particular evolution of the church building, though in certain regions we recognize the very early use of small portable fonts (e.g., in Spain). Normally the baptismal rite implied the nudity of the *catechumen and so supposed privacy. But the position in relation to the church varied greatly. The baptistery might be a place directly attached to the church and could then be near the façade (association with the narthex is frequent in the Balkans) or near the apse (e.g., in a "sacristy" in the vicinity of the apse, or behind the apse and on its axis in a series of African buildings) or on one side.

When the baptistery was a separate building, its position varied: ideal models include behind the apse and on its axis (e.g., Siagu in Tunisia), beyond the atrium but still on the axis (Aquileia or Parentium in the Adriatic), and between two parallel churches (Grado). A direct or indirect link with the cathedral church was normal since the rite supposed the immediate participation of the baptizand in the synaxis.

3. Form of the baptistery. When the baptistery was a room attached to the church, its form could be neutral (a simple rectangle). Sometimes an apse was added, which could contain the bishop's chair or an altar (see below). The ideal form of the separate baptistery (e.g., the Lateran), sometimes also of that attached to a church, was a central plan, inherited from the common forms of mausoleums, baths or palace vestibules: square, circular, polygonal, polygon inscribed in a square (with corner niches), tetraconch, triconch, etc., with the pool occupying the center. The central part of the room could be raised; i.e., it could have a row of internal columns supporting a lantern or the drum of a dome and separating the pool from a peripheral ambulatory (as in the baptisteries of Provence). At a later date Christian symbolism was applied to earlier forms: particularly often cited are *Ambrose's verses for the octagonal baptistery of *Milan, which seems to have been imitated, esp. in N Italy, from the end of the 4th c. For the geographical distribution of these different forms, see Khatchatrian's table of inventories.

4. Form of the font. The baptismal pool was a basin derived directly from those of the thermal bath or the pools of peristyles. Their form, dimensions and depth varied according to time, the dimensions of the room and the baptismal rite. In general we observe an evolution from simple forms (circular or square) to complex symbolic forms (cruciform and quadrilobate), passing through polygonal forms (esp. hexagonal and octagonal). The polygonal form is well attested from the end of the 4th c. in N Italy in baptisteries which are also polygonal. Cruciform shapes were used esp. in the Byzantine era (6th c.). Almost exclusive to N Africa is a series with more than four lobes (6, 8 or 12), also of Byzantine date, which should perhaps be compared with polylobate altar tables on account of the link between the altar and the baptismal font, both instruments of *redemption.

In Spain, complex but less regular forms also exist, made up of several fonts (see below). The majority of fonts were dug into the floor and consisted of a brick or stone nucleus, covered by a waterproof layer that might be decorative (mosaic, marble). They often had a projecting parapet and inner and outer steps for descending and ascending. (Sometimes the steps went around the entire font.) The average depth varied between 1 meter and 1.30 meters but could also be much less, not allowing the complete immersion of an adult. Few had an arrangement for filling; more had a hole for draining, which suggests that their users were often content with a symbolic quantity of water, or with aspersion (or sprinkling). A series of fonts in limestone countries (Asia Minor, Syria, Palestine, Rhodes, Minorca) are monolithic. Like the altar, the font was often surmounted by a ciborium, generally square or rectangular but sometimes circular or polygonal, related to the form of the pool.

5. Double fonts—evolution of the baptismal rite. Cases are known in various regions of double baptismal fonts, generally of different depths and dimensions. In some cases they represent two successive phases. At S. Pereto in Majorca (Baleari), P. de Palol supposes that two cruciform fonts may have been used together. When a small font is joined to a large pool, some have thought in terms of a basin for preliminary ablutions, for the oil of anointing, for baptism of children; the question remains open. In Spain, some composite fonts made up of a main pool and minor additional fonts suggest, according to Th. Ulbert, an evolution which a study of the liturgical texts seems to confirm; there may have been a change from immersion to effusion (pouring) and then back to immersion, and the age for baptism changed. Composite fonts would have been made for the immersion both of adults and of the newborn and would be late (6th c.). In any case the different dimensions and depths according to times and regions point to a great variety of rites.

6. Secondary installations, annexes, crossings. The baptistery itself might contain a table (for placing oil used for anointing) or even an altar, sometimes in a small apse (e.g., Grado in N Italy, Casa Herrera in Spain). Sometimes this apsidiole seems intended rather for the episcopal cathedra (see above). It quite often happened, esp. in Africa, that a room or an apsed chapel provided with a presbyterial bench or an altar (Dermech at Carthage) was added to the baptistery. Some think, without proof, that this installation was intended for the preliminary education of the catechumens (catechumeneum), or for the anointing of the newly baptized by the bishop (consignatorium). Some baptisteries were supplemented by a thermal installation, esp. in Africa, and by rooms with no particular furnishings (sometimes benches), thought to be changing rooms or waiting rooms for catechumens (Spanish texts call them "sheepfolds"). The arrangement of the different rooms, connected to each other and to the church, and the arrangement of the doors or of the steps for entering and leaving the pool, allow us in some cases to recognize the route of the processions of catechumens and clergy during the ceremony (attempts by E. Dyggve for Salona, N. Duval for Africa, Th. Ulbert for Spain).

V. Various annexes.

1. Funerary chapels, martyria attached to the church. We see in the early Christian era the rise of the custom, widespread in the Middle Ages, of surrounding church buildings with "chapels" or secondary sanctuaries. Some were intended to accommodate relics and could have the form of a martyrium, e.g., the triconchs near the apse at Grado and Parentium (Adriatic) or at the sides (Tebessa in Algeria). Their role might differ little from that of a counterapse (see below). Others, particularly in cemeterial churches, contained family or privileged tombs and might even have a monumental aspect like the mausoleums of the imperial family attached to St. Peter's or to the Christian churches of S. Agnese and the Via Labicana (Rome). As an example of radiating plans formed by this circlet of chapels, we may cite the church near Kelibia (Tunisia) or the Basilica Apostolorum of the Via Appia at Rome. It could happen that the funerary chapels too contained liturgical installations.

2. Other annexes. The episcopal palace. The church building was rarely isolated in the early Christian era: it was often surrounded by various annexes and installations added to the baptistery. But the study of these groups is possible only where the ruins are well preserved and unencumbered by later buildings (N Africa, Syria, Asia Minor, sometimes the Balkans), and it has only just been initiated by archaeologists, who are still mainly interested in monumental architecture. We can cite examples like those of Geneva, Sbeitla in Tunisia, Djemila and Tipasa in Algeria, Mampbis-Kurnub and Shivat (Negev), Gerasa (Jordan), some centers in N Syria, Side (Pamphilia), Nea Anchialos, Philippi (Greece), Stobi (Macedonia), Heraclea (Macedonia), Caricin Grad (Serbia), and Salona (Croatia). In some cases we can make out utilitarian installations (granaries, storerooms and distribution rooms, like the auges rooms in Africa and the Negev) and dwellings, sometimes sumptuously decorated like contemporary houses (Heraclea Lynkestis), called episcopal palace or episcopium. Great monastic complexes (e.g., Qalaat Seman in Syria) or places of pilgrimage (Tebessa complex in Algeria?) also cover a vast area and sometimes show an even greater variety of buildings.

VI. Particular forms of church building.

1. Double apses and double choirs. Mainly in Africa and Spain, we know a series of churches with two opposed apses (beginning with Orléansville, already cited). In Africa, N. Duval's detailed study of the series has demonstrated that the two apses are not contemporary. The erection of a second apse at the front (inside or outside) may have been due to the need to reverse the orientation of the churches originally facing west. It seems more often to have been related to the creation of a center of a martyrial cult inside the building, a center which elsewhere might be placed near the apse (N Syria) or in an annexed building. In Spain we know at present, in the S, four churches provided with apses apparently contemporary with the construction of the church. These churches, generally very small, show a common typology, with side entrances preceded by galleries parallel to the building. According to Th. Ulbert, the second apse would also have a martyrial function. The form with two opposed apses recurs twice in the Mozarabic period (10th c.). As well as those double apses we find, in both Africa and Spain, cases of "double choirs," where the second center of worship was confined to a platform or enclosure near the front. The arrangement with two apses or two choirs generally supposed a circulation between the two centers of worship, ensured by an axial corridor (Spain, Iunca in Tunisia) or by a lateral protection of the whole central aisle (Sbeitla in Tunisia). It was also connected with a rearrangement of the entrances to the church (see above for Spain). In another part of the West (Rhineland, N and E Gaul) we see a series of churches with double apse or double presbytery in the Carolingian era, a tradition that would be maintained in the Romanesque period, esp. in Rhineland. We may ask ourselves whether, despite the absence of early Christian evidence in *Gaul, a Western tradition does not exist.

The role played by the opposed apse could also be entrusted to a lateral apse or an annexed building juxtaposed at right angles (triconch martyrium of Tebessa in Algeria).

2. Double churches. In the West, particularly in N Italy, E Gaul and Germany, but also in Africa (Sbeitla, Iunca in Tunisia, Sabratha in Tripolitania, Djemila in Algeria), Greece (Aliki on Thasos) and elsewhere, we know a quite prominent series of double churches consisting of two parallel churches sometimes separated by a space, in some cases containing a baptistery. This arrangement is deliberate, and the two churches are contemporary (already from the 1st half of the 4th c., at Aquileia and Trier in the Rhineland). We give such groups (two churches and a baptistery) the name "cathedral group" or "episcopal group." But the use of the two halls is still disputed: place of synaxis and room for education of catechumens? Bishop's church and "parish" church? Men's and women's churches? Summer and winter churches? And so on. Medieval names sometimes provide a clue. One of the churches is often dedicated to St. Peter or St. Stephen, another to St. Mary (Trier and Paris), and the baptistery to St. John. In many cases (Sbeitla in Tunisia, Sabratha in Tripolitania, Aliki on Thasos) we notice that the two churches are not contemporary. At Sbeitla, it is evident that the larger church was built on a site near the first. Plurality of sanctuaries in a single enclosure was frequent in medieval episcopal and monastic complexes. Extension by the addition of lateral but joined sanctuaries would also be practiced in the middle Byzantine era at Constantinople and in Greece. Sometimes the two churches are arranged one behind the other rather than side by side: this is the case at Heraclea Lynkestis (Macedonia), Gerasa in Jordan and perhaps Paris. (The question is once again open.)

3. Central plans. The central plan used for baptisteries and some mausoleums annexed to churches was also used separately, esp. to hold a relic or a memorial of Christ's life. (Famous examples are the Anastasis of Jerusalem and the Church of Bethlehem.) The forms, inherited from Roman funerary, thermal or palatine architecture, were not new: they were mainly round, polygonal, tetraconch, triconch, or these same forms inscribed in a square. Yet we know little of any value about large central-plan buildings in early Christian architecture. The cathedral of Antioch seems to have belonged to this category, and S. Lorenzo at Milan is now dated to the mid-4th c. Great tetraconchs may have played the part of cathedrals in the Balkans (church of Hadrian's library in Athens, Ohrid in Macedonia) and in Syria (Apamea, Resafa, Bostra). The development of central-plan architecture is datable to the moment when roofing techniques were mastered and when the use of the vault for large spaces prevailed, beginning in the East. We see at first, in a series of classical-plan basilicas in Greece and Asia Minor, a use of the cupola to crown all or part of the sacred building (e.g., Philippi B in Macedonia and St. John's at Ephesus). Subsequently the predominance of central plans prevailed at Constantinople and Ravenna in the time of *Justinian (SS. Sergius and Bacchus, S. Vitale, and Hagia Sophia); it would be maintained throughout the entire development of Byzantine architecture.

4. Cruciform plan. A small number of ancient buildings adopted this particular plan, whose symbolic meaning is emphasized by, e.g., Ambrose. We must distinguish first between the plans of martyria where, starting from a central nucleus housing a reliquary or memoria, four small naves were inserted, the E one of which could be used as a sanctuary: examples are the martyrium of Kaoussié at Antioch, the pre-Justinian church of St. John at *Ephesus, two stylite sanctuaries (with the column in the central nucleus) at Qalaat Seman and Mons Mirabilis in Syria, and the sanctuary of Shechem, according to Arculf. "Free cross" cruciform churches (i.e., with the cruciform plan visible externally) were deliberately built—it would seem—at Milan from the second half of the 4th c. (SS. Apostoli and S. Simpliciano) and perhaps at Constantinople from the time of Constantine (basilica Apostolorum). A type with the four arms terminating in apses appears in the recent excavations of S. Lorenzo at Aosta, comparable to the basilica Probi in Classis (Ravenna) and Church III of Iunca (Tunisia). The cruciform plan with a "free cross" or an "inscribed cross" (i.e., inside a rectangle) became quite popular in the Adriatic area. At Ravenna the church dedicated to the cross (S. Croce) has a clearly cruciform plan. The reasons for the choice of this plan do not seem to be related to the dedication to the *apostles, as was once believed on the examples of Constantinople, Milan and Gerasa (Jordan), since other basilicae Apostolorum do not adopt it. These cruciform churches must be clearly distinguished from churches with transepts (see above) or with lateral annexes, quite widespread in the early Middle Ages in E Gaul and the Alps.

Origins: Ch. Delvoye, Recherches récentes sur les origines de la basilique chrétienne: AIPho 14 (1954-1957) 205-228; N. Duval, Les origines de la basilique chrétienne. Etat de la question: L'Information d'Histoire de l'Art 7 (1962) 1-19; E. Langlotz, Der architekturgeschichtliche Ursprung der christlichen Basilika: Rheinisch-Westfaliche Akademie der Wissenschaften, Vorträge, Opladen 1972 (derived from the RAC article); accounts by B.M. Apollonj and N. Duval in Atti del IX Congresso internazionale di Archeologia Cristiana, Rome 1975, Vatican City 1978. To be supplemented by N. Duval's observations, Urbs, 1961–1962, 67-95; CArch 15 (1965) 207-254; CCAB 25 (1978) 93-122 and 26 (1979) 41-51; FR 115 (1978) 29-62, followed by Ch. Pietri: REAug 1978; P. Testini, "Basilica," "Domus Ecclesiae" e aule teodoriane: Antichità altoadriatiche 22 (1982) 369-398; F.W. Deichmann, Archeologia cristiana, Rome 1993, 71-87; A. Nestori, Riflessioni sul luogo di culto cristiano precostantiniano: RivAC 75 (1999) 695-709. The architecture of the basilica: A. Orlandos, Ἡ ξυλόστεγος παλαιοχριστιανικὴ βασιλική, 3 vols., Athens 1952-1957; P. Testini, Archeologia Cristiana, Bari [2]1980, 547ff.; C. Mango, Architettura Bizantina, Milan 1974 (last ed. Paris 1981); articles by Ch. Delvoye, in RBK; to be supplemented by the congresses of Byzantine studies and Christian archaeology, esp. Atti del IV Congresso internazionale di Archeologia Cristiana, Rome 1938, dedicated to the basilica; R. Krautheimer and S. Ćurčić, Early Christian and Byzantine Architecture, New Haven CT [4]1986; J.C. Picard, L'atrium dans les églises paléochrétiennes d'occident, in Actes du XI^e Congrès International d'Archéologie Chrétienne (Lyon, Vienne, Grenoble, Genève et Aoste 21-28 septembre 1986), Vatican City 1989, I, 505-553; N. Duval, L architecture cultuelle, in Naissance des arts chrétiens. Atlas des monuments paléochrétiens de la France, Paris 1991, 186-219; W.E. Kleinbauer, Early Christian and Byzantine Architecture: An Annotated Bibliography and Historiography, Boston 1992; F.W. Deichmann, Archeologia cristiana, Rome 1993, 89-104; H. Brandenburg, s.v. Basilica, in Enciclopedia dell'Arte Antica, Classica e Orientale. Secondo Supplemento 1971-1994, I, Rome 1994, 616-629; F. Guidobaldi, Sull'originalità dell'architettura in età costantiniana, in Ricerche di archeologia cristiana e bizantina. XLII Corso di cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina, Ravenna, 14-19 maggio 1995, Ravenna 1995, 419-441.

Particular aspects: Internal arrangements: O. Nussbaum, Der Standort des Liturgen am christlichen Altar, 2 vols., Bonn 1965; G. Tchalenko, Bêma. Églises de villages en Syrie du Nord, Paris 1980; J. Lassus: DACL, s.v. Syrie; G. Roux, Tables chrétiennes en marbre: Salamine de Chypre 4 (1973) 133-196; Articles on N Italy and the Adriatic in Aquileia Nostra and Antichità alto adriatiche; by J.P. Sodini in BCH, Athens; specialist articles in RAC and RBK and see also N. Duval, Les Églises africaines à deux absides Paris 1971-; Th. Ulbert, Frühchristliche Basiliken mit Doppelapsiden auf der iberischen Halbinsel, Berlin 1978. The cathedral: H. Geertmann, Forze centrifughe e centripete nella Roma cristiana. Il Laterano, la Basilica Iulia e la Basilica Liberiana: Rend. PARA 59 (1986-87) 63-91; B.M. Apollonj Ghetti, Le cattedrali di Milano ed i relativi battisteri. Nota sulla basilica di San Lorenzo Maggiore: RivAC 63 (1987) 23-89; P. Piva, La cattedrale doppia, Bologna 1990. A definitive revision with regard to different geographical contexts in Actes du XI^e Congrès International d'Archéologie Chrétienne (Lyon, Vienne, Grenoble, Genève et Aoste 21-28 septembre 1986), I, Vatican City 1989. Baptisteries: A. Khatchatrian's collection of plans, Les baptistères paléochrétiens, Paris 1962, very incomplete and often erroneous. See also the congresses of Christian archaeology, esp. the Actes du V^e Congrès International d'archéologie chrétienne, Aix 1954, partly dedicated to baptisteries, and Th. Ulbert, op. cit.; M. Falla Castelfranchi, s.v. Battistero: EAM 3, Rome 1992, 214-227; S. Ristow, Frühchristliche Baptisterien, Münster 1998; the most recent acquisitions in L'edificio battesimale in Italia. Aspetti e problemi. Atti dell'VIII Congresso Nazionale di Archeologia Cristiana (Genova, Sarzana, Albenga, Finale Ligure, Ventimiglia 21-26 settembre 1998), I-II, Bordighera 2001. Double apses: N. Duval, Les églises africaines à deux absides, II, Paris 1973; Th. Ulbert, Frühchristliche Basiliken mit Doppelapsiden auf der iberischen Halbinsel, Berlin 1978 and N. Duval's recension: JbAC 1981. Double churches: J. Hubert, Les cathédrales doubles et l'histoire de la liturgie, article reprinted in Arts et vie sociale de la fin du monde antique au Moyen Âge, 1977, 87-96; volume soon to be published by J.P. Sodini. Martyria, central plans: A. Grabar, Martyrium, 3 vols., Paris 1946-1948, to be supplemented by the most recent studies, esp. the accounts of J.B. Ward Perkins, R. Krautheimer, P. Verzone in Atti del VI Congresso internazionale di Archeologia Cristiana, Ravenna 1962 and Akten des VII internationales Kongress für christliche Archäologie, Trier 1965. Buildings in distinct geographical contexts: An extremely rich picture emerges esp. from the various contributions in Actes du XI^e Congrès International d'Archéologie Chrétienne (Lyon, Vienne, Grenoble, Genève et Aoste 21-28 septembre 1986), II-III, Vatican City 1989; Acta XIII Congressus Internationalis Archaeologiae Christianae (Split - Poreč, 25 settembre–1 ottobre 1994), II-III, Vatican City-Split 1998. Italy: F. Cecchini, La basilica paleocristiana di Fermo: Atti VI Cong. Naz. di Arch. Cristiana, Florence 1986, 443-455; M. Mirabella Roberti, La basilica paleocristiana di Concordia, in Rufino di Concordia e il suo tempo. Atti del convegno internazionale di studi, Concordia-Portogruaro 18-21 settembre 1986, 2, Udine 1987, 93-106; G. Lepore, Edifici di culto cristiano nella valle del Cesano. Pesaro - Ancona. La documentazione storica e archeologica tra tardoantico e medioevo (Studi e scavi, 14), Imola 2000. A systematic and exhaustive update for Rome is: Ecclesiae Urbis. Atti del Congresso Internazionale di Studi sulle Chiese di Roma (IV-X secolo), I-III, Vatican City 2002. France: N. Duval (ed.), Les premiers monuments chrétiens de la France, 1. Sud-Est et Corse, Paris 1995. Spain: L. Olmo Enciso, Arquitectura religiosa y organización litúrgica en época visigoda. La basílica de Recópolis: Archivo Español de Arqueología 61 (1988) 157-178; C. Godoy Fernández, Arqueología y Liturgia: Iglesias Hispánicas (siglos IV al VII), Barcelona 1995; N. Duval, Les relations entre l'Afrique et l'Espagne dans le domaine liturgique: existe-t-il une explication commune pour les "contre-absides" et "contre chœurs"? à propos de Cristina Godoy Fernández, Arqueología y Liturgia: Iglesias Hispánicas (siglos IV al VII), Port de Terragona 1995: RivAC 76 (2000) 429-476. Croatia and Serbia: N. Duval - M. Jeremi - J. Guyon, Caričin Grad, 1. Les basiliques B et J de Caričin Grad. Le trésor de Hajdučka Vodenica (Collection de l'Ecole Française de Rome, 75), Rome 1984; M. Prelog, The basilica of Euphrasius in Poreč (Monumenta artis Croatiae. First Series, 4), Zagreb 1986; N. Duval, L architecture religieuse de Tsaritchin Grad dens le cadre de l'Illyricum oriental au 6^e siécle, in Villes et peuplement dans l'Illyricum protobyzantin. Actes du Colloque, organisé par l'École française de Rome. Rome, 12-14 mai 1982, Rome 1984, 399-481; N. Duval - E. Marin et al., Manastirine. Établissement préromain, nécropole et basilique paléochrétienne à Salone (Collection de l'Ecole française de Rome 194, 3), Rome 2001. Macedonia: B. Aleksova, The Early Christian Basilicas at Stobi, in La Macedonia iugoslava. XXXIII Corso di cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina, Ravenna 15-22 marzo 1986, Ravenna 1986, 13-81. Albania: N. Duval, La basilique de Ballshi (Albanie): Bulletin de la Société nationale des antiquaires de France (1988) 131-135; N. Duval - P. Chevalier, L architecture chrétienne de l'Albanie dans le cadre de l'Illyricum, in L'Illyrie méridional et l'Epire dans l'antiquité, 3. Actes du III^e Colloque international de Chantilly, 16-19 octobre 1996, Paris 1999, 283-304. N Africa: N. Duval, Une nouvelle basilique à double chœur à Hr Guessès, au nord de Timgad: MEFRA: Antiquité 97 (1985) 1065-1078; N. Duval - F. Baratte - J.C. Golvin, Les églises d'Haïdra, 6. La basilique des martyrs de la persécution de Dioclétien. Bilan de la campagne 1983: CRAI (1989) 129-173; I. Gui - N. Duval - J.P. Caillet, Basiliques chrétiennes d'Afrique du Nord. Inventaire et typologie, 1. Inventaire des monuments de l'Algérie (Collection des études augustiniennes. Série antiquité 129-130), Paris 1992; N. Duval, La basilique de Bir el-Knissia à Carthage. Une fouille du pére Delattre redécouverte et réétudiée: Antiquité Tardive 3 (1995) 283-302; N. Duval, L'église V (des Saints-Gervais-Protais-et-Tryphon) à Sbeitla (Sufetula), Tunisie. Recherches de 1954-1963: MEFRA 111 (1999) 927-989; N. Duval, Les monuments chrétiens d'Haïdra: recherches récentes: RivAC 77 (2001) 419-467. Near East: V. Corbo, Il Santo Sepolcro di Gerusalemme, Jerusalem 1982; N. Duval, L'architecture chrétienne et les pratiques liturgiques en Jordanie en rapport avec la Palestine. Recherches nouvelles, in Churches Built in Ancient Times. Recent Studies in Early Christian Archaeology (Research seminar held at the University of London on December 10-11, 1991), London 1994, 149-212. Particular architectural typologies: F. Tolotti, Le basiliche cimiteriali con deambulatorio del suburbio romano: questione ancora aperta: Mitteilungen des Deutschen Archäologischen Instituts. Röm. Abt. 89 (1982) 153-211; Ambrogio e la cruciforme "Romana" basilica degli Apostoli nei milleseicento anni dalla sua storia, Milan 1986; V. Fiocchi Nicolai - M.P. Del Moro - D. Nuzzo - L. Spera, Lo scavo della nuova basilica circiforme della via Ardeatina: Rend. PARA 68 (1995-96) 69-233.

N. DUVAL

CILICIA

I. Christian origins - II. Council - III. Archaeology.

I. Christian origins. A region situated at the SE corner of Asia Minor, between Lycaonia, *Cappadocia and *Syria, integrated into the Roman Empire in 103 BC. Men from Cilicia were among the Jews who disputed with St. Stephen in ca. 36–37 (Acts 6:9). St. *Paul, a native of *Tarsus in Cilicia (Acts 9:11; 21:39; 22:3; 23:34) and in ca. 46 a visitor to his homeland (Gal 1:21), was entrusted with the apostolic letter of ca. 52 which was addressed to, among others, the "brethren of the Gentiles who are in Cilicia" (Acts 15:23), a province that Paul and Silas crossed in ca. 52 "strengthening the churches" (Acts 15:41). A place of deportation of confessors of the faith (Euseb., Mart. Pal. VIII, 13; X, 1; XI, 6), Cilicia counted not a few *martyrs commemorated by the Greek Synaxaria: *Athanasius, *Boniface, *Callinicus, *Quiricus and Julitta, Kyriainē, Clodius and Domnina, Diomede, Dula, Julian, *Hypatius, *Marinus, *Pelagia, Probus, Taracus and Andronicus, Zosimus, Talleleus, Zenaide and Philonilla, to whom we must add the *ascetics *Romanus, *Simeon Stylites, Theodosius and Talleleus. In the 3rd c., the churches of Cilicia were involved in the *Novatian *schism and the controversy over the validity of *baptism conferred by *heretics (Euseb., HE VI, 46,3; VII, 5,1 and 4). In the 1st half of the 5th c. the province was divided in two: Cilicia Prima, with Tarsus as metropolis and suffragans (*Diodore of Tarsus was its most famous son), and Cilicia Secunda, metropolis *Anazarbus (Bishop *Athanasius is memorable), with eight suffragan sees including Mopsuestia, famous for *Theodore. After the 7th-c. Arab occupation, Christianity (hierarchy mostly Jacobite) gradually died out. Remains of the ancient Christian presence are still visible at Tarsus, Anazarbus, Hierapolis, Coricus, Castabala and Flavianopolis.

DB II, 761-767; EC III, 1610-1612; LTK 6, 144-145; KLP III, 208-209; V. Laurent, Le corpus des sceaux de l'empire byzantin, V, 2, Paris 1965, 369; A. Vööbus, The Synodicon in Syriac Tradition, CSCO 367, Louvain 1975; S. Eyice, La basilique de Canbazlier Cilicie: Zograf 10 (1979) 22-29 and 19 pls.; Elisabeth Alföldi-Rosenbaum, The Necropolis Adrassus (Balabolu) in Rough C., Vienna 1980.

D. Stiernon

II. Council. In 423 Theodore, bishop of Mopsuestia, called a council in Cilicia to condemn *Julian of Eclanum and *Pelagianism: which is surprising, since Julian had been Theodore's guest when he wrote his eight books against *Augustine. Moreover, Theodore too had always held that death and the other consequences of *original sin were proper to the state in which God had created human beings.

Mansi IV, 474; Hfl-Lecl II, 1, 214; Palazzini 1, 285.

C. Nardi

III. Archaeology. Cilicia, now in Turkey, bordered Isauria and was divided in two parts. St. Paul's city of Tarsus was capital of Cilicia Prima. It now has no Christian antiquities, only the memory of the *apostle in a Roman gate bearing his name. Excavations at nearby Küzlü Kule have uncovered *Hellenistic and Roman buildings with 4th-c. Roman tomb inscriptions with crosses (Goldman, Excavations, 384f.). Remains of five churches (5th-6th c.) have been found at Korycos, now Narli Kuyu, with a number of inscriptions (Guyer - Herzfeld, Mon. Asiae Min. ant., II, 94-154; Keil - Wilhelm, Mon. Asiae Min. ant., III, 120; Budde, Mosaiken, II). In Cilicia Secunda churches have been found at Anazarbus, now Anawarza, with mosaic floors; at Hierapolis, at Castabala, now Budrum, and at Flavias, now Kars el Bazar (Budde, Mosaiken, II). Remains of Christian basilicas are in two towns in the Taurus mountains: Mazilik and Akdam (Edwards). Better results have been attained at Mopsuestia, now Misis: mosaic floors of the church, with *Noah's ark and many animals, and scenes of *Samson's life with didactic inscriptions. The martyrium of Sts. Taracus, Probus and Andronicus is thought to have been found. Near Mardin, at Deir Zaʿfaran, are remains of a *monastic complex with graves; at Karylos, remains of churches outside the walls, surrounded by *sarcophagi. Many churches of Cilicia had an atrium, providing an enclosure for churches that could not be locked.

S. Guyer - E. Herzfeld, Monumenta Asiae Minoris antiqua, II, Manchester 1930; J. Keil - A.U. Wilhelm, Monumenta Asiae Minoris antiqua, III, Manchester 1931; H. Goldman, Excavations at Küzlü Kule, Tarsus, Princeton 1950; L. Budde, Antike Mosaiken in Kilikien, II, Recklinghausen 1972; C. Dauphin, Mosaic Pavements as an Index of Prosperity and Fashion: Levant 12 (1980) 112-134; R.W. Edwards, Two New Byzantine Churches in Cilicia: AS 32 (1982) 23-32; S. Hill, Matronianus, Comes Isauriae: An Inscription from an Early Byzantine Basilica at Yanikhan, Rough Cilicia: AS 35 (1985) 93-97; O. Feld, Die beiden Kirchen in Hierapolis Kastabala, I, in Studien zur spätantiken und byzantinischen Kunst, Fest. F.W. Deichmann, Bonn 1986, 77-86; Id., Kilikische Ambone: MDAI (I) 39 (1989) 123-128; S. Hill, The Early Byzantine Churches of Cilicia and Isauria, Aldershot 1996.

B. Bagatti

CIRCUMCELLIONS. A revolutionary movement arising out of religious and agrarian discontent in N *Africa associated with the *Donatist church, particularly in *Numidia and *Mauretania in the 4th and early 5th c. (see Praedestinatus, De haeres. 69, "in partibus Numidiae et Mauretaniae"). Their name was derived from circum cellas, i.e., those who dwelled in or moved around the cellae, or *martyrs' shrines (Aug., Enarr. in Ps. 132, 3) "whence they got their food" (C. Gaudentium I, 28, 32). Certain Catholic writers outside *Africa referred to them as Cotopitae or Cutzupitae (e.g., Isid. of S., Etym. Libri VIII, 53). The origin of this term is unknown, but it might come from a combination of the *Coptic words koté, to "move around" or "wander," and aouet, "*cenobium" (see S. Calderone, Circumcelliones, 107). They epitomized the *apocalyptic *martyr-spirit of the Donatist church. They were regarded as "athletes" (agonistici) and "saints," ever ready for combat with the devil, now seen however as creditors and landowners as well as by Roman magistrates. If they failed to receive death at their hands, suicide, mainly by leaping over a precipice, was regarded as an effective alternative (Aug., C. Gaudentium I, 22, 25; 27, 30; 28, 32; Filaster, Diversarum haereseon liber 57, 85; cf. L. Leschi, À propos des épitaphes chrétiennes . . .). The Catholic writers *Optatus of Milevis (ca. 365) and *Augustine describe their depredations. Optatus describes how in ca. 340, due to the activities of Axido and Fasir, duces sanctorum, "no one could feel secure in his estates, the debtor's bond [chirographia] lost its force. In those days it was impossible for a creditor to exact payment of a debt." Slaves and masters were obliged to change places, and masters had to run before their own carriages (De Schismate Donatistarum III, 4: CSEL 26, 82). Fifty years later Augustine paints a similar picture of circumcellion attacks, only with Catholic clergy and Donatist converts to Catholicism added to their victims (see esp. Ep. 88, 8; 93, 11; 108, 4.18; 111, 1; 185, 4.15; C. Cresconium III, 48, 53; Contra litteras Petiliani II, 83, 184). They roamed in gangs (turmae), armed with clubs (C. Ep. Parmeniani I, 11, 17) called "Israels," and their watchword, Deo Laudes, was more feared than the lion's roar (Enarr. in Ps. 132, 6).

Augustine does indicate, however, that the movement also had a religious aspect. The "drunken mobs" (greges ebrios) of circumcellions were accompanied by sanctimoniales (C. Ep. Parmeniani II, 10, 19; cf. C. Gaudentium I, 36, 46 and Ep. 35, 2). The tombs of circumcellion "martyrs" became *pilgrimage centers (Ad Catholicos Ep. 19, 50). The circumcellions sold *relics of real or presumed martyrs (De opere monachorum 28, 36) and were themselves regarded as "confessors" and "martyrs" (C. Ep. Parmeniani III, 6, 29). Other writers confirm this. Though a Donatist himself, *Tyconius (ca. 380) criticized them for their superstition and described them as wandering from one saint's tomb to another for the sake of the salvation of their souls (quoted by Beatus of Liébana, In Apocalypsin, and cited from T. Hahn, Tyconius-Studien, Leipzig 1902, 68). *Isidore of Seville (d. 636) described them as a "fifth type of monk" (Quintum genus [monachorum] est Circumcellionium qui sub habitu monachorum usquequaque vagantur: De off. eccles. II, 16). There has been much discussion of their possible economic role as day laborers employed mainly for the olive harvest in Numidia (Tengström, Donatisten und Katholiken, 52-56), or of their legal status as an ordo, indicated in Honorius's anti-Donatist edict of 30 January 412 (CTh XVI, 5, 52; cf. J.P. Brisson, Autonomisme et christianisme, 332-334). It would seem, however, that a less legalistic interpretation is preferable, i.e., that ordo is used to indicate a definable group, as tagma is used to describe monks, and not a legal status in agrarian society.

The movement shows how the apocalyptic expectations of part of the rural population of N Africa in the 4th c. found their outlet in the martyr ideal of the Donatist church. The leaders of the latter at first rejected the circumcellions (Opt., III, 4) but later accepted them and even led them. *Schismatic religion was thus associated with radical social reform. While the memory of the circumcellions persisted (see Isid., loc. cit.), there is no evidence for the recrudescence of their activity in Africa in *Vandal or *Byzantine times.

The ancient sources are listed by F. Martroye, Circumcellions: DACL 3, 1692-1710. For inscriptions, see ibid., as well as: L. Leschi, A propos des épitaphes chrétiennes du Djebel Nif en Nisr: Rev. Africaine 83 (1940) 35-40; C. Saumagne, Ouvriers agricoles ou rôdeurs de celliers? Les Circoncellions d'Afrique: Annales d'hist. écon. et sociale 6 (1934) 351-364; A. Berthier et al., Les vestiges du christianisme antique dans la Numidie centrale, Algiers 1942; J.P. Brisson, Autonomisme et christianisme dans l'Afrique romaine de Séptime Sévère à l'invasion vandale, Paris 1958, ch. 4; H.J. Diesner, Kirche und Staat in spätrömischen Reich, Berlin 1963 (with particular essays on the sociolegal situation of the circumcellions); E. Tengström, Donatisten und Katholiken, Göteborg 1964, ch. 1; S. Calderone, Circumcelliones: PP 22 (1967) 94-109; W.H.C. Frend, Circumcellions and Monks: JTS n.s. 20 (1969) 542-549; Id., The Donatist Church, Oxford [2]1971, 171-174; G. Gottlieb, Die Circumcellionen. Bemerkungen zum donatistischen Streit: Annuarium Historiae Conciliorum 10 (1978) 1-15; A. Schindler, Kritische Bemerkungen zur Quellenbewertung in der Circumcellionenforschung: SP 15 (1984) 238-241; A. Gotoh, Circumcelliones: The Ideology Behind Their Activities, in Forms of Control and Subordination in Antiquity: Proceedings of the International Symposium for Studies on Ancient Worlds, Tokyo January 1986, Leiden 1988, 303-311.

W.H.C. Frend

CIRCUMCISION. Ritual removal of the foreskin, practiced by various peoples (see Ep. Barn. 9,6; Epiphanius, Haer. 30,33; Jerome, In Ier. 9,2; Cyril Alex., C. Jul. 9), it became for the Jews the sign of inclusion among the descendents of Abraham, in the people of the covenant, and of submission to the law. The prophets pointed out the importance of circumcision of the heart for being pleasing to God (Lev 26:41; Dt 10:16; Jer 4:4). *Philo interpreted these prophetic texts as an allusion to the renunciation of all sensuality (Spec. Leg. I,1-11, 304-306). The Christians, following St. *Paul, stressed this aspect (see Rom 2:25-29), presenting the circumcision of Christ as the stripping away of everything carnal (Col 2:11): for them it is *baptism, which joins one to the new Israel, the church, the people of God; bodily circumcision was its prefiguration (see Justin, Dial. 29,1 and 41,4; Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. IV,16,1; Ambrose, Abr. I,29; Augustine, Serm. 196A,1; 260,1). Some sects like the *Ebionites and *Cerinthians returned to circumcision (Epiphanius, Haer. 30,26; 33,34). Various Fathers argued against a purely carnal conception of circumcision, opposing it to spiritual circumcision (see Ep. Barn. 9,4-6; Justin, Dial. 41,4 and 43,2; Tertullian, Ad ux. I,2,3; Origen, C. Cels. I,22 and VI,24), which can be defined as "knowledge of God and of his Christ" (Justin, Dial. 28,4), and is manifested in "service to God and cultivation of truth in the heart" (Augustine, Serm. 196A,1). Circumcision according to the flesh recalls symbolically the need for *ascesis and chastity: "cut out the passion of lust" (Ambrose, Abr. 2,91; see also Origen, Hom. Jos. I,7; Methodius, Symp. 1,3).

DTC 2/2 (1905) 2519-2527; F.J. Dölger, Sphragis, Paderborn 1911; O. Cullmann, Le baptême des enfants et la doctrine biblique du baptême, Paris-Neuchâtel 1948; B. Bagatti, L'Église de la circoncision, Jerusalem 1965, 273 (see index); A. Hamman, Le baptême et la confirmation, Paris 1969, 9-10 and 242 (see index); Beschneidung: RAC 2 (1954) 164-169 (bibl.); G.W.H. Lampe (1976) 1074-1076; TRE 5 (1980) 714-724.

M. Maritano

CIRTA (present-day Constantine). Cirta, now Constantine or Kasantina (departmental capital, Algeria), occupies a strategic position on a plateau, in a bend of the Rummel River (or Rhumel, the ancient Ampsaga), 139 km (86.4 mi) SE of *Hippo. Capital of the *Numidian kingdom, under *Augustus it became a Roman colony and then capital of a vast confederation which included three other colonies (Chullu, Milevis and Rusicada). It suffered serious destruction at the time of the war between *Maxentius and *Domitian; it was rebuilt by *Constantine, for whom it is named, in 313–314, and became capital not only of Numidia Cirteana, as it had been until then, but of all of the reunified province. It resisted the *Vandal attacks until 454; after the *Byzantine reconquest it was the seat of the dux Numidiae.

The first sure sign of Christianity is the presence of Bishop Crescens at the Council of *Carthage of 256 (Sent. epp. 8). The victims of *Valerian's persecution are known from the Passio Iacobi et Mariani (BHL 131): they were taken before the governor of Lambaesis, where they suffered *martyrdom; they are recorded in a 6th-c. votive inscription at Constantine (CIL VIII 7924). During *Diocletian's persecution, its Bishop Paul and the subdeacon Silvanus yielded (traditores). In 307 (most probable date), there was a meeting of bishops at Cirta for the ordination of Silvanus (see Cirta, Council of); the acts survive in a document from 320, the minutes of the trial held against Bishop Silvanus before the Numidian consul Zenophilus. The text shows the divisions, reciprocal accusations and suspicions that followed on the persecution. *Augustine calls this document Gesta apud Zenophilum (CSEL 26, 185-97; PL 8, 724-742); it includes, among other documents, a sort of report of the inventory of the goods confiscated from the church during the persecution and tells us something about the local church in 303, the election of the bishop in 307 and the origins of *Donatism in Cirta.

For the next 80 years the church of Cirta fell again into obscurity, reappearing under the name Constantine in ca. 400 when *Petilian was the Donatist bishop and *Profuturus the Catholic bishop, succeeded in 410 by *Fortunatus. Augustine addressed treatises to both. Of the Vandal era we know only Bishop Antoninus Honoratus, who wrote Arcadius a letter of exhortation to *martyrdom in the time of *Genseric (PL 50, 567-570), and Bishop *Victor, who took part in the council called by *Huneric in 484.

PWK 3, 2586-2588; DACL 3, 2713-2732; DHGE 13, 623-625; LTK³ 2, 1303; AugLex 1, 941-942; I. Gui - N. Duval - J.-P. Caillet, Basiliques chrétiennes d'Afrique du Nord, Paris 1992, I, 205-208; Y. Duval, Chrétiens d'Afrique à l'aube de la paix constantinienne, Paris 2000.

V. Saxer

CIRTA, Council of. On 5 March 305, at Cirta in *Numidia (now Constantine, Algeria), a synod of 11 bishops was held to ordain a new bishop of Cirta. Most of the bishops present admitted handing over the Scriptures during *Diocletian's persecution and begged pardon. The oldest member and president, *Secundus of Tigisis, had also lapsed, and so he decided "that everyone should render an account to God of his actions in this matter" (Aug., Contra Cresconium III, 27). Thus excused, they chose as bishop the deacon *Silvanus of Cirta who, like his Bishop Paul, had handed over the Scriptures in 303. Many of these bishops, including Silvanus, later became leaders of the Donatist sect, so keen to denounce traditores everywhere.

Hfl-Lecl I, 209-II; Palazzini 1, 209-211; J.A. Fischer, A. Lumpe, Die Synoden von den Anfängen bis zum Vorabend des Nicaenums, Paderborn 1997, 385-400; Y. Duval, Chrétiens d'Afrique à l'aube de la paix constantinienne. Les premiers échos de la grande persécution, Paris 2000.

CH. MUNIER

CITIZENSHIP, Roman. In addition to freedom (status libertatis), Roman citizenship was an essential condition for the enjoyment of political rights, both private and public. The civis was originally one who lived with full rights intra muros, i.e., inside the city. Later the concept was broadened. Citizenship was acquired mainly by legitimate birth to citizen parents; the son of a peregrinus inherited his father's legal status; a freed slave obtained with his freedom the status of citizen. Citizenship was sometimes granted to whole communities but more often to individuals, in connection with particular services to the state (military services of special merit) or with the political tendencies that dominated from time to time, more or less open to the reception of foreign elements. Between 90 and 87 BC (Social War), the whole population of *Italy obtained citizenship; it was gradually extended until, with *Caracalla's Constitutio Antoniniana (212), it embraced all the subjects of the empire (in orbe romano). The problem of conceding citizenship to all Italians exploded with particular violence in the age of the Gracchi: under the agrarian reform promoted by Tiberius Gracchus, Italians were subject to the confiscation of their surplus portions of ager publicus but were excluded as noncitizens from the redistribution. Roman citizenship included ius honorum (right of access to magistrates), ius suffragii (right to vote in assemblies), right of appeal to the people in criminal cases, right to contract legal marriage, the right not to be tortured and full legal competency. These rights and duties underwent changes, even significant ones, through the centuries, esp. after Caracalla's concession of Roman citizenship to all free inhabitants of the empire in 212. Also important was the distinction between a person's legal status and social status: there could be poor Romans who possessed the privileges of citizenship and slaves or merchants who were not Roman citizens yet were very wealthy and influential. For his part, the Roman citizen was bound to military service and the payment of taxes. In *Justinian's legislation (6th c.), the civis romanus was still the privileged subject. Being a civis conferred a strong social identity and a close bond of belonging; the peregrinus, the noncitizen, however, enjoyed no civil rights (and human rights were linked to these). Christians made ample use of both concepts to speak of an identity and a belonging: they possessed heavenly citizenship, but on earth they were only peregrini, without a permanent home. This new citizenship was acquired with *baptism.

A.N. Sherwin-White, The Roman Citizenship, Oxford ²1973; C. Castello, L'acquisto della cittadinanza e i suoi riflessi nel diritto romano, Milan 1951; La nozione di "romano" tra cittadinanza e universalità, Da Roma alla Terza Roma, eds. P.A. Catalano and P. Siniscalco, Atti del II Seminario intern. di studi storici, Naples 1984; E. Norelli, A Diogneto, Milan 1991; J.F. Gardner, Being a Roman Citizen, London 1993; G. Crifò, Civis. La cittadinanza tra antico e moderno, Bari - Rome 2000.

M. FORLIN PATRUCCO

CLAUDIAN, poet (ca. 370–early 5th c.). Claudius Claudianus was born ca. 370 at *Alexandria in *Egypt and there received an education which provided him with the rhetorical and cultural competence to undertake a great variety of professional services. Claudian distinguished himself from other poets with a similar formation by his complete mastery of poetic Latin. He made his official debut as a Latin poet at *Rome in January 395, with his *panegyric for the consolatio of Probinus and Olybrius, scions of one of the most conspicuous families of the Christian senatorial aristocracy. He then went immediately to *Milan, where the 11-year-old *Honorius had just succeeded *Theodosius (d. 17 January 395). Claudian attached himself to the actual holder of power, the *Vandal generalissimo *Stilicho, whom in a long series of encomiastic poems he exalted as defender of Roman security and values, presenting his actions in the most favorable light. (In this sense Alan Cameron spoke of Claudian as Stilicho's "propagandist.") The last act of Claudian's ten-year run as official poet of the Western court (first at Milan and from 402 at *Ravenna) was his recital at *Rome of the panegyric for the 6th consolatio of Honorius in early January 404; after that date, we lose track of Claudian, and it can reasonably be supposed that a premature death ended his activity during the same year.

In his compositions—even those which do not develop mythological subjects—Claudian often has the *pagan gods intervene, whereas Christianity is absent. In itself, this choice would not be proof of an adherence to paganism: it was in fact consistent with the classical tradition and is reflected in the figurative arts, where the representation of pagan themes is attested even in cases where the work was commissioned by Christians. There is the testimony of *Augustine, however, who in De civitate Dei 5, 26 calls Claudian a Christi nomine alienus; this description is taken up and intensified by *Orosius (VII, 35, 21: poeta quidem eximius, sed paganus pervicacissimus).

In fact, of Claudian's almost 10,000 verses, only 21 hexameters of car. min. 32, De salvatore, have an unequivocally Christian character. Recited at court for the celebration of *Easter, the De salvatore treats the theme of the *incarnation, passion and *resurrection of Christ in classical language and a courtly tone but with an impeccable theology; the poem concludes by invoking Christ's protection over the Augustus. For this poem, which the common MS tradition attributes to Claudian, it is not methodologically proper to deny his authorship—as was done in the past—on the basis of the statements of Augustine and Orosius. Certainly, one hymn to the Savior is not enough to prove that Claudian was a Christian, even if it would be hard to believe that—at the Christian court of Honorius—he would make an open profession of paganism. If propagan sympathies and possible digs against Christianity are identifiable in places in his poems, they are nonetheless veiled and ambiguous references, or refer to persons who were already objects of criticism (Gualandri 1989).

In one case, however, Claudian does make an explicit reference to Christianity: in car. min. 50, an epigram on the pious dux Iacobus, in which, guilty of having criticized him, the poet looks to the saints for support against the barbarians, hoping for a bloodless victory to save him from cutting his verses to pieces. Criticism is divided over the meaning of the poem, in which Claudian displays a good knowledge of the cult of the saints (in particular of those venerated at Milan): some scholars consider it vehemently anti-Christian; for others, the object of his scorn is not Christianity as such but the attitude of the overly devout person in general, more concerned with honoring the saints and *martyrs than with defending the empire.

In any case, whether he nurtured a closet paganism or a Christian façade, it remains significant that, precisely in the years in which the church was exploiting *Theodosius's victory at the Frigido (6 September 394) to establish a relationship of cause and effect between the emperor's faith and his victory, Claudian "de-Christianizes" the victory and attributes Honorius's military successes—and those of Stilicho under him—solely to the latter's value and ability. *Prudentius would oppose this reading, proposed by Claudian in the Bellum Geticum for Stilicho's victory over *Alaric at Pollentia (402), in Contra Symmachum II, 708ff., attributing the victory to the faith of Honorius and Stilicho.

Camers's edition (Vienna 1510) is the first to attribute to Claudian two other Christian poems (Schmidt, 658): the Laus Christi (car. min., App. 20), 30 hexameters which are probably the work of Merobaude, and the miracula Christi (car. min., App. 21), 9 elegiac distichs probably inspired by Prudentius's Dittochaeon. The two Greek poems to the Savior passed down in the Antologia Palatina (AP I, 19 and 20) under the name of Klaudianos, for their versification technique—which follows *Nonnus of Panopolis and is quite different from that of Claudian's surviving Greek verses (Birt LXXIV)—is probably the work of a later author of the same name, active probably in the late 5th and early 6th c.

Editions: T. Birt, MGH, AA X, Berlin 1892; J.B. Hall, Leipzig 1985; Claudii Claudiani Carmina minora, intr., tr. and commentary, ed. M.L. Ricci, Bari 2001. Ed. with Eng. tr. by M. Platnauer, Claudian, I-II, Cambridge, MA [5]1990; the complete edition was edited for Les Belles Lettres by J.-L. Charlet.

Studies: W. Schmid, Claudianus I: RAC 3 (1957) 152-167 (esp. 158-163); Claudianus II, ibid., 168-169; A. Cameron, Claudian: Poetry and Propaganda at the Court of Honorius, Oxford 1970; S. Döpp, Zeitgeschichte in Dichtungen Claudians, Wiesbaden 1980, 24-41; C. Lo Cicero, I carmi cristiani di Claudiano: Atti Accad. Scienze, lettere and arti di Palermo 36 (1976-77) 5-51; I. Gualandri, Alla corte imperiale di Milano nel IV secolo d.C.: riflessi politici del classicismo claudianeo: Archivio storico lombardo 6 (1989) 9-35; P.L. Schmidt, Zur niederen und höheren Kritik von Claudians Carmina minora, in De Tertullien aux Mozarabes. Mélanges offerts à Jacques Fontaine, I, Paris 1992, 643-660; I. Gualandri, Claudiano e Prudenzio: polemiche a distanza, in F.E. Consolino (ed.), Letteratura e propaganda nell'occidente latino da Augusto ai regni romanobarbarici, Rome 2000, 67-105; S. Döpp, Claudianus, in S. Döpp - W. Geerling (eds.), Dictionary of Early Christian Literature, English Translation, New York 2000, 130.

On the De salvatore: Birt, LXIII-LXVIII; L. Alfonsi, Su una fonte del Carmen de Christi Iesu beneficiis di Elpidio Rustico: RFIC 84, 1956, 173-178; Cameron 214-218; Döpp, 25-35; J.-L. Charlet, Théologie, politique et rhétorique: la célébration poétique de Pâques à la cour de Valentinien et d'Honorius, d'après Ausone (Versus Paschales) et Claudien (De Salvatore), in var. aus., La poesia tardoantica: tra retorica, teologia e politica. Atti del V corso di Erice, 6-12 dicembre 1981, Messina 1984, 273-287; Ricci, op. cit., 234-239. On car.min. 50: Cameron 224-227; J. Vanderspoel, Claudian, Christ and the Cult of the Saints: CQ 36 (1986) 244-255; Ricci, op. cit., 286-289; F.E. Consolino, Poetry and Politics in Claudian's carmina minora 22 and 50, in Aetas Claudianea, eds. W.-W. Ehlers - F. Fehgenteu - S.M. Wheeler, Munich - Leipzig 2004, 142-174.

F.E. Consolino

CLAUDIANUS MAMERTUS (ca. 420/430–474). Eminent representative of the renaissance in Narbonese *Gaul at the end of the Western empire. Born between 420 and 430, perhaps at *Vienne; he passed his youth at *Lyon, where he listened to the debates of Bishop *Eucherius (bishop 434–450) and received a literary education together with his lifelong friend *Sidonius Apollinaris, who provides our knowledge of him; he was then a priest at Vienne and collaborator with the bishop, his brother, and animator of philosophical and doctrinal debates among a group of learned friends. Adversary of the semi-*Pelagian *Faustus of Riez, against whom he wrote, ca. 470, De statu animae, dedicated to Sidonius Apollinaris; the work refutes a work of Faustus, today identified as the last part of Epistle 3, which at that time circulated anonymously. In this treatise in three books, making particular use of Plato, *Neoplatonism and neo-Pythagoreanism—perhaps mediated by Apuleius and *Latin translations and compendiums—and among Christian authors, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Ambrose and esp. *Augustine, he refutes, with dialectical rigor and some literary charm, the theory of the material nature of the *soul, accepted earlier by *Tertullian and tenaciously followed by Faustus, and upholds the spiritualist theory of its immateriality. Of Claudianus's two remaining letters, particularly important is that addressed to Sapaudus, a rhetor teaching at Vienne; it gives evidence of the cultural crisis in 5th-c. *Gaul due to widespread negligence and incompetence. Praised by Sidonius (Ep. 14) as a philosopher, orator, poet, exegete and defender of *orthodoxy, he probably wrote other works, including a hymn in trochaic verses and a lectionary, both cited by Sidonius. He is remembered as a rhetor and philosopher by *Gennadius (De vir. ill. 84); his metaphysical speculation on the soul was popular in the Middle Ages up to the time of Abelard and Alan of Lille.

CPL 983-984; A. Engelbrecht, Claudiani Mamerti opera, ed. A.E., Vienna 1885 (CSEL 11); E. Amann, Claudianus: DTC 9, 1809-1811; Fr. Bömer, Der lat. Neoplatonismus u. Neopythagoreismus und Claudianus Mamertus in Sprache u. Philosophie (Klass. Philol. St. 7), Bonn 1936: ed. R. Beutler: Gnomon 13 (1937) 552-558 and R. Philippson: PhW 58 (1938) 1033-1041; E. Harleman, De Claudiano Mamerto Gallicae Latinitatis scriptore quaestiones, Uppsala 1938; Id., La littérature gallo-romaine vers la fin de l'empire d'Occident: Eranos 76 (1978) 157-169; A. Jülicher, Claudianus Mamertus: PWK 3, 2660-2661; W. Schmid, Claudianus Mamertus: RAC 3, 169-179. N.K. Chadwick, Poetry and Letters in Early Christian Gaul, London 1955, 207-210; R. Bossuat, Alain de Lille, Anticlaudianus, Paris 1955; P. Courcelle, Les lettres grecques en Occident, Paris 1948, 223-235; E.L. Fortin, Christianisme et culture philosophique au Vᵉ siècle. La querelle de l'âme humaine en Occident, Paris 1959; M. Simonetti, La produzione letteraria latina fra romani e barbari, Rome 1986, 105-106 (103-148, for a general picture of the historical-cultural milieu); M. Di Marco, La polemica sull'anima tra "Fausto di Riez" e Claudiano Mamerto, SEA 51, Rome 1995; S. Bonanni, Il Contra poetas uanos carmen nel Par. Lat. 7558: RCCM 39 (1997) 71-78; P. D'Alessandro, Agostino, Claudiano Mamerto, Cassiodoro e i Disciplinarum libri di Marrone, in MOUSA, scritti in onore di Giuseppe Morelli, Bologna 1997, 357-370.

S. Costanza

CLAUDIUS, abbot (7th-8th c.). Of the *monastery of St. Eugendus (Saint-Oyend-de-Joux, now Saint-Claude) in the Haut Jura, Claudius lived between the 7th c. and the early 8th. Venerated as a saint, his cult greatly increased in the 12th c. with the inventio of his intact body, and spread quickly beyond the region through the impetus of his most authoritative devotee, King Louis XI of France. His two Vitae are *hagiographical compositions, both written in the 13th c. and accepting a tradition which makes Claudius the first archbishop of the city of Besançon (from 626–633), and then *abbot of the *monastery of Condat (= Saint-Oyend), which he directed for 55 years. It is probable that while the hagiographical texts attributed to Claudius of Saint-Oyend the dignity of bishop of Besançon, the bishop was actually another Claudius who, during the 6th c., took part in the Councils of Epaone and Cione. The modern city of Saint-Claude, which arose near the abbey, is named for him; his feast is 6 June.

The hypothesis advanced by Perrat that Claudius is the author of the sermon for the feast of All Saints preserved in a papyrus envelope at Basel (1 B) seems unsustainable. It was opposed, in particular, by Tjäder, who asserts that the fragment in question contains, rather, a list of "objects and fabrics of various kinds, donated to or extant in some church or monastery" (32), perhaps compiled at *Ravenna in the 1st half of the 8th c. From this point of view, the papyrus fragment of Basel would seem to have no relation with the monastery of the Jura or with its abbot.

If the papyrus comes from Ravenna there is also no reason for it to be associated with Claudius, abbot of Saint-Oyend, of the Tractatoria Cameracensis (inc.: Istae sunt pigmentae quas ad Cameracum debemus comparare), on which see CPL 1312b. It is actually a diploma, written in the Merovingian period and handed down in an appendix to the Statutes of Adalard of Corbie in the MS Paris, BN, 13908,ff. 26-27, which attests to a flourishing commerce in Eastern products in France, in particular papyrus and spices, with which the city of Cambrai was regularly provisioned.

BHL 1840-1847: AASS. Iunii, I, 648-659; G. Duhem et al., Saint Claude. Vie et présence, Paris 1960; BS 4, Rome 1964, cols. 13-17, Il grande libro dei Santi. Dizionario enciclopedico 1, Turin 1998, 453-454. CPL 1312: Sermo in festivitate omnium sanctorum: C. Perrat, Des Pères du Jura à l'humaniste Grynaeus. Le papyrus de Bâle 1B: Bibliothèque d'Humanisme et de Renaissance 12 (1950) 149-162; Id., Le papyrus I B de Bâle: CRAI (1950) 114-116; J.-O. Tjäder, Revisione dei Papiri Latini Basel 1 B–C (P. Grynaeus), Rome 1953; Id., Die nichtliterarischen lateinischen Papyri Italiens, 1, Lund 1955, 37, nn. 53-54; A. Bruckner - R. Marichal, Chartae Latinae Antiquiores, 1, Lausanne 1954, Ia, b.; Patrologia IV, 351. CPL 1312b: Tractatoria Cameracensis: B. Guérard, Polyptique de l'abbé Irminon, 1, Paris 1836, 335; F. Vercauteren, Étude sur les civitates de la Belgique seconde, Brussels 1934, 210-212; H. Pirenne, La fin du commerce des Syriens en Occident: AIPhO (= Mélanges Bidez) 2 (1934) 677-687 (part. p. 679, n. 1); Patrologia IV, 351.

V. Milazzo

CLAUDIUS, emperor (10–54). Born 10 BC at Lugdunum (Lyon) to Drusus and Antonia (daughter of the triumvir Anthony), he avoided politics, perhaps out of shyness, and dedicated himself to historical studies until in AD 41 the praetorians, having assassinated his nephew *Caligula, proclaimed him emperor. Claudius governed honestly and moderately, refusing divine honors and showing formal respect for the Senate, which he nonetheless sought to deprive of power. He granted citizenship to many provincials, conquered *Britain, enlarged the port of Ostia and gave *Rome a superb aqueduct. In ca. 50, he expelled the Jews from Rome for, according to *Suetonius (Claud. 25, 4), causing disorders impulsore Chresto; some scholars think Chrestus is a corruption of Christus; others, perhaps the name of a Jewish agitator. This hit the Jews directly: Aquila and his wife Priscilla had to take refuge in *Corinth (Acts 18:2). In a letter to the *Alexandrians, Claudius forbade the Jews to allow coreligionists to come from *Syria or *Egypt: some see this as a prohibition of Christian missionaries. Claudius first married Messalina, then his niece Agrippina, who made him adopt her son from a previous marriage, Domitius, the future *Nero, as heir over his own and Messalina's son Brittanicus. Claudius died in 54, perhaps poisoned by Agrippina. His reign saw *Paul's missions and the first propagation of Christianity.

H.I. Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt, London 1924; L. Pareti, Storia di Roma, IV, Turin 1955; M. Sordi, Il cristianesimo e Roma, Bologna 1965, 61-66 and 420-421 (bibl.); S. Benko, The Edict of Claudius of A.D. 49 and the Instigator Chrestus: Theol. Zeitschr. 25 (1969) 406-418; M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan 2004; G. Jossa, I cristiani e l'impero romano da Tiberio a Marco Aurelio, Naples 1991; F. Jacques - J. Sheid, Roma e il suo impero, It. tr., Rome-Bari 1992; A. Giardina - A. Schiavone, Storia di Roma, Turin 1999; S. Roda, Profilo di storia romana. Dalle origini alla caduta dell'Impero d'Occidente, Rome 2001.

L. Navarra

CLAUDIUS II Gothicus, emperor (ca. 214–270). Roman emperor 268–270. A native of *Dalmatia, he distinguished himself in 250 as a valiant officer of *Decius, then as general under *Valerian and *Gallienus. On the latter's death the army proclaimed Claudius emperor, which the Senate ratified. He fought the Germans on the shores of Lake Garda; his rout, at Naissus (Moesia), of *Ostrogoths, *Visigoths, Heruli and Gepidi, who had crossed the Danube, earned him the surname Gothicus. In 270, while working to reorganize the unity of the empire, he died at *Sirmium (*Pannonia) during a plague. It seems that Christians were persecuted at *Rome and in *Italy during his reign.

M. Christol, L'empire romain du III^e siècle. Histoire politique (192-325 après J.-C.), Paris 1997; A. Watson, Aurelian and the Third Century, London 1999.

L. Navarra

CLAUDIUS MARIUS VICTORIUS (1st half of 5th c.). Claudius Marius (or Marius Claudius) Victorius (or Victor) was a *rhetor of *Marseille and the author of a rhetorical and didactic paraphrase in three books of the account in Genesis, from the *creation until the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, titled Alethia (The Truth), probably composed under the *Byzantine emperor *Theodosius II and the Western Roman emperor *Valentinian III (see *Gennadius of Marseille, De viris illustribus 61, E.C. Richardson, TU XIV [1896]). The poem is preceded by a precatio (*prayer), structured according to the *hymnic style, in 126 hexameters.

The Precatio is divided into two sections. In the first (vv. 1-100) Victorius sings the high praises of *God, celebrates God's works and makes a profession of the orthodox faith. In the second (vv. 101-126), which concludes with a *trinitarian *doxology, the poet asks God for the necessary help to bring to a happy end the poetic undertaking, the purpose of which is the moral and religious formation of young children (vv. 104-105: dum teneros formare animos et corda paramus / ad uerum uirtutis iter puerilibus annis), to whom he vows to offer a reading book that will replace the cosmogonic stories of the *pagan poets with the Genesis story. The faltering meter and the seemingly improper language are justifiable, as long as faith does not run into dangers: Quod si lege metri quicquam peccauerit ordo / peccarit sermo inproprius sensusque uacillans / incauto passim liceat decurrere uersu / ne fidei hinc ullum subeat mensura periclum (vv. 119-122). The brief prologue of the second book also has a programmatic value. Here the poet claims for himself the right to link the truth to poetic perfecting: nunc hominum mores et iam mortalia uersu / ingressum fas sit ueris miscere poetam (vv. 4-5). Indeed, he exercises this right by amplifying the terse biblical text on original *sin, the flood and *Abraham with fictional narrative elements, scenes of *dialogue and descriptions, and even a number of didactic excursus as well as philosophical and theological reflections, exploiting a broad knowledge of the classical poets (Lucretius, Virgil, Ovid), the Christian writers (*Lactantius, *Ambrose of *Milan, *Augustine of *Hippo, *Prudentius) and especially the paraphrastic poets (*Juvencus, *Cyprian of *Carthage). The folklorist Alexander Krappe argues that in the account of the discovery of fire at the beginning of the second book, it would appear that the poet introduces a *Persian *myth. *Adam and Eve throw stones on the *serpent, who has returned to tempt them, and one of the stones, as it rebounds, produces a spark that ignites a forest.

In the first book, the poet paraphrases the creation account of Genesis, culminating in the creation of the man and *woman, who live blissfully in *Paradise, described in rich detail. Such bliss ceases with the sin of the first parents and their consequential expulsion from the earthly Paradise. With sin as the reason why the humanity loses the capacity to contemplate the world, a new age begins for humanity.

The second book opens with a broad poetic digression on the condition of the first parents after the expulsion from Paradise. The hostile world of nature makes them bemoan the generosity of lost Eden. Bare necessity is at the foundation of human society and progress, as becomes evident with the discovery of metals and agriculture. The paraphrase otherwise accentuates ignorance and the rise of human knowledge, determined by the need to regain the lost ways of thinking. The poet proves that he comprehends the historical conditions that characterize the birth of a civilization as well as the primordial laws of social evolution, and in doing so he positions himself as the Christian counterpart of Lucretius (5,722 ff.). Yet together with knowledge there arise doubt—the father of error—and superstition. Therefore, the poet intones the increase of the human species, its corruption that begins with the fratricide of Cain, and its punishment with the flood. The description of this cosmic catastrophe, which only *Noah survives in his ark, even has an *allegorical significance. As a figure of *baptism, the flood foreshadows the *redemption.

The third book recounts the dispersal of Noah's sons. When they seek to conquer the sky with the Tower of Babel, the Omnipotent, who gives a long discourse in a punitive tone, disperses humanity and impedes the harmony that was based on a common language. On account of their *piety, only *Abraham and his brother Lot are chosen, and lands at *Bethlehem and Shechem are granted to them. In the battle with his predatory enemies, Abraham is celebrated as an epic hero and a *Stoic sage, but Lot is captured; Abraham liberates him and receives the promise of descendants as numerous as the stars. By the time he is a centenarian, the promise is reached. Following a lacuna in the textual tradition, the poem ends with the terrible *judgment of God against Sodom and Gomorrah.

In addition to great poetic force, supremely expressed in the punitive acts of God that are justified by the lex talionis and announced in grand discourses, the insertion of philosophical elements into the biblical narratio distinguishes the poem. The best examples of this are the creation, the rise of human culture, the description of Paradise and the portrayal of Abraham.

CPL 1455. Editions: PL 61, 937-972; C. Schenkl, CSEL 16, 1 (1888) 335-498; P.F. Hovingh, Claudius Marius Victorius, Alethia. La prière et les vers 1-170 du Livre I avec introduction, traduction et commentaire, Groningen 1955; Id., CCL 128 (1960) 111-198.

Studies: Schanz 4, 2, 362-365; Patrologia III, 301-304 (with bibl.); S. Gamber, Le Livre de la "Genèse" dans la poèsie latine au Ve siècle, Paris 1899; O. Ferrari, Un poeta cristiano del V secolo: Claudio Mario Vittorio, Pavia 1912; A.H. Krappe, A Persian Myth in the Aletheia of Claudius Marius Victor: Speculum (1942) 255-260; P.F. Hovingh, La fumée du sacrifice de Caïn et Abel et l'Alethia de Claudius Marius Victorius: VChr 10 (1956) 43-48; A. Hudson-Williams, Notes on Claudius Marius Victor: CQ 14 (1964) 296-310; C. Witke, Numen Litterarum. The Old and the New in Latin Poetry from Constantine to Gregory the Great, Leiden and Köln 1971, 156-161; H.H. Homey, Studien zur Alethia des Claudius Marius Victorius, (Dissertation) Bonn 1972 (see review by S. Costanza, BStudLat 4 [1974] 312-314); R. Herzog, Die Bibelepik der lateinischen Spätantike, Munich 1975; D. Kartschoke, Bibeldichtung, Munich 1975; C. Codoñer Merino, Un pasaje de Alethia 2, 456-481: Helmantica 28 (1977) 87-96; J. Fontaine, Naissance de la poésie dans l'Occident chrétien, Paris 1981, 241-243; G. Malsbary, Epic Exegesis and the Use of Virgil in the Early Biblical Poets: Florilegium 7 (1985) 55-83; M. Roberts, Biblical Epic and Rhetorical Paraphrase in Late Antiquity, Liverpool 1985; A.V. Nazzaro, "Claudio Mario Vittorio" in Enciclopedia Virgiliana, V, Rome 1990, 599-600; D.J. Nodes, Doctrine and Exegesis in Biblical Latin Poetry, Leeds 1993, 39-45; 90-107; Claudii Marii Victorii Alethias concordantia, ed. M. Wacht, Hildesheim 2001.

A.V. Nazzaro

CLAUSULA and CURSUS. A sentence conclusion formed of long and short syllables, stressed or atonal with a regular cadence. In music, cadenza. It marked out the harmonious fluidity of the sentence, which was naturally arranged in small units, stychoi, i.e., short lines. To give a musical flow to a sentence was an exercise learned in rhetorical schools: compositio verborum. It was done after inventio and dispositio, and added a completely personal note. Cicero was a great master of the art of compositio, but his principles were not universally accepted. As a rule, the rhythm was given by the ordered arrangement of longs and shorts (quantitative clausulae), and by the alternation of stressed and unstressed syllables (accentuative clausulae). The terms "metrical prose" for prose characterized by quantity, and "rhythmical prose" for that characterized by stress, are unclear and cause confusion. To distinguish rhythm based on quantity, it was common to use the terms numerus and cursus—the latter dear to the hearts of medieval teachers of ars dictandi—terms which indicated rhythm based on stress and quantity, or on stress when quantity was diminished. These were the sonorous cadences at the ends of sentences. But the term numerus expressed a very complex concept: numerus orationis, the rhythm of oration; numerus poeticus, the rhythm of poetry; numerus cantus, the rhythm of song. Cicero uses the term cursus to indicate the rhythmical rise and fall of speech: cursus orationis (De orat. 2, 10, 39; Orat. 58, 198); cursus verborum (De orat. 1, 35, 161; De orat. 3, 33, 136). Quintilian and Aulus Gellius use it in the same sense.

To put it more subtly, rhythm was obtained by an opportune arrangement of words, in which long and short syllables gave a feeling of reasonable alternation of strong and weak tempi. To Christian authors, rhythm was more important than melos, both in the double form of the play of longs, shorts and stresses, and in the cadences of stresses alone. Of the two elements, melos and rhythm, the latter remained the principal one, as it had a more lasting effect. Rhythm was the principal, the active element, the life and movement of compositio verborum, while melos was the passive element, the inert, resistant matter. Melos was the sweetness of poetry and prose which swayed the human soul, ψυχαγωγία. Melos varied according to the state of mind to be induced and depended on modulations of voice. Quintilian said (1,10,25) that the raising and lowering of the voice served to enthrall the minds of the listeners. *Augustine had wanted to write six books on melos, but circumstances prevented him, depriving us of an important resource. As in De doctrina christiana and De musica, his examination would have dwelt on the authors who preceded him and on the sacred texts.

In terms of stress, the outstanding clausulae are cursus planus, cursus tardus, cursus velox and cursus trispondaicus—the cursus that come from quantitative clausulae. In the cadence of stresses, we should remember to count from the last syllable which, quantitatively, is always anceps, short or long. Cursus planus (stressed on the second and fifth syllables: ígne torrére) comes from the trochaic cretic; cursus tardus (third and sixth syllables: indulgénte vindémia) from the double cretic or the tribrachic cretic; cursus velox (second and seventh syllables: pérdere magistrátus) from the ditrochee preceded by a cretic (the cretic was later replaced by a proparoxytone [a word stressed on the propenultimate syllable]); cursus trispondaicus (second and sixth syllables: ésse videátur) from the first paeon and trochee. The best modern study on clausulae and cursus is that of F. Di Capua (Il ritmo prosaico nelle lettere dei papi e nei documenti della cancelleria pontificia, 3 vols., Rome 1937-1946). Besides the rhythm of the clausulae, we must evaluate other patterns of ancient rhetoric, better known as figures of sound. Otherwise we risk missing the formal values of ancient Christian prose, and even its content.

R.A. Lanham, A Handlist of Rhetorical Terms, Berkeley, CA [2]1991; Historisches Wörterburch der Rhetorik, ed. von G. Ueding, Darmstadt 1992ff., 2,397-405 and 4,1088-1104; Handbook of Classical Rhetoric in the Hellenistic Period 330 B.C.-A.D. 400, S.E. Porter (ed.), Leiden 1997.

A. Quacquarelli

CLEMENT of Alexandria (150–ca. 215)
I. Life - II. Works - III. Doctrine.

Titus Flavius Clemens, rightly considered one of the most important missionaries to the wealthy and educated classes, left little written information about himself, sparsely supplemented by others, e.g., *Eusebius (HE 5, 11; 6, 6).

I. Life. Clement was born ca. 150 and died ca. 215; precise dates are lacking. He is commonly held to have been born at *Athens, though this seems to be just a hypothesis derived from Strom. 1,1,11, where he relates his journeys in search of the best-known teachers of Christianity. We know that he started in Greece, then attended the lectures of a teacher in Sicily, then went to *Syria-*Palestine and finally to *Alexandria. From this we deduce that he became a Christian as an adult and was thirsty for knowledge; from contemporary accounts we know that it was common practice to go in search of the best teachers, and Clement too sought the best school; he would later pour all his knowledge back into Christianity. At Alexandria, he found in *Pantaenus what he had been looking for: a congenial teacher and a refined penetration of the faith with the aid of the science of the time. We must distinguish the school that Clement opened at Alexandria, with its specific character, from the community catechetical schools: it more resembled that which *Justin opened at *Rome in the previous generation. It was for the most part a cycle of conferences, drawn out over years, on philosophical and cultural matters and daily problems of topical interest; entry was in principle open to all. And yet this "new philosophy" made clear, using philosophical terms, the Christian ideal of life. It is not certain that the course ended in *baptism. Clement may have also guided a small group in baptismal instruction, but most participants would have put it off to a later time or neglected it entirely. They did, however, let themselves be guided by the Christian ideal in solving the problems posed by wealth and education. Thus a way was opened to Christianity in the circle of the rich, the highly placed and dominant class, in which the penetration of Christianity had encountered some difficulty. Nor is it certain that Clement was a priest, as might be deduced from the corrupt passage of Paed. 1,37,3, and despite the honorific title of *presbyter conferred on him by his friend Alexander (Euseb., HE 6, 11, 6). In 202/203 the incipient persecution of *Septimius Severus forced him to leave Alexandria again. He took refuge with his friend Bishop Alexander, who at that time presided over a Christian community in *Cappadocia. Later Alexander became bishop of *Jerusalem and as such wrote, in 215/216, a letter to *Origen in which he mentioned *Pantaenus and Clement as being dead, so Clement must have died in this period (Euseb., HE 6,24,8-9).

Clement's person and work were held in great esteem in early Christianity, as is evident from the honorific titles conferred on him: makarios ("blessed") and hagios ("saint"), the latter until the 8th c. He was included as a saint in Usuard's *martyrology (4 December). Since Benedict XIV, he has been left out of the Roman Martyrology, for several reasons. First, Clement and his work have been damaged by his having been considered a presumed teacher of Origen in the Origenist controversies, though he was not strictly his teacher, and many points of teaching condemned in Origen have nothing to do with Clement. This damage was already reflected in the Sacra Parallela, which still cite him with some frequency but no longer give him the titles "blessed" and "saint." It later found peculiar expression in the Decretum Gelasianum* (7th c.?), which, in the face of all reality, numbers him without ado among the *heretics. Given the vast circulation and enduring use of this text, it is no wonder that in the West, after *Cassiodorus, Clement's writings remained practically unused. In the East he was particularly harmed by the condemnation of *Photius, who, conditioned by a certain rigidity and incapacity to think historically, compared the terminology used by Clement and by the 2nd-3rd c. with that of his own period, and thought he could accuse him of *christological heterodoxy. Because of Photius's vast influence, his judgment of Clement's works had a big following, producing a negative effect lasting to our time; so it is no surprise if Clement has been largely forgotten in the East, from Photius on. He did Clement little justice by placing him in his own time and evaluating him only on the basis of attempts to solve problems of that time.

II. Works. Among Clement's surviving works, three (the Protrepticus, the Paedagogus and the Stromata) excel and seem to form a trilogy aimed at clearly explaining the gradual way toward perfection. But this is not the case: in fact the first two, the Protrepticus and the Paedagogus, are so very different in content from the redaction of the Stromata that the theory of a trilogy only barely stands, and thus this opinion cannot be maintained. The first two were written for the publishing market and for the public, while the Stromata was written to illustrate the activity of the school. The "trilogy" theory originated from the fact that Pier Vittori (Latinized to Petrus Victorius), publishing the editio princeps in 1550, casually changed the usual order of the works (that of Eusebius and *Jerome) to that of Protrepticus, Paedagogus, Stromata. This order was followed by Franz Overbeck in his essay Anfänge des Christentums as a tripartite mystical way of perfection, which in practice still continues to condition our judgment of Clement. Considered closely, the Protrepticus is presented, like *Aristotle's lost work of the same name, in the form of a proclamation addressed to educated persons with an interest in Christianity, seen as the true way of life, rather as Aristotle had done for *philosophy in his Protrepticus. The three books of the Paedagogus are a manual aiming to consolidate, broaden and deepen the benefit of faith imparted in baptismal teaching, also addressed to the highly educated. The Stromata, however, must be seen as a work to be used privately for expositions of the work of pedagogy. Clement starts from the rhetorical topos of support for his weak memory; the arguments, repropounded, could serve as pioneering models to initiate a similar didactic experience elsewhere. And yet, through the philosophical arguments discussed, the Capitula present the true solution of the problems in a Christian perspective. No wonder we find so few, or only passing, references to the institutions and *sacraments of the church, though the basic ultimate purpose of the treatment remains true Christianity. While the intention is a description of the Christian ideal, presented in *Stoic terms, Clement emerges from the work as the great missionary to the rich and intellectual, who speaks their language.

The other book worth mentioning, the Excerpta ex Theodoto, shows another, even more marked, side of Clement: his skill in dialogue. Since, as far as we can conjecture, the primitive mission to *Egypt was probably from the start actuated by *Jewish Christian missionaries from Palestine, the *gnostic model of Christianity too was soon preached and, in Clement's time, many intellectuals not content with the simple faith of common Christians sought here the solution to their problems. Clement took up the problems of the gnostics, making excerpta from the *Valentinian *Theodotus with the intention of providing a way toward *orthodox faith. Argument and reply are so closely coupled here that it is often hard to tell what is Clement's and what is Theodotus's. The same method is used on the Eclogae Propheticae, in which Clement brings together proto-Christian speculations of the subapostolic period on the first chapters of Genesis and on many passages from the Prophets. Clement fits them into *Hellenistic models as an aid to seekers of truth who are not content with a simple ethic. The homily Quis dives salvetur? is composed differently. Clement answers the doubts and questions posed for the rich by Mk 10:17-31. He maintains that true poverty is to be free from rigid attachment to money and possessions and is aimed at inner freedom. As for Clement's lost writings, we should mention the Hypotyposeis, of which, besides citations by other authors, we have one longer extract in a *Latin translation from Cassiodorus's scriptorium (ca. 540), titled Adumbrationes. These were brief interpretations of all of Scripture in the form of scholia,* of the type used for contemporary Homeric exegesis. A single fragment of the Canon ecclesiasticus is preserved by Eusebius (HE 6, 13, 3). Other works mentioned by Eusebius have not been preserved. *Anastasius the Sinaite cites a De providentia, but the attribution remains dubious. No letters were known until 1973, when M. Smith published a recently discovered document, which must be considered a letter by Clement, in which he mentions a secret and apocryphal gospel of Mark, accepted by deeply orthodox Christian circles as authentic and adhered to by Clement himself. But as the *Carpocratians, a gnostic sect, interpreted it in their own way, Clement opposed their interpretation. Of particular interest is the story of the young man raised from the dead, which could derive from a tradition circulating at the time and must have been a free redaction, predating Jn 11, of the raising of Lazarus. From this it is evident that Clement represents a wider view of canonicity than our own, and that everything concerning the life and teaching of the Redeemer was important to him. We should note that the citations in his writings reveal a vast knowledge of earlier Christian literature, as well as of Hellenistic Jewish literature, where his main source is *Philo of Alexandria. But his knowledge of secular literature is also surprising. We know various works solely through his citations; of others we know only the title, and that also through him. Manuals and school writings that he drew upon have been suggested; this may be so, but we must not forget that a master in the art of citations and in literature, as Clement was, gave his information a personal tone, and the consultation of a manual would offer him new stimuli and incentives.

III. Doctrine. For the NT, Clement uses the primitive Alexandrian text. Like other types of text this is relatively free from additions and open to different interpretative possibilities, but also faithful and good. This has led to its being seen as a prototype of the so-called Western text, whose origin must be placed much later. We must not forget the technique of the citations in Clement, who magisterially perfects the old Hellenistic practice in etymology and the use of words. Of his high esteem for Greek philosophy as a way to Christ we find many citations, a good half of them from *Plato, the other half from Jesus's words in the NT, which give the passages cited from Plato their full meaning. Since for Clement Greek philosophy, dependent on the oldest and greatest wisdom of humankind, is a precious good, it has a function similar to the OT. Some suggestions, such as thefts of the Greeks or the mediation of demons as the origin of philosophy, come from the arsenal of *apologetic and polemic and are therefore mentioned, but they are not in harmony with his specific ideas. In any case the ascending line of his search for truth starts from the primordial wells of human thought on philosophy, and still more from the OT, and ends with the apostles, and above all with Christ. The principles of his thought, like his critical discussion of it, come mainly from Jewish-Alexandrian philosophy, and from that form of Platonism which included the *Middle Platonism of the school tending to *Neoplatonism, and finally from his dialogue with gnosticism. All this was under the guidance and light of Christian faith, the penetration of which was his ultimate aim. Considered in this light, we understand better his continuity with the earlier Christian tradition, more influenced by Semitism, which he knew well and transformed for the benefit of the Greeks. The case is different for traditions merely reported: e.g., comparing Justin's *trinitarian doctrine with that of Clement, we find nothing new, something hardly surprising in an ante-*Nicene writer. His great central figure is Christ, whom he, in Greek, appropriately calls Logos. Christ is at the center of the Clementine reflections as humankind's great teacher and redeemer. The Christian must become like him: this is expounded with the help of the Stoic ideal of wisdom and with the use of Platonic and gnostic reasoning, from which he shows the often-wearisome way that, together with the eternal High Priest, leads us, though numerous gradations in this life and in the midst of the angelic ranks in the next, to the throne of God. Other opinions of his—on Adam's sin, on penitence, and on the problem of marriage and virginity, which he subordinates to marriage—become comprehensible only in the context of his polemic against gnosticism. Considered in its entirety, his doctrine is a spur to Christian faith, in which the stress is put on continuity, even if the conditions are changed. Thus Clement may be called a theologian of *tradition more than of *Scripture, and one who puts particular stress on the solution of current problems and consequently a great ethicist.

PG 8-9; O. Stählin, GCS 12 (1905; ^{2}1939; with U. Treu, ^{3}1972); 15 (1906; ^{2}1939; 3rd. ed. with L. Früchtel, GCS 52, 1960; 4th ed. with U. Treu, GCS 52, 1985); 17 (1909; L. Früchtel - U. Treu, ^{2}1970); 39/1-2 (Indexes 1934-1936; 2nd ed. only the index of citations 39/1, 1980, U. Treu). Tr.: Eng.: ANL 4, 12, 22, 24; Fr.: SC 2, 70, 108, 258, 30, 38, 278-279 (Strom. 5), 23 (Exc. Th.); It.: Turin 1971 (Prot. e Pedagogo); Ger.: BKV^{2} 7, 8, 17, 19, 20. E. de Faye, Clément d'Alexandrie, Paris 1896; Cl. Mondésert, Clément d'Alexandrie. Introduction à l'étude de sa pensée religieuse à partir de l'Écriture, Paris 1944; A. Knauber, Katechetenschule oder Schulkatechumenat: TTZ 60 (1951) 213-266; W. Völker, Der wahre Gnostiker nach Klemens von Alexandrien, Berlin 1952; E.F. Osborn, The Philosophy of Clement of Alexandria, Cambridge 1957; A. Méhat, Étude sur les Stromates de Clément d'Alexandrie, Paris 1966; J. Quasten, Patrologia, Turin 1967, I, 287-314; J.P. Broudéhoux, Mariage et famille chez Clément d'Alexandrie, Paris 1970; A. Knauber, Die patrologische Schätzung des Clemens von Alexandrien bis zu seinem neuerlichen Bekanntwerden durch den ersten Druckeditionem des 16. Jahrhunderts, Festschr. J. Quasten I, Münster 1970, 289-308; M. Mees, Die Zitate aus dem Neuen Testament bei Clemens von Alexandrien, Bari 1970; S.R.C. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971; A Brontesi, La soteria in Clemente Alessandrino, Rome 1972; L.F. Ladaría, El Espíritu en Clemente de Alejandría, Madrid 1980; S.R.C. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria: A Study of Christian Platonism and Gnosticism, London 1976; G. Apostolopoulou, Die Dialektik bei Klemens von Alexandria. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Philosophischen Methoden, Bern 1977; E.A. Clark, Clement's Use of Aristotle: The Aristotelian Contribution to Clement of Alexandria's Refutation of Gnosticism, New York 1977; R. Hoffmann, Geschichte und Praxis. Ihre prinzipielle Begründung durch Klemens von Alexandrien. Ein Beitrag zum spätantiken Platonismus, Munich 1979; A.K. Koffas, Die Sophia-Lehre bei Klemens von Alexandrien—eine pädagogisch-anthropologische Untersuchung, Frankfurt/M. 1982; D. Wyrwa, Die christliche Platonaneignung in den Stromateis des Clemens von Alexandrien, Berlin - New York 1983; C. Nardi, Il battesimo in Clemente Alessandrino. Interpretazione di Eclogae propheticae I-26, Rome 1984; H. Köhler, Erkenntnis im Glauben. Der Beitrag des Clemens Alexandrinus zur Theorie der Glaubenserkenntnis und Lehrentwicklung, Munich 1984-85; H. Blair, The Kaleidoscope of Truth: Types and Archetypes in Clement of Alexandria, Worthing 1986; M. Galloni, Cultura, evangelizzazione e fede nel "Protrettico" di Clemente Alessandrino, Rome 1986; Ch. Riedweg, Mysterienterminologie bei Platon, Philon und Klemens von Alexandrien, Berlin 1987; A. van den Hoek, Clement of Alexandria and His Use of Philo in the Stromateis: An Early Christian Reshaping of a Jewish Model, Leiden 1988; P. Impara, Gli Stromateis di Clemente Alessandrino ed il pensiero greco, Rome 1989; E. Mascellani, Prudens dispensator verbi: Romani 5,12-21 nell'esegesi di Clemente Alessandrino e Origene, Florence 1990; L. Rizzerio, Clemente di Alessandria e la "physiologa veramente gnostica": saggio sulle origini e le implicazioni di un'epistemologia e di un'ontologia "cristiane," Louvain 1996; L. Rizzerio, L'accès à la transcendance divine selon Clément d'Alexandrie: dialectique platonicienne ou expérience de l'"union chrétienne"?: REAug 44 (2) (1998) 159-179; D.K. Buell, Making Christians: Clement of Alexandria and the Rhetoric of Legitimacy, Princeton 1999; U. Schneider, Theologie als christliche Philosophie: zur Bedeutung der biblischen Botschaft im Denken des Clemens von Alexandria, Berlin - New York 1999; M.J. Edwards, Clement of Alexandria and His Doctrine of the Logos: VChr 54 (2) (2000) 159-177; J.J. Sanguineti, La antropología educativa de Clemente Alejandrino. El giro del paganismo al cristianismo, Pamplona 2003.

M. Mees

CLEMENT of Rome, Letters of. Composed probably ca. AD 96–98, just after *Domitian's persecution, the letter of the *Roman community to that of Corinth, unanimously ascribed to Clement of Rome, was well known in the ancient church. *Hegesippus (Eusebius, HE III,16; IV,22,1) and *Irenaeus (A.H. III,3,3) mention it, and it was still read in Corinthian liturgical assemblies ca. 170 (see Dionysius of Corinth's letter to Soter: Euseb., HE IV,23,11). According to *Origen, who cites I Clem. 20,8 in De princ. II,3,6, the author is to be identified with the Clement mentioned as *Paul's collaborator in Phil 4:3 (Com. Ioh. VI,36). *Eusebius adds that Clement was bishop of the church of Rome for nine years, from 92–100 (HE III,4,9; 15; 34). Clement's letter to the Corinthians is a document of prime importance for our knowledge of late-1st-c. Roman *theology and *liturgy (chs. 59-61) and had a vast circulation in Christian antiquity, as the MS tradition attests. The text survives in six codices, three of them biblical, in four languages: the Greek codex Alexandrinus (5th c.), a *Coptic papyrus codex (5th-7th c.), a Syriac codex from *Edessa (1170); the Greek codex Hierosol. 54 (1056), a Coptic codex in Berlin (4th-5th c.) and an 11th-c. Latin MS. The letter reveals a strong awareness of the right possessed even then by the Church of Rome, thanks to the example of the *apostles *Peter and Paul (ch. 5), to intervene in the internal affairs of another community (i.e., Corinth), in this case to reconcile the split caused by the dismissal of some *presbyters by one or two proud agitators.

The whole document aims to recall the Corinthian community to the values of eirēnē and homonoia (63,2), through the practice of humility and obedience. Not without reason is Christ presented as the model of humility (ch. 16) and therefore as the only way of salvation (ch. 36). In this way the author wants to lead those who had carelessly and wrongfully revolted against the legitimate authority of the presbyters, founded on the tradition of the apostles, to *penitence and acknowledgment of their faults (chs. 1–3 and 40–58). To this end the first part of the letter (chs. 4-39) is interwoven with admonitory OT passages intended to demonstrate the nefarious effects of envy and hatred on human history, and the good effects of the spirit of humility and peace. There are also examples taken from the harmony of the cosmos (chs. 19,2–20,12), the structure of the army (ch. 37,1-4), the human body (ch. 37,5–38) and the Levitical hierarchy (chs. 40–41), as models of the interconnected, harmonious unity that must inspire Christ's body, the church. It should be noted that in 40,5 the technical term laïkos anthrōpos is used for the first time in Christian literature, to distinguish the people in general from the sacred order of priests and Levites. The author demonstrates an excellent knowledge not only of the OT and Jewish traditions but also of *Hellenistic culture, with a decidedly *Stoic emphasis: with literary skill he uses the devices of ancient rhetoric, though he puts them in a context of wider paraenetic-homiletic structures not unknown to the preaching of the Hellenistic Jewish synogogue, and sometimes has recourse to examples from mythology, such as Danaus and Dirce (ch. 6,2) or the Arabian phoenix (ch. 25).

It is unclear whether the Corinthian conflict was caused by any strictly doctrinal rather than disciplinary factors; but Clement's words against doubts about the *resurrection of the body (chs. 23–26) and against boasting about *ascetism (38,2; cf. a similar text in Ignatius, Pol. 5,2) might lead us to think so. To date it has not been duly recognized that the positions criticized in the letter are exactly the same as those elaborated and introduced into the Corinthian community about fifty years earlier by Apollos of Alexandria. In his correspondence with the Corinthians, St. Paul had criticized Apollos's *Encratite enthusiasm, which linked an absolute asceticism to an already-realized eschaton (marriage is abolished because the *resurrection has already taken place) (for more detail, see my analysis in ANRW II.26.2, 1232-1275). Clement's explicit mention of the earlier conflict at Corinth, which opposed the party of the apostles Paul and Cephas against the party of Apollos, seems to confirm the enduring vitality of Apollos's party at Corinth even in the late 1st c., made worse by the fact that now the antagonists, unlike at Apollos's time, no longer had direct contact with the apostolic generation (ch. 47). In this renewed clash of theological positions, Clement analogically assumes the role played by Peter and Paul against Apollos in the earlier conflict. One can say that Clement's strategy is entirely similar to that adopted by his contemporary Luke. For the latter also, Apollos is merely an underling, approved by Paul and his collaborators (Acts 18:24-28), which nonetheless doesn't keep Luke from harshly attacking the "heretics" who in his time continued to propagate Apollos's teachings (Acts 20:29-35). Indeed, the ideological and literary affinity between Clement and Luke may explain why the letter to the Hebrews was here or there attributed to one or the other (see Clem. Alex., Hypot. in Eusebius, HE VI, 14,2; Origen, Hom. Hebr. in Eusebius, HE VI, 25,14; Eusebius, HE III, 38,1-2).

Clement's letter thus finds its natural home—along with other contemporary writings such as the Pastoral Epistles, the *Epistle of Barnabas and the letters of *Ignatius of Antioch—in the general "proto-Catholic" movement of polemic and intervention against the fringe of ascetic "enthusiasts," rebels against presbyterial-episcopal power. At the same time, nothing of a political nature can be detected in the document. If on one hand the concluding prayer for the authority (ch. 60,4–61) demonstrates the work's basic loyalty to Rome, on the other hand it establishes that obedience to authority must never lead to a contradiction with the higher will of God. A recognition of the divine origin of political authority, expressed with these reservations, cannot be compared with the command of unconditional obedience contained in an interpolated text such as Rom 13:1-7.

A penitential homily of an unknown author, the oldest Christian preaching to have reached us (difficult to date later than the mid-2nd c.), has passed into ecclesiastical literature as the second letter of Clement (see Euseb., HE III, 38,4), simply because it is transcribed after Clement's letter to the Corinthians in three codices (Alexandrian, Hierosol., one Syriac). In fact the homily's unassuming tone and unaffected language reveal an author with no literary aspirations. Its main interest is to recall new converts from idolatry and *paganism so as to show gratitude to Christ for the benefits received by observing the commandments and leading an ascetic life (chs. 3–4 and 15). The author collects and reworks complex theological traditions, such as the theme of carnal purity as a basic baptismal pledge (chs. 6 and 8) or the doctrine of the preexistence of the heavenly church (ch. 14). A point of anti-*Docetist polemic is included (ch. 9). The preacher's strong ascetical tension is also shown from the citation of an *apocryphal logion on the coming of the kingdom and the overcoming of the duality of the sexes (ch. 12), which recurs in Encratite texts such as the Gospel of the Egyptians (in Clem. Alex., Strom. III, 64,1) and the *Coptic Gospel of Thomas (log. 22). Its substantial lack of awareness of Pauline literature leads today to the hypothesis that the homily likely originated in *Syria, though some lean toward *Egypt, others Corinth. In fact the document's date of composition, geographical provenance, literary genre, and ideological orientation are still debated, and it would be tiresome to list all the proposals more or less weak, advanced thus far. Perhaps the only thing that can be asserted with some confidence is the text's "presbyterial" origin (ch. 17,3), which for that time period suggests its location within the "orthodox" or "proto-Catholic" front interested in opposing the growth of radical movements (enthusiastic, Encratite, pre- or protognostic) spreading throughout the eastern Mediterranean basin. This alone would be enough to justify the very early joining of this enigmatic document to Clement's prestigious letter.

At the time of *Epiphanius (see Pan. 30,15,2), two letters Ad virgines circulated under Clement's name, containing teaching on chastity. They opposed the practice of so-called Syneisaktentum and for this reason would seem to go back to the "orthodox" Syrian milieu of the 3rd-4th c.

K. Bihlmeyer - W. Schneemelcher, Die Apostolischen Väter I, Tübingen ³1970; A. Jaubert, Clément de Rome. Epître aux Corinthiens, SC 167, Paris 1971; K. Beyschlag, Clemens Romanus und der Frühkatholizismus. Untersuchungen zu I Clemens 1-7: BHTh 35, Tübingen 1966; D.A. Hagner, The Use of the Old and New Testaments in Clement of Rome: SNT 34, Leiden 1973; K.P. Donfried, The Setting of Second Clement in Early Christianity: SNT 38, Leiden 1974; Chr. Stegemann, Herkunft und Entstehung des sogenannten zweiten Klemensbriefes, Diss. Bonn 1974; P.F. Beatrice, Continenza e matrimonio nel cristianesimo primitivo (sec. I-II): Etica sessuale e matrimonio nel cristianesimo delle origini (SPMed 5), Milan 1976, 3-68; Ph. Vielhauer, Geschichte der urchristlichen Literatur. Einleitung in das Neue Testament, die Apokryphen und die Apostolischen Väter, Berlin - New York ²1978, 529-540, 737-744; E. Dassmann, Der Stachel im Fleisch. Paulus in der frühchristlichen Literatur bis Irenäus, Münster i.W. 1979, 77-98, 231-236; A. Lindemann, Paulus im ältesten Christentum. Das Bild des Apostels und die Rezeption der paulinischen Theologie in der frühchristlichen Literatur bis Marcion (BHTh 58), Tübingen 1979, 72-82, 177-199, 263-272; D. Powell, Clemens von Rom: TRE 8 (1981) 113-120; Id., Clemensbrief, Zweiter: TRE 8 (1981) 121-123; K. Wengst, Didache (Apostellehre), Barnabasbrief, Zweiter Klemensbrief, Schrift an Diognet (Schriften des Urchristentums 2), Munich 1984, 203-280; Ph. Henne, La christologie chez Clément de Rome et dans le Pasteur d'Hermas (Paradosis 33), Fribourg/ Swiss 1992; P.F. Beatrice, L'eredità delle origini. Saggi sul cristianesimo primitivo, Genoa 1992, 67-123; 227-286; A. Lindemann, Die Clemensbriefe, Tübingen 1992; O.B. Knoch, Im Namen des Petrus und Paulus: Der Brief des Clemens Romanus und die Eigenart des römischen Christentums: ANRW II.27.1, Berlin - New York 1992, 3-54; A.W. Ziegler - G. Brunner, Die Frage nach einer politischen Absicht des Ersten Klemensbriefes: ibid., 55-76; E. Baasland, Der 2. Klemensbrief und frühchristliche Rhetorik: "Die erste christliche Predigt" im Lichte der neueren Forschung: ibid., 78-157 (bibl.); G. Schneider, Clemens von Rom. Epistola ad Corinthios. Brief an die Korinther (FCh 15), Freiburg-Basel-Vienna 1994; P.F. Beatrice, Apollos of Alexandria and the Origins of the Jewish-Christian Baptist Encratism: ANRW II.26.2, Berlin - New York 1995, 1232-1275; H.E. Lona, Der erste Clemensbrief (KAV 2), Göttingen 1998.

P.F. Beatrice

CLEMENTINES (pseudo). The Pseudo-Clementines exist in two versions, the Greek Homilies and the Latin Recognitiones, both of which refer back to a common source usually called Grundschrift (G). One explanation, going back to J. Hilgenfeld (1848), is that the Recognitiones and Homilies are the independent creations of different authors with differing objectives, both departing from a source that is the work of one author (G), with the Recognitiones seeming to be closer to the original. Others see G as a *Jewish Christian work, written in *Syria in the 3rd c. and composed of various sources: (1) the account of the recognition; (2) missionary sermons of *Peter, or rather Kerygmata Petrou; (3) accounts of Peter's meetings with Simon; (4) Peter's dialogues with Apion; (5) a history of God's people from Abraham to the earliest days of the church, the work of an anti-Pauline Jewish Christian from ca. 200, taken up by Rec. I, 27-71, but identified with the Ascension of James, known by *Epiphanius. This latter work, from the 2nd half of the 2nd c. and the source of Rec. I, 33-71, attempts to discern a true path between two false ones. G, the work of a sectarian Jewish Christian, would have been written in Celesyria in the mid-3rd c. Its first elaboration, that of the Homilies, would correspond to the early 4th c., before *Nicaea. That of the Recognitiones, more autonomous from G, could be the work of a Catholic (interpolated in his *trinitarian doctrine by a *Eunomian) of Celesyria or *Palestine, ca. 350.

The doctrine of the true prophet is the nucleus of the so-called Preachings of Peter against *Simon Magus. This doctrine is already referred to in the Letter of Peter to *James of Jerusalem. The preachings were sent to James by *Clement, who had accompanied Peter in his travels and was ordained bishop of *Rome by the *apostle himself, who was near death. Together with Peter's letter, Clement's Letter to James constitutes the introduction to the Homilies, which expounds how Scripture must be used for its adequate interpretation (Drijvers, 314)—the sole objective of the doctrine of the true Prophet. God gives the Spirit of Christ to Adam, who was thus in fact identical to Christ, the true Prophet. From the beginning of the world, humanity receives a continual prophecy, which reveals itself in various forms and under other names besides Adam and Christ, including, prominently, Moses (Drijvers, 315). But false prophecy always appears before the true. This doctrine is the author's antiheretical construction to refute the *Marcionism prevalent in Syria (Drijvers, 318). The author of G offers some explanations to reconcile the apparent contradictions in Scripture regarding the existence of opposites in creation, which both true and false prophecies attest. The fulfillment of false doctrine is predicted and foreknown by God, but people must recognize the right way based on a correct use of Scripture, so as to distinguish true doctrine from false and to follow a right interpretation (Drijvers, 320). The two letters are the introduction most appropriate to G as an anti-Marcionite treatise. G was probably called the Periodoi Petrou (Origen, Philoc. 23). The same title is given by *Epiphanius (Panarion 30,15.1-3), who mistakenly considers it an *Ebionite work. It therefore seems unlikely that a work titled Kerygma Petrou, identifiable as the source of G (Periodoi Petrou), would have had an autonomous existence. Its author is representative of this center of Syrian Christianity, characterized not so much by that notable mixture of Jewish traditions and Christian doctrine, as by its continual clash with the *Marcionites and other gnostic groups over cosmological and philosophical questions (Drijvers, 321). Nor is it anomalous that the author made ample use of *Bardesanes of Edessa's Dialogue on Fate or Book of the Laws of the Countries, of which it offers an ample citation in Rec. 9,19-29—*Eusebius (HE IV, 30) knew Bardesanes as a writer of anti-Marcionite dialogues (Drijvers, 322-323). The author must have written his anti-Marcionite book between 220 (Bardesanes died in 222) and 253 (death of Origen), a period in which Marcionism represented a real threat to nascent Syrian *orthodoxy. The identity between Adam and Christ, creation as composed of opposites (G attributes evil to the combination of four elements in a substance), and the doctrines of false prophecy and the spurious biblical texts were all used as ammunition in this battle, in which biblical interpretation was the central question (Drijvers, 323).

In the Recognitiones, Clement, of a distinguished Roman family, is separated from his parents and brothers. As a youth he is interested in religious questions and finds the teaching of the philosophers insufficient. Learning of the manifestation of the Son of God in Judea, he travels there and stays with Peter, who instructs him and takes him on his missions as a fellow worker. Peter works as a missionary, preacher and apologist; particularly important is his opposition to Simon Magus. At the end, Clement's whole family is reunited.

These recognitiones and other traits put the Clementines in the same class as the secular romances of the time. But their objective, at least in the original source, seems to have been apologetic, i.e., to transmit Christian doctrine systematically. This sets them apart from the apocryphal acts of the apostles, which are essentially adventure narratives.

The common theory is that the Clementines go back to a basic source, and some maintain that this in turn is based on two other works: Kerygmata Petr. and Praxeis Petr., the first of which is clearly Ebionite and anti-Pauline (H. Waitz). Strecker and Schoeps base their theology and history of Jewish Christianity on an analysis of the Clementines' sources, as reconstructed by Waitz. Rius-Camps supposes that the original consisted of some "Journeys of Peter" (Periodoi Petr.), which he attributes to a disciple of Bardesanes. Then follows the basic line of Rehm, who thinks that the basic work dealt with Clement's journeys and recognitions and that its author composed it along the rationalist lines of the apologists, between Bardesanes and Origen. Its spiritual ambience is indeed that of the rationalism of the time of the *apologists. Justice on earth is a guarantee for the last *judgment. Living reasonably is demanded. Faith plays only a subordinate role. Jesus' death matters little from the religious point of view. Of more interest is the true prophet, guaranteed by the fulfillment of his predictions. According to Irmscher, the basic work (Syria, 1st half of the 3rd c.), which could not have circulated widely, was first reworked by the homilist, who had both ethical and metaphysical interests. His doctrine of "syzygies" (pairs of opposites in history, leading up to the being of God) is the cause of the opposition between Peter and Simon Magus. His critical attitude to the OT is obvious. Only the Homilies truly frame the Peter/Simon motif in a dualistic structure: the rule of the syzygies, according to which Peter's action always follows that of Simon, as light succeeds darkness. The Recognitions, on the other hand, propose a doctrine of likeness (Côté 263). Simon seeks to pass off his rival Peter as what he himself is: a magician. Using ars dialectica, Peter defends himself as a philosopher. This is a rationalization of the antagonistic relation between *magic and *miracle, between good and evil (Côté 264). Peter, the leading disciple, and Simon, the leading heretic, clash, and carry out their argument as would the philosophers of the imperial era, around the accusation of magic (Côté 265). The two figures propose two opposite types of relation with Greek culture: Simon the Samaritan is the Hellenized barbarian (Côté 270-271); Peter the Jew is the barbarian who resists *Hellenization; rejects the claims of myth, magic and *philosophy; performs miracles invoking the one God; and defends the thesis of prophetic truth. The claims of philosophy are rejected so as to preserve its methods, while the methods of magic are rejected so as to imitate its efficacy (Côté 272). The Clementine corpus constitutes one of the most reliable documents for reconstructing the history of the relations between Hellenism and Jewish Christianity and for the study of cases of indirect Hellenization, such as that which presents the Clementine use of literary forms and themes, drawn from romance and from philosophy (Côté, 272).

In the Clement of the Recognitions a process of education is developed, under Peter's guidance, from the untrained *catechumen to the advanced disciple and apostle, who, as Peter's successor in the apostolic office, does not deny a pagan past and education but like his brother uses it for Christian purposes. The Recognitions thus not only remain within the tradition of the ancient educational romance but are also closer to the postulated Grundschrift than are the Homilies. The idea of evolution is present in the Homilies only rudimentarily: Clement the homelist did not receive an education from Peter; nonetheless, though the preachings and the doctrinally edifying discussions are missing, in his early youth he came in contact with Jewish Christianity, to the extant that the resulting education and his conversion remain fundamental presuppositions and can assume a guiding role, after his encounter with Peter, in his dispute with *Apion. The idea of development is therefore present only at the beginning but disappears completely by the end of the account (Vielberg 193).

Here we have two creations by two authors of a version of the romance composed by a single author. This confirms a thesis of J. Hilgenfeld (1848), which gave priority to the Recognitions. What we possess are two independent versions, each with different objectives (Vielberg 193-194).

The Clem. Hom. would have remained forgotten if they had not been appropriated by the *Ebionites, who made interpolations and added 1 Clem., the Ep. Pet. and the Diamartyria, making the whole work expound a secret tradition, Petrine and anti-Pauline. This heretical falsification of the homilies may have provoked the composition of the Clem. Recogn. (which presuppose both the basic work and the homilies). The author seeks in every way to free them from whatever is contrary to the *dogma of the Great Church, leaving intact the prominence of Peter and James, of Ebionite origin. Its theology is that of the Jewish Christians, probably of Syria, where the pseudo-Clementine literature developed; this is exemplified in its conception of *baptism, which is not to take away Adam's sin but to dampen the fires of concupiscence. The person born of carnal desire is born of corruption, which is why a second birth, regeneration, is necessary (cf. Jn 3:5; Hom. XI, 26; Rec. VI, 9; IX, 7).

The date of composition seems earlier than Const. Apost. (Syria, ca. 360–380). In the third stage of the heretical interpolations, followers of the neo-*Arian *Eunomius made room, in the Recognitiones, for their idea of the *Trinity (III, 2-11). In the Great Church the work began to be considered suspect, and it eventually disappeared. In the West, it was preserved in a translation by *Rufinus, who sought to free it from all additions; but a later translator filled in Rufinus's gaps on the basis of the Greek document. Both the Hom. and the Recogn. were quickly translated into *Syriac. Two Greek Compendia (summaries of the doctrinal discussions, which improve the narrative) also survive. There is also an Arabic compendium and some Clementine fragments in Ethiopic.

PG 2, 19-646; PG I, 1157-1474; B. Rehm - J. Irmscher - F. Paschke, Die Pseudoklementinen, I. Homilien, GCS 42, Berlin 1969; B. Rehm - F. Paschke, II. Recognitiones, GCS 51, Berlin 1965; H. Waitz, Die Pseudoklementinen Homilien und Rekognitionen, Leipzig 1904; O. Cullmann, Le problème littéraire et historique du roman Ps. Clémentin, Paris 1930; B. Rehm, Zur Entstehung der pseudoclementinischen Schriften: ZNTW 37 (1938) 77-184; H.J. Schoeps, Theologie und Geschichte des Judenchristentums, Tübingen 1949; G. Strecker, Das Judenchristentum in den Pseudoklementinen, Berlin 1950; H.J. Schoeps, Urgemeinde, Judenchristentum, Gnosis, Tübingen ²1956; A. Salles, Le diatribe antipaulinienne dans le roman pseudoclémentin et l'origine des kérygmes de Pierre: RBi 64 (1957) 516-551; J. Irmscher, Die Pseudo-Clementinen, Hennecke-Schneemelcher, 2, 373-398; L.

Cyril, Le Pseudo-Clementine e il Vangelo di Barnaba della Biblioteca nazionale di Vienna: Asprenas 18 (1971) 333-369; J. Rius Camps, Las Pseudo-Clementinas. Bases filológicas para una nueva interpretación: Rev. Catalana Teol. 1 (1976) 79-158; LACL 155-157 (with bibl.).

R. Trevijano

CLEOMENES. A *heretic, he represented the *patripassian doctrine at *Rome, where he opened a school in the early 3rd c. According to the Philosophumena, our only source, he was a disciple of *Epigonus and had great success, partly thanks to the support of *Zephyrinus and esp. of *Callistus (Philos. IX, 7; IX, 11,2).

E. Prinzivalli

CLERGY

I. The term - II. Choice and requirements.

I. The term. In classical Greek and in the LXX, clergy (clerus, κλῆρος) means destiny, drawing of lots, the piece of land assigned by lot and hence heredity. *Philo adds a religious nuance: God is the clerus ("portion") of the believer and the Levite, and at the same time the believer is God's clerus. Matthias was chosen by the primitive community to replace Judas, by drawing lots (Acts 1:26); in the NT the term means not just the drawing of lots but also the portion allotted, which often has an eschatological significance (Acts 1:17; 8:21; 26:18; Col 1:12).

In the early Christian community, those with a ministry of direction were called by the collective term clerus, a loan translation from the Greek, to distinguish them from laicus. This terminology was in use by the start of the 3rd c. in both East and West (Clem. Alex., Quis dives 42; Orig., Hom. 11,3 in Jer.; Exp. in Prov. 26,17; Tertull., De exhort. cast. 7) and became common usage (Cypr., Ep. 45,2; De unit. ecc, 17; Anon., De rebat. 12; De sing. clericorum; Ambr., Ep. 18,14; Const. Apost. VI, 17,3; Counc. Ancyr. [314], can. 3; etc.). From clerus is derived the adjective clericatus, sometimes also used as a noun to indicate members of the clergy (Jerome, Ep. 60,10). In the CTh from 313 it is usual to designate the ministers of the Christian religion by the term clerici qui divino cultui ministeria impendunt (CTh 16, 2,2). Nevertheless, for the concession or revocation of privileges, in many laws the imperial authorities had to specify who belonged to the clergy. As far as Christian practice was concerned, one became a cleric by ordination or some other rite of installation, since it was clerici omnes qui in ecclesiastici ministerii gradibus ordinati sunt (Isid., Ecc. off. 2, 1).

The clergy are distinguished from the laity not because of their state of life but because their sacred function in the service of the people; a whole *ecclesiology underlies this distinction. *Augustine explained the term clergy by deriving it from the episode of the choosing of Matthias: cleros et clericos hinc appellatos credimus, quia Matthias sorte electus est, quem primum per apostolos legimus ordinatum, κλῆρος cum graece, sors vel haereditas dicitur (Enarr. in Ps. 67,19). This explanation did not catch on, whereas that proposed by *Jerome, which went back to Philo, was very popular in subsequent *theology and spirituality: "Clerics are so called either because they are the Lord's portion, or because the Lord is their portion" (Ep. 52,5 ad Nepot.). "In an age-old tradition, impressive in its unity, the idea of being the Lord's portion and of possessing him as one's portion has remained as the heart of the clerical state" (Congar 24-25).

In the Middle Ages, when monks, who in antiquity had been laymen, received the priesthood, people tended to speak of two kinds of Christians: one, the clergy, composed of monks and those assigned to worship; and the other, composed of laypeople (Decr. Gratiani C. 7 C. XII, q. 1). By the 4th c. the clergy were divided into two categories: clerici inferioris ordinis and primi clerici or superioris ordinis (bishops, priests and deacons [*Diakonia - Diaconate]). But it is not always clear which categories belonged to the clergy. In the West, *Isidore (6th c.) considered doorkeepers, psalmists, readers, exorcists, acolytes, *subdeacons, deacons, *presbyters and bishops to be members of the clergy. At first, entry into the clergy was by ordination, but in the early Middle Ages the rite of tonsure arose ad clericum faciendum (J. Deshusses, Le Sacramentaire Grégorien, Fribourg 1971, I, 417).

GLNT 5, 583-601; TLL 3, 1339ff.; Y.M.-J. Congar, Jalons pour une théologie du laïcat, Paris 1954; L. Hardick, Gedanken zu Sinn und Tragweite des Begriffs clerici: Arch. Franc. Hist. 10 (1957) 7-26; R. Gryson, Les degrés du clergé et leurs dénominations chez saint Ambroise de Milan: RBen 76 (1966) 119-127; A. Faivre, Naissance d'une hiérarchie, Paris 1977; C. Tagliavini, Storia di parole pagane e cristiane attraverso i tempi, Brescia 1963; D. Powell, Ordo Presbyterii: JTS 26 (1975) 290-328; P. Iovino, Valenza comunitaria del termine kleros nella S. Scrittura, in Laici-chierici: dualismo ecclesiologico?, Palermo 1986, 116-123; É. Paoli, Clericus dans l'œuvre d'Augustin: aspects philologiques et contexte historique: Euphrosyne 20 (1992) 323-334; R. Seagraves, Pascentes cum disciplina: A Lexical Study of the Clergy in the Cyprianic Correspondence, Fribourg 1993; G. Schöllgen, Die Anfänge der Professionalisierung des Klerus und das kirchliche Amt in der Syrischen Didaskalie, Münster 1998; A. Faivre, Clerus: AugL 1, 1011-1020.

II. Choice and requirements. The basis of the bishop's authority was the conviction that he was chosen by God; but in practice he was designated by the community, though sometimes the elect was invitus. Procedure varied in the course of the first centuries. The Didache* prescribes: "Elect yourselves bishops . . . worthy of the Lord" (ch. 15). The Apostolic Tradition* is more specific: "Let him be ordained bishop who has been chosen by all the people; the chosen person's name shall be declared and, if it meets unanimous approval, etc." (ch. 2). *Cyprian is still clearer: "Divine tradition and apostolic practice must be carefully respected—tradition and practice found also among us in almost every province. That is, so as to proceed according to the law of ordination, the nearest bishops belonging to the same province must take a hand in the community in which the election is taking place. The bishop must be chosen in the presence of the people. The people truly know the life of each one and, living together, will be able to evaluate his conduct" (Ep. 67,5,1). Though clear, this text does not specify the role of the three participating groups: people, clergy and neighboring bishops. We have no more precise information for the 3rd c. Often the most wealthy and influential women favored one candidate or another (see Jerome, Comm. in Tess. 3,3).

During the 4th c., complex ecclesiastical and civil legislation was worked out, but it was only partially applied, since from the many documentable cases we can deduce a very diverse practice; yet nonobservance of the rules of election and ordination often caused disputes and conflicts. The presence of the people was always required: "He who must be in charge of everyone must be elected by everyone" (Leo Gt., Ep. 10, 6: PL 54, 634). In the West, at least theoretically, the people's participation was required even afterward (see Statuta ecc. ant., ed. Munier, prologue). But the *metropolitan sought to play a central role at the expense of the other groups (see Leo Gt., Ep. 10, 4; 14, 15). He wanted to exclude the turbulent and rowdy masses (Council of *Laodicea, can. 13), who often imposed their own candidate. In the East too, the metropolitan's role was stressed; perhaps by the 5th c., he chose one of the candidates presented by the clergy, the decuriones and the important citizens (CJ I, 3, 41). The Second Council of *Nicaea (787) reserved election to the bishops alone (can. 3), a rule that became definitive in the East.

While popular participation could be a valid guarantee of the dignity of the person chosen, it was often the cause of struggles, divisions and abuses both within the community and among the aspirants, so that, as *Jerome observed, the least designing and most worthy were excluded (Adv. Iovin. 1, 34; cf. Aug., Ep. 213, 1; John Chrys., De sacerd. 3, 15). While the people's role was being reduced, the importance of the emperor's was growing. He had an interest in the choice of bishops because of their civic importance, as substitutes for the state authorities and guarantees of their subjects' loyalty. The manner of imperial intervention, never codified, could take different expressions: designating a candidate, ratifying an election already held, transferring or choosing between different candidates. Ideologically, this was in line with the old Roman idea of authority, which conceived of no other power than that of the state.

The bishop-elect did not necessarily have to belong to the city's clergy, but he had to be known to them; even laymen could be elected, but from the 4th c. legislation favored a choice from among the clergy according to the Council of *Serdica (can. 10), which prescribed that he must be a lector, deacon or presbyter; *Leo the Great also required a cursus, as a guarantee of his preparation. Meanwhile the practice of ordaining hermits or monks—a category not then belonging to the clergy—increased, in the hope that they had more preparation and, particularly, that they practiced continence. Monks aspired to the priesthood, seeing it as a means of social advancement. It was the bishop who chose all the other members of the clergy, though he took advice from others, esp. the presbyters: "When it comes to ordaining clerics, we are accustomed to consulting you before their ordination and examining each one's morals and merits in a public assembly" (Cypr., Ep 38, 1; cf. Orig., In Matth. 16, 21-22; Didasc. apost. 2, 34). The people also intervened in the nomination of presbyters, but probably not always. At times presbyters were ordained by urgent popular demand, as with Cyprian, *Ambrose, *Paulinus of Nola, *Augustine, Jerome's brother *Paulinianus and *Nepotianus. The growing difficulty of recruiting people specifically prepared for the ministry led to the idea of preparing future cadres, as suggested by Pope *Siricius (Ep. 1,9: PL 13, 1142-1143) and done by some great spirits, e.g., *Eusebius of Vercelli and Augustine. The Pastoral Epistles give indications, esp. moral ones, for the choice of a good bishop or a "deacon" (1 Tim 3:2-13; Tit 1:6). A neophyte or a twice-married man could not be a bishop (1 Tim 3:2, 6) and, by the 3rd c., those who had done public penitence or had been voluntarily mutilated or baptized during a grave illness (clinici) were ordinarily not admitted, not just to the episcopate, but to the clergy. We know some cases of neophytes who, by popular demand, were ordained bishops: *Ambrose, *Synesius of Cyrene, *Nectarius of Constantinople. Interdictions, both civil and ecclesiastical, on admission to the clergy became numerous in the 4th c. and greatly limited choice. Professions unacceptable to the church included those involved in entertainment, state officials, soldiers baptized before military service, administrators of others' goods until they had finally accounted for their charge, and slaves and freedmen because they did not enjoy full civil liberty. The state too, for economic reasons, banned certain categories of people from entering the clergy: slaves and coloni without the written permission of their patronus, butchers and bakers, junior officials of various public services, employees of imperial industries, curiales, etc., those who possessed sufficient wealth: "It is right that the rich should assist the needs of the time and the poor should be sustained by the wealth of the church" (CTh 16,2,6; cf. 16,2,3). It was permitted to clarissimi, senators—but these were few and it was not always convenient for them—and to those in liberal professions (lawyers, professors) who because of their activities were not always acceptable to the church. That left only the urban artisan class, since in this period Christianity was a predominantly urban phenomenon. But the legislative rules were frequently ignored, as we can deduce from the repetition of similar laws and from the numerous exceptions. The rules which limited entry to the clergy also caused a scarcity of ministers, often lamented by bishops.

To assess the candidate's faith and conduct, genuine examinations (scrutini) were introduced so that, in the absence of specialized schools, skill in liturgical practice and familiarity with the bishop and other priests might be acquired. The examination was aimed at ascertaining the qualities needed for belonging to the militia spiritalis, rather than at intellectual preparation. It was also insisted that the minor orders be received gradually (interstitia) and exercised for a certain period of time, longer or shorter, as preparation for the higher grades and as a test of conduct through each grade (Leo Gt., Ep. 12, 4). These arrangements became more elaborate with Popes *Siricius (384–399) and *Zosimus (417–418). But many bishops were inadequately prepared (Greg. Nys., Oratio 18,33: PG 35, 1027; Oratio 43,25: PG 36, 531). Except in exceptional cases, the clergy were self-taught in religious matters, for which reason rules arose about their secular and religious education (Counc. of *Rome [465], can. 3; Brev. Hipp. can. 3, ed. Munier; Counc. of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon [410], can. 26: Mansi 7, 1181; Statuta ecc. ant., ed. Munier, prologue), since "frequently by God's judgment and popular vote illiterates are elected; but at least, once ordained priest, they should take care to learn God's law, so that they may teach it and not suffer the shame of learning from laymen" (Jerome, In Agg. 2, 11; Aug., Ep. 202, 3, 7; Novellae 6, 4 and 123, 12). During the 4th c., legislation, necessarily still variable, arose on the required age for receiving the various orders: 30 years for the priesthood (Council of *Neocaesarea [314/319], can. 11), but we find even bishops who were ordained very young (e.g., Antoninus of Fussala).

J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'Empire romain (IV^e^ et V^e^ siècles), Paris 1958; P.-P. Joannou, La législation impériale et la christianisation de l'empire romain (311-476), Rome 1972; R. Gryson, Les élections ecclésiastiques au III^e^ siècle: RHE 68 (1973) 353-404 (with bibl.); A. Faivre, Naissance d'une hiérarchie. Les premières étapes du cursus clericalis, Paris 1974; P.G. Caron, I poteri giuridici del laico nella chiesa primitiva, Milan [2]1975; Id., L'intervention de l'autorité impériale romaine dans l'élection des évêques: RDC 28 (1978) 76-83; R. Gryson, Les élections épiscopales en orient au IV^e^ siècle: RHE 74 (1979) 301-345; J. Gaudemet, Les élections dans l'Église latine des origines au XVI^e^ siècle, Paris 1979; E. Hermoso de Mendoza, La participación de la comunitad cristiana en la elección de los obispos. Siglos I-V, Pamplona 1977; A.G. Hamman, La formation du clergé latin, dans les quatre premiers siècles: SP 20 (1989) 238-249; A. Faivre, Ordonner la fraternité. Pouvoir d'innover et retour à l'ordre dans l'Église ancienne, Paris 1992; E. Dassmann, Ämter und Dienste in der frühchristlichen Gemeinde, Bonn 1994; L. Pietri - Y. Duval - Ch. Pietri, Peuple chrétien et plebs: Le rôle des laïcs dans les élections ecclésiastiques en Occident, in Institutions, société et vie politique, Rome 1992, 373-395, now in Christiana respublica, Rome 1997, 1059-1081; G. Bausenhart, Das Amt der Kirche. Eine notwendende Neubestimmung, Freiburg i. B. 1999; J.St.H. Gibaut, The Cursus Honorum: A Study of the Origins and the Evaluation of Sequential Ordination, New York 2000; J.A. Sabw Kanyang, Episcopus et plebs. L'évêque et la communauté ecclésiale dans les conciles africains (345-525), Bern 2000; A. Kramm, Amt: RAC Supp. 1 (2001) 350-401.

A. Di Berardino

CLERICS of VERDUN (5th c.). Three *presbyters (Franco, Paul and Valerian) and a deacon, Sisinno, authors of a letter written in the 2nd half of the 5th c., addressed to Polychronius (or Pulchrone), bishop of an unknown diocese, perhaps Verdun, handed down in a 6th-c. MS (Paris, BN, Lat. 12097, f. [143r]) from the canonical collection of Corbie. Speaking for all the clerici, they tell their bishop of the exile to which, like him, they had been subjected, and thank him for his intervention on their behalf; they also tell him that they have found refuge with Castor, perhaps bishop of Chartres, probably the same person who had given asylum to Polychronius; finally, they ask him to come and visit at *Easter, to encourage themselves and their fellow citizens. From the letter it is clear that it was not just individuals who were exiled, but the entire population of the city, perhaps in consequence of *Frankish expansion toward the S at the time of Chilperic and *Clovis.

CPL 1000: Epistula "de patria" ad Polochronium. PLS 3, 831-832 (= ed. Turner 1929). L. Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, 3, Paris 1915, 69-70; C.H. Turner, Chapters in the History of Latin MSS of Canons. IV. The Corbie Ms (C), now Paris. Lat. 12097: JTS 30 (1929) 225-236; G. Morin, Castor et Polychronius. Un épisode peu connu de l'histoire ecclésiastique des Gaules: RBen 51 (1939) 31-36; R.W. Mathisen, Roman Aristocrats in Barbarian Gaul. Strategies for Survival in an Age of Transition, Austin 1993, esp. 64ff.; Patrologia IV, 343.

V. Milazzo

CLERICS, Immunities and Privileges of

I. Fiscal immunity - II. Patrimonial statute - III. Forum privilege.

I. Fiscal immunity. A few months after the *Edict of Milan, *Constantine dispensed all clerics from the munera so that they would be able to dedicate themselves entirely to their ecclesiastical obligations (CTh XVI, 2,1: 31 October 313). Suppressed by *Julian, this ordinance was renewed by *Valentinian I and extended further by *Gratian. In 346, another constitution (CTh XVI, 2,10) exempted clerics from land taxes. In 360, this was limited to ecclesiastical goods; this was certainly due to the fact that some laymen, in order to avoid these taxes, entrusted the management of their goods to obliging clerics. This same constitution exempted clerics from the munera sordida; but *Theodosius II, in 423, was constrained by the difficulties of the times to require clerics and churches to participate again in the maintenance of bridges and the construction of streets (CTh XV, 3,6 = CI I, 2,7). Finally, in 441, *Valentinian III suspended all fiscal privileges of clerics (Novella X).

II. Patrimonial statute. A constitution of *Leo, valid only for the pars orientalis, granted clerics the right to conserve as property everything they had acquired from the time of their entrance into orders (CI I, 3,33: AD 472). Thus it was licit for them to alienate their own property to whomever they wished. Nevertheless, canonical legislation strove in many ways to limit this right. From the 4th c. on, *councils in *Africa prohibited clerics from disposing of their goods in favor of non-Catholics (Epitome of Hippo, can. 14; Reg. Carth. can. 81). Civil legislation of the 5th c. continued along the same lines: a constitution of Theodosius II granted the goods of a cleric who had not left a testament to his church (CTh V, 3,1).

III. Forum privilege. 1. Imperial legislation. In 355 the Emperor *Constantius, in a constitution (CTh XVI, 2,12), introduced the reservation of forum for bishops who could be judged only by a tribunal established by other bishops. In 378, upon the request of the Roman synod, Emperor *Gratian sent a rescript to the vicarius of *Rome, Aquilinus, in which he determined the procedure to be followed in cases in which bishops were accused. In the constitution, he prescribed that in *Italy, beyond local courts of the first instance, there be instituted an ecclesiastical tribunal which would analyze the various questions before presenting them to the bishop of Rome; in the rest of the West he decided that cases involving clerics in the second instance be judged by a tribunal established by the metropolitan. Against this second sentence an appeal was possible either to a college of fifteen bishops or to the pope himself. Finally, the metropolitans were judged by the pope or by his delegate (Collectio Avellana 13, 11-12).

The effect of this imperial rescript was that in the entire West the governors of the various cities and the judicial authorities cooperated in such a way as to render effective the sentences of the bishops. Yet the rescript of Gratian did not take up a decision voted for by the synod, according to which the pope was subject only to the council or to the emperor. In the inferior grades of the hierarchy, the regulations of Constantine in favor of the audientia episcopalis* were sufficient to ensure appearance of clerics accused in a process before the bishop's tribunal (CTh 1, 27, 1: 23 June 318 and C. Sirm. 1: AD 333); but parallel to the legislation which limited the episopale iudicium (see Audientia Episcopalis), some later measures intervened aimed at limiting reservation of the forum. In 384 *Theodosius I granted privilege of forum exclusively for cases pertaining to ecclesiastical matters (C. Sirm. III). In the 5th c. *Valentinian III, with the Novella XXXV, imposed greater severity in the application of the reservation: the disputing parties were allowed complete freedom to choose their own tribunal, but a preliminary compromise was necessary in order to approach an ecclesiastical tribunal: the judgment was then valid whether the two disputing parties were clerics or laymen. In this way, the possibility of the privilege of forum was excluded, since the will of the prosecutor or defendant to bring his case to the attention of a secular judge prevailed over the opposition of the other side. Further, the law also dealt with cases in which a bishop was accused, excluding the possibility that he refuse to be present in appeal before a state tribunal, but granting the privilege of defending himself through a proxy in cases of serious accusations. In the East, a constitution of *Marcian reserved to the patriarch of *Constantinople processes against clerics of the city, provided that the one requesting the process accept this arrangement (CI I, 4,13 and I, 3,25: 456 AD).

2. Canonical and ecclesiastical sources. The institution of the privilege of forum was an absolute novelty for Roman law, but the practice was already present within the church, though it was limited to matters of faith and to cases in which a bishop had been accused (Conc. Antiochenum I [341], can. XV: Mansi II,1313-1315; Conc. Sardicense [347], can. V: Mansi III,9-10). The church, in response to ever more restrictive imperial legislation, naturally sought to remind clerics, in the many appeals of the pope and of the most eminent bishops, of their obligations concerning the reservation of forum and forbade them to turn to secular courts (Innocent I, Ep. II, 3; Augustine, Enchiridion 88, De opere monachorum XXIX, 37; Basil of Caesarea, Regulae fusius tractatae, interrogatio XLIX). This position was affirmed in many councils. The first certain attestation that deals with the problem of the episcopale iudicium is contained in the ninth canon of the Council of *Carthage in 397. The bishops in council decreed that any bishop, priest or deacon, if he should have to be involved in a process, should direct himself without any hesitation to the iudicium ecclesiasticum, as was the custom and the obligation for all Christians according to the Pauline precept (Conc. Carthag. III, can. IX: Mansi, III, 882). This regulation was confirmed by later councils, although reformulated in a more rigid manner (Conc. Arel. [451-452], can. XXXI: Mansi VII,882; Conc. Venet. [465], can. IX: Mansi VII,954; Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua, can. LXXXVII: CCL 148,171). In the East as well, clerics were forbidden to resort to civil courts (Conc. Chalced. IV [451], can. IX: Hfl-Lecl II,2,791-797).

B. Biondi, Il diritto romano cristiano, I, Milano 1952, 361-374; L. Ferrari delle Spade, Le immunità ecclesiastiche nel diritto romano imperiale: Scritti giuridici III, Milano 1956; C.G. Mor, Sui poteri civili dei vescovi dal IV al secolo VIII. I poteri temporali dei Vescovi in Italia e in Germania nel Medioevo: Annali dell'Istituto storico italo-germanico 3 (1979) 7-33; M.R. Cimma, L'Episcopalis audientia nelle costituzioni imperiali da Costantino a Giustiniano, Torino 1989, 100-132; J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'Empire romain (IVe-Ve siècles), Paris [2]1989, 172-179, 240-245; F. Marigliano, I privilegi in favore dei chierici nella legislazione degli imperatori cristiani, Rome 1991; Storia del Cristianesimo 2, 211-212, 532-533; G.L. Falchi, La diffusione della legislazione imperiale ecclesiastica nei secoli IV e V, in Legislazione imperiale e religione nel IV secolo, eds. J. Gaudemet - P. Siniscalco - G.L. Falchi, Rome 2000, 151-155; G. Pilara, Sui tribunali ecclesiastici nel IV e V secolo: ulteriori considerazioni: StudRom 52/3-4 (2004) 353-378.

G. Pilara

CLINICUS. From the Greek κλίνη ("bed"), κλινικός meant both the skilled doctor and the sick person confined to bed; in Christian language it also came to designate those who were baptized in grave danger of death (see Cypr., Ep. 69, 13). Many preferred to put off *baptism, either because they lacked the courage for conversion or because of the severity of *penitence for serious sins (see De rebaptism. 4-5; Ambr., De paen. II, 11,98ff.; Aug., Sermo de urb. exc. 6,7); many inscriptions concern dead neophytes (see Diehl 90; 965; 1477-1509A). For this reason the Fathers insisted on not delaying baptism. The baptism of clinici, while considered valid, fell under considerable disfavor because it was received only in danger, because it was administered by infusion, not immersion, and because of the scant preparation of the baptizand; it had to be complemented later by laying on of hands by the bishop (De rebaptism. 10; Cornelius in Euseb., HE VI, 43, 15; Counc. of Elvira, can. 38) and religious instruction (Counc. of *Laodicea, can. 47). In general, clinici could not receive orders, since baptism received in emergency was considered an impediment (see Cornelius in Euseb., HE VI, 43, 17; Counc. of Neocaes., can. 12).

DACL 3, 1942-1944; EC 3, 1873-1874; F.J. Dölger, Antike und Christentum, Münster 1930, vol. II, 258ff.; A. Goulon, Un jeu de mots chez Lactance ("Divinae Institutiones," III, 8,10): REAug 19 (1973) 39-55; G.W. Clarke, The Letters of Cyprian of Carthage, New York 1989, vol. IV, 176-177.

A. Di Berardino

CLOTHING

I. Undergarments - II. Overgarments - III. Hairstyling - IV. Footwear - V. Military clothing.

In this entry clothing is treated in regard to its relevance for *iconography, although liturgical garments have a specific treatment, as do religious garments. For understanding clothing in *Late Antiquity and in the early Middle Ages, it is first of all important to distinguish undergarments (indumenta) from overgarments (amictus). This distinction will serve as the basis upon which we will classify our subject matter.

I. Undergarments. Tunica (i.e., "tunic," a Roman undergarment worn by both sexes, which could also be an overgarment). The undergarments, especially one having long sleeves, in part always remained visible, despite the overgarments. It was a type of shirt made of wool or flax, with or without sleeves, girded or ungirded. If it was long, it was called the tunica talaris; if ungirded and without sleeves it was called the colobium; if worn with the right shoulder exposed it was called the esomide. It could be put on by itself or also as an outergarment along with undergarments, which could be more than one. At the time of Emperors *Commodus and Elagabalus, the use of the broad tunic, often ungirded, with long sleeves, almost at half calf or longer, was called the "Dalmatian tunic" (dalmatica). It was very common in the East. Used as an outer garment, it had ornate decorations. The Eastern emperors often used it under the chlamys (i.e., a short mantle or cloak worn by men in ancient Greece), a great tunic also made of seta or purple, which was called the divitision (Gk: an imperial military tunic; a long, belted robe having tight sleeves).

Perizoma (i.e., a girdle). A band around the lower part of the stomach; at times it was made to pass through the thighs.

Ventrale. Consisted of a sort of girdle around the loins, placed either above the tunic or in direct contact with the skin.

Strophium. A band that women would use to lift their breasts above or below the tunic.

Bracae. A type of zouave trousers, which the ancient Eastern and Nordic used, tight and long, also called anassiride or saraballa. They were often connected to footwear or used as underwear.

Hosae. The leg garments that were very much in use during the early Middle Ages: not to be confused with the tubruci or the tibialia (i.e., stockings or leggings), which were probably not worn on naked skin.

Femoralia (i.e., a covering for the thigh) or feminalia (i.e., bandages for the upper part of the thighs, thigh-bandages). There were various types, and they had different uses. For the throat, the chest, for the decoration of clothes, to cover the shins (fasciae crurales) or the feet (fasciae pedules).

II. Overgarments. Toga. A Roman garment par excellence, white, made of wool or flax, placed upon one or more tunics. Its form was semicircular or circular bisection. It was put on in various ways: on the shoulders with strips hanging in front (as in the case of the pallium), or with an end under the right armpit to free the arm. The same piece of cloth was draped upon the left shoulder or was folded again in front in the manner of the balteus (i.e., girdle, belt) and was carried again on the left arm. For this last type of style, a rather consistent measurement of fabric was necessary, as was in use in the imperial era, when the toga also had an abundance of folds on the body (toga fusa). The toga was also worn connected to the person, leaving their arms free. Among the decorations for this type of clothing, we should note a band of purple material on the colored togas (toga praetexta, used by young men but also by the high magistrates). The toga also had various decorations of purple (togae pictae); the emperor and some high individuals could have a toga made entirely of purple (trabea).

Pallium (imation). A Greek garment, made of wool, with a square or rectangular form, it was worn on the tunic or the flesh, also in the manner of the esomide, that is, with the right arm uncovered, a fashion also called "Cynic." It was worn in various ways, very similar to the most simple use described for the toga. This type of clothing would be connected to the sacred individuals and consequently to priestly attire (*Vestments, Liturgical).

Paenula. A cloak of heavy material, likewise heavy or made of leather, with a bell-bottom cut with a hole at the center for the head, all closed and without sleeves, and stretched down to the knees. At times it had a hood (paenula cucullata). Toga and paenula were well documented, as in the case of the figures found on the Arch of *Constantine.

Clamide (i.e., chlamys). A garment in the trapezoidal form, which was at times short, especially military (see below), put on in various ways, but more often pinned up with a pin at the same level of the left shoulder. They could have the decoration of a purple fold (tabula purpurea).

Paludamentum. A garment similar to the chlamys, but long and rather lavish.

Sagion. This type of clothing was similar to the chlamys; it was made of wool and connected to the shoulder with a knot or a pin. So too the abolla, made of double cloth, with a buckle under the neck or on the shoulder, and the sagochlamys, which consisted of two rectangles, one on the front and one on the person's back; united by buckles on the shoulders. Many of the aforementioned types of clothing can be documented, e.g., on the wooden doors of the Basilica of Santa Sabina in *Rome (5th c.) or on the reliefs of the Antonine Column.

Mandyas. This was the true and proper cloak (Persian in origin) pinned to the front, for military and ecclesiastical use. It seems that the garment understood today as a toga of the famous consular *diptychs from the 5th c. should be understood as a mandyas, an interpretation that could also be suggested in other cases.

Lacerna. A cloak made of light or heavy material, secured to the chest by a pin and often also equipped with a hood (under the entry *Vestments, Liturgical, see piviale).

Byrrus. A sort of paenula brevis, overcoat with a hood, cut short at the thighs.

Alicula. A sort of lacerna brevis sometimes made of fur. It was used by young men and especially shepherds.

Caracalla. A tunic with sleeves, open in the front and back, it took its name precisely from the emperor who wore it frequently, but was itself perhaps of Gallic origin. With respect to the skaramangion or the skaranicon or the kandys (which was also used by women), they were in the shape of a caftan and were intended to be used on horseback and were therefore rather short (see also the military outfit). They were very much in use at the court of *Byzantium.

The following elements were connected to clothing: the palliola, types of small pallia, a type of handkerchief (also called sudaria or mappulae, if used like napkins); various types of scarfs among which was the orarium, with long fringes, and the loroi, often crossed on the chest and also heavily decorated (see the mosaic of the Basilica of S. Agnese extra muros at Rome). The women then, in the West, but especially in the East, used veils for their heads (velum, maphorium, kalumma, ricinum etc.), more or less wide, nets for their hair (reticula), and headbands (mitrae or mitellae).

Among the coverings for the head, one should note the pileus, a tall and narrow beret, especially in the ancient examples, which remained then as a priestly insignia, conical in shape, tapered off on the top, or rather rounded off. At *Rome, preference was given to the short and roundish pileus. The one worn by the *Magi was typically Eastern, a rather high spherelike ending, tilted forward (Phrygian beret). At *Byzantium, the pileus continued in the skiadion (scholars, however, are not in agreement on this point). With regard to the the pileus, however, there is a significant amount of confusion, and the term was often used to refer to berets of various styles. The tiara was also a fez type of pileus (like that worn by the peoples of northeastern Asia), or a diadem in the shape of a modiolus with stripes at the back, or in the style of the Phrygian beret. It seems, however, to have been connected to a character of distinction like that of the pontifical tiara, which was a high and conical Phrygian beret (even if more often the tiara was shorter and not conical). In ancient times there existed a short type with straps under the chin used more often than not by the women (mitella).

The crown could be a standard precious circle for the tiara or the mitre. Even the kamilavka (i.e., a pressed down beret) could have a diadem around also connected over the head by precious bands. Among the other types of pilei, one should note the σκυφία and the galerus both round caps.

One could also wear a small pallium on the head connected behind the neck. The women then more often used a simple veil, but also a type of headdress in the form of a kamilavka or a turban with another veil (see the arcosolium of Veneranda in the *cemetery of *Domitilla at Rome). The petasos, however, was a hat with a large brim and a low back, tied under the chin or behind the back of the head, different from the pilei. Given that many types of male and female clothing were common to the two sexes, let us only state that the women in particular made a greater use of the *Dalmatian type, which was often very elegant. They then made use of narrow bands above their inner tunics to lift up their breasts, and they used the short tunic, which also had no sleeves, called the colobium. They also put on the palla like the shawl, in the Greek manner and directly on the skin or even in the esomid way or like a shawl. As was said, they made extensive use of the veil as well as nets for hair. The nuptial veil was called the flammeum.

III. Hairstyling. With respect to hairstyling, the women, especially during the imperial age, used more precious gems. First, the hair on the crown of the head was mostly tied in braids and made to hang from the back. From the 1st c. onward, however, curls began to be most frequently used, likewise connected by being interwoven, and a hairstyle that was at times very complex and imposing, which could be combined with a wig or hair weave. Very short hair (unless it was covered according to *monastic use) or shabby hair was not well received, but also excessive care of the hairstyle or its dyeing was criticized by Christian authors, who preferred to see women veiled or dressed with simplicity. In the 3rd c., parting of the hair in the center was the prevalent fashion, with folds on the sides more or less intricate and precise; in the 4th c., there was much variation: from the "helmet" type, to that of the diadem, often confused with the turban, which even at times was undoubtedly inserted into the hair. Wigs and hair weaves were of much help in hairstyles, and the higher the classes, the more ornate the styles were (see the mosaic of Theodora in the Basilica of San Vitale at *Ravenna). A veil and a headdress, perhaps at times divided with pearls, however, often hid a large part of the hairstyles; barbarian women, however, always had their hair loose or tied in large or small braids.

With respect to male hairstyles, let us recall that the male face with a well-trimmed beard can be seen starting from the *Hadrian era. The use of shaving the entire face returned at the time of Emperor *Constantine. The hairstyles of preference for that era were rather short, often tucked with a curling iron. Long hair and a long beard were proper to the philosopher and also Eastern attire, or they were an indicator of an *ascetic life (the popes preferred short hair, with or without a short beard).

In the East, unshaven faces were more common, and hair was long and gathered or even turban-covered; examples of a complete shave, however, are not lacking. The barbarians had a beard and long hair (with the exception of the Gauls); among them, the *Longobards (Lombards) shaved their hair on the back and let it grow long in the front of the face with a split down the middle of the scalp.

IV. Footwear. Among footwear, we should mention the solea, a sole placed under the foot and tied to it with cords. There were then various types of calcea, more or less open and more or less covering the foot, to the point of true and properly speaking closed shoes (especially to accompany a toga) with a front opening to be easily threaded. The shoes of the patricians could also be decorated with studs of silver or ivory; the upper portion of the shoe was at times artistically carved. The soccus, however, was a type of boot that went above the ankle (other boots that went above the knee were the zanchae; these were of Persian origin). The gallicae, to the contrary, were low shoes, of Gallic origin, which were worn preferably with the lacerna. For the Roman soldiers there was the closed shoe with a high sole and nails, tied by laces on the outer arch. Hunters and workers had low boots, called perones. Last, let us note the campagi, which often covered the front tip and the heel but not the middle part of the foot, which was tied by a lace at the center. The imperial campagi especially had different types of decorations, but in time they became the typical footwear for church officials.

V. Military clothing. The ancient Romans derived their military style of clothing from the Etruscans and Greeks and in the late empire also from the Germans and the peoples of the Steppe and from Eastern civilizations. Therefore they put on one or more tunics (the upper tunic was made of white linen for the Palatine militias and red or dark crimson for the others). The lorica or shield, above the tunic, was originally in strips of leather with bronze plates and a supplement divided by the stomach at the bottom. On the shoulders there was an analogous spin off of the bands. The loricae could have pure circles of iron on the back and descending bands from the shoulders and connected to the torso, or could be the scales-type connected by metal threads, or true batches of links in the shape of intertwined rings. The shoulders and the forearms could be covered by scales and bands (humeralia). Each armored soldier was dressed in full armor, especially the foreign militias of the Easterners covered in armor from head to toe. As a cloak, they used the sagum with a buckle but also the paenula and the various types of chlamys among which was the paludamentum especially for the emperor's or the high officials. A belt (cingulum) from which dangled combat helmets used for a seige could have been supported by a balteus or a bandoleer. For the legs, they used greaves (tibialia), made of leather with metal reinforcements, but the average combat soldiers often did not have them; the shoes could be the sandal type or the closed calceus, especially for the officers. At times, the soldiers also put on bracae, which were rather tight and modified (banded) for harsh climates. The helmet was made of iron or even bronze, with a nonsalient crown and also with reinforcements at the top. Certain types of noncommissioned officers also had a plume of feathers (cresta). The front area of the helmet could be either stationary or mobile; there were metal pieces for the cheeks (bucculae: the Greek cheek piece) and metal bands under the chin.

With respect to the weaponry, let us mention the following: the shields, which were oval, rectangular, hexagonal, circular (clipeus), those made of wood, or wood covered with leather, also with metal reinforcements on the inside, where they crossed for the protection of the arm. The center bulge of the shield was called the umbo. The designs and the variegated colors on the shields were also used to distinguish the various brigades. The soldiers were furnished with a spatha and a gladium; the first was longer, but both had a double edge and a grasp for the hand, with a sheath (vagina) with a ring to hold everything on the belt or on the balteus. They also had a dagger, lance and javelins (the lance was generally longer with a nodus to hold it), bows with arrows, with a simple edge or hook, battle axes (securides) and also batons (especially for services of law and order). Let us also recall that there were numerous insignia, according to the various types of soldiers and also varieties of decorations applied to individuals or the same insignia (armillae, torques, phalerae). The Byzantines also used the Roman military outfit, with the addition of Eastern elements (for example, the skaramangion for the cavalry), which was of Parthian origin. Their helmets tended to take the shape of a cusp, and the shields were often oval; notable among the weapons was the use of the bow.

With respect to the barbarian military dress, we could mention some particularities exhibited by the *Huns, who had a broad tunic that went halfway down the thigh, which was open on the sides and fastened and tied down on the wrists with a large pant fastened around the ankle, goat skins for the legs and leather boots. The beret was made of skin with the extremities hanging on the cheeks; the helmet was heavily fortified on the forehead. The casing of the bow hung from the belt on the front. The quiver, however, hung near the loins; in addition to golden objects, they had arrows made of bone, weapons of iron and traps to snare enemies. With respect to the Alans, scholars know for certain that they were excellent horsemen. Their military dress, perhaps, was also shared by the Scythians or the Sarmatians, the short and tightened tunic (a type of jacket), the trousers, the closed shoes or the ankle boots and, at times, the Phrygian beret. At the side they had a quiver; moreover, they carried lances, bows, daggers and double-edged swords. On the column of Emperor *Trajan, the Sarmatians are likewise wearing scale armor and cone-shaped helmets with horizontal and vertical bands; horses were also covered with hinged armored platings. The Dacians, however, had an uncovered head, short, fastened tunics, and trousers; at times their coats were buckled on the shoulder; their shields were oval. The barbarians also appeared in representations with a naked torso, trousers and a skullcap. Among the Persians, one finds the shielded horse; their shield was in the form of links, and perhaps they also carried a sleeved jacket made of skin. One can definitely thus summarize a series of notations on the Asian military costume. Helmet: hemispherical or pointed arch in shape; the helmet was stout or very high, with bands; at times, the lateral lines were added to the fringes. Armor: covered the body, part of the legs and all or part of the arm. It was made up of a type of leather coat fastened by a belt and fabric made of metal sheets in overlaying areas, overlapped by strips of leather. In central Asia, one finds the first attestation to the use of a large glove for the protection of the forearm. At times one also notes a protective plate for the groin area. Footwear: boots. Weaponry: bow, arrows, lance, also with flaming arrows. A single or double-headed ax, long or short sword with decorative carvings. Helmet: various forms of protection for the throat and the neck, and also a ridge to protect the base of the nose. Armor: made of scales, plates or mesh; also at times even for the horse. Shield: round, square or oval. All these elements merged mostly in the Roman and Byzantine world and then were found again in the West in late Middle Ages. The Gauls: their helmet could also have horns (for the god of war, who was a bull), with or without a visor; the shields were large and oval or hexagonal with a border of iron covered with leather; they had arrows and lances with a point in the shape of a large leaf, also shaped with a slight ripple, with decorative crossbars. The sword had a simple grip, more or less large and hung on the belt or the bandoleer. There was also a manlike clasp with small and raucous trumpets (cornix) likewise very high, with a pointed curve and flared like a throat of an imaginary animal. Every Gallic brigade had its own insignia. They draped the heads of their slain enemies along their horses' necks, according to the custom of Eastern peoples.

The Germans had a short and fastened tunic, rather tight trousers, a beard and long hair (as was already said), heavy shoes, and a cloak. Their weapons were as follows: the lance, the heavy, long or short sword. They usually carried an often-rounded shield, with a central knob at the end, a bow and a helmet, which perhaps replaced a previous hairy beret. The *Franks had double-edged and long knives, shoes of leather and a part of their legs were naked. The sleeves of their cowls only came down to their forearms. Their swords hung from their bandoleers and a large belt of skin with knobs on their loins. The lances had a tip with backward flaps. There were few helmets; they did not have armor and leg bands when riding their horses. By preference, the soldiers were naked to the waist and had bands of linen or skin for their legs and trousers; the shield was on the left. They used axes and lances in place of bows and arrows. Later, the military attire of the Franks changed through the influence of Roman military garb. Through contact with first the Byzantine and then the Roman world, the *Goths also lost the characteristics of their original military attire, concerning which, however, we do not have much information. Theodoric, in fact, was clothed in armor with small metal plates through bands on his legs, and Totila had a skullcap helmet with a nose cone with iron bands running across. With respect to the Longobards, we should note, for example, that on the Triumph of *Agilulf, many men in armor appear with areas of metal bands; their helmet has a panache, protecting the back part of the head, the cheeks and the throat. The shields are round and they ward off a lance. The legs are perhaps covered by leggings of leather in bands (ocrea, impilia). The following were among the furnishings discovered: sword, at times with a golden sheath and decorations; rather short lances, tips and arrows; straps and simple belts; shields (wood covered with leather or metallic layers); helmets (rare); spurs; fragments of shoes (the Longobards first covered their shin bones with bands of leather, then they used leggings: see above); bracelets; metal basins; bags for fodder or for washing horses; large round shields; and semispherical umboni, culminating with a stud at which crosses or zoomorphic swastikas reached their apex. The *Celts were first naked, then they had a short tunic or fur coat, buckled on the shoulders.

Moreover, the Slavs, who were at first bereft of arms, subsequently enriched their weaponry thanks to the influence of the Germans and the Byzantines. (We have sparse and late artefacts.) Last, the Vikings had a closed helmet in the shape of a mask on the face with a cheekpiece. Between the 7th and 9th c., however, in addition to the closed helmet with cheek pieces and a figure of a ravenous bird on top, the horsemen had a lance and a round shield (the armor being doubtful); the infantrymen had leather tunics, a closed helmet with figures of a wild boar, a sword and an imposing lance. For the protection of the chest and shoulders, one can also perceive a sort of pelt or fur. Later, the following would also be characteristic: nose pieces, glazed helmets and swords with a golden grip.

C. Cecchelli, Vita di Roma nel Medio Evo. Le arti minori e il costume, Rome 1960 (with bibl.). For Byzantine attire: C. Nicolescu, L'héritage byzantin de l'art romain. Les broderies: FR 18 (1971) 403-417 and also the work of F. Kolb, Römische Mäntel: Paenula, Lacerna, Mandyas: Röm. Mit. 80 (1973) 69-167; L. Pisetzky, Storia del costume in Italia, I, Milan 1964; J.P. Wild, The Byrrus Britannicus: Antiquity 37 (1963) 193-202; Id., The Caracallus: Latomus 23 (1964) 532-536; Id., Textile Manufacture in the Northern Roman Provinces, Cambridge 1970; The World of Roman Costume, ed. J.L. Sebesta - L. Bonfante, Madison, WI 1994; L. Bonfante, Introduction to The World of Roman Costume, Madison, WI 1994; R. Martorelli, Aspetti di storia del costume in Europa dall'età giustinianea al VII secolo, in Atti del XIII Congr. Int. di Archeologia Cristiana, Split-Poreć settembre 1994, Split-Città del Vaticano 1998, 723-733; The Roman Textile Industry and Influence: A Birthday Tribute to John Peter Wild, ed. P. Walton Rogers - L. Bender Jorgenseb - A. Rast-Eicher, Oxford 2001; RAC 21, 1-60; A. Köb - P. Riedel (eds.), Kleidung und Repräsentation in Antike und Mittelalter, München 2005.

M. Cecchelli

CLOTILDE, saint (ca. 474–544/548). Born in *Lyons as a Catholic *Burgundian princess, ca. 492–494 she married the Merovingian king *Clovis, still a *pagan, and led him to *baptism (he was baptized by Bishop *Remigius of Reims at Christmas, ca. 498–499); she was widowed in 511. She watched, powerless, the battles between the *Franks and the Burgundians, in which her eldest son Chlodomer died (524), leaving her with three sons; she was similarly powerless over the crimes of her surviving sons, *Chlothar and Childebert, who massacred Chlodomer's sons out of lust for power. She withdrew from the residence at *Paris to *Tours, near the tomb of St. *Martin, where she founded a female *monastery dedicated to St. Peter, where she died; she was buried at Paris, however, beside her husband in the Basilica of the Holy Apostles, which would later be called St. *Genevieve. The foremother of the Merovingians came to be venerated as a saint, feast 3 June.

BHL 1785-1786; BS 4,64-67; BBKL 1,997; LMA 2,1343-1345; M. Reydellet, La royauté dans la littérature latine de Sidoine Apollinaire à Isidore de Séville, Rome 1981; J.A. McNamara - J. E. Halborg (eds.), Sainted Women of the Dark Ages, Durham - London 1992.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

CLOVIS, king (466–511). Son of Childeric, king of one of the tribes of Salian *Franks by then established in NE *Gaul, he assumed power in 482, aged 16. His base of operations may initially have been at Tournai, where his father was buried. In 486 at Soissons he defeated the Roman Syagrius, king of Gallia Lugdunensis and parts of Belgica Secunda, and immediately thereafter extended his reign between the Somme and the Loire, establishing his residence at *Paris. Through the influence of his wife *Clotilde, a *Burgundian of *Nicene faith, and of *Remigius, *metropolitan of *Reims, he drew near to Christianity, and after defeating the Alemanni at Zülpich (Tolbiac), he promised—in the sanctuary of St. *Martin at Tours—to receive *baptism. Imitating Flavius *Theodoric, the *Ostrogoth king of *Italy who in 497 was recognized by the new emperor, *Anastasius I, Clovis waged a successful war against the *Arian *Visigoth king Alaric II and with the help of Gundobad's Burgundians (whom he had defeated in 500) defeated him at Vouillé (near *Poitiers) in 507. After this victory and the conquest of Toulouse, on his return (spring 508) Clovis stopped at Tours and there received investiture as patricius from those sent by Anastasius. On Christmas night of probably the same year (or in 497, according to the traditional date), Clovis was baptized, perhaps at Paris, where Remigius and his suffragan bishops had gathered. Soon after his sister Albofleda was also baptized, dying shortly later. His sister Audofleda was given in marriage to Flavius Theodoric. Probably at the end of Clovis's reign, the first formulation (class A of the MSS) of the Lex Salica—a collection of national customs for the Franks and the other German components of Clovis's kingdom—was written, with Roman influence but also on the model of the slightly earlier Burgundian codification.

Under Clovis's patronage the synod of Orléans was held in 511, which established (can. 4) the obligation of the approval of the king and of the local civil authority for priestly ordinations.

At Clovis's death the kingdom was divided among his sons (Theuderic, Chlodomer, Childebert, Chlothar). His daughter *Clotilde married, perhaps after 526, the Visigoth Amalaric, son of Alaric II and grandson of Theodoric.

Ep. ad episcopos: CPL 1818; PL 71, 1158 and 72, 1118; MGH Legum sectio I: leg. nat. Germ. II/1, 1883, 1-2 (A. Boretius).

Lex Salica: CPL 1813; MGH Legum sectio I: leg. nat. Germ. II/2, 1962, 2ff. (K.A. Eckhardt).

Letters addressed to Clovis: Remig., Epist. Austras. 1-2; Alc. Avit., Epist. 46; Cassiod., Var. II, 41; III, 4; Conc. Aurel. a. 511, CCL 148A, 5. The letter of Pope Anastasius II (Ep. 2, 624 Thiel) is considered apocryphal.

PLRE II, 288-290; A. Lippold: PWK suppl. XIII, 139-174. - F. Vogel, Clodwig's Sieg über die Alamannen und seine Taufe: HZ 56 (1886) 385-403; B. Krusch, Chlodovechs Sieg über die Alamannen: Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 12 (1886) 289-301; G. Tessier, 25 décembre . . . : Le Baptème de Clovis, Paris 1964; B.S. Bachrach, Procopius and the Chronology of Clovis' Reign: Viator 1 (1970) 21-31; E. Griffe, L'épiscopat gaulois et les royautés barbares de 482 à 507: BLE 76 (1975) 261-284; I.N. Wood, Gregory of Tours and Clovis: RBPh 63 (1985) 249-272; C. Carozzi, Le Clovis de Grégoire de Tours: MA 98 (1992) 169-185; M. Spencer, Dating the Baptism of Clovis, 1886-1993: EME 3 (1994) 97-116; O. Guyotjeannin (ed.), Clovis chez les historiens, Paris 1996; M. Rouche, Clovis, Paris 1996; var. aus., Die Franken Wegbereiter Europas. Vor 1500 Jahren: König Chlodwig und seine Erben, Mainz 1996; M. Rouche (ed.), Clovis. Histoire et mémoire: Clovis et son temps, l'événement, Paris 1997; D.R. Shanzer, Dating the Baptism of Clovis: The Bishop of Vienne vs. the Bishop of Tours: EME 7 (1998) 29-57; G. Halsall, Childeric's Grave, Clovis's Succession, and the Origins of the Merovingian Kingdom, in Society and Culture in Late Antique Gaul, R.W. Mathisen - D. Shanzer (eds.), Aldershot 2001, 116-133.

E. Malaspina

CODEX APIARII CAUSAE (or Gesta de nomine Apiarii: CCL 149,98-148). On the occasion of the dispute regarding the case of *Apiarius, two collections of rules were composed by the *African bishops. The first, it seems, was composed immediately after the council of May 419 (two sessions: 25 and 30 May), and sent to *Rome (and passed into Italian collections: the Teatina, Sanblasiana etc.); the second, more complete, was written in November to justify the positions of the African bishops. This second collection comprised the Gesta (Acts) of the council, the authentic canons of *Nicaea translated into *Latin at *Constantinople by *Atticus, and the letters of *Cyril of Alexandria and of Atticus himself. Because of its size, this collection immediately underwent changes and mutilations, passing into the Hispana. Later, in 424 according to Munier, a third collection was compiled to defend the rights of the African churches against Rome's claims; it passed into the Collectio Frisingensis, where the editor tried to soften statements against papal authority. This collection was used by *Dionysius Exiguus.

CPL 1765; EOMIA I, 2,3, 566-595; Concilia Africae, Concilium Carthag., CCL 149, 90-148. W. Telfer, The Codex Verona LX (58): HTR 36 (1943) 169-246; F.L. Cross, History and Fiction in the African Canons: JTS 69 (1961) 227-247; C. Munier, Tradition littéraire des conciles africains: RecAug 10 (1975) 3-32; Id., La tradition littéraire des dossiers africains: RDC 29 (1979) 41-52; E.J. Kilmartin, Early African Legislation Concerning the Liturgical Prayer: EphLit 69 (1985) 105-127; H. Mordek, Karthago oder Rom? Zu dem Anfängen der kirchlichen Rechtsquelle im Abendland, in Studia in Honorem A.M. Stickler, Rome 1992, 359-374; J.E. Merdinger, Rome and the African Church in the Time of Augustine, New Haven 1997; PCBE 1,82f.

A. Di Berardino

CODEX JUSTINIANUS. Collection of imperial decrees made in 528 by order of *Justinian (527–565), who entrusted it to a ten-man commission of high magistrates and jurists (incl. Tribonian, magister officiorum, and Theophilus, professor of law at the school of *Constantinople), presided over by John of Cappadocia. The commission used three earlier compilations of laws: the Codex Gregorianus (ca. 291), the Codex Hermogenianus (with the laws of Diocletian from 291 to 294) and the Codex Theodosianus, discarding all that was useless or obsolete, eliminating repetitions and contradictions, and giving the texts simplicity and clarity. The Codex Justinianus was published 7 April 529 (the work has not survived; we have only—through papyri—a list of rubrics and of the decrees of book I,11-16) but was soon overtaken by the emperor's abundant legislation; in 530 he ordered a new edition (Codex repetitae praelectionis), published mid-December 534. Besides the two editions of the code, in 533 the Digests (collections of passages from the works of the jurists) and the Institutiones (elementary principles of law for use in schools, to replace the classical ones of Gaius) came into force: Justinian intended the various collections to constitute a whole. After the reconquest of *Italy, the three compilations were sent there for publication and in 554, with the Sanctio Pragmatica pro petitione Vigilii, the promulgation of the subsequent Novellae issued in the East between 535–540 was also ordered.

The oldest law of the Codex Justinianus goes back to *Hadrian (VI, 23,1), the latest to November 534 (the year of publication). The code is divided into 12 books, and the books into titles, within which the decrees are ordered chronologically, with information on the emperors who issued them, the recipients they were addressed to and their date of issue. The compilers of the collection had been authorized to make opportune changes in the texts of previous emperors' laws: comparison with the corresponding texts of the Codex Theodosianus and with the interpolations inserted therein is important for reconstructing the technique and the criteria which inspired the collection; where comparison is impossible, as for laws predating *Constantine, we must have recourse to the usual criteria of form and substance criticism. The laws are reproduced in the language in which they were written, meaning almost entirely in Latin. The first book is dedicated to religious arguments and begins with the Cunctos populos, the law of Theodosius issued at *Thessalonica in 380.

P. Krueger, Codex Iustinianus, Berlin 1887; Id., Corpus Iuris Civilis 2, Berlin 1929 (repr. 1954); G. Rotondi, Studi sulle fonti del Codice Giustinianeo, in Scritti giuridici I, Milan 1922, 110-283; H. Jaeger, Justinien et l'episcopalis audientia: RHD 38 (1960) 214-262; G.G. Archi, Giustiniano legislatore, Bologna 1979, with bibliography; for the historical context, see J.W. Barker, Justinian and the Later Roman Empire, Madison-Milwaukee-London 1966; Il mondo del diritto nell'epoca giustinianea, caratteri e problematiche, Ravenna 1985; D. Mantovani, Digesto e masse bluhmiane, Milan 1987; G.A. Archi - C. Capizzi, Giustiniano I tra politica e religione, Soveria Mannelli 1994; O. Mazal, Justinian und seine Zeit, Cologne 2001.

M. Forlin Patrucco

CODEX of VISIONS. The Codex of Visions consists of three parts: the first presents the first three visions of the Shepherd of *Hermas, a well-known text, the second the *visio Dorothei—the the most important text in the codex—and the third, eight poems by various unknown authors. The codex as a whole was compiled probably in the 1st quarter of the 5th c. in the region of Panopolis in *Egypt, while the visio and poems were composed in the 1st half of the 4th c., shortly after Dorotheus's *martyrdom during the reign of *Diocletian. Some scholars defend the historicity of the person Dorotheus, and suppose that he himself is the author of the vision of Dorotheus; others think of a community, probably of clerics, who compiled the texts out of veneration for the martyr, perhaps for liturgical use. The theme of the codex is spiritual martyrdom, contrition, humility and *penitence as a means of reintegration into the church after a grave sin.

Papyrus Bodmer XXXVIII: Hermas, Il Pastore (Ia-IIIa visione), Cologny-Geneva 1991; Papyrus Bodmer XXIX: Vision de Dorothéos, Cologny-Geneva 1984; Papyri Bodmer XXX-XXXVII: "Codex des Visions" Poèmes divers, Munich 1999; A. Hurst - J. Rudhardt, Le Codex des Visions, Geneva 2002.

S. Samulowitz

CODEX THEODOSIANUS. Official collection of imperial laws from *Constantine (312) to *Theodosius II (438, year of publication, to take effect on 1 January 439). Compiled to answer the need for legal certainty (requested, e.g., in the anonymous late-4th-c. treatise De rebus bellicis), it should be thought of as the expression of a precise initiative of the chancellery of the court of *Constantinople, with two aims: (1) to collect all the imperial decrees, from Constantine to Theodosius II inclusive, in a codex characterized by the diversitates existing between the various laws (see CTh I, 1,5 of 429), thus a sort of pure inventory of material; (2) to provide, besides the exposition of the laws, the integration of the iura, i.e., to present the dialogue between the regulative activity of the emperors and the creative interpretation of jurisprudence, with the declared aim of creating a magisterium vitae, a systematic exposition of the legal system considered as educational activity and instruction for imperial subjects (loc. cit.). The first program of 429 was essentially a failure, and in 435 Theodosius II began a new initiative (CTh I, 1,6), apparently autonomous and more modest than the first, which provided for the ordering of decrees according to the contents expressed in their titles and instructing the drafters of the collection to be brief and clear, i.e., to limit texts to the essential, clarifying their contents so as to make them usable in practice: the relationship between the two programs should perhaps be understood as a reuse, for different ends, of the material collected as a result of the provisions of 429.

In its surviving form, the Codex Theodosianus is divided into 16 books, and the books into titles expressing content, arranged according to the ascending chronological order of the original texts, of which only passages are reported, and not the whole law, with the inscriptio at the beginning (the emperor or emperors who emanated the law and the addressees) and a subscriptio at the end (place and date of issue). Sometimes the inscriptiones or the subscriptiones are erroneous. Often the original text has been taken apart and put under various titles according to the arguments treated. The lack of introductions in the reported passages keeps us ignorant of the reasons for a law's emanation and the purposes the legislator hoped to accomplish. Also, outside of their original context, the imperial decrees acquire a different historical meaning than that at the time of their emanation. A vast part of the code was assumed into the Lex Romana Visigothorum or Breviarium Alaricianum (a compilation ordered by Alaric in 506 for the use of Roman citizens in Visigothic territory) and later into the Codex Justinianus*. It remained in force in the Eastern empire until abrogated by the publication of the Codex Justinianus (529), and in *Italy until the conquest by *Justinian in 554.

The text is not preserved complete (much of it is known through the Lex Romana Visigothorum): the most serious lacunae are in the first five books; also, to the interpolations prescribed to the redactors in the programs we must add the glosses and paraphrases inserted in the text in the course of its transmission in subsequent MSS of the code proper and of Alaric's Lex.

Some problems of an ecclesiastical nature are included in various places: I, 27 de episcopali definitione; IV, 7 de manumissionibus in ecclesia; V, 3 de bonis clericorum et monachorum; IX, 45 de his, qui ad ecclesias confugiunt; a sign of willingness to consider, on the level of prescriptive law, the new problems represented by the triumph of the church as a social reality and an established institution. In particular the whole of the last book, XVI, is dedicated to the relations between the empire and the Catholic Church. The position of this book in the compilation and its special nature are disputed by scholars: is it a mere appendix, negligible for evaluating the criteria inspiring the collection, or does it contain its own internal logic justifying its structure, a choice of themes corresponding to the political and legal reality of the time? The most recent literature tends to see it as evidence of the empire's interest in religious unity, decisive in the support given by the state to the church insofar as it meant a guarantee of religious and civil peace within society. Compared with the code of Justinian, which opens with ecclesiastical legislation (1,1-13), enhancing the importance of the Catholic faith by recognizing the legal autonomy of all legislation pertaining to it, the compilers of the Codex Theodosianus—while fully aware of the historical reality of the institutional church—set this new reality within a prescriptive model which adhered to the constitutional structure of the state: recognition of the church as an institution was thus effected in connection with the requirements of civil society, and in collaboration—even on the legislative level—with its structures.

Th. Mommsen - P.M. Meyer, Theodosiani libri XVI, cum constitutionibus Sirmondianis et Leges Novellae ad Theodosianum pertinentes, Berlin 1905; Eng. tr. by C. Pharr, The Theodosian Code and Novels and Sirmondian Constitutions, Princeton, NJ 1952; see in general J. Gaudemet, La formation du droit séculier et du droit de l'Église au IVe et Ve siècles, Paris 1957; G.G. Archi, Teodosio II e la sua codificazione, Naples 1976; in particular, on book XVI, L. De Giovanni, Chiesa e stato nel Codice Teodosiano, Naples [4]1997; W. Turpin, The Law Codes and Late Roman Law: RIDA 32 (1985) 339-353; T. Honoré, The Making of Theodosian Code: ZSS 103 (1986) 139-216; The Theodosian Code: Studies in the Imperial Law of Late Antiquity, J. Harries - I. Wood (eds.), London 1993; A. Barzanò, Il cristianesimo nelle leggi di Roma imperiale, Milan 1996; T. Honoré, Law in the Crisis of Empire (379-455 AD), Oxford 1998; E. Dovere, Ius principale e Catholica Lex, Naples [2]1999; É. Magnou-Notier (ed.), Le Code Théodosien, Livre XVI, Texte latin et traduction française, Paris 2002.

M. Forlin Patrucco
S. Samulowitz

COGITOSUS (Toimtenach), monk (7th c.). Irish monk, to whom, ca. 650, the community of the *monastery of Kildare (Cell Dara), to which he probably belonged, entrusted the composition of the Life of St. Brigid, foundress and first *abbess of that monastery. The work, written in Hiberno-Latin, is among the earliest evidence of Irish *hagiography, along with *Tírechán's Collectanea on St. *Patrick, *Muirchú's Life of St. Patrick and *Adamnan's Life of St. Colombanus. Complex and disputed are the relations between the Life compiled by Cogitosus and the other hagiographical works on the Irish virgin, in particular the two anonymous Lives, one in *Latin (the Vita prima Brigitae) and another in Old Irish (Bethu Brigte), which seem to derive, like that written by Cogitosus, from an earlier hagiographical work. Regarding its relation to continental hagiography, its conscious insertion into an already-consolidated literary genre has been demonstrated, along with its conscious originality, shown esp. in the prologues. In this sense Cogitosus can justifiably be considered the father of Irish hagiography, a primacy acknowledged by his student Muirchú in the prologue of the Vita sancti Patricii. The monastery of Kildare was a monastic foundation of both monks and nuns who lived in different parts of the monastery; the abbess, beginning with the foundress *Brigid, had a position of preeminence.

CPL 2147; Vita S. Brigidae auctore Cogitoso (BHL 1457): J.F. Kenney, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: Ecclesiastical. An Introduction and Guide, Dublin 1979, n. 147 (359-360); PL 72, 775-790; S. Connolly - J.-M. Picard, Cogitosus's Life of St Brigit: Content and Value: Journal of the Royal Society of Antiquaries of Ireland 117 (1987) 11-27 (Eng. tr.); M. Esposito, On the Earliest Latin Life of St Brigid of Kildare, PRIA 30c (1912-1913) 307-326, now in Id., Latin Learning in Mediaeval Ireland, London 1988; M. Esposito, Notes on Latin Learning and Literature in Mediaeval Ireland, 1, 6: Hermathena 45 (1930) 251-257, now in Id., Latin Learning in Mediaeval Ireland, London 1988; M. Winterbottom, Variations on a Nautical Theme: Herma-thena 120 (1976) 55-58; R. Sharpe, Vitae S. Brigitae: The Oldest Texts: Peritia 1 (1982) 81-106; K. McCone, Brigit in the Seventh Century: A Saint with Three Lives?: Peritia 1 (1982) 107-145; J.-M. Picard, Structural Patterns in Early Hiberno-Latin Hagiography: Peritia 4 (1985) 67-82; W. Berschin, Biographie und Epochenstil im lateinischen Mittelalter, 2, Stuttgart 1988, 230-243; K. McCone, Pagan Past and Christian Present in Early Irish Literature, An Sagart 1990, esp. 179-202; C. Stancliffe, The Miracle Stories in Seventh-Century Irish Saints' Lives, in Le septième siècle: changements et continuités. Actes du Colloque bilatéral franco-britannique tenu au Warbourg Institute les 8-9 juillet 1988, London 1992, 87-112; S. Connolly, The Power Motif and the Use of Scripture in Cogitosus' Vita Brigitae, in Aquitaine and Ireland in the Middle Ages, Dublin 1995, 207-220; D.A. Bray, Die heilige Brigitte, die Marie der Gälen, in Herrscher, Helden, Heilige, St. Gallen 1996, 629-638; L.M. Bitel, Land of Women: Tales of Sex and Gender from Early Ireland, Ithaca - New York - London 1996; Patrologia IV, 452-453; D. Howlett, Vita I Sanctae Brigitae: Peritia 12 (1998) 1-23; D. McCarthy, The Chronology of St Brigit of Kildare: Peritia 14 (2000) 255-281; D. McCarthy, Topographical Characteristics of the Vita Prima and Vita Cogitosi Sanctae Brigitae: Studia Celtica 35 (2001) 245-270; C. Olsen, Did Brigit Love Animals Like a Good Celt Should? An Inquiry into Cogitosus's "Life of Saint Brigit": Comitatus 33 (2002) 1-17.

V. Milazzo

COLLATIO ALEXANDRI ET DINDIMI. A false epistolary exchange between Alexander the Great and Dindimus, king of the Brahmans, written in the 4th-5th c. at the same time as that between *Seneca and St. *Paul. Alexander's relations with Hindu sages were surrounded with legend by *pagan and Christian philosophers. The Collatio Alexandri et Dindimi is linked to or inspired by the Comm. Palladii and the Dindimus de Bragmanibus (see H. Becker, Die Brahmanen in der Alexandersage, Königsberg 1889). Its five letters are in the form of philosophical-religious controversies: (1) Alexander asks for information about the Brahmans. (2) Dindimus expounds his people's simplicity and purity. He indicts the pagans, and he praises poverty as the source of freedom and a life in conformity with nature. (3) Alexander criticizes the Brahmans' understanding of human rights. (4) Dindimus explains the Brahmans' return to heaven and their rejection of seductions. (5) Alexander praises freedom, culture and relativism.

CPL 192; PL 101, 1366-1375; PLS 1, 679-690; E. Liénard, La Collatio Alexandri et Dindimi: RBPh 15 (1936) 819-838; G.A. Gary, A Note on the Mediaeval History of the Collatio Alex. cum Dind.: CM 15 (1954) 124-129; T. Pritchard, The Collatio Alexandri et Dindimi: A Revised Text: CM 55 (1995) 255-283 (critical ed. of the text); M. Steinmann, Die "Collatio Alexandri et Dindimi," Göttingen 2000 (Lat. text and Ger. tr.); M. Steinmann, Collatio Aelxandri et Dindimi: Göttinger Forum für Altertumswissenschaft 4 (2001) 51-84.

E. Romero Pose

COLLATIO CUM DONATISTIS. The Conference of *Carthage opened on 1 June 411 under the presidency of the imperial tribune, the notary *Marcellinus, in the baths of Gargiglianus. It was the culmination of a series of efforts, first by *Augustine (Ep. 34,5; 44,12; 61,2 etc.) and then by the whole *Catholic Church of N *Africa, to force the *Donatists into a confrontation which could decide which party had the better claim to be the "Catholic Church in N Africa." After the failure of a Catholic initiative (25 August 403; see Gesta Collationis III, 174), imperial edicts of 12 February 405 (CTh XVI, 6, 4 and 5, 38) condemned the Donatists as *heretics. The following year a Donatist delegation went to *Ravenna and seems to have accepted the idea of a conference (Aug., Ep. 88, 10). The project was delayed by four years of political conflicts (fall of *Stilicho, August 408) and wars in *Italy, but in summer 410 a Catholic delegation to the imperial court obtained *Honorius's consent to the conference. On 14 October 410, the emperor sent a personal letter to Marcellinus instructing him to call a conference within four months to put an end "to the vain error and sterile schism of the Donatists" (Gesta Collationis I, 4,1). But a later edict dated 19 January 411 allowed Marcellinus more room for impartiality (Gesta Collationis, I, 5). Nevertheless, when it finally opened, the initial probabilities were decidedly against the Donatists, who, not without reason, doubted the commissioner's impartiality (Aug., Gesta cum Emerito 2). Both parties deployed all their forces for the occasion, the Donatists bringing 285 bishops and the Catholics 286 (see S. Lancel, Actes de la Conférence de Carthage, I [SC 194], 110-118). The accounts of the first two sittings (1 and 3 June) survive entire, but the second part of the Acta, for the third and decisive session of 8 June, has been lost, apart from the headings of the discussion. During the procedure, each party was represented by six actores or delegates, who had permission to bring documentary proofs to support their case.

The first session was completely occupied with examining the credentials of the bishops. First the Catholics then the Donatists came forward to prove their identity to the satisfaction of the commissioner and the delegates on each side. Each one had to declare whether he had any enemies, and all remarks were written down by stenographers and signed by the speaker. The second session never got under way, since the Donatists complained that the minutes of the previous session were not yet ready, and demanded an adjournment. At dawn on 8 June, the conference met again. In the course of the debate, despite the efforts of *Petilian of Constantine (who spoke 150 times), the Catholics gradually gained the upper hand. They were able to present documents showing that *Caecilian had been acquitted of the charge of being consecrated by a *traditor bishop, and therefore the *schism had never had any justification. The Catholics added that they were in *communion with other churches throughout the world and, finally, that Donatist treatment of the schism of *Maximian was inconsistent with their continued refusal to return to union with the Catholics. Augustine played a prominent role in turning the final day's debate in favor of the Catholics. Marcellinus formulated his decision in favor of the Catholics on 26 June, and on 30 January 412 the Donatist church was officially proscribed (CTh XVI, 5,52). Its clergy were exiled, its followers diminished considerably, and all its property was confiscated in favor of the Catholics.

The acts of the conference are of great value as an authentic account of the situation of the rival N African churches at the start of the 5th c., and they throw an interesting light on the administrative procedures of the Roman government in the West.

S. Lancel (ed.), Actes de la Conférence de Carthage en 411, Paris 1972-1975 (SC 194, 195, 224); PL 11, 1223-1434; Monceaux IV, 388-425; E. Tengström, Die Protokollierung der Collatio Carthaginensis, Göteborg 1962; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church, Oxford [2]1971, ch. 17; S. Lancel, op. cit., vol. I; M.A. Tilley, Dilatory Donatists or Procrastinating Catholics: The Trial at the Conference of Carthage: ChHist 60/1 (1991) 7-19.

W.H.C. Frend

COLLATIO LEGUM. Collection of Mosaic and Roman laws, compared in order to show the greater antiquity of the former and hence the truth of Christianity, which refers to them, against the claims to greater antiquity advanced by *pagan legal science. The biblical text is cited according to an otherwise unknown version of the LXX; the Roman laws are taken from the works of ancient jurists (ps.-Paul, ps.-Ulpian, Modestinus, Papinian and Gaius, the Codex Gregorianum, and the Codex Hermogenianum) and imperial decrees. Its 16 chapters each relate to a legislative problem, generally criminal: this must have constituted book I of the work, which presumably contained others (see Hincmar of Reims, De div. Loth. et Tetb., interr. XII, resp.: PL 125, 697B). The collection, known as Lex Dei or Mosaicarum et Romanarum legum collatio, was probably composed in the late 4th or early 5th c. Its author is still unknown, despite numerous hypotheses (incl. *Ambrose and *Ambrosiaster). It has also been hypothesized that the work was composed in a Jewish context in the early 4th c.

CPL 168 (bibl.); CPPM IIA, 1786; Schanz IV, 1 (1914) 359-362; Th. Mommsen, Mosaicarum et Romanarum legum collatio, in Collectio librorum juris antejustiniani, t. III, Berlin 1890, 107-198; J. Baviera, Fontes Juris Romani antejustiniani, 2, Florentiae [2]1968, 544-589; L. Wenger, Die Quellen des römischen Rechts, Vienna 1953, 545-548 (bibl.); Patrologia III, 175-176; A.M. Rabello, Sull'ebraicità dell'autore della "Collatio legum Mosaicarum et Romanarum": Rassegna mensile di Israel 23 (1967) 339-349; D. Liebs, Die Jurisprudenz im spätantiken Italien (260-640 n. Chr.), Berlin 1987, 162-174.

A. Pollastri

COLLECT. A variable *prayer, the first oration recited by the bishop or priest alone after the Introit of the *Mass. The three ancient Roman *sacramentaries preserve the texts of this prayer, which probably entered the Roman Mass at the time of Pope *Leo I. In the Roman *liturgy, the term collecta designated the assembly, esp. in the stational churches. But in the *Gallican sacramentaries, collectio (later collecta) denoted the priest's prayer summing up and concluding the prayer of the assembly. *John Cassian, in De institutis coenobiorum (CSEL 17, 23-24), speaks of him qui orationem collecturus est or qui precem colligit. Walafrid Strabo explains that the word collecta means that the petitions are gathered together (De exord. et increm. 22: PL 114, 945). It was under Gallican influence that the Franco-Roman prayer at the beginning of Mass came to be called the collect.

The collect is basically a prayer of petition. In its ancient Roman form it was addressed to the Father: ut nemo in precibus vel Patrem pro Filio vel Filium pro Patre nominet; et cum altari assistitur, semper ad Patrem dirigatur oratio, according to can. 23 of the III Council of *Carthage (397). Its complete structure includes a theological proposition with an allusion to the feast (protasis), followed by the petition (apodosis), and concluding with the clause Per Dominum. Those written in the 5th-6th c., the classical period of Roman literary art, employ the oratorical cursus, or rhythmic prose, which is present particularly in the collects of Pope Leo I. The Leonine cursus of the collects is more quantitative than accentuative: it follows more the laws of meter than of rhythm and is practically restricted to the planus, tardus and velox type of cursus (Di Capua, Il ritmo prosaico, vol. I).

F. Di Capua, Il ritmo prosaico nelle lettere dei papi e nei documenti della cancelleria romana dal IV al XIV secolo, vol. I, Rome 1937; P. Bruylants, Les oraisons du missel romain, texte et histoire, 2 vols., Louvain 1952; B. Capelle, Collecta: Travaux liturgiques 2, Louvain 1962, 192-199; M. Metzger, A Eucharistic Lexicon, in Handbook for Liturgical Studies, vol. 3, Collegeville, MN 1999, 5; M. Dudley, Collect, in The New Westminster Dictionary of Liturgy and Worship, London 2002, 119-120.

A. Chupungco

COLLUCIANISTS. In his letter to *Eusebius of Nicomedia, *Arius greets him as a Collucianist, i.e., a fellow disciple of the school of *Lucian of Antioch. The name was anciently given to a group of Lucian's disciples who supported Arius doctrinally and politically: it included Eusebius of Nicomedia, *Maris of Chalcedon, *Theognis of Nicaea, Anthony of Tarsus, *Leontius of Antioch and *Asterius the Sophist.

G. Bardy, Saint Lucien d'Antioche et son école; les collucianistes: RSR 22 (1932) 437-462; G. Bardy, Recherches sur S. Lucien d'Antioche et son école, Paris 1936.

M. Simonetti

COLLUTHUS (mid-6th c.). Alexandrian *monophysite, author of an Apologia pro Theodosio defending the Tomus ad Theodoram of *Theodosius, monophysite patriarch of *Alexandria (525–560), against the attacks of the deacon *Themistius, head of the sect of the *Agnoetae, who had been accused in the Tomus. Some fragments of the Apologia are preserved. Themistius replied with a Contra Colluthum.

CPG 7298: Mansi X, 1117E, 1121A, 1121D-1124A; DTC 15, 219-221; Beck 395; R. Riedinger, ACO ser. c. I, 330.14-17, 25-28, 30-33; 332.1-5; A. Van Roey - P. Allen, Monophysite Texts of the Sixth Century, OLA 56, Leuven 1994, 6, 10-11, 16; Patrologia V, 362-363; 359-363 (Themistius).

F. Scorza Barcellona

COLLUTHUS of Alexandria (4th c.). Presbyter, founder of a sect. Following his claim to be a bishop (on what basis we do not know), the Council of *Alexandria of 324 declared him a mere *presbyter and that ordinations conferred by him were invalid (Athan., Apol. sec. 12, 75-77, 80). From a letter of *Alexander of Alexandria preserved by *Theodoret (HE I, 4), it seems that Colluthus began his *schism before the condemnation of *Arius. It has been thought, on the basis of some expressions in this letter, that Colluthus received money to confer orders and that he separated because he thought Alexander's position on Arius too bland: the name Colluthus is first among the presbyters who subscribed to Alexander's condemnation of Arius (Gelas. Cyz., HE II 3, 21). *Epiphanius (Haer. 69, 2, 4-7) mentions him as founder of a sect which soon disappeared. Following *Filaster (Haer. 79), later heresiologists considered Colluthus a supporter of the doctrine that God could not be held to have created evil, in contradiction of Is 45:7.

DCB 1, 596; EC 3, 1991; LTK[3] 2, 185 (Colluthianer); ODC[3] 377.

F. Scorza Barcellona

COLLYRIDIANI. *Epiphanius names this sect in the masculine (Anc. XIII,8), saying that its followers offered twice-baked bread called collira (see Lev 7:12; 8:26) to *Mary. He later explains (Haer. 78,23; 79,1) that they were a female sect active in *Arabia in the late 4th c., who venerated the Virgin as a deity and communicated once a year with bread offered to her on an altar.

F. Cocchini

COLMANUS (Colmán) (7th c.)
I. Monk of Iona and later bishop of Lindisfarne - II. Irish poet(s).

I. Monk of Iona and later bishop of Lindisfarne. There are more than one Irishman with this name of which we have information and some compositions. The first is Colmanus, monk of Iona and later bishop of Lindisfarne, an island on the E coast in the North Sea. *Bede mentions him in the Ecclesiastical History of the English People (3,25ff.), in connection with the controversy on the observance of *Easter (and on other rules of ecclesiastical life), in which those who followed Roman practice opposed those who followed *Celtic. At the Synod of Whitby (664) Colmanus supported the Celtic tradition, which went back to the *quartodeciman observance of Johannine tradition, against *Wilfrid, who promoted Roman observance. The synod ended with the "Roman" party's victory; Colmán left *Britain and returned to *Ireland to the small island of Inisboufinde, where he founded two *monasteries for monks he had brought with him, one for the *Scots and one for the English (at Muig éo). The Irish bishop's discourses, reported by Bede, are important evidence in favor of the cultural identity of the local churches. Bischoff sees this Colmanus as the author of the Letter to Feradach, preserved in a 9th-c. Brussels MS (BR, MS 5649-67 [ff. 186-187v]. Inc.: Dilectissimo et eruditissimo filio Feradacho Colmanus) in which mention is made of the "textual critical" work done by the community, aimed at correcting the manuscripts in their possession based on multa . . . scripta librorum exemplaria which ad nos a Romanis . . . pervenerint. In particular, Sedulius Scottus's Carmen paschale was the object of detailed textual notes.

M. Lapidge - R. Sharpe, A Bibliography of Celtic-Latin Literature, 400-1200, Dublin 1985, 79, n. 290; R. Sharpe, A Handlist of the Latin Writers of Great Britain and Ireland Before 1540, Turnhout 1997, 89, n. 198. F. de Reiffenberg, Paléographie-histoire littéraire: Bulletin de l'Académie Royale des Sciences et Belles-lettres de Bruxelles 10 (1843) 362-381 (esp. p. 368: the text of the letter is incomplete); F. Rädle, Die Kenntniss der antiken latein- ischen Literatur bei den Iren in der Heimat und auf dem Kontinent, in Die Iren und Europa im früheren Mittelalter, Stuttgart 1982, 1, 484-500 (esp. p. 490-491); P. Ó Néill, "Romani Influences on Seventh-Century Hiberno-Latin Literature," in Irland und Europa Die Kirche im Frühmittelalter, Stuttgart 1984, 280-290; R. Sharpe, An Irish Textual Critic and the Carmen Paschale of Sedulius: Colmán's Letter to Feradach: Journal of Medieval Latin 2 (1992) 44-54 (ed. of the text at pp. 47-50); D. Howlett, Aldhelm and Irish Learning: Archivum Latinitatis Medii Aevi 52 (1994) 37-75 (esp. 60-65); Patrologia IV, 452; D. Howlett, Insular Latin Writers' Rhythms: Peritia 11 (1997) 53-116.

II. Irish poet(s). The Irish poet(s) Colmanus (it seems there may have been at least two of the same name) worked very probably in the 9th c. Two MSS (Paris, BN, nouv. acq., Lat. 1615,ff. 182v-183; Paris, BN, Lat. 18095,ff. 47-47v, both 9th c.) pass down two short poems in honor of St. *Brigid of Kildare, the first attributed to a Colmanus nepos Cracavist, who composed it at *Rome; the other to a Colmanus episcopus. To the former Colmanus is also attributed the composition of a short poem addressed to a friend of the same name, who was about to return to Ireland, their common homeland, by a sea voyage depicted as full of dangers (Paris, BN, nouv. acq., Lat. 1615,ff. 183 and London, Ms. Reg. 15. B. XIX. Inc.: Dum subito properas dulces invisere terras). The poem is composed in a good Latin, sprinkled with reminisces not only of Virgil but also of Ovid, Lucan and the ancient Christian poets.

J.F. Kenney, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: Ecclesiastical. An Introduction and Guide, Dublin 1979, 551, n. 359; M. Lapidge - R. Sharpe, A Bibliography of Celtic-Latin Literature, 400-1200, Dublin 1985, 79, n. 290; R. Sharpe, A Handlist of the Latin Writers of Great Britain and Ireland Before 1540, Turnhout 1997, 89, n. 199. K. Strecker, MGH, Poetae Latini Aevi Carolini, 6/1, 179-182; D. Schaller - E. Könsgen, Initia carminum Latinorum saeculo undecimo antiquiorum, Göttingen 1977, nn. 449; 4061; 14013; K. Meyer, Colmán's Farewell to Colmán: Ériu 3 (1907) 186-189 (with editio princeps by Wilhelm Meyer); M. Esposito, The Poems of Colmanus "Nepos Cracavist" and Dungalus "Praecipuus Scottorum": JTS 33 (1932) 113-131, now in Id., Irish Books and Learning in Mediaeval Europe, Aldershot 1990; M. Esposito, Notes on Latin Learning and Literature in Mediaeval Ireland, IV: On the Early Latin Lives of St. Brigid of Kildare: Hermathena 49 (1935) 120-165 (p. 128 text), now in Latin Learning in Mediaeval Ireland, London 1988; R. Sharpe, Vita S. Brigitae: The Oldest Texts: Peritia 1 (1982) 81-106.

V. Milazzo

COLOGNE

I. The first three centuries - II. The 4th-6th centuries - III. Church buildings - IV. Inscriptions and minor arts.

I. The first three centuries. In 38 BC (or 19?) M. Vipsanius Agrippa forced the Germanic tribe of the Ubii to move from the right bank of the Rhine to the left and to found there the oppidum Ubiorum as their new center. The empress Agrippina, wife of *Claudius (41–54), was born there; in AD 50 she promoted the site to the rank of city with the name Colonia Claudia Ara Agrippinensium (Strab. 4,3,4; Tac., Ann. 12,27,1); thereafter it functioned both as capital of the province Germania Inferior and as its ecclesiastical center. The origins of the Christian community of Cologne remain quite obscure, although some signs suggest the presence of a Christian community in the city already at the time of the last *persecutions. The 5th-6th-c. burial inscription of a girl of about 5 years, Rudu[f]ula, contains the expression SOCIATA MS, which perhaps may be understood as sociata m[artyribu]s "associated to the tombs of the martyrs," in allusion to a tomb retro sanctos. An inscription of St. *Ursula, possibly from the late 4th c., tells how a man from the East, Clematius, was moved by a heavenly vision to rebuild a basilica that arose on the site on which some virgins were *martyred. The crumbling church, which Clematius restored, was in a necropolis active until the 2nd half of the 1st c.; association of the martyrs with Ursula and her companions does not occur before the 9th c. Difficult to evaluate are the martyrdoms of soldiers attested, for the most part, on the site of legionary encampments. Cassius, *Florentius and companions are mentioned in a diploma of 691 (or 692) as protectors of Bonn. Unfortunately, archaeological research in the aforementioned area has thus far uncovered no graves. Gereon, too, only from the 7th c., has been related to a building, built by the end of the 4th c. at the center of a *cemetery NW of the city. *Gregory of Tours (Liber in gloria martyrum 61: MGH. SRM 1/2,530) does not name him, only citing 50 soldiers of the Theban legion who must have been thrown into a well inside a church (D. van Berchem, Le martyre de la Légion Thébaine, Basel 1956; J. Helgeland, Christians and the Roman Army from Marcus Aurelius to Constantine: ANRW II 23.1 [1979] 774-7).

II. The 4th-6th centuries. In 313 we find a Maternus ex Agrippina civitate among the arbitrators called to *Rome by *Constantine on the occasion of the *Donatist question (*Optatus, De schismate Donatistarum I, 23: CSEL 26,26); later he also subscribed, with the deacon Macrinus, to the acts of *Arles in 314 (Concilia Galliae 314-506: CCL 148,15). The fact that a Bishop Maternus appears, in the latest lists of bishops, in the third position between Valerius and *Agricius in the series of the bishops of *Trier, and is also passed down as the founder of Tongern, is not easily explained. Cologne presents no data opposing the hypothesis that Maternus may have been buried in Trier. If we do not want to admit multiple homonymous bishops, or delete Maternus from the episcopal lists of Trier and Tongern, one may deduce from these toponymic interconnections that Cologne was founded from Trier and Tongern from Cologne, perhaps at the time of Maternus.

The next bishop known to us, Euphrates, also presents difficulties. In 342 he took part in the Synod of *Serdica and, with Bishop *Vincent of Capua, was sent by Emperor *Constantius, who was at *Antioch, to take a position in favor of the orthodox (Athanasius, Historia Arianorum 20,2; H.G. Opitz, Athanasius Werke II, Berlin 1934-41, 193). A few years later (346) he was removed in a synod of Gallican bishops at Cologne, presided over by *Maximinus of Trier, with the charge: Christum deum negat (Concilia Galliae 314-506: CCL 148,27). Since Euphrates, a convinced proponent of *Nicene faith, could not turn into an *Arian in the space of a few years, it is likely that the synod had found him guilty of radical *Sabellianism. It is likely that there was a falsification of the acts of the synod, which are known from a 10th-c. MS, in turn based on an 8th-c. biography of Bishop Maximinus. The falsification may have been motivated by the need to emphasize, in the post-Carolingian era, the preeminence of Trier over Cologne.

Toward the end of the 4th c. a Bishop *Severinus is attested, who, according to a document of 948, in 376 founded a *monastery in honor of Saints Cornelius and Cyprian, now called St. Severinus. *Gregory of Tours reports that Severinus heard a choir of angels singing during St. *Martin's agony (De virtutibus S. Martini 1,4: MGH. SRM 1/2,590). In the early 5th c. the *Franks pressed upon the Rhine; in 420 Trier fell briefly into their hands; soon after, they occupied Cologne, which led to a long period of silence in the sources after Severinus. Only in 566–567 does *Venantius Fortunatus, Carmen 3,14 (MGH.AA 4/1,67-68), cite a bishop, still with a Roman name: Carentius. The next bishop known to us, Eberigisil (ca. 590), was certainly of Germanic origin.

Few other documents supplement this sparse information on the bishops of Cologne. *Ammianus Marcellinus (15,5,31; Jones-Martindale-Morris I,840-841) tells how the magister peditum Silvanus, having had himself acclaimed Caesar, on the occasion of the Frankish irruption in 355, pursued by the soldiers of the commandant of the Roman army, took refuge in a conventiculum ritus Christiani and was then killed with many sword blows. In a letter of Emperor *Gratian we read that Ursinus, adversary of Pope *Damasus (366–384), was exiled to Cologne (Collectio Avellana 13,4: CSEL 35/1,55). *Salvian of Marseille recounts how the population of Cologne suffered in 450 at the hands of the invading Franks (Ep. 1,5: CSEL 8,201-202). A Roman noblewoman was constrained to put herself at the service of the uxores barbarorum to support herself. Finally Gregory of Tours (Vitae Patrum 6,2: MGH. SRM 1/2,681) relates that St. Gall destroyed a barbarian *pagan temple at Cologne ca. 520. It is possible that the cited conventiculum ritus Christiani refers to the cathedral of Cologne, traces of which have been discovered under the present duomo.

III. Church buildings. Archaeological finds give no proof of the existence of a Christian church at Cologne in the 3rd or 4th c. The most recent excavations under the present cathedral have not confirmed theories regarding a 1st-c. temple on the site, a pre-Constantinian domus ecclesiae, similar to that at *Dura Europos or to the presumed titular churches at Rome, a 4th-c. baptistery, or an episcopal house. It is true that the first layer excavated, from the 2nd to 3rd c., contains remains of two rooms furnished with heating systems, similar to the early Christian church of *Aquileia. While floor mosaics at Aquileia, however, give indubitable proof of liturgical use, at Cologne there is no such trace. The same is true for the pool from the period, ca. 70 m from the E wall of the houses. Since here also there are no indications of liturgical use, the hypothesis of an early Christian baptistery can no longer be sustained. One can only say that on this site there was a continual use of pre-Constantinian buildings with various alterations and reconstructions, to the point of leading, in the 2nd half of the 6th c., to the certain construction of a three-aisled basilica, dimensions 30 x 25 m, with the addition of a baptistery.

It remains to be ascertained whether the wall structures built on Roman foundations can be traced back to a Roman-period church; they are near the present-day Churches of St. George and St. Peter near the city wall and have no cemeterial area. It could have been a "parochial" church, as distinct from the episcopal church and located in the crowded suburbium.

Outside the walls were the cemeterial Churches of St. Gereon, St. Ursula and St. Severinus, built in the fields of late-Roman necropolises of the 1st c. AD. The brickwork of St. Gereon is from the Late Antique period; the church is an oval building of ca. 23 x 18 m with four semicircular niches on each side, radius ca. 2.30 m, and eastern apse. The church itself was not attested before a document of 839; some inscriptions in the cemetery indicate a liturgical use of the building in the early Christian period. Inscriptions on three *sarcophagi in the confessio confirm the veneration of the Theban martyrs. The three-aisled basilica of St. Ursula, dimensions 28 x 17 m, dates possibly to the 4th c. (after the Frankish invasions of 355/356?), as some tombs in the cemetery suggest, which contain objects decorated with early Christian iconographical themes. Christian use of the basilica, however, is not certainly attested before the construction of an ambo in the 6th c., and the cult of the martyrs not before the 10th c.

The Church of St. Severinus seems not to have had any particular relation with the cult of the martyrs. By the presence of Christian epitaphs in the surrounding cemetery, it can be supposed that the primitive building of 11.60 x 7.60 m was used as a private cemetery chapel by a Christian family. Around 470 the chapel was turned into a church, three-aisled with narthex, which, until the 6th c., had no new area for the deposition of the deceased. Thus in this case too, we cannot exclude the possibility that it was a "parochial church," established to serve a populous quarter on the periphery.

IV. Inscriptions and minor arts. There are many Christian funerary inscriptions, variously distributed: almost 20 have been found in Cologne cemeteries, all from the 4th to the 7th c. Among the remains of the floor of St. Gereon, fragments of mosaics have been found, which were perhaps part of the decoration of the barrel, which Venantius Fortunatus (Carmen 3,14: MGH.AA 4/1,68) and Gregory of Tours (Liber in gloria martyrum 61: MGH. SRM 1/2,530) had already noted. The fragment of a statue of a shepherd, from the cemetery of St. Severinus, is not of certain Christian origin (Fremersdorf 15, pl. 8,2).

Particularly abundant and significant are the finds of gold glass and richly decorated cups of finished glass, which must have been produced not only at Trier but also in workshops in Cologne. In the finished cups, the glasswork reaches perfection. Notable are the plate from St. Severinus, with many biblical scenes obtained with glass droplets, the cup decorated with biblical scenes from St. Ursula, and the conical glass chalice with depictions of the miracle of the spring, the resurrection of Lazarus and the first sin, all now preserved in the British Museum, London; a spherical cup of blue glass, decorated with incisions and covered with gold leaves and four medallions with OT scenes next to the busts of Constantine's sons, and the cup "of Adam and Eve," from a tomb of Luxemburger Strasse, both in the Römisch-Germanisches Museum at Cologne. On cups, no longer preserved, were depicted a scene of Susanna, the sacrifice of Isaac and the NT scenes of the *resurrection of the dead. Another chalice is decorated with a frieze made up of a scene of soldiers, perhaps Christian, among banners. Other objects, often from funeral trousseaus, include incised cups and gold glass, rings, silver spoons, box seals produced by early Christian artisans (for minor art objects with syncretistic, *gnostic and pagan-magical elements, see Doppelfeld 118-120). Rich funerary trousseaus have also been found in the tombs of Frankish princes, excavated under the presbytery of the cathedral.

Kölner Jahrbuch (until 1992: für Vor und Frühgeschichte) 1 (1955) ff.; F. Fremersdorf, Ältestes Christentum (mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der Grabungsergebnisse unter der Severinskirche in Köln): Kölner Jahrbuch 2 (1956) 7-26; Frühchristliches Köln, Cologne 1965; F.W. Oediger, Das Bistum Köln von den Anfängen bis zum Ende des 12. Jahrhunderts, in Geschichte des Erzbistums Köln 1, Cologne [2]1972; W. Schulten, Kostbarkeiten in Köln, Cologne 1978; H. Borger, Die Abbilder des Himmels in Köln. Kölner Kirchenbauten als Quelle zur Siedlungsgeschichte des Mittelalters, Cologne 1979; H.Ch. Brennecke, Synodum congregavit contra Euphratam nefandissimum episcopum. Zur angeblichen Kölner Synode gegen Euphrates: ZKG 90 (1979) 30-54; O. Doppelfeld, Vom unterirdischen Köln, ed. G. Biegel, Cologne 1979; G. Ristow, Römischer Götterhimmel und frühes Christentum. Bilder zur Frühzeit der Kölner Religions- und Kirchengeschichte, Cologne 1980; J.G. Deckers, Kult und Kirchen der Märtyrer in Köln: RQA 83 (1988) 25-43; Series episcoporum ecclesiae catholicae occidentalis ab initio usque ad annum MCXCVIII, series V: Germania, tomus I: Archiepiscopatus Coloniensis, coadiuvantibus H. Kluger et E. Pack, curaverunt St. Weinfurter et O. Engels, Stuttgart 1982; St.R. Hauser, Spätantike und frühbyzantinische Silberlöffel (JbAC Erg. band 19), Münster 1992; B. Päffgen, Die Ausgrabungen in St. Severin zu Köln, 3 vols., Mainz 1992; E. Dassmann, Die Anfänge der Kirche in Deutschland, Stuttgart 1993, 104-159; W. Schmitz, Die spätantiken und frühmittelalterlichen Grabinschriften in Köln (4.-7. Jahrhundert n. Chr.): Kölner Jahrbuch 28 (1995) 643-776; F. Brink, Die Anfänge des Christentums in Trier, Köln und Mainz: Trierer Zeitschrift 60 (1997) 229-254; K. Dietz, Colonia Agrippinensis: NP 3 (1997) 72-76; S. Ristow, Die frühen Kirchen unter dem Kölner Dom: Befunde und Funde vom 4. Jahrhundert bis zur Bauzeit des alten Domes, Cologne 2002; U. Verstegen, St. Gereon in Köln in römischer und frühmittelalterlicher Zeit, Cologne 2003.

H.R. Drobner

COLOR, SYMBOLISM and LITURGY. The use of different-colored vestments (most frequently white, black or violet, red and green) in certain liturgical circumstances expresses the mysteries of the Christian faith more visibly and effectively. Though attested only late and in the West, this use is undoubtedly connected, in some aspects, with the symbolic value of colors expressed throughout the early church (as already in the *pagan and Jewish world).

Most excellent is white, linked in Mt 17:1-2 (Mk 9:2-3; Lk 9:28-29) with glory: the eternal beatitude of the Lord's transfiguration on Mt. Tabor is shown concretely by the whiteness of his clothing. All heavenly "inhabitants" are described as wearing white, e.g., the angels in Acts 1:10. From here it is a short step to an *eschatological significance, already expressed in various ways in the book of Revelation (see, e.g., Rev 4:4; 7:9ff.). In the Shepherd of *Hermas (Sim. 8,2,1-4), all the elect entering the tower (the church triumphant) receive a crown, a garment white as snow and the seal of incorruptibility. Similarly, in the vision of the noblewoman *Perpetua (Pass. Perp. 4,8), the *martyrs preceding her into paradise are clothed in white to show the glory in which they are clothed after death. This reality is taken up again particularly in the rite of the white baptismal garment. *Gregory of Nyssa (Hom. Cant. I), e.g., emphasizes that the baptizand wears the same tunic that clothed the Lord in purity and incorruptibility on Mt. Tabor. In general in the Fathers of the church, the white baptismal garment comes to signify *resurrection to new life and the reacquisition of primitive innocence, a status which must be preserved always so as to attain immortality; hence it is eschatological (V. Pavan, La veste, 264). Following an ancient tradition, *Jerome associates white with festivity and rejoicing (Ep. 118,4); in *Cyril of Jerusalem the white nuptial garment in the parable of Mt 22:2-14 is the good inner disposition with which we must approach the heavenly bridegroom's banquet (Procatech. 3). An illustration in the purple codex of Rossano (Calabria) shows the wise virgins of Mt 25:1-13 in paradise, clothed in white in contrast with the multicolored clothing of the foolish virgins.

Opposite to white is black, which thus becomes a symbol of death, darkness, evil, the devil (Barn. 4,10; Herm., Sim. IX, 19,1). Another illustration in the purple codex of Rossano depicts Barabbas dressed in black. I Clem. 8,3 makes red and black the colors of sin, citing Is 1:18. For Augustine, black indicates sin and affliction (Civ. Dei XI, 23). But *Cyprian (Mort. 20) censures the use of black for mourning and suggests wearing white to more aptly indicate the heavenly beatitude of the departed (a concept which, in certain aspects, has been reaffirmed by Vatican II: see Constitutio de sacra liturgia 81). Finally, a black or dark tunic, as earlier an animal-skin garment or belt (see Gen 3:21; Mt 3:4), is a sign of *penitence and and humility; it is considered (although sometimes with censure) typical of *ascetics and monks since it expressed the mortification of the senses and disdain for the world (Jerome, Ep. 66,13; Greg. Naz., Carm. II, 1,44,27ff.). Dark violet or deep blue were equivalent to black in ancient times, as iconographical evidence proposed by E. Kirschbaum, L'angelo, 218ff., confirms.

Beyond general concepts derived from ideas widespread in the pagan or Jewish world, there is little significant evidence about red and green. The red garment worn by the Lord on his shoulders during the passion (Mt 27:28) recalls for *Justin (Dial. 54,1-2) and *Tertullian (Marc. 4,40,5-6) the life which Christ gave to humanity by shedding his blood (A. Quacquarelli, La società, 112). *Origen (Schol. in Cant. 5,10) sees Christ's divinity and humanity authentically expressed by the two colors white and red. *Cassiodorus alludes to red-purple as a symbol of Christ's love or of the *Holy Spirit's tongues of fire (Exp. in Cant. 4,3). Green for *Bede significat animas fide semper virentes (Expl. Apoc. III,21): it is the color of hope in the incorruptible and eternal inheritance.

Judging from *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. IV, 22) and Jerome (Adv. Pelag. I, 29; Ep. 64,3), the preferred color for worship during the early centuries seems to have been white (see A. Hermann, Farbe, RAC 7, 421-422); from the 6th c. on the tendency is more frequent to link the color of the vestments (in fact just white) with liturgical circumstances. References to the use of white vestments at *Easter time are found, e.g., in Vita Caes. Arel. 1,32 (PL 67, 1017) and in Exp. brevis ant. lit. gall. (PL 72, 98). One of the oldest testimonies of the liturgical use of black is from the Carolingian era (M. Andrieu, Ord. Rom. XX, 2; XXI, 2); from that period forward it is clear that the liturgical symbolism of colors became ever richer. Not until 1194–1195 do we see—in the work of Cardinal Lotario, the future Innocent III—a standardization and a first truly ordered canon of colors (specifically white, red, black and green) assigned to the different liturgical feasts (De sacro altaris mysterio I, 65: PL 217, 799-802).

In practice, this correspondence of colors to liturgical feasts meant: white, understood as the color of glory, immortality, joy, purity and innocence, was reserved for the feasts of the Lord, of the angels, of virgins and *confessors; for the dedication of a church; and, usually, for All Saints. Red, recalling the ardor of the Holy Spirit which appeared in the form of tongues of fire over the *apostles and the blood shed by the first Christians, was assigned to the solemnities of *Pentecost and of the *cross, and to the feasts of the *apostles and *martyrs. Black, associated with the ideas of sorrow, *penitence and *expiation, was used in connection with the commemoration of the dead, throughout Advent and from Septuagesima to Easter Saturday. Less precise in Innocent is the significance of green, relegated by him simply to "ferial and common" days. Thus it seems to be understood as the color of the Sundays per annum, a time in which—according to a symbolic value given by Bede and confirmed by Bruno of Segni (11th c.), which considers green the color of faith (Exp. in Ex. 28) and immortality (Exp. in Ap. II, 4)—the church, after Pentecost, reflects on the last things and emphasizes its faith in the eternal inheritance.

Finally we should mention pink which, in the medieval Roman *liturgy, came to mark the third Sunday of Advent (Gaudete Sunday) and the fourth Sunday of *Lent (Laetare Sunday). Regarding the latter, Lotario records the use of violet, but also alludes to a well-known papal ceremony, that of the blessing of the golden rose, propter laetitiam quam aurea rosa significat. From the symbolic meaning unveiled by Innocent III we can easily intuit that the later, direct use of pink in the liturgy was to momentarily turn the thoughts of the faithful to the joy of Christmas or of the Lord's *resurrection.

The correspondence of colors to liturgical feasts as arranged by Innocent III was at that time accepted only by the Church of Rome. Indeed it could not be normative for the other churches, who in those times still enjoyed full autonomy in the defense of their own liturgical traditions. The Roman practice was made obligatory for the whole Catholic Church only with the decisions of the Council of Trent, though this does not mean that they were always respected.

The Eastern church does not have canons regarding colors, but, esp. for the *Byzantine church, besides the privilege accorded to the use of white at Easter time, red is generally indicated for *funeral rites and for Lent. It is thus evident that the invitation to penitence is in this case elicited through the memory of the shedding of blood.

E. Kirschbaum, L'angelo rosso e l'angelo turchino: RivAC 17 (1940) 209-248; P. Radó, Enchiridion Liturgicum II, Rome 1961, 1445ff.; M. Righetti, Manuale di Storia Liturgica, I, Milan ³1964, 613-615; A. Hermann, Farbe: RAC 7, 413ff.; T. Schnitzler, Farbensymbolik: LIC 2, 7ff.; RBK 2, 524-533; T. Schnitzler, Farben, liturgische: LTK³ 3, 1979-1181; A.C. Rush, The Colours of Red and Black in the Liturgy of the Dead, in Kyriakon II, Münster W. 1970, 698-708; V. Pavan, La veste bianca battesimale, indicium escatologico nella Chiesa dei primi secoli: Augustinianum 18 (1978) 257-271; A. Quacquarelli, La società cristologica prima di Costantino e i riflessi nelle arti figurative, Bari 1978, 102, 110-114; A.A. Häußling, Farben/Farbensymbolik: TRE 11, 26-29; A. Casartelli, La funzione distintiva del colore nell'abbigliamento romano della prima età imperiale: Aevum 72 (1998) 109-125; J.J. Ramos Passalodos, Coloribus idololatria (Tert. Spect. IX,5): Cuadernos de filología clásica, Estudios latinos 17 (1999) 89-103 (REAug [2000] 284 other bibl.); M. Pastoureau, Ordo colorum. Notes sur la naissance des couleurs liturgiques: La MaisonD. 176 (1988) 54-66; L. Luzzatto - R. Pompas, Il siginficato dei colori nelle civiltà antiche, Milan 2001.

V. Pavan

COLOSSEUM (COLISEUM), Flavian amphitheater. This building, a Roman archaeological invention (see Cozzo 197-253; Futrell 121-161), was a symbol from its conception, part of the political plan to exalt the Flavian dynasty. At the same time it restored a public space used by *Nero for private ends, the construction of the Domus Aurea, the Flavian amphitheater, was thus meant to reflect the power and magnificence of the Roman Empire. Following the proposal of Alföldy (Eine Bauinschrift, 208ff.), who found an inscription in two versions: I[MP(ERATOR)] CAES(AR) T(ITUS) VESPASI[ANUS AUG(USTUS)] AMPHITHEATR[UM NOVUM (?)] [EX] MANUBIS (vac.) [FIERI IUSSIT (?)] in the marble remains of another inscription (CIL VI, 1763, 32089), the building, which *Vespasian wanted but was begun by *Titus in AD 80, was to be financed, according to the custom of the time, with the spoils of war (manubiae): the riches of the *temple of *Jerusalem. *Rome would thus have a monumental space adequate for the spectacles offered to the people by the authorities, mainly gladiatorial fights (munera gladiatorum) and wild animal hunts (venationes). The elliptical design (188 x 156 m) favored both good sight lines for the attendees (ca. 55,000, seated according to social class) and the uniqueness of the spectacles, thanks to the special arrangement of the arena and the hypogea. Initially there were also naval battles or naumachie (see Bomgardner; Golvin). We must also mention the religious and cultic elements which, as in any aspect of Roman society, were an ever-present component of such events (see Futrell 77-93). The Flavian amphitheater replaced the earlier buildings, remaining the only building of this type in use at Rome from the late 1st c. to the early 6th c., when it fell into complete abandonment and ruin. The Castrense amphitheater, according to some, always functioned in relation to the Flavian amphitheater, both as a training ground for the gladiators—at least for the so-called praetorians—and as a holding ground for wild beasts (vivarium); some private spectacles may also have been held there (see Colagrossi 265-283). During these centuries the Flavian amphitheater underwent some modifications due to the requirements of the spectacles and public, but much reconstruction was done esp. due to damage caused by earthquakes and fires.

Damnatio ad bestias,* according to Roman legislation (see Digesta Iustiniani 28.1.8.4; 28.3.6.6; 29.2.25.3; 48.8.11.1-2; 48.10.8; 48.13.7; 48.19.12; 48.19.28.15-16; 48.19.29; 48.19.31; 49.16.4.1; 49.18.1; 49.18.3), was carried out at Rome in the Flavian amphitheater as part of the programs of the munera.

These reasons—the specific use of the Flavian amphitheater and the carrying out of damnatio ad bestias in the arena—are the possible historical basis of the *hagiographical tradition attested by more than 15 martyrial passiones, which present the Flavian amphitheater as the scene of *martyrdom; they can also explain the link that Christians wanted to form with the building from the 5th to the 6th c., whether in the elaboration of these very hagiographical traditions or in the use of areas near the building as *cemeteries (but not inside it, as with other amphitheaters; see Ferrua; Rea, Rota Colisei, 121-125), or during the Middle Ages, as the seat of religious communities, churches and the via crucis in or near it. The monumental inscriptions of the popes (16th-17th c.), along with a type of devotional literature that is popular even today (19th c., see O'Reilly), are other manifestations of this link. As for the so-called martyrs of the Colosseum, leaving aside the apologetic dissertations written from the 18th to the early 20th c. (see Delehaye; Gori; Leclercq; Lugari; Marangoni; Martigny; Rovira) which claimed to offer information affirming or denying their historicity, we believe that some historical basis must be admitted, handed down not only through texts but also in the cult (including elements such as *relics and churches), in archaeological evidence, and in citations in other historical sources (see Grabar; Sicari). We can thus think of the group of martyrs of the Colosseum as a symbolic unit with a specific role and a clear popularity within the Christian tradition (see Beaujard-Prévot).

Besides Gaudentius, the hypothetical architect who built the Flavian amphitheater—according to the inscription found in the cemetery of S. Agnese on the Via Nomentana in the 17th c.: Sic premia servas, Vespasiane dire / Civitas ubi gloriae tue autori / Premiatus es morte Gaudenti letare / Promisit iste, dat Kristus omnia tibi / Qui alium paravit theatru(m) in coelo (see Colagrossi, 285-333)—the group of the martyrs of the Colosseum consists of Alexander (Mart. rom. 21 September; BHL 273), *Almachius or Telemachus (Mart. rom. 1 January; Theodoret, Historia Ecclesiastica V, 26), the 260 soldiers (AASS 1 March), *Eleutherus (AASS 18 April; BHL 2451ff.), Eustace and companions (Mart. rom. 20 September; BHL 2760ff.), *Ignatius of Antioch (Mart. rom. 17 October; BHL 4255ff.) and Prisca (Mart. rom. 18 January; BHL 6926).

The saying quandiu stabit Colisæus, stat et Roma; quando cadet Colisæus, cadet et Roma. Quando cadet Roma, cadet et mundus ("as long as the Colosseum stands, so shall Rome; when the Colosseum falls, Rome shall fall; when Rome falls, so falls the world"), which was very famous and became a kind of prophecy, has been attributed to the Venerable *Bede (it is found in an anonymous work: Collectanea . . . CPL 407; PL 94, 543). The term Colosseum, from the 11th c., is generally linked to the bronze statue of Nero which was next to the building.

G. Marangoni, Delle memorie sacre e profane dell'Anfiteatro Flavio di Roma, Rome 1746; F. Rovira Bonet, Breve e divota notizia della vita, martirio, virtù e miracoli d'alcuni santi dell'anfiteatro Flavio volgarmente detto il Colosseo, Rome 1759 and 1796; F. Gori, Le memorie storiche, i giuochi e gli scavi dell'Anfiteatro Flavio e i pretesi martiri cristiani del Colosseo, Rome 1875; Colysée, in J. A. Martigny, Dictionnaire des antiquités chrétiennes, Paris 1877, 191-195; H. Delehaye, L'Amphithéâtre Flavien et ses environs dans les textes hagiographiques: AB 16 (1897) 209-252; G.B. Lugari, L'anfiteatro Flavio rivendicato ai martiri, Rome 1899; H. Leclercq, Amphithéâtre: DACL 2, 1648-1665; P. Colagrossi, L'Anfiteatro Flavio nei suoi venti secoli di storia, Florence 1913; H. Delehaye, Saint Almachius ou Télémaque: AB 33 (1914) 421-428; G. Cozzo, Ingegneria romana, Rome 1928, 203-253; H. Delehaye, Recherches sur le légendier romain: AB 51 (1933) 34-98; A. Ferrua, Epigrammata damasiana, Vatican City 1942, 96-97, 187-188; A. Grabar, Martyrium. Recherches sur le culte des reliques et l'art chrétien antique, I, Paris 1946, 33-37; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975; K.W. Weber, Panem et circenses, Düsseldorf 1983, Mainz a. R. 1994 (It. tr. Garzanti 1986); A.J. O'Reilly, Martyrs of the Coliseum with Historical Records of the Great Amphitheater of Rome, Rockford 1987; Th. Wiedemann, Emperors and Gladiators, London 1992; R. Rea, Il Colosseo e la valle da Teodorico ai Frangipane: note di studio, in La storia economica di Roma nell'alto medioevo alla luce dei recenti scavi archeologici, eds. L. Paroli - P. Delogu, Florence 1993; G. Alföldy, Eine Bauinschrift aus dem Colosseum: ZPE 109 (1995) 195-226 (It. tr. in R. Rea [ed.], Rota Colisei, Milan 2002, 14-35); L. Abbondanza, La valle del Colosseo, Milan 1997; J.C. Golvin, L'amphithéâtre romain, I, Paris 1988, 173-180; R. Rea - M. C. Cartocci, Amphiteatrum, in E.M. Steinby (ed.), Lexicon Topographicum Urbis Romae, I. A-C, Rome 1993, 30-35; G. Sicari, Reliquie insigni e "corpi santi" a Roma, Rome 1998; A. Gabucci (ed.), Il Colosseo, Milan 1999; D.L. Bomgardner, The Story of the Roman Amphitheatre, London 2000, 1-31; A. Futrell, Blood in the Arena, Austin 2000, 77-93; 121-213; A. La Regina (ed.), Sangue e arena, Milan 2001; R. Rea (ed.), Rota Colisei, Milan 2002.

M. Flores Colín

COLUMBA, abbot (521–597). Irish founder of *monasteries (Derry, Durrow) and evangelizer of the Picts and Scots. His Gaelic name was Crimthann, in Latin, Columba. Ancient *hagiography compared him with *Patrick and *Brigid. Of the royal Uì Néill family, he was involved in political conflicts and in 563 had to leave *Ireland: so he worked in *Scotland, making converts and creating a vast monastic organization (similar to the one he founded on the island of Iona). A poet (the hymn Altus prosator) and defender of the first Celtic artists and a famous "scribe," he was called the apostle of Caledonia, since on his death in 597 a great part of Scotland had been converted. Information on him is in *Adamnanus's Vita Columbae.

CPL 1131; L. Gougaud, Christianity in Celtic Lands, London 1932.

L. Navarra

COLUMBANUS (ca. 543–615). Irish saint, *abbot of Luxeuil and Bobbio. After an adolescence of study, Columbanus entered monastic life and left his native Leinster to enter the school of a vir venerabilis named Sinell. He then embraced the *cenobitic life in the *monastery of Bangor, which he left at ca. age 50 with the consent of his abbot Comgall to follow the peregrinatio pro Christo. Received (ca. 593) at the court of the Austrasian king Childebert II at Metz, he then founded the monastery of Annegray and—in the kingdom of Guntram—those of Luxeuil and Fontaine, thus initiating in the Vosges region a continental monasticism of Iberian stamp, profoundly different from the monasticism descending from *Lérins present in the rest of Burgundy. In ca. 601 Columbanus met—as they passed through *Arles, Lérins or Gap—the Roman missionaries working in Kent, disciples of *Augustine of Canterbury (see Bede, Hist. II,4): perhaps from them, Columbanus received some of *Gregory the Great's works, which he had requested the previous year, after having read the Regula pastoralis (Ep. 1,9), which was sent to him perhaps in November 594, if we accept the identification of Columbanus with the presbyter Columbus (Greg. Gt., Ep. V, 17); a presbyter Columbus was also recommended by Gregory to Conon, abbot of Lérins (Greg. Gt., Ep. XI, 9), in October 600, i.e., after Gregory had received Columbanus's letter.

Denouncing the corruption of the new king of Burgundy, Theuderic II (son of Childebert II), and of his grandmother Brunhilda, Columbanus was banished from the kingdom (610); from Nantes he wrote a letter (Ep. 4) to the congregatio of his monks still at Luxeuil. Then, rather than returning to Ireland, Columbanus was accepted by *Chlothar II, king of Neustria, and then by Theudebert II, king of Austrasia. Sailing down the Rhine, he settled at Bregenz, where he dedicated himself to the evangelization of the Germanic population (in particular Alemanni and Suebi). Leaving his disciple Gallus near Lake Constance, he passed into the territory of the *Longobard (Lombard) king *Agilulf, where he founded the monastery of Bobbio (613). From there or from *Milan, in 614, Columbanus wrote a letter to *Boniface IV (Ep. 5) defending the thesis of the *Three Chapters held by *Theodelinda and Agilulf: their plan for unity between Romans and Longobards aimed at taking a distance from the *Byzantine East, but in Columbanus's wholly spiritual outlook, its purpose was above all to overcome the divisions produced by the *schism of the Three Chapters, breaking free of old theological controversies that were contrary to the interests of Irish *ascetism and evangelization. Columbanus died at Bobbio in 615. The monk Jonas of Susa wrote his life.

Among the works attributed to Columbanus (Epistolae, Poenitentiale, Regula monachorum, Regula coenobialis, Instructiones, Carmina), some poetical compositions (ad Hunaldum, ad Sethum, ad Fidolium, Carmen navale) are now considered—not unanimously—the work of Columbanus of Saint-Trond (late 8th c.); other works are also considered spurious.

Sharpe 201; Lapidge-Sharpe 639-642 and 1251; J.F. Kenney, The Sources of the Early History of Ireland, New York 1929, I, n. 50, 186-200; CPL 1107-1114, 1117-1118; PL 80, 209-293 (40, 1332-1334); MGH Epist. III, 1892, 156ff. (W. Gundlach); SLH II, 1957 (G.S.M. Walker); J. Laporte, Le Pénitentiel de saint Colomban, Tournai 1960 (Monumenta Christiana Selecta, IV); SLH V, 1963, 96-107 (L. Bieler); A. de Vogüé et al., Saint Colomban. Règles et pénitentiels monastiques, Bégrolles-en-Mauge 1989 (comm. tr.); A.M. Canopi - G. Picasso (comm. tr.), San Colombano abate, Istruzione e Regola dei monaci, Seregno 1997; F.G. Nuvolone - P. Todde, Le "Lettere" e la "Preghiera" di S. Colombano: versione italiana con testo latino a fronte, apparato e commento, ABob 22 (2000) 43-290; var. aus., San Colombano. Le opere, Milan 2001. Works of doubtful authenticity: Sharpe 202; Lapidge-Sharpe 650-653; CPL 1112.1117.1119. Jonas, Vita Sancti Columbani: CPL 1115; PL 87, 1011-1046; MGH Script. rer. Merov. IV, 1-156 (B. Krusch); cf. VII/2, 822-827; M. Tosi (ed.), Ionas Bobiensis, Vita S. Columbani . . . (tr. E. Cremona - M. Paramidani), Piacenza 1965; A. de Vogüé et al., Ionas de Bobbio, Vie de saint Colomban et de ses disciples, Bégrolles-en-Mauge 1998-99 (comm. tr.). F. MacManus, Saint Columban, London [2]1963; J.W. Smit, Studies on the Language and Style of Columba the Younger (Columbanus), Amsterdam 1971; Colombano pioniere di civilizzazione cristiana europea, Bobbio 1973; T. O'Fiaich, Columbanus in His Own Words, Dublin 1974; H.B. Clarke - M. Brenann (eds.), Columbanus and Merovingian Monasticism, Oxford 1981; Die Iren und Europa in früheren Mittelalter, H. Löwe (ed.), Stuttgart 1982, 171-201, 434-467, 468-483; F. Prinz, Papst Gregor der Grosse und Columban der Jüngere, in Irland und Europa, Die Kirche im Frühmittelalter, eds. P. Ní Chatháin - M. Richter, Stuttgart 1984, 328-337; J.P. Mackey, The Theology of Columbanus, in P. Ní Chatháin - M. Richter (eds.), Irland und Europa im früheren Mittelalter, Stuttgart 1996, 228-239; M. Lapidge (ed.), Columbanus. Studies on the Latin Writings, Woodbridge 1997; F. Kurzawa, Saint Colomban, figure emblématique du monachisme irlandais, in Les moines irlandais dans la Lorraine médiévale, éd. F. Kurzawa, Metz 1999, 59-92.

E. Malaspina

COMBAT (iconography). Depictions of combat in Christian iconography can be divided into three groups: (1) combat between two people, (2) combat between a person and an animal, and (3) combat between animals. The first group contains a single example: a late 3rd-c. painting in a cubicle in the catacomb of SS. Pietro e Marcellino, *Rome. Man–animal combat appears in scenes of the Samson cycle in the catacomb of Via D. Compagni (Ferrua, Via Latina, pls. CV-CIX-XVII-XXXI, 1). An example of this type also appears on a panel of the *diptych of the consul Aureobindus (506), where a combat scene between men and lions in the circus is depicted. Combat between animals is much more common. The mosaics of the N and S halls of the Theodorian complex at *Aquileia (2nd decade of the 4th c.) show combat between cock and tortoise, symbols of light and darkness, respectively. A pavement mosaic from Amwas in *Palestine (5th-6th c.) shows combat between wild and domestic animals. In plastic art, a sarcophagus from Palazzo Lancellotti (Rep. 976) and one from Villa Ludovisi (Rep. 86), both in Rome, show scenes of cockfighting. Another example of combat is in the *Tours Pentateuch (fol. 56a).

DACL III, 2, 2886-2905; G.P. Kirsch, Un cubicolo con pitture profane inedite nella catacomba dei SS. Pietro e Marcellino: RivAC 10 (1933) 263ff.; W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz 1952, pls. 5,21; 36; 17,60; 19,59; B. Bagatti, L'archeologia cristiana in Palestina, Florence 1962, 103, pl. 8; A. Grabar, L'età d'oro di Giustiniano, Milan 1966, 278, fig. 320; J. Porcher, in J. Hubert - J. Porcher - W.F. Volbach, L'Europa delle invasioni barbariche, Milan 1968, 128; A. Ferrua, Una nuova regione della catacomba dei SS. Pietro e Marcellino: RivAC 44 (1968) 29ff.; E. Jastrzebowska, Les origines de la scène du combat entre le coq et la tortue dans les mosaïques chrétiennes d'Aquilée: AAAd VIII (1975) 93-107; P. Testini, Arte mitraica e arte cristiana, in Mysteria Mithrae, Rome 1979, 441-443.

A.M. Di Nino

COMMENTARIES, Biblical. As opposed to quaestiones*—collections of interpretations of biblical passages of particular interest—and to homilies*—preached to illustrate biblical passages read during liturgical functions—the biblical commentary can be defined as a work which systematically illustrates an entire book of the Bible or an organic section thereof, interpreting the text verse by verse. Among the Jews, the pesher, of which several examples were discovered at *Qumran, was a commentary of this type; but since the first Christian commentaries date from the late 2nd c., when the church was already profoundly *Hellenized, the models of these Christian texts must be sought more among the Greeks. In that context, schematizing, we can distinguish two types of commentary: one grammatical or literary, consisting mostly of short marginal explanations of poetry and prose texts studied at school and historical, antiquarian, grammatical or rhetorical in character; the other type is the philosophical commentary, in which the exegete illustrates the text of an illustrious philosopher (e.g., *Plato, *Aristotle) at great length and often in a very personal way: e.g., *Proclus's commentaries on Plato.

The earliest Christian commentary known to us is the Commentary on John by the mid-2nd-c. *gnostic *Heracleon. From its surviving fragments, it must have consisted of short explanations, little more than glosses, unsystematically illustrating the fourth gospel. Its model must be seen in the grammatical type of *pagan commentary. *Hippolytus's commentaries (turn of the 2nd/3rd c.) on Daniel, Song of Songs etc., show much the same character, though the interpretation seems more prolix than Heracleon's must have been. But those of *Origen (on John, Matthew, Song of Songs etc.) are much longer, reaching many books in length (33 on Jn, 10 on Song), and seem to resemble the philosophical type, perhaps through the medium of *Philo of Alexandria, whose works are mostly commentaries on passages from Genesis and Exodus resembling precisely this type of secular commentary.

After these early examples, in the great flowering of biblical commentaries that began in the 4th c. in the East and more than 50 years later in the West, we see examples of both forms, by now emancipated from secular models and adhering only, in the pattern described above, to the specific interpretative tendencies of their authors. In general, commentaries from the *Antioch area are literalist, short and to the point, while those from *Alexandria are *allegorical and usually much more long-winded. In the West, *Augustine's De Genesi ad litteram most resembles this type in amplitude of comment.

The manner of composition could also vary. *Ambrose's commentaries (De Abraham, De patriarchis etc.) derive from a series of homilies, revised and adapted to rid them, at least superficially, of their homiletic character. Much of *Gregory the Great's Moralia in Iob is of the same type. Suppressing the distinction between one homily and the next is what differentiates this type of commentary from certain organized series of homilies by, e.g., *John Chrysostom or Augustine, which systematically interpret entire books of the sacred text or large sections of them but maintain for publication the distinction between the different homilies (Chrysostom's Homilies on Genesis, Matthew etc., Augustine's Enarrationes in Psalmos, Tractatus in Iohannem). More normal is the commentary composed as a written work and intended solely for reading. Of this type are Augustine's De Genesi ad litteram, *Jerome's Commentaries on the Prophets and the Commentaries on the Minor Prophets of *Theodore of Mopsuestia, *Cyril of Alexandria and *Theodoret. We cannot in principle rule out that a commentary of this type, e.g., that of *Hilary on Matthew, may be derived from a collection of homilies and so well revised as to eliminate any obvious trace of its origin.

The commentary of scholastic origin, i.e., one derived from teaching activity, deserves a separate treatment. It is the Alexandrian type of commentary, i.e., linked to the activity of the exegetes of the Didaskaleion.* In fact Origen's commentaries, though later revised, betray such an origin in their way of presenting the material, with continual digressions and departures from the main line of interpretation: esp. the Commentary on John. The finding of the Tura papyri has shed much light on this narrow area. Two of *Didymus's five commentaries, those on the Psalms and on Ecclesiastes, faithfully reproduce the teacher's explanation in class, to the point of recording interruptions by students seeking clarification. Close examination of these texts, only recently discovered, will allow us to greatly deepen our knowledge of scholastic teaching of Scripture in the patristic age.

G. Bardy, Commentaires patristiques de la Bible: DBS 2, 73-103; R. Gryson - D. Smatula, Les commentaires patristiques sur Isaïe d'Origène à Jérôme: REAug 36 (1990) 3-41; Commentaries-Kommentare, Glenn W. Most (ed.), Göttingen 1999; LACL (2002) 437-439.

M. Simonetti

COMMODIAN. Probably the most enigmatic poet of Christian antiquity. The dating of his two works, the Instructiones and the Carmen apologeticum, which burst upon the history of Latin poetry like a dark sun ("soleil noir"—Fontaine), was at the center of critical debate for three centuries, developing in two directions. The early date, no longer considered, is represented by scholars such as Katwijc, Blumenkranz, Simonetti, Thraede, Salvatore, Gagé, Alföldy, Fontaine and Poinsotte, who put the composition of the two works in the mid-3rd c., at the time of *Decius's persecutions (Martin pushes the date back to the 1st decade of the 4th c., Ferrari to the 4th c.). The later date is represented by scholars such as Brewer, Hermann, Courcelle, Krestan and Sirago, who, on the basis of presumed references to the barbarian invasions in his works, opt for the 5th c. The enigmatic inscriptio of Instr. 2, 35, nomen Gasaei, has also been variously interpreted by critics: Gaseus would be a proper name or, changed to Gazeus, could even indicate Commodian's provenance from *Gaza (in *Palestine). Gaseus has also been interpreted as custos aerarii (community treasurer) or as "poet" by Sigwalt and by Salvatore, who defends this interpretation in light of the connection between the inscriptio and the poem's contents, in particular the last two verses (Omnia non possum comprehendere parvo libello / Curiositas docti inveniet nomen in isto). In fact the poet's name is contained in the acrostic Commodianus mendicus Christi, obtained by reading the initial letters of the verses from bottom to top. Also debated is the question of Commodian's birthplace and where he lived: *Gaul Narbonense (Brewer), *Rome (Martin), *Syria (Opelt) or *Africa (for most). Poinsotte tries to make the various positions agree, maintaining that Commodian, belonging to the milieu of Syrian merchants, settled in N *Italy, traveled both in the region of *Aquileia (which would explain his *apocalyptic vision, similar to that of *Victorinus of Petovium) and in Africa. Such travel would also explain his use of the African version of the Bible, the relation that exists between his compositions and the works of *Cyprian, his concern over judaizing *pagans, and the use of *acrostic, common in African nonfunerary epigraphy.

Of the two books in hexameters which constitute the Instructiones, the first, containing 41 acrostic compositions, moves in the *apologetic tradition and is characterized by criticisms aimed at pagans, Jews and judaizers, expressed with a notable propensity to hackneyed, rough polemic, full of vulgarities and sarcastic abuse; the second, containing 39 acrostics, is directed to Christians for corrective and hortatory purposes.

The Carmen apologeticum or De duobus populis (1059 rhythmic hexameters), partially transmitted in a codex written probably in the 8th c. at Nonantola, is not an apology but an exposition of the Christian *mystery for didactic purposes. In the prologue (which refers to the praefatio of the Instructiones), Commodian, after mentioning his conversion, sparked by reading Scripture, runs through the periods of the economy of salvation (original sin, flood, election of Israel, coming of Christ, rejection of the Jews because of their rejection of the Messiah) and, certain as he is of the robust happiness of the *millennium, concludes with a lively description of *eschatological times, which will be ushered in in the year 6,000 from the creation. Its sign will be the seventh *persecution, initiated at Rome by *Nero under pressure from the Jews. The empire will be destroyed and Rome burned, and the second antichrist, victorious, will turn to the East. Then the battle between the two peoples, the pure and the impure, ignites before *Jerusalem. The scene of the end of the world after Satan's final defeat is the fruit of a vigorous fantasy: an endless dark night, the powerful voice of God, the collapse of the earth and stars under a storm of fire that lasts seven months, the descent of Christ with his angels, and the *resurrection of the dead from their tombs. The work, permeated by a fanatical faith and by an often extreme moralism, exhibits a theology clearly characterized by *Monarchian-*Sabellian doctrine.

The text of both works, despite the admirable work of many skillful editors, translators and exegetes, still contains hard-to-understand obscurities due to a language full of neologisms, barbarisms and popular terms, with frequent violations of prosody and metric. Commodian's cultural, linguistic and metric "primitivism," which led one critic to think of a "countercultural" experiment (Fontaine), corresponds to a rough religiosity that is nonetheless authentic and vigorous. The poet Commodian continues to be "a delight for linguists, a torment for scholars of metric and a puzzle for historians" (Di Berardino).

CPL 1470-71. Editions: PL 51,201-262; B. Dombart, CSEL 15, 1887; J. Martin, CCh 128, 1960; PLS 1. Instr.: J. Durel, Les Instructions de Commodien, Paris 1912; Ant. Salvatore, Naples 1965-68 (3 vols.: cr. text, It. tr. and notes). Carm. apol.: J.-B. Pitra, Spicilegium Solesmense, 1 (1852) 21-49; Ant. Salvatore, CP 5, 1975 (cr. text, It. tr. and comm.). Lexicon: A.F. van Katwijk, Amsterdam 1934.

Studies: A. Di Berardino, Patrologia III, 246-253 (bibl. up to 1977); H. Brewer, Commodian von Gaza, Paderborn 1906; H. Scheifler, Quaestiones Commodianeae, Diss. Breslau 1908; J. Durel, Recherches sur la doctrine, la langue et le vocabulaire du poète, Paris 1912; J. Martin, Studien u. Beiträge zur Erklärung und Zeitbestimmung Commodian, Leipzig 1913; H.B. Vroom, De Commodiani metro et syntaxi adnotationes, Utrecht 1917; E. Castorina, La poesia di Commodiano nella storia della metrica latina, Catania 1950; H.A.M. Hoppenbrouwers, Commodien, poète chrétien, Nijmegen 1964; J. Daniélou, Les origines du christianisme latin, Paris 1978, 93-111 (on Commodian's theology) and 224-234 (Commodian and the biblical testimonia); J. Fontaine, Naissance de la poésie dans l'Occident chrétien, Paris 1981, 39-52; V. Loi, Commodiano nella crisi teologica ed ecclesiologica del III secolo, in La poesia tardo-antica: tra retorica, teologia e politica. Atti del V Corso della Scuola Superiore di Archeologia and Civiltà Medievali (Erice, 6-12 dicembre 1981), Messina 1984, 187-207; A. Salvatore, Commodiano: Enciclopedia Virgiliana, I, 855-56; P. Baldwin, Some Aspects of Commodian, Illinois Classical Studies 14 (1989); N. Castrillo Benito, Comodiano, primer poeta de la Cristiandad: estudio del vocalismo, con un apéndice bibliográfico sobre el autor y sus obras: Revista Agustiniana 30 (1991-92) 44-55; J.-M. Poinsotte, Commodien dit de Gaza: REL 74 (1996) 270-281; Id., Un "Nero rediuiuus" chez un poète apocalyptique de III^e siècle (Commodien), in J.M. Croisille - R. Martin - Y. Perrin (eds.), Neronia. 5. Néron: histoire et légende, Brussels 1999, 201-213; G. Brugnoli, Comm. Apol. 16-21: GIF 49 (1997) 243-246; S. D'Elia, Letteratura latina cristiana. With a completely reworked and updated bibl. by A.V. Nazzaro, Rome ³2000, 53-55 and 176-177.

A.V. Nazzaro

COMMODUS (161–192). Marcus Aurelius Commodus, who ruled 180–192, was the first Roman emperor born of a reigning father (*Marcus Aurelius). After an unsuccessful plot against him (hatched by the Senate with his sister *Lucilla and his cousin Hummidius Quadratus), Commodus ended by losing interest in power, which passed first into the hands of Perennes, head of the praetorians, and later was shared by *Marcia, his pro-Christian concubine, Eclectus, and Aemilius Laetus, commanders of the praetorians. Commodus identified himself with Hercules, whose mythical labors as a gladiator he wished to emulate. During his reign the empire was shaken by insurrections and famines. Commodus was strangled by an athlete named Narcissus. Perhaps through Marcia's influence, Christians who had been forced to work in the mines of *Sardinia were freed, and synods could be held on the controversy over the feast of *Easter. The *Scillitan martyrs were beheaded during his reign.

L. Pareti, Storia di Roma, V, Turin 1960; M. Sordi, Il cristianesimo e Roma, Bologna 1965, 199-207; M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan 2004; G. Jossa, I cristiani e l'impero romano da Tiberio a Marco Aurelio, Naples 1991; F. Jacques - J. Sheid, Roma e il suo impero, It. tr., Rome-Bari 1992; A. Ziolkowski, Storia di Roma, It. tr., Milan 2000; S. Roda, Profilo di storia romana. Dalle origini alla caduta dell'Impero d'Occidente, Rome 2001.

L. Navarra

COMMUNICATION, Written. With the full recognition during *Theodosius's reign of Christianity as state religion, an intense cultural activity developed in centers of religious life such as *monasteries and episcopal sees, by that time already present in many regions of the empire. This was especially true when these centers were run by highly educated persons, such as *Ambrose, *Jerome and *Paulinus of Nola, who were accustomed to study or even, like *Augustine, former professors of *rhetoric. These men brought to the institutions which they inspired their experience of study, teaching and school organization, adapting it and putting it at the service of the church and of the Christian communities over which they had pastoral responsibility. Their command of grammar, rhetoric and dialectic facilitated their study and *exegesis of Scripture, provided useful tools for preaching, and made possible the writing of letters and books. Augustine, Jerome, *John Chrysostom and other Fathers gave themselves tirelessly to these activities, often moved by contingent reasons or solicited by various correspondents based on the needs of the various churches or of individuals (not necessarily believers), such as to produce an extraordinary number of texts aimed at offering an apology for the faith or at the instruction and edification of Christians, also promoting their publication for these same ends.

A kind of edition of a text, even if limited and nondefinitive, came into existence with the sending by the author of complete or partial copies of it to friends or those he knew, asking for their comments, or with readings before a select audience. From that moment the work, until then known only by its author, or at most by those who had contributed materially to its writing (stenographers, notary copyists), became de facto "public," at least for those who had been authorized to read it or hear it read, who could then decide to return it to the author for the necessary corrections, or, with the author's consent, promote its circulation.

The definitive act of publication, however, was the sending of a copy of the finished work to a friend as a gift, perhaps with a dedication; with this gift the author effectively lost control of his work and tacitly allowed its reproduction. Augustine, e.g., sending the definitive version of De Trinitate to *Aurelius of Carthage, in the dedicatory letter explicitly authorized his bishop friend to allow whoever wished to listen to, copy or read his work (Aug., Ep. 174). This instruction makes clear the close relation that reading and transcription had in the publication and circulation of texts.

An important role in the circulation of Christian writings was held by those whom bishops and the church fathers charged with delivering their correspondence to the various regions of the Empire (baiuli, perlatores, portitores tabellarii), often enlisted from their own presbyterium, among the various degrees of the ecclesiastical hierarchy (monks, acolytes, *subdeacons, deacons [*Diakonia - Diaconate], *presbyters, even bishops) or, when this was not possible, even among trustworthy laypeople. The choice of ecclesiastics and monks for these tasks depended on their availability, their implicit trustworthiness and their level of education. Absolute fidelity was asked of these men since, besides the time required to carry out the entrusted mission, in some cases they delivered not only the Fathers' letters and books but also those of their correspondents. These were writings of every kind, from *exegetical studies to refutations, from heretical works to extremely sensitive documents such as the acts of councils or of disputes with *heretics, which absolutely could not be lost or fall into the hands of the church's enemies. Mentions of these men and their missions in the letters which they carried were in most cases stereotypical and almost removed from reality (according to the canons of traditional epistolography), in such a way as to transform real persons—sometimes even well-known persons highly involved in religious or political matters—into abstract, strongly idealized personalities. These messengers were used in order to communicate the sender's message as though he himself were present, the bearers pouring their heart into it: thus the messengers, like the letter, rendered the sender present to the recipient, in some instances themselves becoming a "living letter" (Aug., Ep. 31,2: CSEL 34,2,2).

The bearers, whether ecclesiastics or laymen, usually departed on their mission during the good season for reaching sometimes remote destinations by land or by sea. Facing wearying and dangerous voyages, their mission assured continued relations not only between churches near and far and among bishops and local or court authorities but also between bishops and those (Christians, *pagans, heretics) who submitted to them the widest variety of questions. Usually such persons were sent not just to deliver letters or books but also to perform various tasks, the nature of which often cannot be specified, due to the generality of references to them.

Some carried out their task scrupulously, without sparing themselves or hesitating, if necessary, to make sea voyages in the middle of winter, risking their health or sometimes even their life (Paul. Nol., Ep. 5,11: CSEL 29,32); others, sometimes for reasons out of their control but sometimes out of negligence, failed to complete their mission. Many texts were lost or stolen during these deliveries: some were never found, whereas others luckily reached their recipients after the most fantastic adventures.

We know the exact identity of many such bearers, esp. when they were members of the church hierarchy or freemen who were friends of the recipient or sender; those of servile condition, however, were designated generically as homines or pueri.

Among those who carried letters back and forth between Augustine and Jerome, we can mention the deacon Cyprian, the subdeacon Asterius, the priest Innocent (who also carried out various missions for other bishops at *Rome, *Alexandria, *Antioch and *Constantinople) and the presbyter *Orosius. Relations between *Hippo and *Nola, i.e., between Augustine and Paulinus, were assured by the layman *Romanianus, the youth Vetustinus, Bishop *Pos-sidius of Calama, Romanus and Agilis and the deacon Quintus.

The task of the bearers of letters and books went well beyond the delivery to the recipient of what had been entrusted to them by the sender. Not only did they need to know the texts they carried and be able to read and explain them, contextualizing them orally with other information perhaps contained in separate documents, but they also had to update the recipient with information about the sender and his community.

It was not always possible to find bearers capable of carrying out such a complex task, such that in some circumstances senders were forced to delay sending their letters: emblematic is the case of *Consentius, a correspondent of Augustine, who, though he wanted to let Augustine know of the works he was composing against *Pelagius, thought it better to not send them until he could find a messenger qualified to converse and discuss the texts with the bishop of Hippo (Aug., Ep. 12*, 15, CSEL 88, 79).

D. Gorce, Les voyages. L'hospitalité et le port des lettres, Paris 1925; G. Cavallo, Libro e pubblico alla fine del mondo antico. Libri editori e pubblico nel mondo antico. Guida storica e critica, Rome - Bari 1975, 83-172; Id., Dallo scriptorium senza biblioteca alla biblioteca senza scriptorium, in Dall'eremo al cenobio. La civiltà monastica in Italia dalle origini all'età di Dante, Milan 1987, 331-422; Id., Tra "volumen" e "codex." La lettura nel mondo romano, in Storia della Lettura, eds. G. Cavallo - R. Chartier, Rome - Bari 1995, 37-69; M. Caltabiano, Litterarum lumen. Ambienti culturali e libri tra il IV e il V secolo, SEA 55, Rome 1996; Id., Storie di uomini, lettere e libri nella corrispondenza di S. Agostino, in L'adorabile vescovo di Ippona, Soveria Mannelli 2001, 73-96; Id., I latori della corrispondenza di Agostino: tra idealizzazione realtà: Augustinianum 60 (2001) 113-148; S. Mratscheck, Der Briefwechsel des Paulinus von Nola. Kommunikation und soziale Kontakte zwischen christlichen Intellektuellen, Göttingen 2002; M. Caltabiano, Libri iam in multorum manus exierunt. Agostino testimone della diffusione delle sue opere, in Tra IV e V secolo. Studi sulla cultura latina tardoantica, Milan 2002, 141-157.

M. Caltabiano

COMMUNION

I. Meaning of the word - II. Aspects of eucharistic communion.

I. Meaning of the word. The Latin term communio was used to translate the Greek κοινωνία, although the equivalence is not perfect. In biblical Greek the word means "that which is common," that which constitutes a bond (see 2 Cor 13:14; 1 Jn 1:3); also a generous spirit of sharing (2 Cor 9:13); then the sign or proof of fraternal unity, esp. in holding goods in common (Acts 2:42); finally, participation in a collection to help the poorest (2 Cor 8:4), or in a common good par excellence, e.g., the body and blood of Christ (1 Cor 10:16)—a use which gives the word, in the *liturgy and in 4th-c. writers, the meaning of "communion in the eucharistic mystery" (Lampe 763).

Among the Latins the term expresses the act of association, participation, then the status of being common, the fact of sharing the same faith, the union with the whole church, which holds fast to spiritual and material goods, the reconciliation which reintegrates the sinner, making him reenter "communion" with it, and finally participation in the *Eucharist, receiving Christ, who offered himself for us.

II. Aspects of eucharistic communion. Frequency. In the first three centuries the faithful received Communion at every celebration (see *Tertullian, Idol. 7; *Cyprian, Ep. 56; De or. dom. 18). *Clement of Alexandria says that "every day the Lord gives himself in the food and drink of immortality" (Quis dives 23; see also *Origen, In Gen hom. 10,3). In the 4th c. we see a relaxation: *Basil of Caesarea (Ep. 93) and *John Chrysostom (In Hebr. hom. 17,4) encourage Christians to receive the Eucharist every day, since it is God's desire—declared *Hilary (frag. 7, PL 10, 725)—that "every day the Christ, bread of life, the bread come down from heaven, would dwell in us." The Council of *Agde (506) prescribes communication three times a year; that of Mâcon (585), once a week.

Administration of communion. *Justin informs us that deacons brought Communion to the absent (1 Ap. 67,5). There was also a custom of taking the sacred species home in order to communicate on the following days: see Tertullian, De or. 19,4; Ad uxor. II,5; Cyprian, De Laps. 26; *Hippolytus, Tr. Ap. 37; and still in the 4th c., see *Severus of Antioch, Ep. a Cesaria; Jerome, Ep. 49,15; *Augustine, Opus imp. c. Iul. 3,162. *Eusebius of Caesarea cites the example of simple laymen who bring Communion to the sick (HE VI, 44).

Under both species. The Council of *Nicaea (can. 13) already presents Communion under both species, brought as viaticum to the dying, as "ancient and canonical." Also see Vita Ambr. 47; the IV Council of *Carthage [= Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua], can. 76-78; and the I Council of *Orange (441), can. 3: "according to the definition of the Fathers."

Attitude in approaching the Eucharist. The Fathers insist much on the need to worthily prepare to receive the Eucharist. *Ambrose exhorted: "Live in such a way as to merit receiving [Christ] every day" (Sacr. V, 4,25); John Chrysostom recommended approaching with a pure conscience, respect and fear, after having fasted and prayed (In Nat. hom. 7; In 1 Cor hom. 24,5): it is a preparation of the heart, not the mouth (see Augustine, Serm. 112,5), so as to receive Communion "with respect, devotion, humility" (*Isidore of Seville, Eccl. off. 2,18,7).

Effects of the Eucharist. It is considered "the one bread, the medicine of immortality, the antidote to death, the food of eternal life in Jesus Christ" (Ignatius Ant., Eph. 20,2); its main purpose is to unite us to Christ and, as a consequence, to each other, "in such a way that we would be in Christ and Christ in us. . . . Christ is in us through his flesh, and we are in him, so that with him, we are in God" (Hilary, Trin. 8,14; see also Augustine, Civ. Dei, 10,6 and 21,25,4); it therefore makes us one body with Christ (see Cyril Alex., In Io 11,11), changes us into him (see Augustine, Conf. 7,10), generates an intimate transformation of the Christian: "Christ forms us according to his image in such a way that the qualities of his divine nature shine in us through sanctification, justice and a good life in conformity with virtue" (Cyril Alex., Resp. ad Tiber.).

DACL 3, 2427-2447; DTC 3, 515-552; DSp 2, 1188-1300; A. van Kol: Bijdragen 13 (1952) 419-433; Lampe 763-764; A.G. Martimort, La chiesa in preghiera, Rome 1963, 957 (index: s.v. communion); A. Chavasse, À Rome, l'envoi de l'eucharistie, rite unificateur de l'église locale: RBen 97 (1987) 7-12; C. Caspers - G. Lukken - G. Rouwhorst (eds.), Bread of Heaven: Customs and Practices Surrounding Holy Communion: Essays in the History of Liturgy and Culture, Kampen 1995; A. McGowan, Ascetic Eucharists: Food and Drink in Early Christian Ritual Meals, Oxford 1999.

M. Maritano

COMPUTI (apocryphal). During the 6th and 7th c., controversies arose in the West over the reckoning of the date of *Easter. The main cause of difference was the fact that neither the replacement of the Supputatio romana vetus by *Victorius of Aquitaine's computus (see Computus, Ecclesiastical) nor that of the latter by the Easter table of *Dionysius Exiguus, took place at the same time in the various churches. Even Victor's Easter corsus sometimes gave different dates for Graeci and Latini (e.g., in 577 and 590); meanwhile the *Celtic churches kept the Supputatio romana vetus until the 7th c., fixing the spring equinox at 25 March and accepting 25 March and 21 April as the extreme limits of Easter, from the 14th day of the moon (possibly coinciding with 14 Nisan) to the 20th. In this climate computi multiplied in support of the various positions, and remain a characteristic element of early medieval culture, in which astronomical data mingle with *allegorical interpretations of Scripture, polemic and apology defending peculiar liturgical traditions and a spirit of pseudo-scientific research. One of the most authoritative texts was the *Tractatus de ratione Paschae, attributed by one recension to *Athanasius and more commonly to Martin of Braga, but really the work of an anonymous 5th-c. Iberian computist (see CPL 2302) with a considerable capacity for theological reflection; probably inspired by it are the false Acts of the Council of Caesarea, also known as Epistula Synodica, attributed to *Theophilus of Caesarea, composed between the 2nd half of the 6th c. and the early 7th, probably in *Britain, but perhaps in *Spain or *Africa; *Bede (De temporum ratione, 47: see CPL 2307) cites them as an authoritative source. Of Celtic origin are ps.-Anatolius's *De ratione Paschae (CPL 2303), the *Disputatio de ratione paschali attributed to Bishop Morinus of Alexandria (CPL 2306) and two Epistolae attributed to *Cyril of Alexandria (CPL 2304-2305).

Editions in B. Krusch, Studien zur christlichmittelalterliche Chronologie, I-II, Leipzig - Berlin 1880/1938; C. Frick, Chronica minora, I, Leipzig 1893. List of codices and editions in A. Cordoliani, Les traités de comput du haut moyen âge (526-1003): ALMA 17 (1943) 51-71. Studies: A. Cordoliani, Les computistes insulaires et les écrits pseudoalexandrins: BECh 106 (1945-46) 23ff.; Textos de cómputo español del siglo VI. El "Prologus Cyrilli": Hispania Sacra 9 (1956) 127ff.; Textes de comput espagnol. Encore le problème des traités de comput de Martin de Braga: Revista de Archivos, Bibliotecas y Museos 62 (1956) 685-697; CPPM III/A 160-839 (pp. 185-302).

V. Loi - B. Amata

COMPUTUS DE PASCHA. Handed down among *Cyprian's works, the Computus de Pascha was composed in the 5th year of the emperor Gordian (243) by an anonymous computist, probably *African judging from the biblical text he used. He proposed an *Easter table correcting the error of *Hippolytus of Rome (see Computus, Ecclesiastical), whose 16-year cycle was three days out of phase with the corresponding cycle of solar years; he held that the error was due to calculating the moon's movements starting from the first day of creation, fixed as 25 March, instead of taking 28 March, day of the creation of the moon. He based his correction more on his *exegesis of biblical passages than on astronomical calculations, and appealed to biblical teaching. Otherwise he was faithful to Hippolytus's table.

CPL 2276; PL 4, 939-974; CSEL 3/3, 248-271; CPPM III/A 750; P. Hufmayr, Die pseudocyprianische Schrift De Pascha computus, Augsburg 1896; Monceaux III, 79-102; G. Ogg, The Computist of A.D. 243 and H.: JTS 48 (1947) 206ff.; Id., The Tabella Appended to the Pseudo-Cyprianic De Pascha Computus in the Codex Remensis: VChr 8 (1954) 134-144; Id., The Pseudo- Cyprianic De Pascha Computus, London 1955; V. Grumel, Traité d'études byzantines, I, La chronologie, Paris 1958, 17-18.

V. Loi - B. Amata

COMPUTUS, ECCLESIASTICAL. The effort of many Christian writers to offer a certain basis for calculating the date of *Easter led to the origin and development of ecclesiastical computus, which could be called a technical, mathematical and astronomical science aimed at exactly establishing the date of the spring equinox. This calculation proved to be particularly difficult, since both solar and lunar years needed to be taken into account. The date of Easter is fixed according to the lunar calendar: it is celebrated on the Sunday immediately after the first full moon of spring; but it is moveable according to the solar calendar, since the lunar year is shorter than the solar year by ca. 11 days and 6 hours. To keep this difference of length between the solar and lunar years from making the day of the first full moon of spring (14 Nisan according to the Jewish calendar) slide indefinitely in relation to the solar calendar, an "embolismic" (i.e., "added") month must be added to the lunar year at regular intervals. But this insertion displaces the correspondence between 1/14 Nisan and the days of the solar calendar; it was thus necessary to identify a cycle of solar and lunar years which allowed the cyclical recurrence of the dates of Easter in the same order and on the same days. Moreover, in the resulting "Easter table," the insertion of the embolismic months caused, at the end of a cycle, a further displacement between the cycle of lunar years and the cycle of solar years, which had to be corrected by a periodic increase of the epact. By "epact" was meant the excess days of the solar year over the lunar year, or the age of the moon on 1 January of each year. The periodic increase of the epact was called a saltus lunae. The Easter tables of the Roman tradition also indicated the concurrentes, i.e., the conventional figures used by computists to determine on what day of the week each year would begin.

1. The first systematic Easter computus was that proposed by *Hippolytus of Rome in his work Apodeixis chronon tou pascha, whose Easter table is incised on the base of a statue found at Rome in 1551. The computus is based on a 16-year cycle; it started from 222 and gave the Easter dates for the next 112 years. Hippolytus did not allow celebration of Easter before the 16th day of the moon, so, if 14 Nisan fell on a Saturday, Easter had to be celebrated, not on the next day but eight days later. Hippolytus was convinced that after a 16-year cycle the Easter dates would return in the same order and on the same days of the solar calendar; in fact, at the end of the first cycle there is already a displacement of three days between the lunar and solar years under consideration. To obviate Hippolytus's error, in 243 an anonymous Latin-speaking African computist proposed a new computus (Computus de Pascha) with a simplistic correction of Hippolytus's mistake: he displaced the lunar dates proposed by Hippolytus by three days, taking as the starting point for his calculations not 25 March, date of the creation of the world, but 28 March, date of the creation of the moon. A few decades later, a new Easter cycle was proposed by the *African computist *Augustalis, who was the first to adopt an 84-year cycle. Augustalis's Easter table went from 213 to 312 and was adopted by the African churches and the Church of *Rome, with an indication of the added days that correspond to the leap year every 14 years. Probably in 298, Augustalis's cycle was replaced at Rome by the supputatio romana vetus, also based on an 84-year cycle; it allowed celebration of Easter neither before 25 March (traditional Roman date for the spring equinox) nor after 21 April, and differed from Augustalis's table in requiring a saltus lunae every 12 (rather than 14) years.

2. The Eastern churches, from the 2nd half of the 3rd c., followed an Easter computus proposed by *Anatolius of Laodicea, who used a 19-year cycle worked out in 432 BC by the Athenian Meto. Anatolius fixed the date of the spring equinox at 22 March and, disallowing celebration of Easter before the equinox, proposed 22 March and 25 April as the extreme limits of Easter. Anatolius's Easter table was continued by *Theophilus of Alexandria in the late 4th c. and then by his successor *Cyril.

3. In the course of the 4th c. the divergences between the Roman computus and the Alexandrian computus were considerable, so that more than once (in 333, 346, 349, 350, 357, 360, 387) the Roman church proposed different Easter dates from those of the East. The correction made to the supputatio romana vetus in 343, by which the equinox was fixed as 21 March in accordance with the new Alexandrian computus and the Easter limits fixed as 22 March and 21 April, from the 16th to the 22nd of the moon, was not sufficient to overcome the divergences.

Since the Easter controversies were still going on in the 5th c., Pope *Leo I entrusted the task of a new computus to *Victorius of Aquitaine: he combined the 19-year lunar cycle used at *Alexandria with a 28-year solar cycle, creating an Easter period of 532 years, at the end of which the Easter limits returned in the same order and on the same days of the calendar; as Easter limits, Victor proposed 22 March and 24 April; he had a saltus lunae every 6/7 years of the 19-year cycle. But the divergences between the Roman computus and the Alexandrian computus continued, since Rome did not allow celebration of Easter before the 16th day of the moon, while Alexandria allowed it on the 15th day; Rome fixed 22 March and 24 April as Easter limits, but Alexandria fixed 22 March and 25 April.

In 525, at the request of the primicerius notariorum of Pope John I (Bonifacius, primicerius), the learned Scythian monk *Dionysius, surnamed Exiguus, or "the Little," compiled an Easter table from 532 (in which the Alexandrian table compiled by Cyril came to an end) to 626, based on the 19-year Alexandrian cycle; as extreme limits of the new moons of Easter, Dionysius fixed 8 March and 5 April, and the corresponding full moons as 21 March and 18 April, so that the extreme limits of Easter became 22 March and 25 April, since Dionysius allowed Easter to be celebrated on the 15th day of the moon. Dionysius's computus triumphed over the supputatio romana vetus and Victorius's computus in the course of the 7th c., and became normative for the Middle Ages. But the supputatio romana vetus lasted much longer in the marginal areas of Western Christendom, leading to the 7th-c. Easter controversies between Rome and the churches of *Ireland and *Britain.

B. Krusch, Studien zur christlich-mittelalterlichen Chronologie. Der 84jährige Ostercyclus und seine Quellen, I, Leipzig 1880; E. Schwartz, Christliche und jüdische Ostertafeln, AGG N.E. VIII/6 (1905); G. Gentz, v. Ostern: PWK XVIII/2 1647-1653; V. Grumel, Traité d'études byzantines, I. La chronologie, Paris 1958, 6-55; V. Grumel, Le problème de la date pascale aux IIIe et IVe siècles: REByz 18 (1960) 163-178; A. Van de Vyver, L'évolution du comput alexandrin et romain du IIIe au IVe siècle: RHE 52 (1957) 5-25; D. McCarthy, The Chronology and Sources of Early Irish Annals: Early Medieval Europe 10 (2001) 321-334; D. Edel, The Celtic West and Europe: Studies in Celtic Literature and Early Irish Church, Bodnein 2001 (Computus 124-226).

V. Loi - B. Amata

CONANTIUS of PALENCIA (d. 638/639). Described by *Ildefonsus as a reflective and eloquent man, dedicated to the *liturgy and to the composition of sacred music, esp. for the morning office (Vir. ill. 11, PL 96, 203), Conantius was born ca. 580 and was bishop of Palencia for more than 30 years, from 607 to ca. 639. As bishop he participated in the Synod of *Toledo of 610 and in the Councils of Toledo IV (633), V (636) and VI (638); he instituted a school of formation for clergy, where he also had as a disciple *Fructuosus of Braga; and wrote a series of psalmodic prayers, in part recognized in the appendix of book IV of the Liber orationum psalmographus (Vega).

J. Pinell, Liber orationum psalmographus, Barcelona-Madrid 1972, 90-95; 217-231; M.C. Díaz y Díaz, Tres notas sobre cultura latina medieval en la región palentina, in Actas del I Congreso de Historia de Palencia, IV, Palencia 1987, 9-28; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, IV, Madrid 1998, 465-466.

P. Marone

CONCORDIA. When the Roman colony was settled, ca. 42 B.C., at the crossing of the Via Postumia and the Via Annia on the site of a previous vicus, Roman penetration in the region had been going on for centuries. The immediate purpose in founding Iulia Concordia was to settle veterans in fertile territory, and initially it shared the general conditions of well being and peace. In the last years of the empire, Concordia's strategic importance increased continually and it became the seat of a military arsenal specializing in the production of sagittae, according to the information in the 5th-c. Notitia Dignitatum, confirmed by a fair number of inscriptions.

Excavations near the parish church of St. Stephen and the Romanesque baptistery have uncovered an important early Christian complex, which illuminates the obscure period of the territory's Christian origins and is itself illumined by the famous address in dedicatione ecclesiae (Sermo XXVI), now ascribed by J. Lemarié to *Chromatius of Aquileia (388–408). Latin and Greek inscriptions cut from the *sarcophagi of a mixed *cemetery allow us to reconstruct the composite sociocultural milieu in which the first Christian community provided itself with stable diocesan institutions and church buildings. The large rectangular basilica recently discovered under the parish church seems to be that dedicated by Chromatius in honorem sanctorum, with *relics of the *apostles (*John the evangelist, *Andrew, *Thomas), as well as those of *Luke and *John the Baptist, between 389 and 400, when—in his words—ornata est igitur Ecclesia Concordiensis et munere sanctorum et basilicae constructione et summi sacerdotis officio. A confirmation of their presence within the complex is given by epigraphical evidence relative to privileged burials ad sanctos, like that on the sarcophagus of Faustiniana famula Christi which recommends her tomb to the saints' memory (sanctorum memoriae), and that on the sarcophagus of the presbyter Maurentius who rests ante limina domnorum apostolorum. This basilica, built in an external zone along the Augustan walls, next to the three-celled tomb on the S and two cemeterial enclosures on the E, is generally recognized as the early Christian cathedral of Concordia; Chromatius's sermon does not confirm, but neither does it explicitly exclude, the identification of the basilica he dedicated with the cathedral, and recent archaeological data seem to support this identification. In any case, it is a cemeterial cathedral built in an area of necropolises, which raises a whole series of problems and hypotheses: nevertheless the funerary use of the area does not seem to exclude here, as elsewhere, the episcopal function of the basilica, dedicated with the sacred deposition of the relics according to a rite that was used increasingly from the time of *Ambrose on. Unfortunately, we do not know the name of the sanctus vir consecrated as the first bishop by Chromatius, and we have only a few names of his successors. *Attila's invasion in 452 and the flood of 589, lamented by Paul the Deacon, struck a mortal blow to the city's prosperity; after the *Longobard occupation (615–618), the episcopal see was transferred to Caorle, under *Byzantine rule.

P.L. Zovatto, Antichi monumenti cristiani di Iulia Concordia Sagittaria, Vatican City 1950; I. Furlan, Architettura del complesso paleocristiano di Iulia Concordia: revisione e proposte, in Scritti storici in memoria di P.L. Zovatto, Milan 1972, 79-95; G. Bovini, Concordia paleocristiana, Bologna 1973; G. Fogolari, La maggior basilica paleocristiana di Concordia. Relazione preliminare: AAAd VI (1974) 267-295; Iulia Concordia dall'età romana all'età moderna, eds. B. Scarpa Bonazza - B. Forlati Tamaro - G. dei Fogulari - L. Coletti - R. Cessi - G. Zille, Treviso 1978; L. Bertacchi, Architettura e mosaico, in Da Aquileia a Venezia, Milan 1980, 311-331; G. Lettich, Le iscrizioni sepolcrali tardoantiche di Concordia, Trieste 1983; G. Cuscito, Cromazio di Aquileia e la Chiesa di Concordia: AAAd 25 (1984) 69-88; D. Mazzoleni, L'epigrafia cristiana a Concordia: AAAd 31/2 (1987) 75-91; C. Noviello, "Quievisti in saeculo": a proposito di una celebre iscrizione concordiese: Atti and Memorie della Società Istriana di Archeologia and Storia Patria 97 (1997) 143-165; var. aus., La Chiesa concordiese 389-1989, Pordenone 1989; var. aus., Concordia. Tremila anni di storia, eds. P. Croce Da Villa and E. Balestrazzi, Concordia Sagittaria 2001.

G. Cuscito

CONCUBINAGE. Derived from the Latin verb concubo ("to live with"), the term itself indicates the essence of such a union: the cohabitation of two persons without the intent to marry (sine affectione maritali). Concubinage became more common with Augustus's legislation prohibiting marriage between cives Romani and women of a lower social class, such as slaves, landladies, actresses, ballerinas, prostitutes, libertines and women condemned for adultery; it corresponded to what we call morganatic marriage. Concubinage thus created problems for the primitive church, which held strongly to the uniqueness of the matrimonial union, though it was forced to live with the easy divorce offered by official marriage. In concubinage, the church saw a type of cohabitation that was weaker than even Roman marriage, not to mention the fact that until 326 (Cod. Just. 5,26,1), alongside Roman marriage, men could also keep concubines. If we are to believe *Hippolytus (Elenchos 9,12,24-25), to prevent Christians from marrying *pagans, even of the same social class, concubinage was recognized by Pope *Callistus as "marriage" in the eyes of the church. It was still practiced at the time of *Augustine: see his personal example, or Serm. 224, where he specifies that concubinage was so common that it would have been impossible to *excommunicate all the Christians living in such unions. It was tolerated, on the condition that the man did not have a concubine and a wife simultaneously, by canon 17 of Toledo (400), and under certain conditions by the Apostolic Tradition and the Apostolic Constitutions* 8,32, but some bishops also fought against it, wanting the man to marry his concubine, having redeemed her, or to send her away and marry another woman according to the law. Concubinage was finally rejected by Pope *Leo I (Ep. 167, to Rusticus of Narbonne, 4-6). Two imperial concubines played a role in the history of the church: *Marcia, companion of *Commodus; and *Helena, companion of *Constantius Chlorus and mother of *Constantine the Great.

H. Crouzel, L'Église primitive face au divorce, Paris 1971, 304-312; B. Rawson, Roman Concubinage and Other de facto Marriages: TAPhA 104 (1974) 279-305; J. Gaudemet, La décision de Callixte en matière de mariage, in Sociétés et mariages, Strasbourg 1980, 104-115; A. Rousselle, Concubinat et adultère: Opus 3 (1984) 75-84; J. Gaudemet, Union libre et mariage dans la Rome impériale: Iura 40 (1989) 1-23; K. Power, Sed unam tamen: Augustine and His Concubine: AugStud 24 (1993) 49-76.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

CONFESSOR. Called by this term were all Christians who, having publicly confessed their faith before a *pagan tribunal during the *persecutions, were punished with imprisonment, exile or other minor penalties, though without suffering *martyrdom. Confessors were venerated by the community while they awaited death in prison and later, if freed, they occupied an important position in the church. Particular rights within the community were accorded them, since they were considered clothed with the *Holy Spirit. They could therefore be associated with the clergy without having received regular ordination, though not with the episcopate (Apos. Trad. 9). Their prayers for the sick and their power of *intercession for sinners were held to be efficacious. They also had the faculty to intervene in areas of church discipline.

The Latin term confessor is the equivalent of the Greek ὁμολογητής, which was initially used as a synonym of μάρτυς; but from the 2nd c. on they were more clearly distinguished: a "martyr" would be one who died during his sufferings, and a "confessor" one who survived, not sealing his witness with martyrdom. We first see this distinction in the Letter on the Martyrs of Lyons of 177, where those who have survived the persecution do not accept the title of martyr but prefer to be called only confessor (Euseb., HE V.2.2-3).

Later evidence shows how this terminological specification was consolidated over time (Tertull., Pud. XXII.3; Orig., Com in Ioh. II.34, 209-210); nevertheless, in some passages of *Hippolytus, *Tertullian and *Cyprian, some still-living confessors are called martyrs. Cyprian makes a further distinction between public confession (before pagan judges) and private (fleeing persecutors), an inferior degree (De Lapsis 3). Once the persecutions ended, the meaning of the term confessor expanded to also include bishops who fought for the faith and *ascetics who lived the faith radically, witnessing to Christ not in tortures but with their virtue.

P. de Labriolle, Martyr et confesseur: BALAC 1 (1911) 50-54; H. Delehaye, Sanctus, Brussels 1923, 74-95; DACL 3, 2508-15; LTK 2, 142; E.L. Hummel, The Concept of Martyrdom According to St. Cyprian of Carthage, Washington, DC 1946, 1-33; M. Lods, Confesseurs et martyrs, Neuchâtel 1958, 61-78; B. Kötting, Die Stellung des Konfessors in der Alten Kirche: JbAC 19 (1976) 7-23; P. Testini, Archeologia Cristiana, Bari [2]1980, 123-125; E.R. Hardy, The Decline and Fall of the Confessor-Presbyter: SP 15 (1984) 221-225; M. Girardi, Basilio di Cesarea e il culto dei martiri nel IV secolo, Bari 1990, 22-24; Th. Baumeister, Genese und Entfaltung der altkirchlichen Theologie des Martyriums, Bern 1991; Ph. Harnoncourt - H. Auf der Maur, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit 2,1, Regensburg 1994, 89-90; R. Grégoire, Manuale di Agiologia, Fabriano 1996, 46-48.

O. Jiménez

CONFIRMATION. "*Baptism in the spirit" is promised more than once in the NT (by *John the Baptist and by Jesus himself). Baptism "in the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 8:16; 19:5) or "in the name of Jesus Christ" (Acts 2:38; 10:48) confers the *Holy Spirit, the gift promised for the messianic age (Acts 2:38). Only in exceptional cases do the *apostles confer this gift by laying on of hands (Acts 8:17; 19:6). But we know little or nothing of the actual rite of baptism. Only "washing in water, accompanied by the word" is stressed (see Eph 5:26); the gift of the Spirit is referred entirely to this. In both cases cited, a laying on of hands is also mentioned; Paul, however, does not mention it. His words on sealing and *anointing with the Spirit do not necessarily imply a concrete rite of anointing with *oil. Even if a basis can be discerned for a further development of the baptismal *liturgy, we must confine ourselves to saying: Paul, and especially the NT (despite the exceptional cases mentioned in Acts), "connect the conferral of the Spirit only with baptism; the epistles know no conferring of the Spirit which concludes baptism and is conferred by laying on of hands or anointing" (Neunheuser, Taufe im Geist, 268). Yet the fact that, in the cases cited in Acts, laying on of hands was presented as known and practiced, and the potent image of anointing in the Holy Spirit (as well as the use of actual oil in the OT anointings that were its presupposition), led, in the slow process of evolution of the baptismal liturgy, to the introduction of a laying on of hands and, later, of one or more anointings, as the final moments of the washing. But it is probable that the liturgical moment of *initiation remained a unitary action, baptism, also called baptism in Spirit, without it being possible to distinguish individual rites as sacramental moments per se.

This conception remains in subsequent centuries, though the different rites are already attested in the primitive sources. While the Didache* speaks only of "baptism in living water" (7,1), and *Justin offers little more, *Tertullian and, soon after, Hippolytus's Apostolic Tradition give us a deeper treatment of the individual rites within the overall structure of the celebration: baptismal washing (triple immersion); "anointing with oil consecrated according to ancient custom"; "then hands are laid on, invoking the Holy Spirit with a blessing" (Tertull., Bapt. 2 and 7-8; Neunheuser, Taufe und Firmung, 25). Hippolytus describes the whole rite in detail; he knows a double postbaptismal anointing, the first by a *presbyter, the second with "holy oil" by the bishop, who finally signs the baptizand on the forehead (consignans: 21). But the whole preserves a great unity. *Origen says it clearly: "We are baptized with visible water and visible chrism according to the tradition of the church" (in Rom. comm. V,8). Baptismal washing and anointing with chrism are designated by the one name "baptism," a generalized use in those times, with one important exception: Tertullian, author of the first large monographic work De baptismo. He stresses that the water is able to produce miraculous effects by virtue of its previous consecration with the Spirit and with the *epiclesis of God's name; he further specifies that, in baptism with water, the Holy Spirit proper is not given: "Rather, in the baptismal washing we are purified by an angel sent by the Holy Spirit" (6). Baptismal immersion is followed by anointing, in analogy with the priestly anointing of the OT and with Christ's own anointing (7). Then follows "laying on of hands with the words of blessing which invoke the Holy Spirit" (8). But despite this singular formulation, which contains the true kernel of the matter since it more distinctly recognizes a particular infusion of the Spirit, different from that of baptism in a strict sense, the whole remains an indissoluble unity, designated as baptismus aqua, to which the wonderful consecutio aeternitatis is attributed as to a unitary action (2).

Although after the 4th c. the significance of the postbaptismal actions—laying on of hands, anointing, or both—is more clearly identified, the traditional conception remains: within a unitary ritual action, initiatio Christiana, which in its entirety procures the remission of sins, the grafting onto Christ and his church, the gift of the Holy Spirit—i.e., in a word, Christian salvation—the individual actions remain reciprocally united parts of a single sacramental action, in which, however, the particular mode of transmission of the Spirit, "perfecting" (teleiosis), is clearly set in a separate rite, without thereby denying baptismal immersion its (fundamental) sacramental efficacy. The sources of this interpretation, predominant all through the first millennium and not completely lost even in the scholastic era, are mainly *Ambrose and *Cyril of Jerusalem, author of the *mystagogical *catecheses.

Ambrose describes the procedure of initiation in De mysteriis. After baptism in the name of the *Trinity (4), unctio in capite (ut fias electum genus, sacerdotale pretiosum: 6,30), washing of feet (6) and clothing with the vestimenta candida (7), there follows another stage of the rite. The church recognizes the inward desire to come to the sacrament (ad interiora cupit mysteria pervenire—7,40), and the Lord replies to its prayer: Pone me ut signaculum in cor tuum, quo fides tua pleno fulgeat sacrament (7, 41). Ambrose applies this word to the liturgical moment: Unde repete quia accepisti signaculum spiritale, spiritum sapientiae . . . ; et serva quod accepisti. Signavit te Pater, confirmavit te Christus Dominus, et dedit pignus Spiritus in cordibus tuis . . . (2 Cor 1:21-22). All this is confirmed and deepened in De Sacramentis: the rites of baptism (immersio et unctio: II,7) and washing of feet (III,1), sequitur spiritale signaculum . . . , quia post fontem superest ut perfectio fiat; quando ad invocationem sacerdotis Spiritus Sanctus infunditur, Spiritus Sapientiae . . . (III,2,8: PL 16,434A). Then follows a signatio of laying on of hands, as a "perfecting" of the baptismal rites; through it the Spirit is transmitted in a special way but without this action being detached from the preceding ones.

So the West speaks of anointing only in close connection with baptism and puts the stress on signatio (laying on of hands) with a rite that "perfects" initiation; in the East, however, anointing with "holy oil" (myron) is clearly in evidence. This is the theme of the third mystagogical catechesis of Cyril of Jerusalem: De sacro Chrismate (PG 33,1087A-1094C). Participes igitur Christi effecti, Christi . . . appellamini . . . dum Spiritus Sancti antitypum accepistis . . . postquam ex . . . piscina ascendistis, datum est chrisma, illius antitypum quo unctus est Christus (1:1088-1089). This oil is not just any oil: after the epiclesis of the Spirit, it becomes "charism of Christ and power [energētikon] of the Holy Spirit, through the presence [parousia] of the deity" (3:1092A). This is proved in detail in the enumeration of the different anointings and their efficacy. The theological picture sketched out here remained fundamentally valid later on, even in the West, despite the difference in rites.

B. Neunheuser, Taufe und Firmung (HDG IV 2) 1956 = Baptême et Confirmation, Paris 1966, 19 and 101 (= 13-14 and 223) (bibl. up to 1956/1966); esp.: 19-23: 101-110 (= 49-57; 223-241); B. Lewandowski, Evolutio ritus liturgiae Confirmationis in Ecclesiis occidentalibus: EphLit 85 (1971) 29-47; 97-120; published separately by Edizioni Liturgiche, Rome 1971 (with good bibl. XI-XXIX); A.M. Triacca, Rassegne e segnalazioni bibliografiche in merito alla Confermazione: EphLit 86 (1972) 148-181 (ample bibl.). With reference to baptism: B. Neunheuser, Taufe im Geist. Der Hl. Geist in den Riten der Taufliturgie: Archiv. für Lit. wiss. 12 (1970) 268-284; G. Kretschmar, Die Geschichte des Taufgottesdienstes in der alten Kirche, in Leiturgia. Handbuch des evgl. Gottesdienstes, K.F. Müller - W. Blankenburg (eds.), Kassel 1970, 1-348, esp.: 101-109; 137-198; 260-264; S. Regli, Firmsakrament und christliche Entfaltung, in Mysterium Salutis, vol. V, Einsiedeln 1976, 296-348 (with bibl.), It. tr. Brescia 1978, vol. X, 349-414; G. Winkler, Das armenische Initiationsrituale, Rome 1982; V. Saxer, Les rites de l'initiation chrétienne du II^e au VI^e siècle, Spoleto 1988; P.R. Tragan, Le radici bibliche del sacramento della confermazione: Riv. lit. 76 (1989) 214-231; P. Bradshaw, Christian Initiation: A Study in Diversity, see Id., The Search for the Origins of Christian Worship, London 1992, 161-184; C. Granado, La confirmación en el siglo IV. Ambrosio de Milán, Catequesis Jerosolimitanas, Juan Crisóstomo: Estudios Trinitarios 27 (1993) 21-79; P. Turner, Sources of Confirmation from the Fathers Through the Reformation, Collegeville, MN 1993; J. Chalassery, The Holy Spirit and the Christian Initiation in the East Syrian Tradition, Rome 1995; H.B. Logan Alistair, Post-Baptismal Chrismation in Syria: The Evidence of Ignatius, the "Didache" and the "Apostolic Constituions": JTS 49 (1998) 92-108; M. Hauke, Die Firmung, Paderborn 1999, 52-151; W. Kinzig - C. Markschies - M. Vinzent, Tauffragen und Bekenntnis, Berlin 1999; Liturgia, eds. D. Sartore - A.M. Triacca - C. Cibien, 2001, 438-463; A. Elberti, La confermazione nella tradizione della Chiesa latina, Milan 2003.

B. Neunheuser - P. de Navascués

CONON, bishop (6th c.). Consecrated by *Jacob Baradaeus. A disciple of *John Philoponus, whose *tritheist approach he shared. He distinguished three hypostases and three perfectly equal natures in the *Trinity. After having defended his teacher, in the reign of *Justin II (565–577), in a debate before *John, patriarch of *Constantinople, he later condemned him for doctrinal divergences on the *resurrection of the flesh, and wrote an Invective against him (Photius, cod. 24; Nic. Call., HE 18, 49). He maintained the destruction of the form, but not the matter, of human bodies after the resurrection, while Philoponus preached the destruction of form and matter and the creation of new glorious bodies. From Conon derived the Cononite sect, which lasted until the early 8th c.

CPG 7283; A. Van Roey, Les fragments trithéites de Jean Philopon: OLP 11 (1980) 141-143 (Syriac text); G. Furlani, Un florilegio antitriteistico in lingua siriaca: Atti del Reale Istituto Veneto di Scienze, Lettere and Arti 83 (1923-1924), Parte II, 671-673; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieure au VIe siècle, CSCO 127, Subsidia 2, Louvain 1951, esp. 179-187; A. Van Roey - P. Allen, Monophysite Texts of the Sixth Century, OLA 56, Leuven 1994, 106, 14; Patrologia V, 151-153.

E. Prinzivalli

CONON, martyr (3rd c.). Several *martyrs named Conon are mentioned. One was bishop of *Edessa and died in 228. Mart. Rom. mentions another Conon, who suffered martyrdom with his sons at *Iconium in Isauria during *Aurelian's persecution. We possess acts regarding a certain Conon, called "the Gardener," a martyr in Pamphylia under *Decius. He is called a native of *Nazareth in Galilee—perhaps a hasty deduction from his statement: "I am of Nazareth. My family is Christ's"—who settled near Magydos, where he worked as a gardener. Arrested, he confessed his faith before the prefect Publius (or Pollio). Feast 5 or 6 March.

Acts published by A. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, St. Petersburg 1897, republished by Knopf-Krüger, Tübingen, 64-66; cf. BHL 1912-1913; Vies des SS. 3, 105-106; BS 4, 152-153; DHGE 13, 460-461; AB 53 (1935) 370-374; BHG 361 (the Gardener), 2077-2078 (the Isaurian); H. Musurillo, The Acts of the Christian Martyrs, Oxford 1972, 187-193 (Fr. tr. A. Hamman, Les premiers martyrs, Paris 1980); LTK³ 6, 274.

A. Hamman

CONON, pope (686–687). On the death of Pope *John V (685-686), two parties developed in the Church of *Rome: the clergy wanted the archpriest Peter as his successor; the army preferred the poet Theodore. In the end neither candidate was chosen, and agreement was reached on Conon, an old *presbyter of Sicilian origin. After being confirmed by the exarch of *Ravenna, Conon was consecrated 21 October 686. His pontificate lasted only 11 months, and the LP records no significant act of his. Conon died 21 September 687.

Mansi 11,737-738; LP I, 368-369 and 372 (see also CCLXII); Jaffé I, 243; Italia pontificia (P.F. Kehr), V, Aemilia sive provincia Ravennae, Berlin 1961, 7-8, 34 and 77; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 396-400 and 719; BBKL 4, 379-80; LTK³ 6, 274 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi I, 626-29 (P. Bertolini).

M. Spinelli

CONSCIENCE, Freedom of. By "freedom of conscience" we mean, in a broad sense, each person's right to follow and affirm his own conviction in religious or civil matters. The expression also designates the climate—even more than the conditions—which the modern mindset demands of institutions so that each individual may freely adhere to those personal convictions that give light and meaning to existence and actions. In a more specific sense, freedom of conscience is the right of men and women to choose and to abide by their own religious convictions, without external compulsion.

For the ancient society of which the early Christians were a part, it is better to speak of freedom of the conscience, understood as the capacity to commit oneself in a decision for which one takes responsibility, after evaluating it in light of an inner warning based on an awareness of right and wrong, and of the opinion that is formed in the light of the imperatives which urge it.

According to this moral meaning, we may say that, with Christianity, autonomy of the conscience was affirmed in a more peremptory and widespread way and was connected with the recognition of the value of each individual person—that there is something in the person that escapes any human interference. With Christianity, in fact, the recognition and valuing of spiritual interiority—which for ancient *pagan philosophy was the privilege of the sage—became widespread and available to all. *Augustine of Hippo brought to perfection the path begun at the dawn of our era, confirming in universal terms an attitude which could be called interior listening, which is reflected in one's life. For Christians of the first centuries, freedom of conscience was based on the faith that, just as Jesus Christ had freed human beings from sin through his *incarnation, death and *resurrection, so also had he liberated them from every absolute, and thus idolatrous, power. This principle found its point of impact in the distinction, indicated by Christ (see, e.g., Mt 22:15ff.), between the political and religious spheres (which made it possible for Christians to be loyal to the res publica [see Rom 13:1ff.; 1 Pet 2:13ff.] but to reject the sacralization of power). It was also expressed in the testimony given by the *martyrs and *confessors to whom many anonymous documents refer (acts and passions), along with exhortations to martyrdom, biographies, ancient letters, etc. From *Constantine on it must be noted that, while freedom of conscience still remained alive in men and women and manifested itself in various forms, this freedom was not assured by the political authorities (see, e.g., the series of repressive and discriminatory laws regarding non-Christians or non-Catholics in book XVI of the Codex Theodosianus), who were not infrequently requested by some bishops to act without respect for human conscience. But even in ancient times the evangelical seed was not lost, and maintained a perpetual tension in society that was destined never again to disappear.

A. Laurent: Cath 7, 650, s.v. Liberté; H. Chadwick, RAC 10, 1065ff., s.v. Gewissen (bibl. at cols. 1105-1107); P. Hadot, Exercices spirituels et philosophie antique, Paris [3]1993; M.P. Baccari, Cittadini, popoli e comunione nella legislazione dei secoli IV-VI, Turin 1996; F. Renaud: NP 4, 1056-1057, s.v. Gewissen.

P. Siniscalco

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION
(to military service)

I. Until approximately 170 - II. Until the peace of Constantine - III. After the peace of Constantine.

It is not easy to answer the question regarding military service in the early church because of the scarcity and complexity of the evidence, which has been interpreted variously by many scholars according to their own militarist or pacifist ideology. One must also consider that the problem varies with the geographical area; e.g., in Roman *Africa one detects a certain antimilitarist sensibility in authors like *Tertullian, *Cyprian, *Arnobius, *Lactantius and in the stories of the military *martyrs. Moreover, to address the question, three different periods must be distinguished: until approximately 170, until the peace of Constantine and after the peace of Constantine.

I. Until approximately 170. The sources from this period do not tell us much; there is no evidence either of the presence of Christians in the Roman army or of an attitude of refusal to participate for reasons of conscience. Presumably, considering the number and the sociological condition of the first Christian generations, military life did not present a problem for the church. References to military service in the first two centuries are indirect: *Clement of Rome presents the army's discipline as a model for the community of *Corinth (1 Ep. ad Cor. 37,1-3); *Ignatius uses military terminology to express the concept of militia Christi (Ad Polyc. 6,2), taking up Paul's argument in Eph 6:10-20; the *apologists repeat the Christian message of peace and of the rejection of homicide (Just., Tryph. 110,3; Athenag., Legat. Christ. 35,4-5; Min. Fel., Octav. 30,6).

II. Until the peace of Constantine. First, we must make it clear that in the first centuries of Christianity we cannot speak of an offical discipline of the whole church against military service. But ca. 170 we find a movement which views faith as incompatible with soldiering. This position was not confined to the *heretical circles of the *Montanists, and later of the *Manichees, but is also found in some ecclesiastical writers. Evidence of this attitude is reported by *Origen in Contra Celsum: at the time of *Marcus Aurelius, *Celsus had lamented the absence of Christians in the army and exhorted them to fight for the emperor (C. Cel. VIII, 68-73). Other sources, however, speak of the presence of Christians in the ranks of the Roman army: *Eusebius of Caesarea recounts a battle won by Marcus Aurelius, thanks to the prayers of Christian soldiers (HE V, 4,3-5,7); *Clement of Alexandria mentions the possibility of Christian farmers, sailors or soldiers (Protr. 10,100,4); Tertullian acknowledges the existence of Christian military personnel (Apolog. 42,2-3; De cor.).

In analyzing the sources on conscientious objection during this period, one must distinguish between the absolute rejection of military service (the martyr *Maximilian; Tertull., De idolol. 19,1-3; Lact., Div. inst. VI, 20,15-17) and the refusal to engage in any activities proper to the life of soldiers: participating in combat, killing, the danger of *idolatry due to oaths etc. (Trad. Apost. 16; Tertull., De cor. 11). It seems that, due to the specialization of the Roman military, Christian soldiers could to a certain degree avoid these activities. It is also presumable that these were for the most part soldiers who converted to Christianity rather than believers who then enlisted. In the 2nd half of the 3rd c. the number of Christians in the army increased; thus during the last *persecutions there were many *martyrs who were soldiers: the centurion Marcellus, the veteran Julius etc.

III. After the peace of Constantine. The new situation of the church in the 4th c. would influence its position on military service, which would become more positive. Still, exceptions were *Martin of Tours and *Victricius of Rouen, who had left the army for reasons of faith. In 314, the Council of *Arles showed the beginnings of a compromise with the emperor, condemning those who laid down their arms in peacetime. *Athanasius and *Basil of Caesarea seem to accept the killing of enemies in war; *Ambrose defends combat in war against the barbarians (Exp. Luc. 2,77); *Augustine argues in favor of the legitimacy of military service with the accounts of the conversions of soldiers in the NT (Ep. 189,4-6). Conscientious objection to the occupation of soldier would be limited only to *monasteries.

Concilium 7, 1965 (bibl. 1945-1965, ed. J. Fontaine); A. Harnack, Militia Christi, Darmstadt 1963 (repr.; It. tr. Palermo 2004); H. Karpp, Die Stellung des alten Kirche zu Kriegsdienst und Krieg: EvangTheol 17 (1957) 496-515; B. Schöpf, Das Tötungsrecht bei den f. christ. Schriftstellern . . ., Regensburg 1958; J.M. Hornus, Évangile et Labarum, Geneva 1960; G. Crescenti, Obiettori di coscienza e martiri militari nei primi cinque secoli del cristianesimo, Palermo 1966; P. Siniscalco, Massimiliano: un obiettore di coscienza del tardo impero, Turin 1974; J. Helgeland - R.J. Daly - J. Patout Burns, Christians and the Military, Philadelphia 1985; E. Pucciarelli, I cristiani e il servizio militare, Florence 1987; A. Barzanò, Il cristianesimo delle origini di fronte al problema del servizio militare e della guerra: RSCI 44 (1990) 440-450; S. Tanzarella, Rifiuto del servizio militare e della violenza nel cristianesimo africano tra la fine del III e l'inizio del IV secolo: Augustinianum 34 (1994) 455-465; J. Fernández Ubiña, Cristianos y militares. La Iglesia antigua ante el ejército y la guerra, Granada 2000; A. Di Berardino, Obiezione di coscienza e servizio civile nella Chiesa precostantiniana, in Chiesa e Impero, Rome 2001, 101-129.

O. Jiménez

CONSENTIUS (d. after 420). Early 5th-c. theologian. It is unknown whether he was a layman, priest or monk. Probably from *Tarraconensis or S *Gaul. He settled in the Baleari islands where, in close connection with *Augustine and *Patroclus of Arles, he wrote on the *Trinity and against *Priscillianists, *Pelagians and Jews, in addition to his letters. Our principal source on Consentius are the letters to which Augustine replies, in 410, on the relation between the two natures in Christ and between the three divine persons (Cons. in Aug., Ep. 119, 1-5), and in 419/420 on the body of the glorified Christ and on what our body will be like in the *resurrection (Aug., Ep. 205). Consentius also went to *Hippo to meet Augustine but was unable to because the latter was away for health reasons (Aug., Ep. 119,1). Augustine, informed by Consentius of the theories of *Dictinius—whom he had known through *Fronto—dedicated Contra Mendacium to Consentius (420). We have three letters of Consentius (420): one (PL 33, 449-462; CSEL 34, 698-722) is on trinitarian-christological questions. The other two, recently discovered by J. Divjak (Divjak, Ep. 11 and 12), confront the Priscillianist problem and shed light on the history of the *Tarraconese and *Balearic church; among other things, they give us information on persons connected with Priscillianism and on Agapius, *Asterius, Fronto, Leonas, *Leontius, *Maximian and Carparius, *Patroclus, Paulinus of Diaca, Sagitius, the matron Severa, the priest Severus, bishops Severus and Syagrius, Titianus, and the monk Ursicius.

CPL 262, 373, 797; Ep.: PL 33, 449-462; ed. Goldbacher, CSEL 34, 698-722; J Divjak, CSEL 55, 51-80 (the other letters); cf. Augustine, Ep. 119; 120; 205; and Contra Mendacium; Patrologia III, Sp. ed. Madrid 1980, 677-678; H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila, Oxford 1976, 154-155; A. López Ferreiro, Estudios histórico-críticos sobre el priscilianismo, Santiago di Compostela 1980, 166-176; F. Moriones, San Agustín y Consencio. Carta de San Agustín a Consencio sobre la razón y la revelación: Augustinus 25 (1980) 29-50; L. Robles, San Agustín y la cuestión priscilianista sobre el origen del alma. Correspondencia con autores españoles: Augustinus 25 (1980) 51-69; U. Stafforst, Ein neuentdeckter Brief an den Kirchenvater Augustin (Ep. 11 Consentii ad Augustinum*, ed. Divjak), in Festschrift des Bismarck Gymnasiums, Karlsruhe 1986, 67-79; A.M. La Bonnardière, Du nouveau sur le priscillianisme (*Epist. 11), in Les lettres de S. Augustin découvertes par Johannes Divjak, Paris 1983, 205-214; M. Moreau, Lecture de la lettre 11 de Consentius à Augustin. Un pastiche hagiographique?*, in op. cit., 215-223; A. Wankenne, La correspondence de Consentius avec Saint Augustin, in op. cit., 225-242; R. van Dam, Sheep in Wolves' Clothing: The Letters of Consentius to Augustine: JEH 37 (1986) 515-535; J. Amengual i Batle, Consenci, Correspondencia amb Sant Agusti, 2 vols., Barcelona 1987-1991; C.E. Quillen, Consentius as a Reader of Augustine's Confessions: REAug 37 (1991) 87-109; J. Amengual i Batle, Una trilogía agustiniana antipriscilianista y unas sugerencias para una nueva cronología: REAug44 (1998) 205-221; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura española, Madrid 1997, II, 25-26; J.-P. Weiss, Consentius, un écrivain espagnol témoin de son temps, in Mots chiffrés et déchiffrés, Mélanges offerts à E. Bruner, Paris 1998, 707-732.

E. Romero Pose

CONSOLATIO. Consolatio comes naturally to the person who does not want to abandon a friend or relative who has suffered misfortune. The events that can bring regret and sadness are many: sickness, death, floods, earthquakes, ruined fortunes, etc. The models for the consolatio that deals with each of these misfortunes are different according to the matter to be treated. The more tearful the situation, the more need for a suitable and spontaneous form of expression. The greatest of all misfortunes, leaving us stupefied, is death, the breach that generates trauma and confusion. For the *Stoics, death is one of the cosmic changes, like the falling of leaves (Sen., Ep. 104, 1), a natural process of the world (Sen., Ep. 30, 11). We must not attach too much weight to death but must prepare for it (Sen., Ep. 61, 2). Christ always underlies Christian consolatio, in a tension that determines other values of content and form.

Ancient Christian consolatio has two points of reference: *Cyprian's De mortalitate, for the epidemic that raged at *Carthage in 256, and *Paulinus of Nola's Carm. 31. Cyprian's work reaches the pinnacle of artistic prose in the harmonious unfolding of the cola and commata, making us aware of the rhythm and melos; Paulinus's poem sounds the most poetic notes of *Late Antiquity. Cyprian cannot understand those who, while asking for God's will to be done, do not know how to die (Mort. 18: M. Simonetti CCL 3A, 26-27). The plague, allaying the fear of death, beneficially arouses in the souls of the faithful the desire for *martyrdom. It also becomes a school of fortitude and allows us see whether the healthy are available to the sick, if relatives have common feeling for each other, if masters have pity for their slaves, if doctors do not abandon the sick who beg for help, if the violent are able to restrain themselves, if thieves cease their baleful activities and if the rich give to the *poor (Mort. 16, cit., 25). He who would reach Christ's dwelling in heavenly glory must not mourn and weep but rejoice as the day of his departure approaches (Mort. 22, cit., 28-29). Awaiting him are the choir of the *apostles, the array of exultant prophets, the multitude of *martyrs crowned with glory, the triumphant virgins and the merciful who spent themselves for the poor (Mort. 26, cit., 31).

In Carm. 31, Paulinus of Nola wishes, by his consolatio, to be close to Pneumatius and Fedelis, who have lost their 8-year old son Celsus. He looks for original models which escape common classifications and fixes forever the canon of the Christian consolatio. In a few verses he touches on Celsus's brief earthly life. Christ calls from heaven, and the person cannot be sad, but joyful; he must cast all sorrow out of his heart if he does not wish to be ungrateful (Carm. 31, 195-200: G. de Hartel CSEL 30). In Paulinus's exhortation to his readers to weep for their sins and give themselves to Christ in expectation of eternal life, the ideal of charity emerges as the true help we can give to the poor. He attributes his conversion to poverty to St. Felix (Carm. 21, 491-499). As one of Christ's poor, he feels more honored than when he was a Roman senator. His fine dwellings and fertile lands—which he no longer possessed, having distributed them among the poor—were nothing compared to what he now has with Christ in the state of blessed poverty.

Again in Paulinus's consolatory letter to *Pammachius (Ep. 13: G. de Hartel CSEL 29, 84-107) on the death of his wife Paulina, the highest reference is to works of charity. Pammachius's inviting the poor of *Rome to St. Peter's to offer them food seems the image of Christ. Pammachius is thus doing not human work but God's, revivifying the pallid bodies of the hungry and clothing the cold (Ep. 13, 14, cit., 95-96). Paulinus seems almost to lose sight of Pammachius so as to consider the spiritual values of charity, Paulina's true refrigerium*. The same theme of evangelical poverty informs the whole consolatio of Carm. 31. Witnessing to it himself, and thus persuasively, charity for him becomes a model of the Christian life, the person voluntarily poor for the love of Christ, to whom the kingdom of heaven is open. The rich man in the gospel, having refused alms to the poor Lazarus, was condemned to eternal fire (Ep. 13,6). Paulinus sees in divine justice, which restores to the poor what the rich had taken from him, a coherence hard to explain in human language. The poor man is in Abraham's bosom, the rich man in eternal fire (Carm. 31, 487-488). Paulinus exhorts Pneumatius and Fedelis to feel deeply the sufferings of the poor and to use their goods with benevolent piety. If Pneumatius and Fedelis wish to enjoy their dear Celsus forever, they must so act as to be admitted to the same heavenly dwelling as their son (Carm. 31, 535-544). In love for the poor we have an indissoluble link with Christ, and whoever has lived his earthly life in Christ will see eternal life in him (Carm. 31, 551-572). Pneumatius's and Fedelis's grief is excessive; it is a sin; those who live in God do not weep. He fixes attention on this with the sentence: impia pietas animam lugere beatam (Carm. 31, 45), immediately followed by another: gaudentem deo flere nocens amor est (Carm. 31, 46). These sentences are like the steps of the consolatio; Celsus enjoys in heavenly light what the living cannot even imagine. If Pneumatius and Fedelis will care for the poor, they can be united forever with their Celsus. It is the chain that binds them in an even closer kinship in the kingdom of heaven.

Many early Christian authors, Greek and Latin, used the consolatio, but none were able to attain the clear lines of Sts. Cyprian and Paulinus. With these Fathers the genre of consolatio marked a qualitative leap in the consideration of works of charity as of the greatest value for judgment beyond the grave. From this perspective not even *Gregory of Nazianzus contributed to the growth of this literary genre, since *eulogy ran away with him; the same must be said of *Gregory of Nyssa. The former, for *Basil the Great, and the latter, for *Macrina, take on other theological-spiritual contents that create other forms which depart from consolatio. *Ambrose recommends that the sisters of the dead emperor *Valentinian never forget him but always keep him in their hearts and minds. In De excessu fratris sui, Ambrose says that he will never be able to forget *Satyrus, having always borne the yoke of this life together. *Jerome too, writing his consolatory letter to *Paula on the death of her daughter *Blesilla, remains completely concentrated on Blesilla, because he will never again see a child like her. But here scholastic consolatory elements take over, which do not concern us since they are not strictly pertinent to Christian consolatio as a specific literary genre in its own right, with its own proper characteristics. Apart from some partial studies and the repetitive articles of dictionaries and encyclopedias, in the last decades up-to-date and thorough research has been lacking, both for consolatio and for the other literary genres found in the Fathers. A still useful work is Ch. Favez's La consolation latine chrétienne, Paris 1937, and a step forward was recently marked by G. Cannone's Elementi consolatori ed escatologici in alcune lettere di s. Agostino: RecTh 48 (1981) 59-77.

R.C. Gregg, Consolation Philosophy: Greek and Christian Paideia in Basil and the Two Gregories, Philadelphia 1975; Historisches Wörterbuch der Rhetorik, G. Ueding (ed.), Darmstadt 1992ff., 2, 367-373; J.H.D. Scourfield, Consoling Heliodorus: A Commentary on Jerome, Letter 60, Oxford 1993; Consolatio. Nuevos estudios, C. Alonso del Real (ed.), Pamplona 2001.

A. Quacquarelli

CONSTANS I, emperor (d. 350). Flavius Iunius Constans, younger son of *Constantine, Caesar from 333, acclaimed Augustus by the army, later ratified by senatorial acclamation on 9 September 337, with his two brothers *Constantine II and *Constantius II. In the partition of the empire, decided at the meeting of Viminacium, he obtained *Italy, *Africa and the diocese of *Macedonia, under the tutelage of Constantine II, after whose defeat in 340 he remained lord of the whole pars Occidentis and hence also—from the point of view of church politics—spokesman of *Nicene orthodoxy against the Eastern *Arianism supported by Constantius II. He also took up the fight against *Donatism in Africa without success, creating strong resentment among the *schismatics. His government—praised for strength and justice by the historians Aurelius Victor and Eutropius—encountered grave internal difficulties: a rebellion in *Gaul (expressing the social and economic hardships of peoples oppressed by taxation) was led by the semibarbarian Magnentius, who in 350 declared the emperor deposed and had him killed as he tried to flee to *Spain.

G. Gigli, La dinastia dei secondi Flavii: Costantino II, Costante, Costanzo II, Rome 1959; S. Mazzarino, L'impero romano, Bari ^{2}1973, 697-712; PLRE 1,220; G.A. Cecconi, Elemosina e propaganda. Un'analisi della "Macariana persecutio" nel III libro di Ottato di Milevi: REAug 36 (1990) 42-66; D. Kienast, Römische Kaisertabelle: Grundzüge einer römischen Kaiserchronologie, Darmstadt 1990, 312-313; P.O. Cuneo, La legislazione di Costantino II, Costanzo II e Costante (337-361), Milan 1997; Cambridge Ancient History, 13, Cambridge 1998, 1ff.

M. Forlin Patrucco

CONSTANS II, emperor (d. 668). Grandson of the *Byzantine emperor *Heraclius (d. 11 February 641), ascended the throne in September 641 aged 11, under the tutelage of the Senate; later called Pogonatus ("Bearded"). He tried without success to stop the advance of the Arabs, who conquered N Africa and sacked territories of Asia Minor; the civil war between Arabs saved the Byzantine Empire. Intolerant of limitations on his power, he had his brother Theodosius, rightful co-regent, killed in 660. Popular hatred of the "new Cain" was further fed by his cruel repression of *orthodox opponents of his religious policy—esp. *Maximus the Confessor and Pope *Martin, who had openly condemned the imperial edict of 648 (Typos) which forbade any discussion of Christ's will and energy (object of the monothelite controversy [see Monoenergism – Monothelitism])—and the abolition of Heraclius's Echthesis. In 642 he waged a campaign against the Arabs which hinged on the West, whose renewed strategic and economic importance was implicitly recognized as the center of Greek resistance in the Mediterranean: its total failure was followed by Constans II's assassination in 668 at *Syracuse, where the imperial capital had been transferred.

A.A. Vasiliev, History of the Byzantine Empire 324-1453, I, Madison-Milwakee ^{2}1964; P. Corsi, La spedizione italiana di Costante II, Bologna 1984; Id., La politica italiana di Costante II: Settimane di studio, Spoleto, 34 (1988) 751-796; J.F. Haldon, Byzantium in the Seventh Century: The Transformation of a Culture, Cambridge 1990; ODB 1, 598-603.

M. Forlin Patrucco

CONSTANTIA (d. 330). Flavia Julia Constantia, daughter of *Constantius Chlorus and *Theodora, stepdaughter of *Maximian and so half sister of *Constantine I. Married *Licinius in 313 at *Milan; an adherent of *Arianism, she maintained close relations with *Eusebius of Caesarea and with Arius himself, whose cause she pleaded with *Constantine. A letter from Eusebius to Constantia condemning the cult of images was presented at the Council of *Nicaea of 787 in support of the iconoclastic position.

PG 20, 1546; Rufinus, Hist. eccl. I, 11; Socrates, Hist. eccl. I, 60; Sozomen, Hist. eccl. II, 27; O. Seeck, PWK IV, 1, 958; PLRE 1, 221; H.-G. Thümmel, Eusebios' Brief an Kaiserin Constantia: Klio 66 (1984) 210-22; H.A. Pohlsander, Constantia: Ancient Society 24 (1993) 151-167.

M. Forlin Patrucco

CONSTANTIA or Constantina (d. 354). Daughter of *Constantine I and Fausta, older sister of *Constantius II; she first married Hannibalianus, son of Constantine's half brother (d. 337), then Caesar Gallus, brother of *Julian the Apostate. She built the famous mausoleum on the Via Nomentana at *Rome, to which her body was transported from *Bithynia, where she died in 354 (Ammianus 21,1,5).

F. Savio, Costantina figlia dell'imperatore Costantino Magno e la basilica di S. Agnese a Roma: AAT 42 (1907) 659-669, 732-741; various hagiographical legends associate Constantia with the martyr Agnes and present her as a virgin consecrated to God: see A. Amore, BS IV, 1964, 257-259; on the mausoleum, G. Matthiae, EC 4, 770-771, with bibl.; PLRE 1, 222 (Constantina); PCBE 2,466.

M. Forlin Patrucco

CONSTANTINE. Deacon and cartophylax ("archivist") of *Constantinople. Lived between 550 and 650. We possess his Eulogy of all the Martyrs partly cited, in favor of iconodulia, by *Nicaea II and included in the Greek lectionaries (Panegyrika) as a reading for the feast of All Saints.

PG 88, 480-528 (BHG 1191; CPG 7403); LTK 6, 497; Patrologia V, 92-93.

D. Stiernon

CONSTANTINE I, emperor (271/273–337). Flavius Valerius Constantinus, son of *Constantius Chlorus and *Helena, born at Naissus (Niŝ, Serbia) 27 February 271/273. He fought in *Galerius's campaign against the Persians and was at Galerius's court when Galerius and Constantius Chlorus became Augusti on *Diocletian's abdication in 305. In 306 he was allowed to join his father in *Britain; in June 306 Constantius died and Constantine was acclaimed emperor by the local troops at Eburacum (*York). He went to *Trier, where in 307 he married Fausta, daughter of the emperor *Maximian. The complex political situation, aggravated by the usurpation of *Maxentius and the maneuvers of Maxentius's father, the old Augustus Maximian, was briefly resolved by Constantine's nomination as Caesar with *Maximinus Daia, though both claimed and maintained the full dignity of Augusti. Constantine came into conflict with Maximian in 310 and defeated him near Marseille. Two years later he took up the war against the "usurper" Maxentius: entering *Italy, he broke resistance in the north with two victories at Turin and Verona, finally defeating his rival at the Milvian bridge near *Rome; Maxentius fled and drowned in the Tiber. A tradition—already established during his lifetime—had Constantine, after a vision, place the Christian monogram on his soldiers' shields before the battle as a guarantee of victory under the sign of Christ. The meaning of this gesture—whether it was truly a "conversion" from his previous sun-worship to Christianity—is hotly debated, but from then on he always favored the Christians, as is proved by the regulations issued immediately afterward, in 313, by the sole remaining emperors, Constantine and *Licinius, in favor of freedom of worship—the so-called *Edict of Milan. The agreement between the two Augusti did not last long: after initial hostilities in 314–316, which ended in Constantine's favor, Licinius was finally defeated in 324, first at Adrianople and then at Chrysopolis, and forced to abdicate: Constantine thus became sole Augustus of the empire, in a universal monarchy that expressed on earth, on the theological-political plane, the celestial monarchy of the one true God; in this sense his victory over Licinius was also the victory of Christianity, a punishment for the Eastern Augustus's policy of *persecution.

Constantine carried out important reforms in the various sectors of state administration. He multiplied palace officials, creating a bureaucratic centralization in line with the needs of an absolute government. He completed the separation, begun by Diocletian, of civilian and military commands. He increased the authority of the council of the princeps (consistorium), formalizing its functions. He reformed the army, creating two supreme commanders for infantry and cavalry, directly responsible to the emperor, and increasing the importance of mobile over frontier troops. He introduced a new strong currency, the gold solidus, in an attempt to halt inflation. And finally, he issued the first regulations aimed at preventing coloni and members of corporations from changing their work and curiales from escaping the economic burdens of their status.

But Constantine's most consequential activities were in the political-religious sphere; his "conversion," whatever complex motivations underlay it, was translated into a series of measures directly bound up with the Christianization of the empire, by creating structures capable of preserving the unity of the Christian church as essential to the unity of the state, legitimizing the monarchical form of the state by the *monotheistic religious principle of its heavenly archetype. In this direction tended the provisions in favor of the clergy, concession of ecclesiastical immunities, institution of episcopal tribunals for lay cases (Episcopalis Audientia), recognition of the legal validity of manumissio in ecclesia, *Sunday as a day of rest; but also the measures against *schisms and *heresies, and even the intervention against the *Donatists in *Africa (Councils of Rome of 313 and *Arles in 314) and the calling of the Council of *Nicaea in 325, to resolve the *Arian controversy, which threatened the unity of the ecclesia catholica. The meaning of the formula ἐπίσκοπος τῶν ἐκτός ("bishop of those outside"?) by which Constantine was designated, according to *Eusebius of Caesarea, has been discussed at length by modern critics: we must suppose that the emperor opposed—or rather compared—his own power over affairs (or persons) outside of the institution of the church to the power of the bishops over church affairs, thus fixing the relationship between church and empire. The abandonment of Rome as capital and the refounding of *Byzantium under the name of *Constantinople, destined to become the "new Rome," whose dedicatio took place in 330 with *pagan rites and Christian ceremonies, physically marked the break with *tradition and moved the empire's center of gravity to the East: but to some extent it also represented—esp. for the anti-Constantinian historical tradition—the creation of a Christian capital to the detriment of pagan Rome, which it drained of economic and human resources. The last years of Constantine's life saw an approach to *Arian positions: he was baptized by a bishop of Arian tendency shortly before his death near *Nicomedia in May 337.

Still fundamental is the old work of J. Burckhardt, Die Zeit Constantins des Grossen, Stuttgart 1852, It. tr. Florence 1957; A. Piganiol, L'empereur Constantin, Paris 1932; A.H.M. Jones, Constantine and the Conversion of Europe, London 1948; J. Vogt, RAC 3, 306-379; on the "conversion": H. Dörries, Das Selbstzeugnis Kaiser Constantins, Göttingen 1954; S. Calderone, Costantino e il Cattolicesimo, Florence 1962; R. MacMullen, Constantine, London 1969; A. Alföldi, Costantino tra paganesimo e cristianesimo, It. tr. Bari 1976; a useful anthology of ancient and modern historiography is in The Conversion of Constantine, J.W. Eadie (ed.), New York 1977; on Constantine's political theology: R. Farina, L'impero e l'imperatore cristiano in Eusebio di Cesarea. La prima teologia politica del Cristianesimo, Zürich 1966; on the policy of reform: S. Mazzarino, L'impero romano, Bari 21973, 651-697, with bibl.; I. König, Origo Constantini: Anonymus Valesianus, Trier 1987; Costantino il Grande, Dall'antichità all'Umanesimo, eds. G. Bonamente and V. Fusco, 2 vols., Macerata 1993; S.N.C. Lieu - D. Montserrat (eds.), Constantine: History, Historiography, and Legend, London 1998; H.A. Drake, Constantine and the Bishops: The Politics of Intolerance, Baltimore 2000; A. Di Berardino, La cristianizzazione del tempo nei secoli IV-V: la domenica: Augustinianum 42 (2002) 97-125; L. De Giovanni, L'imperatore Costantino e il mondo pagano, Naples [2]2003.

M. Forlin Patrucco

CONSTANTINE II, emperor (d. 340). Perhaps the illegitimate son of *Constantine I, born at *Arles in 317 and almost immediately proclaimed Caesar, acclaimed Augustus with his brothers *Constans I and *Constantius I; division of the empire gave him *Gaul, *Spain and *Britain, tutelage over his younger brother Constans and therefore a sort of control over his territories. Early in 340 he moved against Constans to secure his part of the empire, but the ill-prepared venture encountered great hostility in *Italy, reflected in the judgment of the historian Aurelius Victor; Constantine fell into an ambush near *Aquileia, was killed and thrown in the River Alsa; all his territory then went to Constans.

G. Gigli, La dinastia dei secondi Flavii: Costantino II, Costante, Costanzo II, Rome 1959; S. Mazzarino, L'impero romano, Bari [2]1973, 697ff.; PLRE 1, 223; D. Kienast, Römische Kaisertabelle: Grundzüge einer römischen Kaiserchronologie, Darmstadt 1990, 310-311; P.O. Cuneo, La legislazione di Costantino II, Costanzo II e Costante (337–361), Milan 1997; Cambridge Ancient History, vol. 13, Cambridge 1998, 1ff.

M. Forlin Patrucco

CONSTANTINE III, emperor. Raised to the throne by the legions of *Britain, from 407 to 411 he usurped imperial power in *Gaul. Attaining some successes against the *Vandals, he extended his dominion to *Spain and obtained recognition as Augustus from *Honorius. He established his residence at *Arles and nominated his oldest son Constans as Caesar; he tried to invade *Italy on the pretext of defending it from the *Goths but, betrayed by one of his generals stationed in Spain, was soon taken prisoner and handed over to Honorius, who had him put to death at *Ravenna (411).

PLRE II, 316-317; O. Seeck, Geschichte des Untergangs der antiken Welt, V, Berlin 1913, 379-408; VI, Stuttgart 1920, 41-50; J.B. Bury, History of the Later Roman Empire, I, London 1923, 188-194.

P. Marone

CONSTANTINE of Laodicea. *Monophysite bishop (d. 553). Formerly magister militiae, he was made bishop of *Laodicea (*Syria) in 510 and took part in the episcopal ordination of *Severus of Antioch in November 512. He was expelled from his see in 510 by Emperor *Justin for his opposition to the *Chalcedonian *Christology. In exile, mainly in *Egypt, he took part in the main manifestations of the monophysite challenge. Recalled to *Constantinople (after 535), he defended the tenets of monophysitism before *Justinian. In 553 the emperor asked him to give his signature, probably in approval of the Third Council of Constantinople (553); already full of years, Constantine died before giving it. Among monophysites he was venerated as a thaumaturge. His works, still unedited in their *Syriac transmission, are a letter to Mark the Isaurian, another to the "orthodox" (= monophysite) bishops and ecclesiastical canons. Fragments of Severus of Antioch's letters to him also survive.

CPG 7107, 7108, 7109 (p. 574), 7110; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie Antérieure au VIe siècle, Leuven 1954, 36-37; Patrologia V, 215-216.

D. Stiernon

CONSTANTINE of Siout (d. 640). One of the major writers of *Coptic literature, he lived sometime between 550 and 640, i.e., in the period when the anti-*Chalcedonian church in *Egypt enjoyed relative freedom and could reorganize its spiritual and hierarchical life (esp. under Bishop *Damian). Constantine was first a monk and traveled in the Holy Land. He was then consecrated bishop of the important center of Siout (Gk. Lycopolis, Ar. Assiut) in Middle Egypt. His major works are two encomia of *Athanasius and two of Claudius the martyr, in which what remained of an Egyptian historical and doctrinal culture emerges.

G. Garitte, Constantin évêque d'Assiout: Studies Crum, Boston 1950, 287-304; G. Godron, Textes coptes relatifs à Saint Claude d'Antioche, Turnhout 1970 (PO 35, 4); T. Orlandi, Constantini episcopi urbis Siout encomia in Athanasium duo, Louvain 1974 (CSCO 349-350); Patrologia V, 570-571; Coptic Encyclopedia 2, 590-593.

T. Orlandi

CONSTANTINOPLE (Istanbul)
I. City - II. Councils.

I. City. SE Europe and the Mediterranean world in general have, esp. in the last five centuries, undergone radical and decisive changes. Thus Constantinople, for a thousand years one of the most important centers of political and cultural life, has not just changed its ethnic character but also lost the role it played from *Late Antiquity to the mid-15th c. The political, administrative and cultural center of the Roman Empire, then of the *Byzantine Empire, with the Turkish conquest in 1453 Constantinople became the capital of the Turkish state. Since 1924, however, it has been a peripheral city of Turkey, since Ankara offers greater strategic advantages. From time immemorial Constantinople's marvelous geographical position has aroused ambitions of conquest. As early as 658 BC the Greek city of Megara founded the colony of Byzantion here on the Thracian Bosphorus, securing access to the less hospitable Euxine (Black) Sea. When in the early 4th c. AD western Europe's situation was made precarious by the invasions of Germanic peoples, *Constantine I (306–337) decided to transfer the capital to the East. After first inclining to *Serdica, a city near his native Naissos (modern Niš, Serbia), he opted for the old Byzantium, and the official inauguration took place 11 May 330. With the partition of the empire after the death of *Theodosius I (378–395), Theodosius's son *Honorius remained in the West (395–423), while his elder son *Arcadius (395–408) moved to the new capital.

The names applied to Constantinople had great significance for the fortunes of the capital on the Bosphorus. The new imperial see was named "City of Constantine" (Kōnstantinoupolis), while the old *pagan name was used very rarely, and never as an official name. The term "Byzantines" did not mean, as it does to us, the subjects of the empire in general, but the inhabitants of the capital. The prestige of the name Constantinople was such that, after the conquest of 1453, it prevailed even among the Turks, who, in official documents and even inscriptions on coins, called the capital Konstantiniya. But for centuries the Greek population simply called it ἡ Πόλις, i.e., "the city" par excellence—like Urbs for ancient *Rome—and the modern name Istanbul is derived from the popular expression εἰς τὴν Πόλιν (ad Urbem)—and not from a pre-etymology Islám-pól—just like Isnik from *Nicaea, Ismir from *Smyrna, Silistra = Is tin Dristra, for old Durostorum (medieval Bulgarian Dristra) on the Danube, etc. Since the Byzantines considered themselves the true successors of the old Roman Empire and sought to stress this continuity in various ways—hence their being called "Romans" or, in the Greek form, Romaioi—the capital was named Constantinople—New Rome, or even "city of the seven hills," Heptalophos or ἡ Νέα Ἑπτάλοφος, and as seat of the empire designated reigning city, ἡ βασιλεύουσα, whence the Slavs derived the name Carigrad (Tzarigrad), "city of the kings [of the sovereigns]," still used today among the Bulgarians, Serbs, etc. After the events of the early 13th c., when the Byzantines came into bitter conflict with the participants in the Fourth Crusade of 1203/1204 and close contacts were established with the European West, their awareness of the past was gradually obscured. This was partly a consequence of the great territorial losses, by which the frontiers of the empire now bounded only the regions inhabited by peoples of mainly Greek stock. The memory of ancient Rome was kept alive longer by the *patriarchate of Constantinople, since for centuries the head of the Greek church was called ἀρχιεπίσκοπος Κωνσταντινουπόλεως, Νέας Ῥώμης καὶ οἰκουμενικὸς πατριάρχης.

For its new dress as capital, the city underwent many changes, largely conceived with the aim of recalling the structure and organization of Rome on the Tiber. Thus its territory was divided into 14 regiones and, to attract more inhabitants, privileges equal to those of the citizens of Rome were granted. According to literary tradition, Constantine I built an imposing palace like that of the sovereigns of Rome: situated near the sea and finished in 337, the building was a synthesis of a Roman castrum and a *Hellenistic royal residence; this attempted amalgamation of Eastern and Roman influences characterized the whole artistic evolution of later times. Since the new capital was no less threatened by "barbarian" incursions than Rome had been, Constantine I saw to the defense not just of his own residence but also of the whole city, extending and reinforcing its existing walls. In subsequent decades the Constantinian wall showed itself insufficient and was modified and strengthened more than once. Under *Theodosius II (408–450), repair works were undertaken in 412–413 and, faced with the threat of the *Vandal fleet, in 439 the famous prefect of Constantinople, Cyrus, built the sea defense, with a double wall furnished with numerous towers (pyrgoi), part of which survive to this day. Under *Heraclius (610–641), another grave threat by Avars, Persians and Slavs forced the building of a defensive wall toward the Golden Horn.

Among the gates giving access to the city, we should mention the so-called Golden Gate used for triumphal processions. Many public and private palaces were built intending to imitate those of ancient Rome: thus the palace of the Blachernae, the palace called Bukoleon and the palace near the Springs, where there was a famous church dedicated to the Madonna. *Septimius Severus (193–211) built a hippodrome; Constantine I, after inaugurating the new capital, built a circus (xylokerkos) and a great hippodrome (now At Meydani) embellished with bronze statues and precious ornaments (324–330), and with a tribune for the emperor when he attended the entertainments (tragic events in the life of the empire took place here: the massacre of several thousand insurgents in the Nika insurrection of January 532 against the rule of *Justinian I [537–565]; the tragic triumph of *Justinian II [683–695, 705–711] over his rivals in 705). For the "birthday of the capital," 11 May 330, which became an official anniversary, Constantine had an image modeled in gilded wood which showed him with Tychē, or Winged Victory, in his right hand, an image later known as Anthousa ("flourishing").

Still with the aim of creating continuity with Rome on the Tiber, Constantine I set up a senate (bouleutērion or synklētos) at Constantinople, whose members—senators of Rome itself and some taken from provincial centers—enjoyed the same honors and privileges as Roman senators. Of the new city's various squares, we should mention the famous Forum Constantini, designed to become the true center of the capital: the statue of Helios, now transformed into an image of Constantine, was erected there on a porphyry column. Finally the capital was enriched with works of art, transported from the provinces and even from Rome (a famous statue of Apollo, the tripod of Pythia etc.). To satisfy the material needs of the population, the emperor *Valens (364–378) built an imposing aqueduct which still survives in part. Constantine I renovated the old baths of Zeuxippus; appropriate xenones were built for foreigners, the poor and the sick, and hospices for the old (gerokomeia).

Constantinople's population grew rapidly from the start, but any calculation is approximate: in the mid-6th c. it may have had three or four hundred thousand inhabitants, which would make it one of the most populous cities of the time. Such a multitude of people led to grave economic and political problems: devout and obedient to the authorities, the popular voice was expressed through the so-called circus parties or four factions, of which the most influential were the so-called Venetoi ("blues") and Prasinoi ("greens"), often in bitter mutual conflict, but sometimes in revolt against the sovereignty of the emperors.

In his new imperial capital, Constantine found a population of varied ethnic stock, whose beliefs were largely *pagan and only partly converted to faith in Christ. Legend attributes the origin of the Christian church there to the *apostle *Andrew and his disciple Stachys. The first Christian community at Byzantion, set up in the mid-2nd c., long remained under the jurisdiction of Heraclea (Perinthus) in *Thrace. At the start of the 4th c. it seems to have been well established; its Bishop Mitrophanes

(ca. 306/307–314) is attested by authentic sources. At the Council of Constantinople (381) the see of the capital was accorded not just the name New Rome but also second place after Rome on the Tiber, a position confirmed at *Chalcedon in 451.

The series of bishops who succeeded Mitrophanes can be established with great probability, though struggles between Catholics (orthodox) and *heretics disturbed religious life more than once, esp. over the *Arian doctrine. After the unhappy death of Emperor *Valens (9 August 378), the bishopric of Constantinople was held by *Gregory of Nazianzus (379–381), who took part in the council of 381 and then retired to solitude in *Cappadocia, unable to endure the internal struggles and intrigues. In 398 he was succeeded by *John called "Chrysostom" ("golden mouth"), renowned for his eloquence and great erudition; his intransigence and moral severity soon drew the hatred of both the heretical *Goths and the empress *Eudoxia ("the new Herodias"), and he was sent into exile in Asia Minor (404), where, after a fruitless intervention on his behalf by Rome, he died in 407. This tragic episode was a heavy blow to the prestige of the church of Constantinople. Yet the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the capital—thanks especially to its political authority—managed to expand not just in Thrace but also in the East, to the detriment of *Antioch and *Alexandria. This was the outcome of a bitter rivalry that would endure until the Arab conquest in the 1st half of the 7th c. The Council of Chalcedon in 451 not only decided on the deposition of *Dioscorus, patriarch of Alexandria, but also confirmed the prerogatives of Constantinople, it being the imperial seat, residence of the emperor and senate, like old Rome (can. 28). This canon was not approved by Rome, still less by the patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria.

Certain innovations—like the creation of the so-called permanent synod as a body of bishops residing at the capital, recognized at the council of 451—facilitated the intervention of the imperial power in the affairs of the church. One consequence of the extension of Constantinople's jurisdiction in the East was a further deterioration of relations with Rome. In the period between 484 and 519 the two churches lived in mutual *schism, which ended only in the reign of *Justin I (518–527) and *Justinian I (527–565), but in a precarious manner. Toward the end of the 6th c. a new conflict arose over the title "ecumenical (universal) patriarch," usurped by Constantinople against Rome, presaging a further separation between East and West. The great religious crisis in the Eastern Roman Empire in the course of the 7th and 8th c., with the spread of *monophysite, *monothelite and then, between 726 and 843, iconoclastic doctrines dug an even deeper chasm between the two centers of Christianity. Some territorial changes—like the annexation of E Illyricum to the possessions of the Eastern empire, the establishment of Eastern power in S *Italy and Sicily, until then under the ecclesiastical supremacy of Rome, at the time of Justinian I—worsened relations. Mutually estranged, only rarely in contact and knowing each other less and less, the two parts of what was the Roman Empire took different paths of political and cultural development.

Constantinople's tendency to rivalry with Rome was manifested even in the 4th c. by the systematic accumulation in churches of *martyrs' *relics and sacred objects, in the presumption that this would give the new political and ecclesiastical see the charis, or "divine grace," that was lacking in its origin. Thus began the translation to Constantinople of relics, authentic and false, a practice begun by Constantine and followed by his successors. A long and documented list of churches and relics was published by P.R. Janin (1969); we mention Constantine's Church of the Holy Apostles, where precious relics were collected; the Church of the Non-Arian Goths (2nd half of 4th c.); the Anastasis, where Gregory of Nazianzus officiated in the last quarter of the 4th c.; St. Mary of the Blachernae, famous throughout the Middle Ages, built by the empress *Pulcheria ca. 450–453; two churches dedicated in the 5th c. to St. Irene. The great *monasteries included St. Bethlehem, work of the empress *Helena; the monastery of the Akoimetoi (*Acoemetae), ca. 420, built by a Syrian monk; the monastery tou Dalmatou, late 4th c.; the monastery of St. Alexandria (Alexander?) in the time of Theodosius I; the monastery of the Egyptians, 1st half of 5th c. In the 6th c. the monasteries of St. Bassus; St. Venantius; St. Dometius the Persian; the monastery of the Bessi, a Thracian tribe partly converted to Christianity; St. Asterius; and others were built. The most famous of Constantinople's churches, Hagia Sophia ("holy wisdom") or the "Great Church," is linked to the see of the orthodox patriarchate. Built, according to a legendary tradition, by Constantine, more reliable evidence attributes it to *Constantius II (337–361): burned down in the great revolt of 532, it was splendidly rebuilt and decorated under Justinian I.

The history of Constantinople in every century from the 7th to 1453, when the capital was conquered by the Turks, reflects all the vicissitudes of the Byzantine Empire as a whole. Gravely menaced in 626 by the siege of the Avars, Persians and Slavs, then more than once by the assaults and incursions of the Bulgars, esp. at the start of the 9th and 10th c., and in particular in the time of King Simeon (893–927), the city always put up an effective resistance. In 1203–1204 it was conquered, for the first time in its history, by the participants in the Fourth Crusade, who partly destroyed and mercilessly sacked it. The capture of Constantinople at the end of May 1453 put an end to the existence of the Byzantine Empire, but not to Byzantine civilization, esp. in its literary and artistic forms; Constantinople, the main center of that civilization, survived as "Byzantium after Byzantium," even after the disappearance of the state as a political and military unit.

EC 4, 732-766; Cath 3, 102-117; DHGE 13, 626-768; EAA 2, 880-919; RBK 4, 366-594; LMA 5, 1387-1393; LTK³ 6, 306-311; EAA² 2, 318-323; EAM 5, 391-436; Comte Riant, Exuviae sacrae Constantinopolitanae, I-II, Geneva 1877-1878; Th. Preger, Scriptores originum Constantinopolitanorum, I-II, Leipzig 1901, 1907; H. Delehaye, Synaxarium ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae: Propylaeum ad AASS Nov., Brussels 1902; Ch. Diehl, Constantinople, Paris 1924; A.M. Schneider, Byzanz, Vorarbeiten zur Topographie und Archäologie der Stadt, Berlin 1936; Id., Konstantinopel. Gesicht und Gestalt einer geschichtlichen Weltmetropole, Mainz-Berlin 1956; R. Janin, Constantinople byzantine. Développement urbain et répertoire topographique, Paris 1950; Id., La géographie ecclésiastique de l'Empire byzantin, I, Le siège de Constantinople et le patriarcat œcuménique, 3, Les églises et les monastères, Paris 1969; E. Fenster, Laudes constantinopolitanae, Munich 1968; J. Jarry, Hérésies et factions dans l'Empire byzantin du IVe au VIIe siècle, Le Caire 1968; R. Guilland, Études de topographie de Constantinople byzantine, I-II, Berlin-Amsterdam 1969; G. Dagron, Naissance d'une capitale. Constantinople et ses institutions de 330 à 451, Paris 1974 (It. tr., Turin 1991); F. Baldovin, The Urban Character of Christian Worship: The Origins, Development, and Meaning of Stational Liturgy, Rome 1987; G. Dagron, Constantinople. Les sanctuaires et l'organisation de la vie religieuse, in Actes du XIe Congrès Intern. d'archéologie chrétienne, II, Rome 1989, 1069-1085; U. Peschlow, Konstantinopel und Kleinasien, in Actes du XIe Congrès Intern. d'archéologie chrétienne, II, Rome 1989, 1563-1619; Costantinopoli e l'arte delle province orientali, eds. F. de' Maffei - C. Barsanti - A. Guiglia Guidobaldi, Rome 1990; Les saints et leur sanctuaire à Byzance: textes, images et monuments, publié par C. Jolivet-Lévy - M. Kaplan - J.-P. Sodini, Paris 1993; C. Mango - G. Dagron (eds.), Constantinople and Its Hinterland, Oxford 1995; P. Magdalino, Constantinople médiévale: études sur l'évolution des structures urbaines, Paris 1996; C. Mango, Studies on Constantinople, Aldershot 1993; Id., The Art of the Byzantine Empire, 312-1453, Toronto 1986; Id., Byzantium: The Empire of New Rome, London 1998; The Chronicle of Theophanes Confessor: Byzantine and Near Eastern History, A.D. 284-813, tr. with intr. and comm. by C. Mango and R. Scott, Oxford 1997; R. Krautheimer, Tre capitali cristiane: topografia e politica, Turin 2002; G. Vespignani, Il Circo di Costantinopoli nuova Roma, Spoleto 2001; The Oxford history of Byzantium, C. Mango (ed.), Oxford 2002.

I. Dujčev

II. Councils.

335/336. After the condemnation of *Athanasius by the Council of *Tyre, confirmed by *Constantine, many bishops from *Asia, *Bithynia, *Phrygia, *Cappadocia, *Pontus and *Thrace met to judge *Marcellus of Ancyra, an ardent anti-*Arian. The doctrine professed by Marcellus was of a radical *monarchian tendency, for which he was condemned and deposed. We do not know where Constantine exiled him. Bishop *Paul of Constantinople was also deposed and exiled at about this time. He too passed for a victim of the Arians, but his deposition was due to reasons of public order.

360. This council, willed by *Constantius and attended by bishops almost exclusively from regions close to the capital (but Ulfilas was there), confirmed the results of the Council of *Rimini (359), favoring *homoians and moderate Arians: it published a formula of faith of the same tenor as that of Rimini and condemned the main spokesmen of both the *homoiousians and the radical Arians (*anomoians). The main victim among the latter was *Aetius; among the former, *Basil of Ancyra, *Eustathius of Sebaste, *Eleusius of Cyzicus, *Silvanus of Tarsus and *Macedonius of Constantinople. *Eudoxius, leader of the moderate Arians, was transferred from *Antioch to replace Macedonius.

335-336: Hfl-Lecl 1, 667-678, 688; E. Schwartz, Gesammelte Schriften 3, 230-239; Simonetti 131-133; J.T. Lienhard, Marcellus of Ancyra in Modern Research: Theologische Studien 43 (1982) 486-503; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318-381, Edinburgh 1988, 284ff.; K. Seibt, Die Theologie des Markell von Ankyra, Berlin 1994.

360: Hfl-Lecl 1, 956-959; Simonetti 338-342.

M. Simonetti

381. *Theodosius I (b. 347), of Spanish origin like his contemporary Pope *Damasus, was invested with the purple by Emperor *Gratian in 379. After defeating the *Goths, he promulgated at *Thessalonica, 28 February 380, the edict De fide catholica, imposing the Nicene formula of faith on his subjects as a dogmatic rule. After his solemn entry into Constantinople on 24 November 380, he immediately published, in late 380 or early 381, a decree of convocation for a synod of bishops of the Eastern empire. Opened in the imperial palace in May 381, it lasted until the end of July. About 150 bishops were present, including *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Gregory of Nyssa, *Meletius, *Cyril of Jerusalem, *Diodore of Tarsus and *Peter of Sebaste. The delegation of 71 bishops from the civil dioceses of the East was led by Meletius, bishop of the most important of the Antiochene Christian communities, who was also designated president of the synod. The Alexandrians, led by *Timothy, were absent from the opening of the synod. *Paulinus of Antioch deliberately did not come. At the emperor's wish a group of 36 so-called *Macedonian bishops had also been invited, led by *Eleusius of Cyzicus and Martin of Lampsacus, against whose ideas the synod later pronounced.

*Macedonius had occupied the see of Constantinople from 341/342 to 360. For reasons still unknown, he gave his name to the theological current of the time which denied the true divinity of the *Holy Spirit and whose opinions *Athanasius was the first to mention and refute in his Letters to Serapion, written 356–360. These pneumatomachi,* later called Macedonians, were not necessarily in line with the anti-Nicene parties. They taught that the Holy Spirit, unlike the Son whom they recognized as true God, was inferior in dignity, a minister, an interpreter, an angel. The Synod of *Alexandria convened by Athanasius in 362 had explicitly proclaimed that the Holy Spirit was equal to the Father and the Son. Around 370, *Basil of Caesarea had opposed the Arian *Eunomius with the same doctrine, which he then (in 374) developed in his treatise On the Holy Spirit. Meanwhile, after *Gratian's accession in 379, the Macedonian party organized itself into a real faction. Its main promoters were *Eustathius of Sebaste, *Eleusius of Cyzicus and *Marathonius, who had earlier been a wealthy employee of the magistrate's court; on Eustathius's advice he became a monk and founded a *monastery at Constantinople, having already founded a hospital there. The remnants of the Nicene community in the capital, where for four decades the bishops had been Arianizers, acquired a bishop in the person of Gregory of Nazianzus, who from 370 preached in the small church of the Anastasis.

After the opening of the synod of 381, the bishops of the majority, led and urged on by Theodosius, sought to obtain a unanimity in favor of the divinity of the Holy Spirit. But the Macedonians did not give way. A "tome" was composed in which the conciliar Fathers professed their faith and condemned the recent *heresies. This synodal letter is lost, but its essential contents can be reconstructed from another document, issued by the Synod of Constantinople of 382, and from the remaining canons of the council of 381. The Fathers professed the one substance (ousia) of the Father, the Son and the Spirit; they rejected the confusion of hypostases made by *Sabellius; and they ruled out any heterogeneity, thus condemning Eunomius and the other Arians. In short, their tomos contained a profession of faith, which is a true creed. Gregory of Nazianzus was recognized as legitimate bishop of the capital. But before the end of May, Meletius died. Theodosius attended his funeral in person. His death complicated the settlement of the *schism of Antioch and released such passions among the synodal members that Gregory himself, whose warnings were ill-understood and whose own enthronement was contested, resigned. *Nectarius, an old senator not yet baptized, was chosen to succeed him: he was quickly baptized and consecrated bishop, remaining so until his death in 397.

The canons of Constantinople I make clear the legal measures that were debated and finally approved at that council. Canon 1, after appealing to the Council of Nicaea of 325, condemns "all heresy and particularly that of the Eunomians or *anomoians, that of the *Arians or Eudoxians, and that of the semi-Arians or pneumatomachi; at the same time it condemns the heresies of the Sabellians, Marcellians, *Photinians and *Apollinarists." Canon 2 gives order to the limits of the bishops' jurisdictions in their own dioceses. Canon 3 says: "The bishop of Constantinople must have primacy of honor after the bishop of *Rome, since Constantinople is the new Rome." Canon 4 nullifies the consecration of *Maximus the Cynic, surreptitiously prepared by *Peter II of Alexandria, who had always wanted Maximus to replace Gregory of Nazianzus as bishop of Constantinople. The greatest political reverberations were reserved for canon 3. Flaunted at *Chalcedon in 451, where "the creed of the 150 Fathers" of 381 was also read during the second session, it contributed to putting Theodosius's synod of 381 on the level of "second ecumenical council." In fact, the creed attributed to the 150 bishops had already existed in 374 (Epiph., Ancoratus); in 381 they were content to promulgate it. It repeated the creed of 325, and to the Nicene formula "and in the Holy Spirit" it added the words "Lord [to kyrion], giver of life, proceeding from the Father [ek tou Patros ekporeuomenon], who with (syn) the Father and the Son is together worshiped and glorified [symproskynoumenon], and has spoken through [dia] the prophets."

The Fathers of Constantinople I departed on 9 July 381 after sending Theodosius a synodal letter. An imperial edict of 30 July 381 required the churches to be given back to the *orthodox. The Arian crisis and its final glimmers in the East now belonged to the past.

CPG IV, 8602-8604; A. Harnack, Konstantinopolitanisches Symbol: RE XI, 12-28; J. Tixeront, Histoire des dogmes II, Paris 1921, 85-132; E. Schwartz, Das Nicaenum und das Constantinopolitanum auf der Synode von Chalkedon: ZNTW 26 (1926) 38-88; I. Ortiz de Urbina, La struttura del simbolo Costantinopolitano: OCP 12 (1946) 275-285; J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds, London 1950; V. Monachino, Genesi storica del canone 28° di Calcedonia: Gregorianum 33 (1952) 261-292; H. Herman, Chalkedon und die Ausgestaltung des konstantinopolitanischen

Primats, in A. Grillmeier, H. Bacht, Das Konzil von Chalkedon II, Würzburg 1952, 459-463; N.Q. King, The Emperor Theodosius and the Establishment of Christianity, London 1961; I. Ortiz de Urbina, Nicée et Constantinople, Hist. des Conciles Oecum. I, Paris 1963; B. Kötting, Die abendländischen Teilnehmer an den ersten allgemeinen Konzilien, in Reformata, Festgabe für Hubert Jedin I, Münster 1965, 1-21; R. Metz, L'intervention de Théodose au 2e concile œcuménique (Constantinople 381), Études d'histoire du droit canonique d. à Gabriel Le Bras, Paris 1965, 651-664; A.M. Ritter, Das Konzil von Konstantinopel und Sein Symbol. Studien zur Geschichte und Theologie des 2. ökumenischen Konzils, Göttingen 1965; G.L. Dossetti, Il Simbolo di Nicea e di Constantinopoli, critical ed., Rome 1967; D.L. Holland, The Creeds of Nicea and Constantinople Reexamined: ChH 38 (1969) 248-261; B. Schultze, Das Nicaenoconstantinopolitanum und das Filioque: OCP 35 (1969) 334-346; H.J. Sieben, Zur Entwicklung der Konzilsidee, II: Die fides Nicaena als Auktoritätsidee nach dem Zeugnis vorephesinischen Schrifttums: ThPh 46 (1971) 40-70; J. Kunze, Das Nizänisch-Konstantinopolitanische Symbol, Leipzig 1898 = Aalen 1972; W. Beinert, Das Glaubensbekenntnis der Ökumene. Eine Auslegung des grossen (nizäno-konstantinopolitanischen) Glaubensbekenntnisses, Freiburg (Schweiz) 1973; TRE 19, 518-524; B. Schultze, Die Pneumatologie des Symbols von Konstantinopel als abschliessende Formulierung der griechischen Theologie (381-1981): OCP 47 (1981) 5-54; A.M. Ritter, The Dogma of Constantinople (381) and Its Reception within the Churches of the Reformation: ITQ 48 (1981) 228-232; P. Chrestou, The Ecumenical Character of the First Synod of Constantinople, 381: GOTR 27 (1982) 359-374; D.J. Constantelos, Toward the Convocation of the Second Ecumenical Synod: GOTR 27 (1982) 395-405; A. de Halleux, Pour une profession commune de la foi selon l'esprit des Pères: RTL 15 (1984) 275-296; Id., "Hypostase" et "personne" dans la formation du dogme trinitaire (ca. 375-381): RHE 79 (1984) 313-369; 625-676; Id., Personnalisme ou essentialisme trinitaire chez les Pères cappadociens? Une mauvaise controverse: RTL 17 (1986) 129-155; 265-292; P. L'Huillier, Faits et fictions à propos du deuxième concile œcuménique: Église et théologie 13 (1982) 135-156; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318-381, Edinburgh 1988; D. Spada, Le confessioni di fede da Nicea a Costantinopoli, Rome 1988; L. Perrone, in Storia dei concili ecumenici, ed. G. Alberigo, Bologna 1990, 57-70; R. Staats, Die römische Tradition in Symbol von 381 (NC) und seine Entstehung auf der Synode von Antiochien 379: VChr 44 (1990) 209-222; L.D. Davis, The First Seven Ecumenical Councils (325-787), Collegeville 1990, 81-133 (It. tr. Storia e cronaca dei sette concili che definirono la dottrina cristiana, Casale Monf. 1998); Conciliorum Oecumenicorum decreta, ed. G. Alberigo, Bologna 1991, 20-35; R. Staats, Das Glaubensbekenntnis von Nizäa-Konstantinopel: historische und theologische Grundlagen, Darmstadt 1996; P. L'Huillier, The Church of the Ancient Councils, Crestwood 1996, 101-142.

Ch. Kannengiesser

382. In summer 382 a number of Eastern bishops met at Constantinople at Theodosius's invitation to resolve the cases of *Maximus the Cynic and *Paulinus of Antioch, on which East and West disagreed: *Ambrose still considered the discredited Maximus the legitimate bishop of Constantinople, and the entire West and *Egypt considered Paulinus the bishop of Antioch, while the East had elected *Nectarius and *Flavian to those sees. The bishops examined a letter from *Damasus inviting them to a council at *Rome to decide the two questions. They made excuses for declining, reaffirmed the validity of the Nicene-Constantinopolitan creed understood in the light of the Basilian interpretation, which distinguished in the Trinity one divine ousia ("essence, substance") articulated in three hypostases, and expressed themselves decisively in favor of Nectarius and Flavian. This council is thought to have published two canons, later erroneously added to the four canons of the 381 council as canons 5 and 6: one related to the *schism of *Antioch and the other to the conciliar procedure to be followed in cases of accusations brought against bishops.

394. Some bishops including *Theophilus of Alexandria and Flavian of Antioch met under the presidency of Nectarius, bishop of Constantinople, to decide the case of Bagadius of Bostra, who had been deposed by a tribunal of only two bishops and replaced by Agapius. They laid down that a bishop could only be deposed by a council.

ca. 400. Some 20 local bishops met under the presidency of *John Chrysostom. Antoninus of *Ephesus was accused of having ordained bishops for money. A three-man commission of inquiry was set up, but Antoninus died before its conclusion. The procedure of this council was not completely regular, since Chrysostom was interfering in the affairs of another diocese; this was brought against him at the Synod of the *Oak.

404. John Chrysostom, deposed and exiled after the Synod of the Oak, had shortly after been recalled to his see by popular clamor, but his enemies continued to maneuver against him, supported by Emperor *Arcadius. In January 404 a council of ca. 90 bishops, about half favorable to John and half against him, met. Against his return, canon 4 of the Council of Antioch of ca. 327 was produced, which established that a deposed bishop could only resume his functions if rehabilitated by a new council. Arcadius arrogated to himself the decision on the case and again had Chrysostom extruded and sent into exile.

426. The bishops meeting at Constantinople to consecrate *Sisinnius as bishop (28 Feb) subscribed to an encyclical letter in which Sisinnius denied that *Messalians caught professing their ideas even after condemnation could be readmitted to ecclesiastical communion.

431. On 5 October 431 the priest *Maximinus was elected bishop of Constantinople to replace *Nestorius. He and the bishops meeting for his consecration sent letters transmitting the acts of the Council of *Ephesus to other sees, with news of the new election. A letter was also sent to Pope *Celestine. We also know of a subsequent council which deposed *Helladius of Tarsus, *Eutherius of Tyana and other bishops who supported Nestorius.

ca. 443. A council, presided over by Bishop *Proclus of Constantinople and including *Cyril of Alexandria, judged the cases of Athanasius of Perrhes and Alexander of Antaradus. The former having been deposed by his clergy, *Domnus of Antioch was asked to intervene in the matter; the latter, whose election had aroused opposition, was declared fit to hold the office.

448. On 8 November 448 Flavian convoked the bishops present at Constantinople to resolve a question relating to disputes between Florentinus of Sardis and two of his suffragans. On this occasion *Eusebius of Dorylaeum, who had earlier accused Nestorius, brought an accusation against the monk *Eutyches, charging him with errors in *Christology. Eutyches appeared, only after repeated summons, on 22 November. His claim to recognize two natures in Christ before the union, but only one after, was identified as erroneous, and he was condemned and deposed from his priestly and *monastic dignities. This act marked the beginning of the *monophysite crisis.

449. On 19 April 449 a local council met to examine a protest by Eutyches that the acts of the council which condemned him had been falsified. After close examination it was decided that there had been no falsification, though the acts had not been drawn up with much care.

449/450. A local council held under *Anatolius withdrew certain cities from the jurisdiction of the bishop of *Tyre and transferred them to that of Berytus (Beirut).

450. In November 450 a local council presided over by Anatolius approved *Leo's letter concerning christology and anathematized the errors of Nestorius and Eutyches.

457. At *Alexandria, Bishop *Proterius had been murdered, and the monophysites had elected *Timothy Ailouros in his place. In the face of protests against this violence and the defense of the Egyptian monophysites, Emperor *Leo asked for the opinion of the Eastern bishops, who met in numerous provincial councils. The council at Constantinople, at which Anatolius presided and, as usual, those bishops passing through the capital took part, declared Timothy's election null and confirmed the validity of the decisions of *Chalcedon.

ca. 458. A council, presided over by patriarch *Gennadius, censured and invalidated certain episcopal elections held in *Galatia and condemned the authors of these actions.

477. In the context of the antimonophysite reaction that followed the end of *Basiliscus's usurpation and *Zeno's resumption of the throne, a council presided over by Bishop *Acacius of Constantinople declared *Peter the Fuller, bishop of Antioch, and Paul of Ephesus condemned and deposed.

482. A local council, presided over by Acacius, accepted Zeno's Henoticon*.

492 and 496. In 492 Patriarch *Euphemius convoked the bishops present at Constantinople, got the validity of the deliberations of Chalcedon confirmed and entered relations with *Gelasius of Rome in an attempt to resolve the *Acacian schism. For this and other reasons he attracted the wrath of the emperor *Anastasius, who had him deposed by a council called in 496.

497/498. *Macedonius, elected patriarch of Constantinople in place of the deposed Euphemius, subscribed to the Henoticon, for which many monks of the capital broke off communion with him. To heal the breach he called a local council, which confirmed the validity of the Chalcedonian decrees and kept silent about the Henoticon. The surviving records of these events are not very coherent.

518. In the antimonophysite reaction that took place at Constantinople after Emperor *Justin's election, Patriarch *John II, faced with requests from the people and monks, convoked ca. 40 bishops who were in Constantinople at the time. The metropolitan of Heraclea presided in the absence of John, who was represented. The names of patriarchs Euphemius and Macedonius and of Pope Leo were restored to the *diptychs, the validity of the Council of Chalcedon was recognized and *Severus of Antioch was condemned.

530/531. Following a protest against the election of the layman *Stephen as bishop of Larissa in Thessaly, Patriarch *Epiphanius of Constantinople summoned Stephen to the capital and, despite his appeal to the pope's authority, had him deposed by a local council. This incident took place during the dispute between Rome and Constantinople over the rights claimed by both sees over Illyricum.

536. In this year the arrival of Pope *Agapetus at Constantinople led to the end of *Justinian's promonophysite policy and, consequently, the deposition of Patriarch *Anthimus, whom that policy had favored. At the request of Agapetus and many monks of Constantinople, the new patriarch, *Menas, called a local council in which bishops and clergy who had accompanied Agapetus also took part. Because of the pope's unexpected death, the council could not meet until 2 May. It condemned Anthimus, Severus of Antioch and his followers.

543. At Justinian's request, Patriarch Menas called a local council. It took note of a very severe letter from the emperor against *Origenism, which enjoyed great popularity in many Palestinian *monasteries. The letter, which concluded with 10 anathemata relating to the more radical aspects of *Origen's doctrine, was approved, and Origen and his followers condemned. This letter should not be confused with the anti-Origenian letter sent by Justinian to the council of 553.

553. This council, the fifth ecumenical, was called by Justinian at the request of Pope *Vigilius, who had been forcibly brought to Constantinople to approve the condemnation of the *Three Chapters required by the emperor. Sometime before the council opened, Justinian sent the conciliar fathers a letter condemning Origenism. The letter's 15 anathemata condemned not so much Origen's genuine doctrine as the more extremist Origenism of the 6th c. The council, however, which opened 5 May in a hall attached to the basilica of Hagia Sophia, with ca. 150 bishops under the presidency of Patriarch *Eutychius of Constantinople, dealt only with the question of the Three Chapters. Vigilius took no part in its work, though he was repeatedly asked to, citing his poor health as an excuse: in fact he was still trying to avoid assenting to the condemnation. On 14 May he published on the subject the Constitutum, which was also subscribed to by 16 Italian bishops who, like him, had abstained from participating: in the document Vigilius condemns 60 propositions taken from the writings of *Theodore of Mopsuestia but refused to anathematize the memory of a dead man, which obviously included *Theodoret and *Ibas. The council however, in the sessions of 17 and 19 May, sanctioned the legitimacy of condemning men who had died in error; on 26 May it examined a series of documents produced by Justinian, aimed at showing that on several earlier occasions Vigilius had condemned the Three Chapters and, at the emperor's request, struck the pope's name from the diptychs, though without condemning him. In the final sitting of 2 June (8th session), it published 14 anathemata condemning the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus's statements hostile to *Cyril of Alexandria and the Council of Ephesus of 431, and *Ibas of Edessa's letter to *Maris. At the same time it reaffirmed the validity of the first four ecumenical councils, hence also that of Chalcedon. Vigilius, who remained at Constantinople, sick, approved the condemnation of the Three Chapters on 8 December and confirmed this with a second Constitutum on 23 February 554.

ca. 588 and ca. 592. These two councils are recorded mainly because Patriarch *John IV of Constantinople, in judging various accusations against *Gregory of Antioch (ca. 588) and various priests and monks accused of *heresy (ca. 592), attributed to himself the title "Ecumenical Patriarch," which led to protests first from Pope *Pelagius II and then from *Gregory the Great.

638–639. Late in 638, just after *Heraclius's publication of the Ekthesis, which imposed the *monothelite doctrine, Patriarch *Sergius of Constantinople, whom this formula had inspired and favored, called a local council, which approved it. Sergius died on 9 December; as soon as he was elected, his successor *Pyrrhus called another council, January 639, which confirmed the approval.

680–681. This council, the 6th ecumenical, was called on 10 September 680 by Emperor Constantine IV, after agreements reached with Pope *Agatho, in order to resolve the *monoenergist and monothelite crisis. It was called *in Trullo, Trullian, from the domed hall (trullos) of the imperial palace, where sessions were held. The council opened on 7 November 680 in the presence of 43 Eastern bishops, including Patriarch George of Constantinople and Macarius, patriarch of Antioch but resident at Constantinople, as well as a three-man delegation from Rome. The emperor presided in person over the first 11 of the council's 18 sessions. The reading of the acts of the 4th and 5th ecumenical councils and of Leo's Tomus ad Flavianum, done to put the monothelite controversy into historical perspective, permitted the discovery of an *apocryphal text (Menas of Constantinople's letter to Pope Vigilius) by which, at the start of the controversy, Sergius of Constantinople had set great store, as supporting his monothelite doctrine. This was defended at the council by Macarius, who adduced a copious patristic *florilegium in support of it: according to him, to admit two wills in Christ was to fall back into *Nestorianism. Once the partiality of the collections he produced had been recognized, Macarius, who persisted in his ideas, was condemned and deposed (sessions of 20 and 22 March 681). After other discussions of lesser importance, in the final two sessions (11 and 16 September) the council's final document was drawn up. It was subscribed to in the emperor's presence by the participants, whose numbers had risen to 164. The council condemned the main supporters, living and dead, of monoenergism and monothelitism, including *Sergius of Constantinople, *Cyrus of Alexandria, *Honorius of Rome and Macarius himself. In its profession of faith it confirmed that as Christ has two natures, so he has two perfectly harmonious wills and two inseparable energies.

692. This council was called by *Justinian II to supplement the decrees of the 5th and 6th ecumenical councils by disciplinary rules: for this reason it was called Quinisext, and (like the 6th) in Trullo from the room in which the meetings were held. It opened on 1 September 692 in the presence of the emperor and over 200 Eastern bishops or their representatives; Bishop *Sergius of Rome was represented by three delegates. 102 canons were promulgated, touching on all fields of religious life and discipline, which was acknowledged to be very lax, even among the clergy. Some of the decisions sanctioned Eastern customs which differed from the Roman, e.g., can. 13, on married deacons and priests. Can. 36 confirmed the rights of Constantinople as second in hierarchical order after Rome and endowed with the same authority. The canons were all subscribed to, even by the papal representatives, but at Rome Sergius disowned their actions and would not accept the copy of the acts sent to him, because of can. 36 and the canons sanctioning customs contrary to Roman discipline.

754. Constantine V, the iconoclast emperor, called a council which opened 10 February in the palace of Hieria. This council, called the 7th ecumenical, was attended by 338 Eastern bishops presided over, in the vacancy of the see of Constantinople, by Theodosius of Ephesus. The Roman delegates were absent. The council condemned the cult of images, though forbidding any profanation or destruction of sacred buildings; but it did not accept the ideas of the emperor, who denied the validity of the intercession of the saints and of the Virgin, and it confirmed the validity of such intercession. From 8 August, the council held its sessions in the church of St. Mary of the Blachernae, ending on 27 August: the emperor himself read the council's decrees to the people; upholders of the cult of images were anathematized.

786. A council, called by Patriarch Tarasius and Empress Irene to restore the cult of images, opened on 1 August. Roman delegates were also present. But the proceedings, interrupted by the irruption into the meeting room of some iconoclastic soldiers, were not resumed.

382: Hfl-Lecl 2, 53-56; Simonetti 549-551; K. Müller, Kanon 2. und 6. von Konstantinopel 381 und 382, Festg. A. Jühlicher, Tübingen 1927, 190-202; - 394: Hfl-Lecl 2, 97-99; - ca. 400: Hfl-Lecl 2, 122-125; - 404: Hfl-Lecl 2, 150-154; - 426: Hfl-Lecl 2, 216; Palazzini I, 327-328; - 431: Hfl-Lecl 2, 378-381; - ca. 443: Hfl-Lecl 2, 764; - 448: Hfl-Lecl 2, 518-538; L.R. Wickham, Eutyches/ Eutychianischer Streit: TRE 10 (1982) 558-565; G. May, Das Lehrverfahren gegen Eutyches im November des Jahres 448. Zur Vorgeschichte des Konzils von Chalkedon: AHC 21 (1989); - 449/450: Hfl-Lecl 2, 545-554; Palazzini I, 330; - 450: Hfl-Lecl 2, 633-634; - 457: Mansi 7, 780; Palazzini I, 330-331; A.B. Schmidt, Die Refutatio des Timothaeus Aeluros gegen das Konzil von Chalcedon. Ihre Bedeutung für die Bekenntnisentwicklung der armenischen Kirche Persiens im 6. Jahrhundert: OC 73 (1989) 149-165; - ca. 458: Hfl-Lecl 2, 887; - 477: Palazzini I, 331; - 492/496: Hfl-Lecl 2, 939; - 497/498: Hfl-Lecl 2, 945-947; Palazzini I, 331-332; - 518: Hfl-Lecl 2, 1046-1048; - 530/531: Hfl-Lecl 2, 1117-1119; - 536: Hfl-Lecl 2, 1145-1154; J. Speigl, Die Synode von 536 in Konstantinopel: OS 43 (1994) 105-153; - 543: Hfl-Lecl 2, 1187-1188; G. Bardy, Recherches sur l'histoire du texte et des versions latines du De principiis d'Origène, Paris 1923, 49-50; F. Carcione, La politica religiosa di Giustiniano nella fase conclusiva della "seconda controversia origenista" (543-553). Gli intrecci con la controversia sui Tre Capitoli: Studi and ricerche sull'Oriente Cristiano 9 (1986) 131-147; P. Bettiolo, Origenismo (in oriente, secc. V-VI), in A. Monaci Castagno (ed.), Origene. Dizionario: la cultura, il pensiero, le opere, Rome 2000, 336-337; - 553: ACO IV, IIII; Mansi 11, 226-375; Hfl-Lecl 3, 68-132; DTC 3, 1231-1259; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, 213-222; F.X. Murphy - P. Sherwood, Constantinople II et III (Histoire des Conciles Œcuméniques III), Paris 1973; H. Crouzel, Origene e l'origenismo: le condanne di Origene: Augustinianum 26 (1986) 295-303; A. Grillmeier - T. Hainthaler, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche. II/2. Die Kirche von Konstantinopel im 6. Jahrhundert, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna 1989; P. Gray, Konstantinopel, II. Ökum. Synode v. 553: TRE 19 (1990) 524-527; G.L.C. Frank, The Council of Constantinople II as a Model Reconciliation Council: TS 52 (1991) 636-650; P.A. Yannopoulos, Il secondo concilio di Costantinopoli o quinto concilio ecumenico, in G. Alberigo (ed.), Storia dei concili ecumenici, Bologna [2]1993, 121-133; - 588, 592: Hfl-Lecl 3, 221-222; Palazzini I, 334; - 638/639: Hfl-Lecl 3, 390-391; - 680–681: Mansi 11, 539-688; Hfl-Lecl 3, 484-515; DTC 3, 1259-1274; R. Riedinger (ed.), Concilium Universale Constantinopolitanum Tertium: Concilii actiones XII-XVIII, epistolae, indices (ACO ser. II, vol. II/2), Berlin 1992; A. Thanner, Papst Honorius I (Stud. z. Theol. U. Gesch. 4), St. Ottilien 1989; K. Schäferdiek, Konstantinopel, III. Ökum. Synode v. 680/681: TRE 19 (1990) 527-529; P.A. Yannopoulos, Il terzo concilio di Costantinopoli o sesto concilio ecumenico, in G. Alberigo (ed.), Storia dei concili ecumenici, Bologna [2]1993, 134-144; - 692: Mansi 11, 930-1006; Hfl-Lecl 3, 560-581; H. Ohme, Das Concilium Quinisextum und seine Bischofsliste. Studien zum Kostantinopeler Konzil von 692, Berlin-New York 1990; D. Salachas, La normativa del Concilio Trullano commentata dai canonisti bizantini del XIII secolo Zonaras, Balsamone, Aristenos (Oriente Cristiano 2-3/1991), Palermo 1991; G. Nedungatt - M. Featherstone (eds.), The Council in Trullo Revisited, Rome 1995; L.J. Patsavos (ed.), Holy Cross Conference: The Council "in Trullo": Basis for Ecclesiastical Reform?, Brookline, MA 1995; - 754: Hfl-Lecl 3, 697-704; - 786: Hfl-Lecl 3, 756-757; var. aus., La legittimità del culto delle icone. Oriente e occidente riaffermano insieme la fede cristiana, Bari 1988; P.A. Yannopoulos, Il secondo concilio di Nicea (786/787) o settimo concilio, in G. Alberigo (ed.), Storia dei concili ecumenici, Bologna [2]1993, 145-151; M. Andaloro, Il secondo concilio di Nicea e l'età dell'immagine, in Vedere l'invisibile, ed. L. Russo, Palermo 1997, 185-194; M. Re, Il secondo concilio di Nicea e la controversia iconoclastica, ibid. 171-183; C. Valenziano, Il secondo concilio di Nicea, ibid. 207-211.

M. Simonetti

CONSTANTIUS I, CHLORUS, emperor (d. 306). Flavius Valerius Constantius, the appellation Chlorus appearing much later. The father of *Constantine I, in 293 he was appointed Caesar for the Western part of the empire in *Diocletian's tetrarchical organization; for this reason he had to divorce *Helena, Constantine's mother, and marry *Theodora, *Maximian's stepdaughter, with whom he had six children, including Dalmatius, Hannibalianus and *Constantia, the wife of *Licinius. He ordinarily resided at *Trier. In 296 he finally put down the insurrection in *Britain led by the Batavo-Roman officer Carausius, who, supported by the merchants of *Gaul, had for 10 years dominated the NW seas with his fleet, controlling the channel coasts. He then defeated Allectus, another usurper; then the Alamanni in 302. On the abdication of the two Augusti in 305, *Constantius and *Galerius became Augusti; next year Galerius allowed Constantine, who was at his court, to join Constantius in Britain. Constantius died at *York in June, and the local troops immediately acclaimed Constantine, rather than the designated Caesar Severus, as Augustus. Constantius did not apply to the letter Diocletian's edicts of *persecution against the Christians.

L. Cantarelli, Per la storia dell'imperatore Costanzo Cloro: Atti Accadem. Pont. di Arch., Memorie I (1923) 31-36; R. Andreotti, Costanzo Cloro: Didaskaleion 9 (1930) 157ff.; PLRE 1,227–1,228; D. Kienast, Römische Kaisertabelle: Grundzüge einer römischen Kaiserchronologie, Darmstadt 1990, 280-282; The Empire of the Tetrarchs: Imperial Pronouncements and Government AD 284-324, Oxford 1996; W. Kuhoff, Diokletian und die Epoche der Tetrarchie: das römische Reich zwischen Krisenbewältigung und Neuaufbau (284-313 n. Chr.), Frankfurt a. M. 2001.

M. Forlin Patrucco

CONSTANTIUS II, emperor (d. 361). Flavius Iulius Constantius, son of *Constantine I and Fausta, proclaimed Caesar in 324 and Augustus 9 September 337. On his father's death he obtained the prefecture of the East and the diocese of *Thrace. He continued his father's *Arianizing religious policy against that of his brother *Constantine II, spokesman of Western *Nicene *orthodoxy. From 337–350 he lived at *Antioch; in 348 he defeated the Persians at Singara. When *Constans was eliminated by the rebel Magnentius in 350, Constantius took up the struggle against the usurper, defeating him in 351 at Mursa in Illyricum, and then at Mons Seleucus (353) in the Veneto, thereby restoring the prestige of the Costantinids in the West, where emperors acclaimed by the army succeeded one another: the appointment of Gallus, son of Constantine I's half brother, as Caesar, was intended to guarantee the stability of the East, threatened by Persian attacks. He had to put down the revolts of his relative Nepotian (350) and Silvanus (355). From 351–359 he lived at *Sirmium and *Milan, after that in the East. Successive internal and external political difficulties were accompanied by complex religious and ecclesiastical questions: Constantius II's activity aimed at finding compromise doctrinal formulations that might unify the Eastern and Western episcopates, and solutions to the problem of the fiscal immunity of church property and that of clerici. In 355, to meet the military situation in *Gaul, threatened by *Franks and Alamanni, he appointed Gallus's half brother *Julian as Caesar: the future emperor, victor over the barbarians, was acclaimed Augustus by the soldiers in 360; Constantius then moved against his rival but died in 361 before meeting him on the field.

S. Mazzarino, L'impero romano, Bari [2]1973, 697ff.; religious policy: G. Gigli, L'ortodossia, l'arianesimo e la politica di Costanzo II (337-361), Rome 1949; R. Klein, Constantius II und die christliche Kirche, Darmstadt 1977; D. Kienast, Römische Kaisertabelle: Grundzüge einer römischen Kaiserchronologie, Darmstadt 1990, 314-322; T.D. Barnes, Athanasius and Constantius: Theology and Politics in the Constantinian Empire, Cambridge 1993; P.O. Cuneo, La legislazione di Costantino II, Costanzo II e Costante (337-361), Milan 1997; Cambridge Ancient History, 13, Cambridge 1998, 1ff.; G. Ventura da Silva, Reis, santos e feiticeiras. Constâncio II e os fundamentos místicos da basileia 337-361, Vitoria 2003.

M. Forlin Patrucco

CONSTANTIUS III, emperor (d. 421). Native of Naissus, acclaimed emperor of the pars Occidentis of the Roman Empire on 8 February 421, a colleague of *Honorius from 421. Earlier, as an able magister utriusque militiae, he was marked out by military successes against usurpations in *Gaul and *Spain; in 417 he married Honorius's sister *Galla Placidia, freed from the *Visigoths among whom she had been long held hostage and whose king Ataulf she had married; in 418 he concluded a peace treaty with the Visigoths, allowing them to settle in Aquitania secunda. The future emperor *Valentinian III was born to him and Galla Placidia in 419. Died 2 September 421.

O. Seeck, PWK IV, 1, 1900, 1099-1102; see the metrical inscription of Albenga in his honor (CIL V, 7781 = ILS 735); PLRE 2,321-325; J.F. Matthews, Western Aristocracies and Imperial Court, A.D. 364-425, Oxford 1975, 377-378; Cambridge Ancient History, 13, Cambridge 1998, 131-132; V.A. Sirago, Galla Placidia, La Nobilissima, Milan 1996.

M. Forlin Patrucco

CONSTANTIUS of Aquino (6th c.). One of the first bishops of the diocese of Aquino, Constantius was celebrated by *Gregory the Great (Dialogues III, 8:

SC 260, 284) as a model ascetic and champion of Christian virtue and was venerated from antiquity as the patron saint of Aquino. He lived in the 6th c.; during his episcopate (probably between 542 and 584) he sent a cleric to St. *Benedict to be *exorcised (Dialogues II, 16: SC 260, 184-186); on the political scene he saw the *Goth *Totila cede power to the Greek general *Narses, and then to the *Longobard (Lombard) Autari. In the Benedictine *cenobium he knew *Sabinus of Canosa, St. Benedict and perhaps also *Victor of Capua, to whom he seems to have turned for the compilation of a Comes, a sort of lectionary for the liturgical use of his church (Morin). Gregory the Great tells how, shortly before his death during the pontificate of *John III (561–574), Constantius predicted the sad fate of his city, decrying in the modest moral stature of his successors the termination of the episcopal see, the arrival of plague and the Longobard domination (Dialogues III, 8,1-2: SC 260, 284-286).

Quamquam licenter adsumatur, PL 30, 487-488; G. Morin, L'auteur de la "Lettre a Constantius." Étude sur les origines du Comes ou Lectionnaire romain: RB 7 (1890) 416-423; DHGE 13, 770; V. Fenicchia, Costanzo, vescovo di Aquino: BS 4 (1964) 263; var. aus., Costanzo di Aquino (VI sec.). Il suo tempo - I suoi luoghi - Il suo culto, ed. F. Carcione, Venafro 2000.

P. Marone

CONSTANTIUS of Lyons (5th c.). *Presbyter of the church of *Lyons in the 5th c., mentioned by *Sidonius Apollinaris as eminens poëta (Ep. II,10,3: PL 58, 487) but also as an able orator (Ep. IX,16,1: PL 58,636-637) and a man dedicated to the study of the sacred books (Ep. VII,18,4: PL 58,588). Constantius was chosen by *Patiens to execute the mural epigraphs of the basilica of Lyons (Sidonius Apollinaris, Ep. II, 10,3: PL 58, 487) and very probably, between 475 and 480, wrote the Vita Germani in an essential and incisive style; in 46 chapters it presents the most important stages of the life and mission of Bishop *Germanus of Auxerre. The work strongly echoes the *hagiographical literature of the time and thus is of significant interest for the history of 5th-c. *Gaul and *Britain.

W. Levinson, ed., MGH 7, Hannover 1920, 225-283; R. Borius, ed., SC 112, Paris 1965; W. Levinson, Bischof Germanus von Auxerre und die Quellen zu seiner Geschichte: Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für Ältere Deutsche Geschichtskunde 29 (1904) 95-175; E. Griffe, L'hagiographie gauloise au Vᵉ s. La vie de saint Germain d'Auxerre: BLE 66 (1965) 289-294; W. Gessel, Germanus von Auxerre (um 378 bis 448): RQA 65 (1970) 1-44.

P. Marone

CONSTANTIUS tractarian (early 5th c.). The author, perhaps *Arnobius the Younger, of the Praedestinatus (written at *Rome between 432 and 435), speaking of the *Pelagian controversy, names a certain Constantius tractator, who had opposed the Pelagians (PL 53,6128B). The term tractator could indicate either a preacher or a person who comments on biblical texts. *Prosper also mentions a Constantius who had been vicarius, and then servus Christi (a monk), who had opposed the Pelagians at *Rome (MGH, AA 9,468) and suffered at their hands in 418. The name Constantius was frequent at the time. According to De Bruyn, the anti-Pelagian Constantius could be the author of the anonymous commentary on the Pauline letters, written between 396 and 405 and discovered by Frede in a Budapest MS.

H.J. Frede, Ein neuer Paulustext und Kommentar, 2 vols., Freiburg 1973-1974; T.S. De Bruyn, Constantius the Tractator: Author of an Anonymous Commentary on the Pauline Epistles?: JTS 43 (1992) 38-54; PCBE I, 473, n. 3 and n. 11.

A. Di Berardino

CONSTITUTIONS of HIPPOLYTUS (epitome). The document which bears this name is a separate edition of book VIII of the Apostolic Constitutions,* in which the following modifications have been made: (1) omission of the liturgical formulas relating to *Mass and *baptism (VIII,11-15; 29; 32, 1-17; 35-41), due to the interdiction made by the last of the apostolic canons against divulging "the mystical things" contained in the Apos. Con.; subsequently VIII,3 (still present in the *Syriac and Arabic texts) was eliminated as useless; (2) some corrections aimed at making the text more orthodox: see Ep. 6 with Apos. Con. VIII, 16; (3) two substitutions: for the installation of the bishop and the lector (Ep. 4 and 13), the interpolator has replaced the text of Apos. Con. with that of the Apostolic Tradition,* the latter being earlier. Ordination of the lector was enacted through the handing over of the book and without imposition of hands by the bishop. Originally the Epitome was accompanied by the *85 Apostolic Canons like its model (Const. Apost. VIII); they are translated alongside each other in the *Syriac *Octateuch and its derivative the Arabic Octateuch.

CPG 1741; F.X. Funk, Didascalia et Constitutiones apostolorum, II, Paderborn 1905 (repr. Turin 1979), 72-96, cf. XI-XIX. Studies: E. Schwartz, Über die pseudoapostolischen Kirchenordnungen: Schriften der wiss. Gesellschaft in Strassburg, 6, Strassburg 1910, 2-6, 8-9, 27-39; J. Blanc, Fragments inédits de l'Epitomé des Constitutions Apostoliques: RTAM 21 (1954) 265-299; J.-M. Hanssens, La liturgie d'Hippolyte. Ses documents. Son titulaire. Ses origines et son caractère, Rome 1959, ²1965, 78-79; A. Faivre, Naissance d'une hiérarchie, Paris 1977, 96-98; cf. M.

Metzger, Les Constitutions Apostoliques, SC 320, Paris 1985, 42; B. Botte, La Tradition Apostolique de Saint Hippolyte. Essai de reconstitution, Münster [5]1989, XXVII-XXVIII; B. Steimer, Vertex traditionis. Die Gattung der altchristlichen Kirchenordnungen, Berlin 1992, 80-86.

P. Nautin

CONSULTATIONES ZACCHAEI ET APOLLONII. G. Morin wanted to attribute this work to *Firmicus Maternus (mid-4th c.), but similarities to *Sulpicius Severus and the expectation of the immediate end of the world suggest a later date. It certainly predates the end of the 5th c., since *Eugenius, bishop of *Carthage from 483, cites it (CPL 103). Book I responds to *pagan objections to the Christian faith. Book II follows the true doctrine on the *Trinity and the *Holy Spirit, with a warning against *Judaism and certain *heresies. The last book, going even more deeply into the Christian life, is a defense of *monastic life. Influenced by *Tertullian and *Lactantius, the author presents the Christian religion as a law requiring both knowledge of God and upright action. Notable in particular is the distinction between the common life of humiliores and the perfect life of monks. The Consultationes Zacchaei et Apollonii is the only ancient dialogue to offer a synthesis of the Christian faith in question and answer form.

CPL 103; PL 20, 1071-1166; PLS 1, 1095; G. Morin, FP 39, Bonn 1939; SC 401-402 (1994). A. Reatz, Das theologische System der Consulationes Zacchaei Apollonii, Freiburg 1920; DSp II/2, 1641-1645; J.L. Feiertag, Die Consultationes Z.A., Fribourg 1990; M.A. Clausen, Pagan Rebellion and Christian Apologetics in Fourth Century Rome: JEH 46 (1995) 589-614; LTK[3] 2, 1305; LACL (2002) 164.

B. Studer

CONTEMPLATION. The term contemplatio was derived from the templum which the augur marked out with a rod as a site for his observations. In Greek θεωρεῖν meant "to see, look, be present at a spectacle," and by extension "to reflect, meditate, investigate." With the progress of thought, the term assumed very diverse meanings. The Greek sophoi soon realized that the senses provide only opinion (δόξα). To contemplate meant to consider things by using reason (νοῦς) to seek out their essence (λόγος). Spiritual Christians were convinced that this type of knowledge was still not true gnosis, contemplation. They distinguished and contrasted "simple" (ψιλή) and "spiritual" (πνευματική) knowledge. We must see things "in their relation to God," understanding the θεοτελὴς λόγος (*Maximus the Conf., Ad Thal. q. 32: PG 90, 372bc), the "wisdom" conceived before creation, the primordial meaning inherent in all creatures, which leads to God (Basil., Hom. in princip. Prov. 3: PG 31, 389c). In spiritual masters, the meaning of the term soon crystallized into a definition derived from a false etymology: θεωρία means θεὸν ὁρᾶν, to see God (Callistus Cataphyg., De vita contemplativa 2 and 19, PG 147, 836b, 852b).

For Christians it was clear that to understand the logos of things is a divine gift: the divine *mystery can only be known by a *revelation. If human beings are logikos by nature, then it is because they partake of the divine Logos. The indispensable condition for this revelation is purity of νοῦς, the spiritual eye, the heart, through πρᾶξις, which is thus the indispensable condition for theoria: πρᾶξις γὰρ θεωρίας ἀνάβασις (Orig., In Lucam fragm. 39: GCS 9, 252, 2).

A.J. Festugière, Contemplation et vie contemplative selon Platon, Paris 1936; DSp 2, 1643-2193, esp. 1762ff. and 6, 848-856. I. Hausherr, Les leçons d'un contemplatif. Le traité de l'oraison d'Evagre le Pontique, Paris 1960; H. Crouzel, Origène et la "connaissance mystique," Paris - Bruges 1961; T. Špidlík, La contemplazione nella spiritualità cristiana orientale: Encicl. delle relig., Florence 1970, vol. II, 385-390; Id., La spiritualité de l'Orient chrétien. Manuel systématique, Rome 1978, 311ff.; B. McGinn, The Foundation of Mysticism, New York 1991, vol. I, passim (see index 490); Dizionario di mistica, ed. L. Borriello et al., Vatican City 1998, 338-348.

T. Špidlík

CONTINENTES. Even before the gospel teaching and that of the Pauline epistles on continence, one must bear in mind the influence of Greek *philosophy on the people of the early period after Christ. Christians, however, having received *baptism, felt themselves better able to resist every temptation of the body and senses. But the church strongly opposed the exclusivist teachings of groups who considered themselves the only true enkrateis, or the sole depositaries of the one rule of life, imposing an oppressive continence; in fact theologians of the first centuries describe perpetual continence as a gift of God which cannot be prescribed for all, and not infrequently these groups that loved continence excessively slid into *heresy. One must therefore make distinctions: in *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. 1,28,1), the continentes (ἐγκρατεῖς), heretics who accept the theories of *Saturnilus and *Marcion, are hostile to marriage out of hatred for God, who created man and woman for procreation; ungrateful to the Creator, they also abstain from animal flesh. With *Tatian they deny Adam's salvation. Continentes are also those who, though remaining in the church, struggle against sensuality. *Chastity is a tranquil possession, whereas continence is hard work. It is one thing to be chaste, another to be continent. Virtue non est in collectatione continentiae, sed in castitatis pace (Cass., Conl. 12,11). *Tertullian describes the torment he underwent to be continent: scio me . . . adulteria commisisse . . . nunc ad continentiam eniti (Resurr. 59,3). Continentes are also married people who abstain from sexual relations in imitation of virginal chastity (Jerome, Epist. 49,2). Tertullian, therefore, distinguishes virgines from continentes, who may be male or female (Castit. 13,2; Praescr. 40,5); *Jerome knows the categories of virgins, widows, continent, married (Epist. 49,5) and in De bono pudic. 4 of ps.-Cyprian, pudicitia is preeminently in virgins, secondly in the continent and thirdly in married life. Given that moderation is needed in continence, it is precisely the continentes who are the subject of an imperial decree of 370: ecclesiastici . . . vel qui continentium se volunt nomine nuncupari, viduarum ac pupillarum domos non adeant (CTh 16,2,20).

U. Bianchi (ed.), *La tradizione dell'*enkrateia. Motivazioni ontologiche e protologiche. Atti del Colloquio internazionale, Milan 20-23 aprile 1982, Rome 1985; and esp.: G. Quispel, The Study of Encratism: A Historical Survey, 35-81; A. Guillaumont, Le célibat monastique et l'idéal chrétien de la virginité ont-ils des motivations ontologiques et protologiques?, 83-98; G. Sfameni Gasparro, *Le motivazioni protologiche dell'*enkrateia nel cristianesimo dei primi secoli e nello gnosticismo, 149-237; U. Bianchi, *La tradition de l'*enkrateia. Motivations ontologiques et protologiques, 293-315; H. Crouzel, *Les sources bibliques de l'*enkrateia chrétienne, 505-526; P. Brown, Le renoncement à la chair: virginité, célibat et continence dans le christianisme primitif, Paris 1995 (Fr. tr.).

C. Tibiletti - L. Odrobina

CONTINUATIO ANTIOCHIENSIS EUSEBII. A continuation of the Chronici canones of *Eusebius of Caesarea. Burgess has reconstructed the text based on *Jerome's Chronaca, that of Theophane, the Chronaca composita and the Chronicon Paschale*. It was written at *Antioch in ca. 350, translated into *Syriac in the late 4th c. and summarized in Syriac in the early 5th c. It continues the list of the bishops of *Antioch, *Jerusalem and *Alexandria, interrupted by Eusebius at 303, and is the only source relating the construction by *Constantine of a bridge on the Danube (328), the destruction of the temples at Antioch (331), the fire in the basilica of *Nicomedia (332) and the organization of the port of Seleucia (346).

R.W. Burgess, Studies in Eusebian and Post-Eusebian Chronography, Stuttgart 1999.

S. Borzì

CONTRA ORIGENEM DE VISIONE ISAIAE. This short work, preserved in *Latin and discovered by A.M. Amelli in 1901, refutes the interpretation given by *Origen of Isaiah's vision in Is 6. Its criticisms are many and are expressed in no uncertain terms, esp. against Origen's seeing the two seraphim as the Son and the Spirit; like *Jerome, the author understands that Origen has made them creatures. Amelli saw it as a work of Jerome, written at *Constantinople in 381, when he stayed with *Gregory of Nazianzus: but Jerome could not have written it at a time when he still greatly admired Origen. Dietsche attributed it to *Didymus, retouched by *Theophilus of Alexandria and translated by Jerome: but we see no reason to bring the "Origenist" Didymus in. Most authors (Diekamp, Altaner, Chavoutier) attribute the work to Theophilus and the translation to Jerome, after 393.

H. Crouzel, Bibliographie critique d'Origène, La Haye 1971, 275.

H. Crouzel

CONVERSION – CONVERTS. If we wish to understand the meaning attributed to conversion by the Christians of the first centuries, we must briefly recall some elements which characterized it in the OT and NT. The prophets gave conversion a positive interpretation: it expressed a new attitude of the person toward God, which invested the person's whole existence and was linked to an action of God. Along the same lines, the preaching of John the Baptist invited not just sinners and *pagans to conversion but also those who thought they had no need of it. Jesus summed up God's good news by saying (Mk 1:15): "The time is fulfilled and the *kingdom of God is at hand; be converted and believe the gospel." Some parables made clear the essence of such a conversion: e.g., the treasure in the field, the pearl, the guests at the wedding feast; they stressed certain important factors: the actual presence of the kingdom of God, God's invitation to human beings at this moment, the person's response which touches his whole life and requires action, though without forcing him to abandon his own history and his own world. The early Christians followed this direction: conversion for them meant not just passing from one religion to another but turning from a life of errors and vices to one of rigorous morality. But there was even more: it required the adhesion of the will to a faith, a "theology," whose first article consists in believing that God loves human beings and wants them to love him and each other; this led to a new life in a new people, a life that partook, through faith and *baptism, of the sanctification brought by Christ. A significant testimony from among the many that could be drawn from the earliest writings is chs. 5-6 of the *Letter of Diognetus (probably late 2nd c.), which outline the identity of Christians and their function and place in the world.

Conversion, then, is of heart and behavior (μετάνοια); it is the personal act of a spirit turning to God (ἐπιστροφή); it supposes God's grace but at the same time is reflected in and leaves traces on the surrounding world; it is born out of a personal religious experience but not confined to it. Christian conversion possesses a marked originality compared with other religious manifestations of the ancient world. It has no parallel in the public worship of Greco-Roman *paganism or in the *initiation into the *mysteries; neither of these aimed to renew spirits and hearts (apart from some exceptional cases attested in the mystery religions). For those religions we may speak of an external adherence that required formal actions which often had little or nothing to do with intimate conviction. On the other hand, cases of "philosophical conversion" were not infrequent in the Greek and Roman world, even in the first centuries of our era; the theoretical system adopted dictated ethical norms which impinged on daily life. We know what an essential place ethics held in philosophy, esp. in the 2nd-3rd c. But the context in which this type of new spiritual orientation occurred was, by its nature, reserved to the few. *Judaism too propagated a form of proselytism that reached many areas of the empire, requiring renunciation of the honoring of pagan gods, giving official worship to dea Roma or swearing by the emperor's genius, so as to consecrate oneself exclusively to Yahweh—an act which in practice involved denial of one's race, country and city while remaining forever distinct from the true descendants of Abraham, the Israelites by birth who alone were part of the Jewish nation by right.

As propounded by the Christian community, conversion showed characteristics that were original in the ancient world and met a set of needs felt by its people: it involved the rediscovery and recovery of essential human values, of which everyone in such a critical and tormented age must have been in search; it also offered the novelty of Christ. It is worth pointing out that we meet "genuine conversion to paganism only when Christianity had become so powerful that its rival was, so to speak, made an entity by opposition and contrast" (Nock, Conversion, 13). Between *Late Antiquity and the early Middle Ages, the history of conversion was enriched by other events; think of the relations between barbarians and Christianity during the great invasions in the West: from the work of the *Arian Ulfila among the *Goths in the 4th c., first N of the Danube, then in Moesia within the empire, to the baptism of *Clovis and 3,000 *Franks in the late 5th c. (according to the mentality and customs of those people, who felt ethnic bonds very strongly, such that their chief's proposals, whether in politics, war or religion, once accepted, became an undisputed rule).

A.D. Nock, Conversion: The Old and New in Religion from Alexander the Great to Augustine, Harvard 1933 (It. tr. Conversione. Società e religione nel mondo antico, Bari 1974); G. Bardy, La conversion au Christianisme durant les premiers siècles, Paris 1949 (It. tr. Milan 1980); A.D. Nock: RAC 2, 105-118 (bibl.); P. Aubin, L'emploi des mots ἐπιστρέφειν et ἐπιστροφή dans la littérature chrétienne des trois premiers siècles. Contribution à la théologie de la conversion, Paris 1960; Id., Le problème de la "conversion." Etude sur un thème commun à l'hellénisme et au christianisme des trois premiers siècles, Paris 1963; W.H.C. Frend: TRE 5 (1980), 443-453; s.v. Bekehrung I, 2-3; K. Löning: LTK[3] 2, 167-168, s.v. Bekehrung-III. Biblisch; J. Werbick, LTK[3] 2, 168-169, s.v. Bekehrung-IV. Historisch-theologisch.

P. Siniscalco

COPTIC

I. Language and literature - II. Church.

I. Language and literature. The adjective "Coptic" is derived through Arabic from the Greek Aigyptios ("*Egyptian"). The Egyptian Arabs used it to designate anything which, in contrast to themselves, was "native" Egyptian: population, religion, language, customs. Transplanted into the West, the term is the source of many ambiguities and would be advantageously replaced by "Egyptian." For traditional reasons we will speak here of the Coptic language as the last stage of the native language of the Egyptians (2nd-12th c.), and of Coptic literature as that which, in original works or translations, was expressed in that language; and of the Coptic church as that most genuinely Egyptian (from the 5th c. to the present: but we will consider only the period covered by the present encyclopedia).

The language, derived from Egyptian and partly from Greek, was objectively the most characteristic element that marked out the non-*Chalcedonian Egyptian Church (more exactly styled the Coptic Orthodox Church), though it was never used exclusively and, from the 10th c., may be considered a dead language. The alphabet is the Greek, in Late Antique capitals, with the addition of some signs derived from demotic Egyptian script. The grammatical structure is that of late Egyptian, spoken in the 2nd c. AD. The syntactical structure is mainly that of the same Egyptian, with strong Greek influences in the concatenation of sentences. Vocabulary is mostly Egyptian, partly Greek (with Latin and Aramaic words of secondary derivation). It is customary to divide it into dialects. In fact Sahidic is the literary language that prevailed from the 3rd to the 8th c.; Bohairic prevailed from the 9th to the 12th c. and is still present in the liturgy. Specifically regional dialects were Akhmimic, Lycopolitan, Oxyrhynchite (or Middle Egyptian), Fayumic and other lesser ones. Literary use must go back to the 2nd c.; the earliest MS evidence is of the 3rd c. The first texts in Coptic were translations of biblical, so-called *gnostic and hermetic texts (see Nag Hammadi and respective entries), other ecclesiastical texts such as *Melito's In s. Pascha, and some *apocrypha. Translations of the OT were made from the Greek of the LXX, though for some books (e.g., the Minor Prophets) we may guess at other versions (Theodotion?), and sometimes we seem to see pre-hexaplar elements, i.e., outside the *Origenian tradition which became standard in Egypt as elsewhere. Translation of the NT usually falls into group H (the Hesychian). Numerous codices of both translations go back as far as the 4th c. and are thus very important for textual criticism, but all work in this field is still at an early stage. Particularly unclear are the relations within Coptic between the different versions, in different "dialects" and within the same "dialect." If we can believe *Epiphanius (Panar. LXVII), the first original author in Coptic was *Hieracas of Leontopolis, a monk of heterodox tendencies; but nothing of his survives. An original Coptic literature, albeit somewhat rudimentary in form, arose within Pachomian *monasticism: we possess works in Coptic (esp. "circular" letters) by *Pachomius himself, *Theodore of Tabennesi and *Horsiesi. The author who raised the language to a level comparable to that of contemporary literary languages (Greek included) was *Shenoute (350–466?), archimandrite of the monastery of Athrib (today called the White Monastery) in Upper Egypt, most of whose vast output has survived. His successor *Besa was also a prolific author of letters and *catecheses and wrote a biography of Shenoute. At the same time an abundant industry developed, translating texts of the Greek Fathers, incl. Alexandrian Egyptians like *Athanasius, *Theophilus and *Cyril, who do not appear to have written or preached in Coptic. The homilies and *hagiographies of the great church fathers (esp. the passions of the *martyrs) were taken into consideration. The former were chosen not so much on theological criteria (Coptic culture was never particularly fond of theological treatises) as on spiritual and moral ones, particularly the needs of the monks. Texts seem to have been chosen solely according to content, the author not mattering so much, so that, in Coptic literary tradition, attributions often ended by being dubious or downright multiple. For this reason we will follow the same criterion in our exposition.

Mainly monastic texts. These include an important treatise on virginity attributed to Athanasius of Alexandria, *Ephrem the Syrian's Sermo asceticus, some ascetical works of *Basil of Caesarea, *John Chrysostom's De compunctione and Ad Theodorum, a De poenitentia attributed to Theophilus of Alexandria, a long treatise De poenitentia et abstinentia composed of Chrysostomic extracts, attributed by critics to John the Faster, bishop of *Constantinople (d. 595). Homilies for Liturgical Feasts: two homilies by *Gregory of Nazianzus, on *Easter and on *baptism; two by John Chrysostom, on Christmas (also attributed to Basil or *Severian of Gabala) and on *Pentecost; and a homily for Good Friday, attributed to Theophilus of Alexandria. Exegetical Homilies: on the raising of Lazarus and on the parable of the vineyard, attributed to Athanasius; two homilies by John Chrysostom, on the scribes and Pharisees, and on the Canaanite woman (attributed in Coptic to "Eusebius the historian"!).

Various. Basil of Caesarea on judgment and mercy (attributed in Coptic to Athanasius); John Chrysostom on Peter and Elijah and on David and Saul; the anonymous treatise called the Didascalia. Works translated on account of their author include Athanasius's Commentary on the Psalms and Festal Letters; *Cyril of Jerusalem's Catecheses; Gregory of Nazianzus's encomia on Athanasius and Basil; *Gregory of Nyssa's Life of Gregory Thaumaturgus; *Epiphanius of Salamis's Anchoratus and De gemmis; an anthology from John Chrysostom's commentary on Hebrews; two homilies by *Proclus of Constantinople on the *incarnation and on Easter; Cyril of Alexandria's Epilysis XII capitulorum. Different in character are the translations of canonical texts and conciliar acts. The Copts had formed two collections, one shorter and one longer, both called Canons of the Apostles. The material is that found in the Greek collections, arranged in a particular way. Then there were the so-called Canons of Athanasius and Canon of Basil. Under the name Canons of Hippolytus was a large collection of different texts connected with the Council of *Nicaea. The Councils of *Ephesus and *Chalcedon had their own acts, not quite corresponding with the Greek collections. Among *hagiographical texts we have those on the most important Eastern saints (*George, *Cosmas and Damian, the two *Theodores, etc.), but on its own is the series of passions connected with Arianus, prefect of the *Thebaid, the great persecutor in Egypt during *Diocletian's persecution.

The Council of Chalcedon caused a change in the direction of Coptic literature. Its first consequence was the development of a historical-polemical literature aimed at opposing the similar literature produced in the Chalcedonian camp and at propounding a contrary interpretation of church tradition. Perhaps its most important product was the History of the Church (maybe by *Timothy Ailouros [d. 477], but at any rate written—in Greek?—in his time): the first part is a revised translation of Eusebius's HE I-VII; the second narrates in an original way the events between the period of *Peter of Alexandria and that of Timothy Ailouros. Conciliar collections also came into existence (perhaps partly preexistent in Coptic): Nicaea, Ephesus, Chalcedon; and lives of important people were written, such as *Dioscorus and Timothy Ailouros (eventually in the form of plerophoriae or the like) or anti-Chalcedonian *archimandrites. In this period it is hard to distinguish translations from original works; in any case the circles from which they issued were uniformly bilingual. After a period of grave crisis, the Coptic Church managed under *Damian (578–605) to provide itself with an autonomous, efficient organization, and original Coptic authors flourished in this period, producing homiletic texts to be read during functions, adapted both to new theological and liturgical requirements and to new public tastes. Hagiographical literature also went through a process of renewal, and the beginnings of the cycle of the legendary general Basilides and his family, one of the most interesting phenomena of Coptic literature, probably date from this time.

This literary renaissance soon had to suffer the traumas of the Persian and Arab invasions of Egypt. The consequences were imperceptible at first, and patriarchs like Benjamin and Agatho as well as bishops like Menas of Pshati and Zacharias of Shkou could freely publish their works. But from ca. 750 the Arabs extended stricter control over the Coptic Church's activities, and literature had to assume clandestine forms. Texts necessary for church life continued to be produced, but to avoid difficulties they had to be attributed to ancient authors. Even homilies were built around "cycles," to whose protagonists they were usually attributed. These were the great names of 4th-c. patristics—Athanasius, Theophilus, Cyril of Jerusalem, John Chrysostom, Basil of Caesarea—who narrate, in first person, facts often bordering on the fantastic, as a setting for religious arguments of a moral and partly theological character. Shortly afterward began the work of selecting and systematizing all the material, older and more recent, within the framework of the liturgical calendar: the most appropriate texts for each feast were chosen and held available in the libraries of churches and monasteries, to be read at the corresponding ceremony. From this would derive the so-called Alexandrian Synaxarion, drawn up in the 12th-c. in Arabic, which contains summaries of a great many homilies and lives and passions of Coptic saints, arranged according to the liturgical calendar. The Coptic MSS fell into disuse and were dispersed and lost, except in certain great monasteries (esp. the White Monastary in Upper Egypt and St. Macarius at Scete) where they lay half-forgotten in cells until the 18th c., when European scholars persuaded the monks to exhume them and give them away: in this way many of them ended up, whole or in fragments, in European libraries. From the 19th c. the fruits of casual or archaeological discoveries, dug up from the soil of an area once populated but now desert, were added to them.

II. Church. We understand "Coptic Church" here in the traditional sense of the *Egyptian Church, which did not accept the dictates of the Council of Chalcedon (451), and consequently set up an autonomous organization (independent esp. of *Rome and *Constantinople) which still exists today. But of course we must not detach it from the previous tradition of the Egyptian Church, of which the Coptic Orthodox Church (this seems the best name to use, to distinguish it from other Coptic churches that have arisen relatively recently) considers itself the legitimate heir, in the line of the patriarchs of Alexandria, starting from St. Mark, the traditional founder of the bishopric, through the great bishops *Peter, *Athanasius, *Cyril, the first schismatic Dioscorus (d. 454), Timothy Ailouros, Theodosius, Damian, Benjamin, to the present Shenouda III. The Coptic Church of Egypt gave birth to that of *Ethiopia (directly dependent on *Alexandria from at least 640 to 1936) and that of *Nubia (also directly dependent on Egypt, but whose slow demise does not allow valid documentation). The history of the Coptic Church can be divided into three periods.

1. 451–537. The *patriarchate was contested between pro- and anti-*Chalcedonians with alternating success, depending mainly on the leanings of the emperors, who, however, hoped for an accommodation between the two parties into which Christendom had split. The main figures of this period were Dioscorus, who died in exile at Gangra; Timothy Ailouros (d. 477), author of polemical treatises and a strenuous fighter; Theodosius (d. 566) who, though protected by Empress *Theodora, had to remain in exile at *Constantinople, where he died. His period saw important theological disputes within the anti-Chalcedonian camp (*Severus of Antioch, *Julian of Halicarnassus) which left long aftereffects in Egypt, as elsewhere.

2. 537–641. the Chalcedonians, finally triumphant at Constantinople, imposed their patriarchs on Alexandria (they were called *Melkites, and their succession still persists). The Coptic Orthodox withdrew into clandestinity, alternating with periods of relative freedom. Internal divisions ceased under Damian (578–605), a Syrian monk who carried out a vigorous, effective and lasting reorganization of the clergy.

3. 641–1250. The Arab conquest freed the Copts from the heavy *Byzantine yoke and for a time allowed them a religious tranquility never enjoyed before. Relations with their rulers were often good, esp. under the Fatimids (969–1171), but were constantly threatened by the intermingling of religious and political-economic problems. Imposition of heavy taxes provoked turbulent revolts, which led to a stiffening of Arab attitudes in the religious sphere also: it was forbidden to build or restore churches or convents; indentifying marks had to be worn on the person; some feasts could not be publicly celebrated. The patriarchal see was moved from Alexandria to Fustat (Cairo), seat of the court. The liturgical books were translated into Arabic. As for *theology, it is hard to speak in this period of a genuine theology of the Coptic Church, which recognized itself more in the line of patriarchs descending in a direct line from Dioscorus than in subtle and complicated theological formulas, on which there was no little disagreement even among the opponents of the Chalcedonians. Yet there are formulas on which the (Coptic) Egyptian texts insist, though without going into them too deeply: the Council of Chalcedon wished, in its declaration of faith, to innovate from *Nicaea, therefore it must be rejected; whoever accepts its conclusions divides in two the second person of the *Trinity, thus forming a "quadrinity"; Christ, Logos and second person of the Trinity, is indissolubly God and man, he was nine months in the Virgin's womb, he assumed all the qualities of human nature, except sin, but including suffering. In the period that interests us, if we exclude *Christology, the rest of the doctrine presents no important differences from that common to the rest of Christendom.

W.C. Till, Koptische Grammatik, Leipzig [2]1961; J. Vergote, Grammaire Copte, vol. I, Louvain 1973; H.J. Polotsky, Collected Papers, Jerusalem 1971; J. Leipoldt, Geschichte der koptischen Literatur, in Gesch. der christl. Lit. des Orients (C. Brockelmann), Leipzig [2]1972; S. Morenz, Die koptische Literatur, in Handbuch der Orientalistik I, 2, Leiden - Cologne [2]1970, 239-250; T. Orlandi, Elementi di lingua e letteratura copta, Milan 1970; T. Orlandi, The Future of Studies in Coptic Biblical and Ecclesiastical Literature, in The Future of Coptic Studies, Leiden 1978, 143-163; Ch. Cannuyer, Les Coptes, s. 1, Turnhout 1990; M. Krause (ed.), Ägypten in spätantik-christlicher Zeit. Einführung in das ägyptische Christentum, Stuttgart - Berlin - Cologne 1994, 9-27; Th.H. Partrick, Traditional Egyptian Christianity: A History of the Coptic Orthodox Church, Greensboro, NC 1996; A. Camplani (ed.), L'Egitto cristiano, Rome 1997; T. Orlandi, Corpus dei Manoscritti Copti Letterari, web page: http://cmcl.let.uniroma1.it/

T. Orlandi

CORICIUS (Χορίκιος) (6th c.). Greek sophist, contemporary of *Justinian; disciple of *Procopius, whom he succeeded as director of the school of *Gaza in *Palestine. He wrote "many works . . . fictitious (plasmatikous) discourses, *panegyrics, monodies, epithalamia and antiheretical discourses." *Photius further praises the clarity and naturalness of his style, his religious sense and respect for the sacred, but judges his inclusion of "pagan fables and tales, even when treating sacred subjects" out of place. Among his descriptions (ἐκφράσεις) and encomiums—a literary genre in which Coricius, according to Photius, "surpassed himself"—we must note the dubious eulogy of Bishop Marcian of Gaza (ca. 530–550), with precise descriptions of the Churches of St. Sergius and St. Stephen in that city. He also composed the funeral eulogy of his teacher Procopius.

CPG 7518; Photius, Bibliotheca, cod. 160: R. Henry, II, Paris 1960, 121-123; R. Foerster - E. Richsteig, Choricii Gazaei Opera, Leipzig 1930, 1-47; S. Impellizeri, La letteratura bizantina da Costantino agli iconoclasti, Bari 1965, 174-175, 352; H. Hunger, Die hochsprachliche profane Literatur der Byzantiner, I, Munich 1978, 165-176; W. Horändne, Der Prosarhythmus in der rhetorischen Literatur der Byzantiner, I, Vienna 1981, 76-78; ODB 1, 430-431; Patrologia V, 281; F.-M. Abel, Gaza au VI^e siècle d'après le rhéteur Chorikios: Revue Biblique 40 (1931) 5-31; A. Sideras, Zwei unbekannte Monodien von Chorikios?: JÖBG 33 (1983) 57-73.

D. Stiernon

CORINTH. The Church of Corinth was founded by the *apostle *Paul (Acts 18:1-18; 1 Cor 1:14-16; 16:15) around the year 50 in a milieu that included Jews organized in a *synagogue (Acts 18:4, 8); but we cannot rule out Christianity having arrived earlier. The primitive community had important Jews as members, but from the letters we can deduce that the majority was of Gentile origin. The city, destroyed by Mummius (146 BC), was rebuilt by Julius Caesar (44 BC) as a traditional Roman colony according to established practice; from 27 BC it was capital of the province of *Achaia. The original plan of the city was vast, ca. 150 hectares; it later spread toward the east. The ancient temples were preserved and the new part of the city enriched with splendid public buildings: the agora, adorned on the model of the Roman forum, acquired a monumental aspect. Corinth, known at that time as the largest and richest city of Hellas, had a multinational population of varied social extraction (de Waele; Wiseman 502-531; Broneer; Dinkler). In AD 267–268 it was destroyed by the Heruli and in the 4th c. suffered repeatedly from earthquakes; destroyed again by *Alaric's *Goths in 396, it rose again rapidly after each catastrophe. It was struck by another earthquake in 522 and by plague in 542 (Scranton 1-5); an earthquake razed it to the ground in 550–551, after which most of its inhabitants abandoned it. Then began a period of decline, which lasted until the early 9th c. (Pallas, Données, 298-305). After its destruction by *Alaric it was given a new city wall, which considerably restricted its expansion (Gregory). The church of Corinth, in a very complex ethnic and social context, was marked by religious enthusiasm (1 Cor 14:4-40), internal tensions and *heresies (1 Clem. I, 1-2, 3, 3-4, 27, 1-5, etc.: PG 1,201ff., 213ff., 231ff.; Praedest. I,23: PL 53,594; cf. Lebreton-Zeiller II,408-409); but it regained unity (Orig., C. Cels. III,30: PG 11,957; P. Koetschau GCS I,227-228; cf. Harnack 789; Lebreton-Zeiller IV,833), and had *martyrs (about 25 are commemorated, some certain, some legendary: Max Herzog z. Sachsen 47, 51, 54, 55; Delehaye 164 and 227; Phoughias 123-125 and 131) and prominent churchmen like Bishops *Dionysius, *Bacchyllus, Alexander, *Perigenes and Peter. From its foundation the church of Corinth was the religious center of the whole eparchy of Achaia (2 Cor 1:2), and hence its metropolis, subject to *Rome through the metropolitan of *Thessalonica, vicar of the pope (see Achaia): for the bishops of Corinth see Janin 878-879 (adding Eustathius, before 536 [Stikas 133]; on Photius [536–553]: Pallas-Ntantis 68-69 n. 7).

The Christians of Corinth, living in an atmosphere of syncretism, used the same cemeteries as the Gentiles, which were gradually Christianized (Pallas, Investigations, 9-14; Id., Monuments, 153-154). Christian sanctuaries predating 550–551 have been discovered at the edges of the old city, consecrated to the cult of the martyrs. Also at the edge of the late Roman city, but nearer the center, near the gate in the Roman wall that faced the amphitheater (which remained outside the late wall), was a large church building, recently found but not yet properly excavated. Probably a basilica, with a central-plan outbuilding (baptistery or martyrium, whose ruins rise considerably above ground level), it seems to date from the 1st half of the 6th c. (Pallas, Scoperte, 205-207). In the space adjacent to the agora, Christian worship took root after 550–551. The oldest church yet known is the basilica of Lechaeum—basilica C—in the port area on the gulf of Corinth, dedicated to the martyr Leonidas and the seven women who suffered martyrdom with him under *Decius. Its construction began under *Marcian (450–457) at the latest and ended not before *Justin I (518–527). Its height and architectural structure are typical: three aisles, pentapartite transept, narthex in five sections, two adjoining porticos on W side, atrium on E side, independent diaconicon on S side accessible from the narthex and the side aisle, symmetrical to N, with a room of unknown function (for catechesis or funerals?), and two small buildings, one at each side of the transverse aisle: that to the N is a mausoleum; that to the S may be a waiting room for clergy. The baptistery, on the N side with access from the narthex through the atrium, seems older than the basilica. The basilica had galleries and a wooden roof. At the crossing of the central nave and the transverse aisle was a vault (wooden cupola) supported on a canopy, consisting of four mighty pillars linked at the top by arches enclosed in colonnades (Pallas, Monuments, 165-171; Id., Corinthe, 95-101).

The basilica of Cranaeum—basilica A—near the Cenchraean gate (of the old walls) had three aisles divided by pillars, a wooden roof, transverse aisle, transept, narthex, W portico, atrium extending the length of the S side; N of the narthex and portico was a baptistery with adjoining rooms, reached from the narthex. The sides of the central body of the basilica were lined with monumental tombs. In front of the apse we may presume a roof higher than that of the rest of the basilica (Pallas, Monuments, 154-156; Id., Corinthe, 101-105). Built in the area of a necropolis which later became a Christian cemetery, it can be dated, with some approximation, between 500 and 520. The basilica of Scoutela—basilica B, outside the old walls, some way from the city—was probably dedicated to a martyr. It was smaller than basilica A, with three simple aisles, colonnade and narthex, baptistery to S accessible from the narthex, but no portico (Pallas, Corinthe, 105). The basilica of the martyr Quadratus—basilica D, near the old N cemetery, outside the late Roman wall—had almost the same characteristics and dimensions, with no narthex, portico or baptistery, but perhaps with diaconicon and an annex for worship (Pallas, Monuments, 156-163; Id., Corinthe, 105-108). Both basilicas date from the first decades of the 6th c. After the destruction of Corinth by the earthquake of 550–551, on a small height near the agora, where the archaic Doric temple stood, rose a small three-aisled basilica—basilica E—with pastophory and polygonal apse. Modest, situated in a funerary area, it dates from the late 6th or early 7th c. (Pallas, Corinthe, 108-109) and seems to have served the small community that survived the catastrophe of 550–551. On the Acrocorinth, in a very poor state, is a basilica with three aisles divided by columns, built on the site of the old temple of Aphrodite (Blegen - Saillwell et al., 21-22, pl. II) and dated to the 2nd half of the 6th c. In Corinth's second port, Cenchraea on the Saronic gulf, were found a basilica and some underground funerary cells, at least one of which seems Christian (Pallas, Investigations, 7-8). The church architecture of Corinth exercised an influence beyond the bounds of the province of Achaia.

M. Herzog zu Sachsen, Das christliche Hellas, Leipzig 1918; A. Harnack, Mission und Ausbreitung des Christentums in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, Leipzig [4]1924 (It. tr. Milan 1906); C. Blegen - R. Saillwell et al., Acrocorinth (= Corinth III 1), Cambridge, MA 1930; H. Delehaye, Les origines du culte des martyrs, Brussels [2]1933; F.J. de Waele: PWK Suppl. VI (1935) 182-199 (s.v. Korinthos); O. Broneer, Studies in the Topography of Corinth: AE 1 (1937) 125-133; F. Dinkler, Das Bema zu Korinth: Marburg. Jahrb. f. Kunstwiss. 13 (1944) 12-22; J. Lebreton - J. Zeiller, The History of the Primitive Church, London II (1948) and IV (1949); R. Janin: DHGE 13, 876-880 (s.v. Corinthe); R. Scranton, Mediaeval Architecture in the Central Area of Corinth (= Corinth XVI), Princeton 1957; D.I. Pallas, Scoperte archeologiche in Grecia negli anni 1956-1958: RivAC 25 (1959) 187-223; E. Stikas, Κοιμητηριακὴ βασιλικὴ ἀρχαίας Κορίνθου: PAAH (1961) 129-136; M.G. Phoughias, Ἱστορία τῆς Ἀποστολικῆς Ἐκκλησίας τῆς Κορίνθου, Athens 1968; D.I. Pallas, Investigations sur les monuments chrétiens de Grèce avant Constantin: CArch 24 (1975) 1-19; D.I. Pallas, Les monuments paléochrétiens de Grèce découverts de 1959 à 1973, Vatican City 1977; D.I. Pallas - S.P. Dantes, Ἐπιγραφὲς ἀπὸ τὴν Κόρινθω: AE (1977) 61-83; J. Wiseman, Corinth and Rome I: 226 B.C.-A.D. 267: ANRW II, Berlin - New York 1979, 438-548; Th.E. Gregory, The Late Roman Wall at Corinth: Hesperia 48 (1979) 264-280; D.I. Pallas, Corinthe et Nikopolis pendant le bas moyen-âge: FR 118 (1979) 93-142; Id., Données nouvelles sur quelques boucles et fibules considerées comme avares et slaves et sur Corinthe entre le VI[e] et le IX[e] s.: Byzantinobulgarica 7 (1981) 295-318; W. Elliger, Paulus in Griechland. Philippi, Thessaloniki, Athen, Korint, Stuttgart 1987; D. Engels, Roman Corinth: An Alternative Model for the Classical City, Chicago 1990; Towns in Transitions: Urban Evolution in Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages, N. Christie - S.S.T. Loseby - S. Hants (eds.), Brookfield, VT 1996, 99-125; LTK[3] 6,378-379; ODB 1,531-533; LMA 5,1444 (cf. 6,834-836); RBK 4,746-811; EAA[2] 2,301-303; RBK 5,746-811.

D.I. Pallas

CORIPPUS, Flavius Cresconius (6th c.). Epic poet born in the first decade of the 6th c., perhaps near *Carthage. After being a grammaticus and composing Georgics in the manner of Virgil, in 533 he moved to *Carthage, where, ca. 550, he composed the Iohannis seu de bellis Lybicis, an epic poem in 8 books of 6,667 verses, on the war of the Romans against the *Vandals of *Africa. The poem was influenced by Virgil's Aeneid, e.g., in the portrayal of the magister militum John Troglita, conqueror of the Moors; as a historical source, it is no less important than *Procopius's Bellum vandalicum. The success of this poem led to Corippus being called as scriniarius or notarius to *Justin II's court at *Byzantium, where he eventually fell into disgrace and died in poverty, perhaps shortly before 568. At Byzantium Corippus composed, on the model of *Claudian, the poem In laudem Iustini minoris in 4 books, in honor of the emperor. This must be considered a genuine *panegyric, though its tones and epic motifs transcend the classical model fixed by the rhetor *Menander. Emulation of the classical poets is prominent in these works, but echoes of *Juvencus, *Prudentius, *Sedulius and other Christian authors are present, as are Christian ideas and motifs such as the frequent prayer to God, e.g., John's to Jesus (Joh. I,151; IV,269-284; V,42; VI,100; VII,88-103; VIII,215 and 341-353), Justin's to the Creator (In laud. Iu. II,11-42) and the empress Sophia's to Mary (op. cit. II,52-69), and in book IV of the panegyric (op. cit. 294-311), the expression of the dogmas of the *Trinity and the *incarnation in accordance with the *Nicene Creed. Corippus's influence has been noted in *Venantius Fortunatus, *Eugenius of Toledo and *Aldhelm.

CPL 1515-1516; I. Partsch, Corippi Africani grammatici libri qui supersunt, MGH Auct. ant. 3, 2, Berlin 1879; M. Petschenig, Flavii Cresconii Corippi Africani grammatici quae supersunt: Berl. Stud. f. Kl. Philol. 4, 2 (1886); D. Romano, In laudem Iustini, text, tr. and ann. ed. D.R., Palermo 1970; Av. Cameron, In laudem Iustini II, ed. with comm., London 1976; U.J. Stache, Flavius Cresconius Corippus "In laudem Iustini Aug. Minoris". Ein Kommentar, Berlin 1976; R. Amann, De Corippo priorum poetarum lat. imitatore, Diss. Kiel 1885, Progr. Oldenburg 1889; B. Baldwin, The Career of Corippus: CQ 28 (1978) 372-376; G. Boano, Su Massimiano e le sue elegie: RFIC 27 (1949) 198-216; Av. Cameron, Corippus' poem of Justin II: ASNP 5 (1975/1976) 129-165; M. Darquennes, Flavius Cresconius Corippus, Stylistische Studie, Louvain 1941; L. Hakenson, Some Notes on Corippus' Iohannis: CQ 27 (1977) 424-29; J.U. Andres, Concordantia in Flavii Corippi Ioannida, Hildesheim 1993; Berbères ou barbares? Recherches sur le livre second de la "Johannide" de CoripPe, ed. V. Zarini, Nancy-Paris 1997; L. Krestan - K. Winkler, Corippus: RAC 3, 424-429; M. Manitius, Zu spätlat. Dichtern: Zs. f. österr. Gymn. 37 (1886) 81-101; Id., Zu Aldhelm u. Beda: SAW 112 (1896) 535-629; Th. Nissen, Historisches Epos u. Panegyricus in der Spätantike: Hermes 75 (1940) 298-325; D. Romano, L'ultimo epos latino. Interpretazione della Iohannis di Corippo: AAPal (1968) 6-26 = Letteratura and Storia nell'età tardoromana, Palermo 1979, 252-272; F. Skutsch, Corippus: PWK 4,1, 1236-1246; A.R. Sodano, Uno storico-poeta del secolo di Giustiniano, Flavio Cresconio Corippo: Antiquitas 1 (1947) 27-37; A. Welzel, De Claudiani et Corippi sermone epico, Breslau 1906; H. Hofmann, Corippus as a Patristic Author?: VChr 43/4 (1989) 361-377; V. Zarini, Poésie officielle et arts figurés au siècle de Justinien: images de pouvoir dans la "Johannide" de Corippe: REL 75 (1997) 219-240.

S. Costanza

CORNELIUS I, pope (251–253). After *Fabian's death, 14 months passed before it was possible to elect a new bishop. The community, tested by *Decian's persecution, preferred Cornelius to *Novatian, who had directed it during the papal vacancy. After some hesitation, *Cyprian entered into communion with Cornelius, praising his goodness, prudence and humility (Ep. 45,2-3; 48,1-3; 55). A synod of 60 bishops approved his mild position on lapsi, *excommunicating Novatian. Cornelius communicated this to the bishops of *Alexandria, *Antioch and *Carthage. We have two letters to Cyprian (Ep. 49 and 50) and a fragment of one to *Fabius of Antioch which, besides the question of penance, touched on the organization of the Roman community (Euseb., HE VI, 43; Mirbt, n. 144). Condemned to exile in the new *persecution under Gallus, Cornelius died in 253 (Cypr., Ep. 60,2). Cyprian calls him a *martyr (Ep. 61,3; 67,6; 69,3).

CPL 50, with Cyprian's Ep. 49 and 50; AASS Sept. IV (1866) 143-191; DHGE 13,891-894; BS 4,182ff.; H.J. Vogt, Coetus Sanctorum, Bonn 1968, 37-56; M. Bévenot, Cyprian and His Recognition of Cornelius: JTS 28 (1977) 346-359; HDG IV/3, 53ff. (with bibl. on Novatian); LTK[3] 2, 1313-1314; LACL (2002) 165.

B. Studer

CORNELIUS the CENTURIAN. Of the cohort called Italica, at Caesarea; his story is in Acts 10. From the 4th c. Cornelius's baths and house at Maritime *Caesarea were shown; a basilica was built above them (CCL 175,13. 116. 152). On 2 February the Mart. hier. mentions a certain Cornilianus. In his *martyrology Ado claims that this is the centurion; the Synax. Eccl. CP cites him on 13 September. Mentions of his episcopate at *Caesarea in *Palestine (Apos. Con. 7,46) and of his apostolate at Skepsis in Mysia (on the Hellespont) (BHG 371) are apocryphal, based on traditions unknown to us. Cornelius's tomb has been located at Caesarea and at Skepsis.

BHG 370-371; BS 4,189-192; LCI 7,341-342; G. Rinaldi, Biblia Gentium, Rome 1989, 619-620; F. Bovon, De vocatione gentium. Histoire de l'interprétation d'Actes 10,1-11,18 dans les six premiers siècles, Tübingen 1967; P. Maraval, Lieux Saints et Pèlerinages d'Orient, Paris 1985, 300; R.L. Vann, The Pilgrim's Harbor at Caesarea Maritima: Akten des XII. Internationalen Kongresses für Christliche Archäologie, Vatican City - Münster 1995, 1242-1243; see the commentaries on Acts.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

CORNERSTONE. The 4th-c. *christological disputes on the person of *Jesus Christ left their mark on *iconography with gammadia. For this reason, these gammadia are today called "christological." These letters are tied either to the symbolic language of numbers they represent or to the image that the individual signs reveal. The letter Γ (gamma) underwent several developments in early Christian iconography. It represents the number three and quickly began to represent the *Trinity. When one flips it, it becomes the capital L in Latin, through no coincidence with the corresponding letter in Greek. This letter, through its angle, revealed the image of the cornerstone and became its symbol. It is similar to the other gammadia such as the small o (omicron), to represent 100, the ϕ (phi) for a distaff, ζ (zeta) to represent the awful character of a person and the letter I (iota) to represent a ship's mast. The letter Γ flipped upside down into an L became a symbol of Christ the cornerstone.

The Fathers spoke of Christ the cornerstone by explaining Is 28:16; Zach 10:4; 1 Pet 2:6; Eph 2:20-21; and most especially Ps 118:22. According to *Origen (Comm. Ioh. 1,148-149: SC 120, 134-136), the rock of Psalm 118:22-23 is none other than *Jesus Christ, as Mt 21:42 and Acts 4:11 show. *Ambrose, in his Commentary on Lk 24:5 (Exp. Lc. 2,86), writes that the church is the mother of the living and God has built it upon Jesus Christ, the cornerstone upon whom the entire edifice grows. For *Didymus of Alexandria (Zacc. 1,259: SC 83, 326-328), Christ has united two walls into one corner, one formed of Jews (*Christians and Jews) that have come over to the gospel, and the other formed by *pagans that have come to Christianity. The church is formed of Jews and Greeks and has as its head Jesus Christ, who joins the building into one sole corner, making one sole building. *Augustine also says that the corner is the point of meeting for the two walls, the two peoples. The walls are not joined in the corner unless they come from two different directions. For St. *John of Damascus (Nat. 6: SC 80,60), from the mountain of the Lord that rises above every hill and mountain, the height of the angels and men, the cornerstone, Christ, has been detached—Christ, who unites what is divided: divinity and humanity, angels and men, pagans and Israel according to the flesh, into one sole spiritual Israel.

The gammadia L, the cornerstone, appears for the first time with its christological meaning in the catacomb of the Via Dino Compagni in *Rome on a person's pallium (4th c.). In his left hand, this person holds a scroll resting on his hip and with his right the hem of his pallium on which is portrayed the L. At times it is represented with a double L, as on the pallium of St. *Stephen (6th c.,) and the small basilica called the "basilica of the Traditio clavium," and the cemetery of Commodilla at *Rome. At *Naples, in the only painted arcosolium in the cemetery of St. Severo, a person shows on the hem of the pallium the same gammadia flipped in the opposite direction, ⅃, a perspectivism of sorts.

The use of the L as cornerstone became very widespread. One finds it at *Ravenna in the side chapel of the mausoleum of *Galla Placidia (5th c.). In the procession of the *martyrs of S. Apollinare Nuovo, it appears in a pair (LL) on the pallium of St. *Hippolytus (6th c.). At *Milan, in the small chapel of St. Aquilino, on the *mosaic of the apse on the righthand side, the young Christ seated on a throne in the middle of the apostolic college, displays the L on the hip of his pallium (5th c.). In the apse of *Parentium one can see the Madonna with child and the two angels with L's.

The Lateran Triclinium of Piazza San Giovanni, Rome, ends in an apse with a mosaic. It is from the 8th c. but was entirely redone in the 18th. In the conch, Christ holds a book open with the words: pax vobis. Around him stand the *apostles, dressed in club-shaped tunics and the pallium, bearing the gammadia. The L as cornerstone is read on the pallium of the first apostle on the lefthand side, and on the right of the fifth. The use of the gammadion L at the Basilica of Santa Maria in Trastevere and S. Francesca Romana continued into the Middle Ages. It is difficult to say, however, if this was deliberate or merely a duplication of earlier models. The zeal with which it was used in the early centuries was lost, and an investigation into the matter is no longer easy.

A. Quacquarelli, La simbologia delle lettere cristologiche nel Battistero degli ariani di Ravenna: RomBarb 2 (1977) 231-246; Id., Il monogramma cristologico (gammadia): VetChr 15 (1978) 5-21; Id., Il monogramma cristologico (gammadia) H: VetChr 16 (1979) 5-20; Id., Catechesi liturgica e iconologica alla Trinità nei primi secoli. Gammadia (lettera cristologica) G: VetChr 18 (1981) 5-32; Id., La lettera cristologica (gammadia) I nella iconografia dei primi secoli: VetChr 23 (1986) 5-18; Id., Retorica patristica e sue istituzioni interdisciplinari, Rome 1995, 221- 225; T. Baarda, "The Cornerstone": An Aramaism in the Diatessaron and the Gospel of Thomas: NT 37 (1995) 285-300; D. Mazzoleni, s.v. Gammadia, in F. Bisconti (ed.), Temi di iconografia paleocristiana, Vatican City 2000, 185-186.

A. Quacquarelli

CORPUS. The term corpus for a group of writings on the same subject was already used by the ancients. *Cassiodorus used it for a collection of letters, Pope *Gelasius for the totality of the books of the Bible (Ep. 9,1). D. Gothofredus (1583) applied it to his edition of the Codex Justinianis, Corpus iuris civilis*. The word was extended to other fields: Latin poets, Byzantinology, inscriptions. The great modern patristic collections adopted it (instead of Bibliotheca): Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, Vienna 1866; Corpus scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium, Paris, then Louvain; Corpus Christianorum, Turnhout 1953.

From the 16th c. the first collections and "libraries" of the Fathers appeared, at first containing minor authors and works, major authors having their own editions. We will mention, in chronological order, the following: the 1528 Basel Library, by J. Sichard, titled Antidotum contra diversas omnium fere saeculorum haereses, followed by the Zurich Bibliotheca Patrum, eds. C. Gesnerius and J. Simlerus, 1572, mainly *christological. In 1575 the Bibliotheca Patrum Parisiensis appeared, in 8 volumes ed. by Margarin de la Bigne and arranged by subject: it was the reply to the Centuries of Magdeburg and was reprinted and added to many times.

Margarin's enterprise was transformed by the Bibliotheca Patrum Coloniensis of 1618, in 14 volumes in chronological order, each volume corresponding to the centuries of the authors. Doubled in size, it became the Maxima Bibliotheca Patrum, Lyons 1677, in 27 volumes from the 1st to the 16th c.

In 1765–1781 the Bibliotheca Veterum Patrum was published in 14 volumes by A. Galland; it was a landmark, reproducing, for the Greeks, the Greek text. Migne abandoned the title of Bibliotheca (which he reserved for his own enterprise) and adopted that of Cursus (already used for other collections); for the first time in the history of publishing, he published in his corpus all the works of all writers, major and minor, providing the opera omnia, including spuria, in 221 volumes for the Patrologia Latina (1844–1864) and 161 volumes for the Patrologia Graeca (1857–1866).

Th. Ittig, De Bibliothecis et Catenis Patrum, Leipzig 1707; J.G. Dowling, Notitia scriptorum SS. Patrum, Oxford 1939; A. Hamman, J.P. Migne. Le retour aux Pères de l'Église, Paris 1975.

A. Hamman

CORSICA. The absence of explicit historical sources, with the exception of the Gregorian correspondence, and the scarcity of archaeological sources mean that as yet we have no exhaustive picture of the topography and monuments of early Christian Corsica. Of the five presumed primitive dioceses on the island (Aleria, Mariana [now Lucciana], Sagona [now Vico], Aiacciu and perhaps Nebbiu [now Saint-Florent]), only two, Mariana on the E coast and Sagona on the W coast, have thus far been subject to partial archaeological investigation. A single *martyr is attested for Corsica in the Mart. hier., Iulia, but this may be Julie of Carthage, as already suggested by Lanzoni.

At Mariana, excavation near the medieval cathedral has revealed a very interesting architectural complex. Along one of the decumani of the Roman city was built a three-aisled basilica of considerable dimensions (38.60 x 17.90 m), inserted into the existing (imperial-era) urban fabric, reusing foundations of earlier structures (shops and dwellings, and an arcade running along the decumanus). SE of it was a baptistery with central pool, initially cruciform but later refashioned as a smaller octagon. The baptistery is built over an earlier small baths complex. These two buildings had mosaic pavements, only partly preserved: in the basilica, along the N and S sides of the raised presbytery, a series of panels with geometric motifs; on the presbytery the depiction, unique in the West, of the OT scene of the lion and ox reconciled in the kingdom, eating hay together (Is 11:6) with the words: [leo et bos simul p] aleas manduc[abunt]. In the baptistery figurative themes prevail: the oceans, two ducks, two fish, two dolphins and a single biblical reference, the deer at the spring (Ps 42:1). While the complex was first dated to the 2nd half of the 4th c., study of the mosaics and architecture, as well as historical and topographical data, led me to date the initial phase of the complex to the early 6th c., attributing its construction to *orthodox *African bishops who took refuge in Corsica during the reign of Thrasamund (496–523). Corsica (like Sardinia) was in fact a *Vandal province from 455–533. New stratigraphic data (2003) from the excavation of the sealed layers under the base of the mosaics, which were taken up in 2002, lead us now to move the date of the construction of the episcopal complex to the 2nd half of the 6th c., i.e., after the *Byzantine reconquest of Corsica. Also at Mariana, outside the urban settlement in an imperial-age necropolis, was the cemeterial basilica of St. Perteu (Parthaeus), perhaps an African (or his relics?) who landed in Corsica with the very bishops who built this edifice in his honor. These buildings remained in use during the early Middle Ages, with considerable restoration of the urban basilica and the baptistery; they were rebuilt from scratch in Pisan times (12th-13th c.): the urban basilica was moved further N, that of St. Perteu was rebuilt over the old one, with a slightly different orientation. Recent archaeological data have allowed us to ascertain that the urban site of Mariana was occupied without interruption until the 16th c.

At Sagona, excavation has revealed elements of the (presumed) primitive cathedral, dedicated to a St. A[p]pianus, perhaps also an African (at least according to a late passio), who would therefore be linked to the orthodox refugees to Corsica. This thesis is reinforced by the discovery, in 1965, of a dedicatory tile of a church or a venerated burial which says: [in honore san]cti Apiani ivbante deo pavlvs fecit; it cannot be determined whether Paulus was a bishop, an ecclesiastic or a generous lay donor, there being no other reference in the sources. Following the recent finds at Mariana and their chronology, it is difficult to date the ruins at Sagona to before the mid 6th c.: an apse, polygonal (three sided) outside and semicircular inside, and a very modest cruciform baptistery with pool initially circular, then made polygonal, perhaps in medieval times. A Pisan-style cathedral, then a small chapel (18th c.), were built over the early-Christian church. The apse of the primitive basilica has been found (polygonal outside, semicircular inside), with some connected rooms, and the baptistery, with the foundations of a small circular pool in the center. For now, we have no other data relative to the urban fabric of Sagona during *Late Antiquity and the early Middle Ages.

A dig at Bravona, a small center N of Aleria but perhaps still in the diocese of Mariana, discovered a small baptismal church (cruciform pool), probably from the 2nd half of the 6th c. An important small *Longobard (Lombard)-era treasure (silver coins) was found there. The small complex was rebuilt in a medieval phase, ca. the 12th c.

In the valley of the Golo (a river emptying into the sea at Mariana), in the diocese of Mariana, under a medieval parish complex has been discovered a baptismal church (two apsed halls side by side), with cruciform pool and the remains of mosaics, also probably from the 2nd half of the 6th c.

We have nine letters of Pope *Gregory the Great concerning Corsica. They give a difficult picture of the Christianization of the island and the state of the dioceses, regularly without bishops and regular clergy, and with no *monasteries on the island. The two most important letters regard the construction of a rural baptismal church, during two different periods and at the pope's expense, in the mountains of the diocese of Aleria, to which an episcopium would be later added. At this point we have nothing to indicate where this complex might have been located.

For past archaeological finds: G. Moracchini Mazel, Les monuments paléochrétiens de la Corse, Paris 1967; N. Duval, Corse, Les premiers monuments chrétiens de la France - 1. Sud-est et Corse, Paris 1995, 308-365; H. Lavagne, Les fouilles de Mariana, 9, Les mosaïques paléochrétiennes, Cahiers Corsica, 1981, 97; G. Moracchini Mazel, Les fouilles de Mariana, 10, Les églises cimétériales de San Parteo, Cahiers Corsica, 1992, 146-148. For more recent sources, finds and interpretations: F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia, dalle origini al principio del VII secolo, Faenza 1927, II, 683-702; Ph. Pergola, Vandales et Lombards en Corse: sources historiques et archéologiques, in La Cultura in Italia tra Tardo Antico and Alto Medioevo (Rome, 12-16 novembre 1976), Rome 1981, II,913-917; Ph. Pergola, L'administration vandale; Grégoire le Grand et le malgoverno byzantin; la tentative manquée d'une hégémonie pontificale, in Mémorial des Corses (ed. F. Pomponi), Ajaccio 1981, I,226-255; S.P. Scalfati, Il monachesimo in Corsica al tempo di Gregorio I, S. Benedetto nel suo tempo, in Atti dell'VIII Congresso Internazionale di Studi sull'Alto Medioevo (1980), Spoleto 1982, 761-772; Ph. Pergola, Observations sur la chronologie des mosaïques de la basilique et du baptistère de Mariana (Corsica), in III Colloquio Internazionale sul Mosaico Antico (Association Internationale pour l'Étude de la Mosaïque Antique - Ravenne, septembre 1980), Ravenna 1984, 401-440; Ph. Pergola, Considérations nouvelles sur les mosaïques et les sculptures du complexe paléochrétien de Mariana (Corsica), in Actes du X^{e} congrès international d'archéologie chrétienne (Thessalonique, septembre 1980), Vatican City - Thessalonica 1984, 397-408; Ph. Pergola, Mariana, Topographie chrétienne des cités de la Gaule des origines au milieu du VIII^{e} siècle, II, Paris 1986, 98-102; Ph. Pergola, C. Vismara (ed.), Castellu (Haute-Corse) - Un établissement rural de l'antiquité tardive. Fouilles récentes (1981-1985), Documents d'Archéologie Française, 18, Paris 1989; Ph. Pergola, Gli interventi di Gregorio Magno in Corsica, aspetti religiosi, socio-economici e politici, in Atti del Convegno Gregorio Magno e il suo tempo (Roma 9-12 maggio 1990), SEA, 33 (1991) 103-108; Ph. Pergola, La Corsica dell'alto medioevo: un crocevia politico, economico e militare tra l'Africa e la costa tirrenica, Medioevo Saggi and Rassegne 24 (La Corsica e il mondo mediterraneo nell'età medioevale), C.N.R., Cagliari 1999, 11-25; Ph. Pergola, La Corse, Alle origini della parrocchia rurale (IV-VIII sec.), Seminario di Archeologia Cristiana, Rome 19 March 1998; (ed. Ph. Pergola), Sussidi allo studio delle antichità cristiane, XII, Vatican City, 1999, 7-10; 205-213; Ph. Pergola, La Corse chrétienne dans l'Église Universelle des origines à la fin du haut moyen âge: Corsica Christiana - 2000 ans de christianisme, 1, Ajaccio 2001, 14-36; Ph. Pergola, Aux origines de la paroisse rurale: bilan l'Italie et la Corse, Colloque international "aux origines de la paroisse rurale en Gaule Méridionale, IV^{e}-IX^{e} siècle," Université de Toulouse-II-Le Mirail - mars 2003 (dir. Chr. Delaplace), Toulouse 2005, 173-192.

Ph. Pergola

COSMAS and DAMIAN, doctors, martyrs, thaumaturges (3rd-4th c.). The first historical evidence concerning Cosmas and Damian regards their cult. *Theodoret of Cyrrhus mentions the basilica dedicated to them at Cyrrhus (Ep. ad Anatolium: PG 84, 747) and the martyrion of Cosmas alone (Ep. 145: SC 114, 168), which in fact also contained remains of his brother, according to the ancient practice of indicating groups of saints by the name of just one of them. Uncertain is the information according to which, in 400 (before Theodoret), *Rabbula, future bishop of *Edessa and saint, was converted by a miracle which occurred during a visit to the sanctuary of Cyrrhus or the chapel of St. Cosmas at Beroea, near *Aleppo (Peeters, 665; Luongo, 37 note 13). According to the archdeacon Theodosius (De situ terrae sanctae 32: CCL 175, 125) their tomb at Cyrrhus was a *pilgrimage destination in the 6th c. and was located on the site where they were killed, probably that which the tradition calls Phereman. The emperor *Justinian, healed by the two saints, had an outstanding devotion to them. *Procopius describes more than once the sovereign's gratitude toward his healers, in honor of whom he enlarged and fortified Cyrrhus, site of the sanctuary (De aedificiis I,VI,5 for the miracle regarding the emperor; II,XI,2-4 for the history of the city, which flourished also for political-military reasons). The two thaumaturges' fame is attested at Edessa, where in 457 Bishop Nonno had a martyrion built in their honor in the city's hospital (Chronicon Edessenum 68).

Parallel to the above was the historical-legendary spread of their *relics. Procopius says that in his day the remains were at Cyrrhus. In Edessa, the bodies of Cosmas and Damian were said to lie separately in two churches, with a division between groups, the creation of two different seats of the cult and of thaumaturgy, and significant economic benefits (Chronicon of Rahmani; see Luongo 38 n. 18).

A church dedicated to them at *Jerusalem, with a *monastery and a hospice for pilgrims, is attested by the nun Damiana in *John Moschus's Pratum spirituale (ch. 127: PG 87/3, col. 2990): the names of the two saints were very popular in antiquity. At *Constantinople there were six churches dedicated to them, all built by either patriarchs or imperial couples between the 5th and 6th c. The most important is the sanctuary which Paulinus, *Theodosius II's rival, had built in 439. A thaumaturgical site par excellence, the prodigies narrated in the Libellus miraculorum occurred there; falling into decay, it was later restored by Justinian and was described by Procopius, who captures the pilgrims' emotion upon their arrival, seeing the temple high above the promontory of the Kosmidion (De aedificiis I, VI, 5-8). Finally, at *Thessalonica Cosmas and Damian appear in the dome mosaic in the Church of St. George: the inscription calls them doctors and puts their feast in September (Delehaye, Les origines, 232).

Their recognition in the West began in the 5th c.; Pope *Symmachus (498–514) had an oratory built in their name near the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore (*Liber pontificalis I, Duchesne, 262), which then became a monastery; *Felix IV (526–530) obtained two buildings in the forums, the Templum Urbis and the Templum Romuli, and turned them into the basilica which survives today. The focal point of the two saints' cult in *Italy, its 6th-c. mosaic presents the two healers as they approach Christ, introduced by *Peter and *Paul who, as *apostles and patrons of the Urbe, are larger than them. At the sides are St. Theodore and Felix IV, the pontiff, with a model of the church in his hand, portrayed alive in the glory of the saints. The inscription in distichs is dedicated to the two Eastern doctors, *martyrs who have become like a spes salutis for the people. Praise for the pope is not lacking: the text opens by emphasizing the beauty of the hall, resplendent with bright metal, and in which shines a light of faith that is even more precious.

On the opposite side of the forum is the place of worship dedicated to the Dioscuri, *pagan healers par excellence, and the spring of Esculapius, god of medicine, the Roman equivalent of Asclepius. The basilica's position seems significant, just as it is interesting to note that the monastery of St. Clement at Subiaco, said to be founded by St. *Benedict on the ruins of *Nero's villa on the right bank of the Aniene, was dedicated to them by the *abbot Honorius (Caraffa, BS IV, 225).

As for the legends which transmit their life, works and martyrdom, the Constantinople Synaxarion distinguishes three pairs of anargiri saints ('unmercenary saints,' physicians who required no payment) of the same name, to which correspond three different narrative schemes, which come together in the Vita Asiatica, Passio Romana and Passio Arabica. This shows that their "history," a sort of jumbled mass, changed as it took root in different places (Peeters, Le tréfonds, 66).

The Vita Asiatica (BHG 372-375c), handed down in over 100 MSS, tells of Theodotia, a pious and faithful woman who used Scripture to educate her two sons Cosmas and Damian. These had the ability to heal people and animals, a gift from the *Holy Spirit which they used without asking for pay, following Mt 10:8. A woman, Palladia, came to them; like the hemorrhaging woman in the gospel, she had futilely spent her money on doctors and was confined to bed. The two saints healed her; the healed woman prevailed on Damian to accept three eggs; upon returning, Cosmas became indignant with his brother and said that they would not be buried together. Damian died first; Cosmas continued his battle against evil alone. Among his patients was a lame camel that he healed and which, on the death of his healer, hastened to reveal that the quarrel between the two brothers was settled and urged that the two be buried together, which took place at Phereman. The narrative presents other miracles occurring in this same place, near Cyrrhus: a sleeping peasant swallows a serpent, then vomits it up; the wife of Malchus, entrusted by her husband to the saints' protection as he departed on a journey, becomes a prey of the devil, who is then defeated by the two "under the appearance of knights." The text was extremely popular, despite the fact that the two personalities are vague, and not even their dies natalis are mentioned. At *Constantinople they were honored on 1 November.

The Passio Romana (BHG 376-377e), more complex in structure, has a prologue in which the martyrs are exalted as models of holiness par excellence. Cosmas and Damian are introduced, without any mention of their family or background, in their guise as generous and disinterested followers of Christ who have given all for the poor, according to Mt 19:21. The devil has them denounced to Emperor Carinus as wicked atheists and magicians. Out of gratitude the inhabitants of their village hide them in a cave where the two pray, fast and keep vigil. The *pagans take hostages in their place; to avoid suffering to others, Cosmas and Damian give themselves up and are taken to the palace (at *Rome, possibly, although it doesn't say). The emperor accuses them of *magic and of not accepting money from their proselytes; he exhorts them to be grateful to the gods, who have given them the power to heal. The accused deliver a long speech which angers Carinus, who is punished by having his head contorted: blinded by the devil, he sees things upside down. The crowd is converted by the prodigy; the sovereign, declaring himself a lost sheep, confesses the faith and is healed; he then has the temples of the gods destroyed and releases Cosmas and Damian. There is no peace for them, however. The devil arouses their old teacher of medicine against them, envious over his disciples' success. Under the pretext of going to collect medicinal herbs, the new Cain draws them to a deserted place, kills them with a stone and hides the bodies in a canyon. The account is constructed according to the typical schemata of the late passions, with traits drawn from the *monastic world and a legendary quality: Carinus's conversion, which never happened, also appears in *John Malalas, in a *Syriac version and Greek adaptations.

The Passio Arabica has reached us in two versions. The first (BHG 378; AASS Septembris, VII, 439-440; Vat. 886 and 2027 from the Italo-Byzantine area; Deubner, Kosmas und Damian, 218-220) puts the trial of Cosmas and Damian, Arabian doctors (whose brothers are Anthimus, Leontius and Euprepius) at Aegeae, the Cilician city famous for the temple of Asclepius. It is 25 November: these Christians refuse to *sacrifice to the *idols; tortured, they ask for increased fury against them. The presiding judge, Lysius, condemns them to drowning, but they are miraculously saved. The magistrate then asks them to teach him magic arts, which he will exercise in *Hadrian's name. Two demons appear who flog the magistrate, who, when his face is contorted, thinks the gods are angry. The Christians tell him that stones (the idols) cannot become angry. New tortures accomplish nothing. Sent to the stake, the fire spares them: the ground opens and receives them, saving them; they reemerge as the flames die out (a clear point of contact with the story of *Thecla). Crucified, they are showered with stones and arrows, which miss them and strike their assailants (see Sir 27:25-27 and Ps 7:14-16). Only by decapitation is it possible to kill them.

The second version (BHG 379; Codex Barberinus VI 22; Deubner, Kosmas und Damian, 220-225) takes up the schema of the first, expanding it and moving the date to 17 October. Lysius is a diabolical tyrant; Cosmas and Damian, dedicated to discourses and to prayer, speak at length. The insane judge is punished, and it is the saints themselves who save him. At the time of their capture, they were living with their brothers in caves—there is a monastic dimension to the group. Cosmas is the real protagonist, a sort of spokesman for the group. All die, after a last prayer in which they invoke health of soul and body for those who remain. The Arabic origin of the saints has great weight, as do the evident points of contact with the acts of the martyrs of Cilicia.

Among the three pairs of saints—set in different geographical areas, at different times and with different liturgical feasts—there is nonetheless a strong tendency to intersect. Among mixed legends are the Acta siriaca (BHO 210; Bedjan, VI, 107-119; Brit. Mus. Addit. 14644), which joins features of the Passio Romana with the Asiatica; the Coptic-Arabic legend; John Malalas's Chronicle; the anonymous Byzantine Passio (BHG 373d) and the paraphrase of John Xiphilinus, which has reached us in a *Georgian translation (Luongo, 43-44 and 59-62). The Syriac legend, prior to the 5th c., is probably one of the first rings in an uninterrupted chain of traditions, which rests on some historical data which cannot be doubted. Cosmas and Damian lived between the 3rd and 4th c. and were doctors and anargiri; persecuted, they confessed the faith. Even if they died a natural death, they were in fact compared to martyrs. Their cult and relics spread simultaneously from Cirrestica in Syria to many cities large and small, with the consequent flourishing of a whole literature about them, focused on the need to *exorcise sickness and suffering through faith (Delehaye, Saints et reliquaires d'Orient, 138; van Esbroeck, La diffusion, 61-77).

The Libellus miraculorum records the miracles which occurred at the sanctuary of Constantinople. The text, edited by Deubner on the basis of 25 manuscripts, relates 40 prodigies from between the 6th-7th c. and 1300. A new collection, with 14 different miracles, was printed by Ruprecht. The text shows the saints at work, and the reader can follow the development and the various results of the rite of incubatio*. Illnesses cured were dropsy, cancer, stomach problems, hemorrhages, in addition to the usual gospel miracles concerning the blind, deaf, mute, lame and demon-possessed. The text is also characterized by a particular narrative style.

Among the problems raised by the famous pair is that of their aspect as a Christian response to the figures of the Dioscuri and of Asclepius: this question was central to a debate involving Deubner, Lucius and Delehaye.

In the West the predominant text seems to be the Passio Arabica: the Acta latina edited by Mombritius have many points of contact with it (BHL 1967; AASS Septembris VII, 440-442). They put the dies natalis at 27 September; the events unfold at Aegeae under *Diocletian and *Maximian. The trial is underway in court against doctors who heal in the name of Christ and who do not allow the gods to be worshiped. Cosmas presents himself and his brothers; together, all refuse to sacrifice to the idols. Tortured and flogged, they remain unhurt; they pray to the Lord and provoke the magistrate, who seeks to convince the "without-a-god," the Christian atheists. Chained and thrown into the sea, they are saved by an angel. Accused of casting spells, Cosmas reacts strongly and reaffirms his belief in Christ. The pagan says he is ready to follow them, and two demons slap him; afraid, he asks help of his victims, who free him. After dramatic confrontations, the protagonists are returned to jail. The next day, the new magistrate Lysius, irritated by their prayers and their refusal to sacrifice, orders the pyre lit: a sudden earthquake causes the flames to burn the pagans instead. Other tortures are followed by angelic interventions and prayers until, in a dramatic crescendo, they are crucified and stoned by the crowd; the stones and arrows fall on those who launch them. They must resort to decapitation, and all of the brothers return to God.

In Latin, the tendency of the Passio Arabica and Vita Asiatica to intersect is attested by the Acta tertia (BHL 1969; ed. Stilting, AASS Septembris VII, 443-444). The story of Theodotia's sons, physicians to people and animals, takes place at Aegeae, where they will be buried. A larger version also exists, with an expansion of its themes and a search for the marvelous (BHL 1070; ed. Surius, 722-726; AASS Septembris VII, 444-448).

Cosmas and Damian seem to be the last saints included in the list of the communicantes of the Mass, in the 1st half of the 6th c. (Kennedy 191-193). Unknown by the Depositio martyrum of 354, they are known to the Mart. hier. and to the Gelasian and Gregorian sacramentaries, on 27 September. Their fame spread quickly beyond the Urbe. In the 6th c. they are present in the mosaics of S. Michele at *Ravenna; *Gregory of Tours attests their fame in *Gaul, calling them twins, doctors and martyrs (In gloria martyrum 94). *Aldhelm, between the 7th and 8th c., *Bede, Usuard and Adone mention them in their martyrologies (Giannarelli 52-53). Known from Sicily to all of France, from *Germany to *Spain, they became the patrons of doctors, surgeons, pharmacists and of those who practiced even minor medicine. They specialized in the healing of plague, dropsy and kidney illnesses and were also the object of legendae novae (see Bartholomew of Trent, Passionale de sanctis 85 and the Legenda aurea of Jacobus de Voragine). At Florence in the 15th c. they held a unique position as patrons of the Medici family, protagonists of a political-cultural project that assured the saints a strong presence in the figurative arts of Humanism and the Renaissance (see Novembri, Sebregondi, Dillon Bussi), with a new flourishing of stories linked to their lives and miracles.

AASS Septembris, VII, Paris and Rome 1867, 400-448; BHG 372-392; BHL 1967-1979 (Novum Supplementum, 227-229); BHO 210; H. Leclercq, Cosme et Damien: DACL 3,2350-2367; P. Bedjan, Acta martyrum et sanctorum VI, Paris 1896; F. Caraffa, Cosma e Damiano: BS 4, 223-225; M.L. Casanova, Cosma e Damiano. Iconografia: BS 4, 225-237; W. Artelt, Kosmas und Damian mit ihren Brüdern Anthimus, Leonthius und Euprepius: LCI 7, 344-352; J. Rendel-Harris, The Dioscuri in the Christian Legends, Cambridge 1903; Id., The Cult of the Heavenly Twins, Cambridge 1906; L. Deubner, De incubatione, Leipzig 1900; L. Deubner, Kosmas und Damian, Texte und Einleitung, Leipzig 1907; W. Weih, Die syrische Kosmas und Damian Legende, Schweinfurt 1910; W.E. Crum, Placenames in Deubner's Kosmas und Damian: Proceedings Society Bibl. Arch. 30 (1908) 45-52; H. Delehaye, Cinq leçons sur la méthode hagiographique: AB 27 (1908) 221-224; Id., Les légendes hagiographiques, Brussels 1927; Id., Les origines du culte des martyrs, Brussels [2]1933; Id., Saints et reliquaires d'Orient: AB 53 (1935) 225-244; Id., Les recueils antiques des miracles des saints: AB 43 (1925) 8-18; Id., Les Passions des martyrs et les genres littéraires, Brussels [2]1966; F. Halkin, Publications récentes de textes hagiographiques grecs: AB 53 (1935) 366-381; E. Rupprecht (ed.), Cosmae et Damiani sanctorum medicorum vita(m) et miracula e codice londinensi, Berlin 1935; A. Pazzini, I santi nella storia della medicina, Rome 1937; P. Peeters, Le tréfonds oriental de l'hagiographie byzantine, Brussels 1950; G. Kaftal, SS. Cosmas and Damian, in Iconography of the Saints in the Tuscany Painting, Florence 1952, cols. 289-296; M.L. David-Danel, Iconographie des saints médicins Côme et Damien, Lille 1958; L. Réau, Côme et Damien, in Iconographie de l'art chrétien, III, I, Paris 1958, 332-338; G. Matthiae, Le chiese di Roma dal IV al X secolo, Bologna 1962; H. Skrobucha, Kosmas und Damian, Recklinghausen 1965; A. Wittmann, Kosmas und Damian. Kultausbreitung und Volksdevotion, Berlin 1967; R. Budriesi, La basilica dei SS. Cosma e Damiano a Roma, Bologna 1968; M.A. Linage Conde, Monasterios altomedievales españoles de los santos Cosme y Damián: Cuadernos de historia de la medicina española 9 (1970) 11-74; B.M. Apollonij Ghetti, Considerazioni sulla basilica dei SS. Cosma e Damiano: RivAC 56 (1974) 7-54; N. Fernández Marcos, Los Thaumata de Sofronio. Contribución al estudio de la incubatio cristiana, Madrid 1975; M. van Esbroeck, La diffusion orientale de la légende des saints Côme et Damien, in Hagiographie cultures et sociétés. IVe-XIIe siècles. Actes du colloque (Nanterre-Paris 2-5 mai 1979), Paris 1981, 61-77; M. van Esbroeck, La légende "romaine" de SS. Côme et Damien (BHG 373) et sa métaphrase géorgienne par Jean Xiphilin, I: OCP 47 (1981) 389-425; G. Fichtner, Das verpflanzte Mohrenbein. Zur Interpretation der Kosma und Damian Legende, in Medizin in mittelalterlichen Abenland, Darmstadt 1982, 323-343; J.-D. Jacquet, Le miracle de la Jambe Noire, in Les miracles miroirs de corps. Ouvrage collectif sous la responsabilité de J. Delis et O. Redon, Paris 1983, 21-52; S. Wilson (ed.), Saints and Their Cults: Studies in Religious Sociology, Folklore and History, Cambridge 1983; V. Tiberia, Il restauro del mosaico della basilica dei Santi Cosma e Damiano a Roma, Todi 1991; G. Luongo, Il "dossier" agiografico dei santi Cosma e Damiano, in Sant'Eufemia d'Aspromonte. Atti del convegno di studio per il bicentenario dell'autonomia (Sant'Eufemia di Aspromonte, 14-16 dicembre 1990), ed. S. Leanza, Soveria Mannelli 1997, 33-89; M. Fanfani, Cosma e Damiano, due medici santi nella storia della medicina e della città di Firenze, Florence 1998; M. Forlin Patrucco, Cosma e Damiano, in Il grande libro dei Santi. Dizionario enciclopedico, eds. C. Leonardi - A. Riccardi - G. Zarri, eds. E. Guerriero - D. Tuniz, vol. I, Cinisello Balsamo 1998, 491-492; J. Duffin, Saints Cosmas and Damian of Toronto: Origin and Meaning of the Medical Cults of Divine Twins, in Saints and the Sacred, J. Goering - F. Guardiani - G. Silano (eds.), New York-Ottawa-Toronto 2001, 11-24; E. Giannarelli (ed.), Cosma e Damiano dall'Oriente a Firenze, Florence 2002; A. Dillon Bussi, L'assenza di Cosma e Damiano nella miniatura fiorentina, in E. Giannarelli (ed.), Cosma e Damiano dall'Oriente a Firenze, Florence 2002, 110-129; V. Novembri, I santi Cosma e Damiano e la tradizione manoscritta nella Firenze medicea, ibid., 66-75; L. Sebregondi, Cosma e Damiano. Santi Medici e Medicei, ibid., 76-109; V. Novembri, Manoscritto Laurenziano Pluteo 20.8, ed. and tr., ibid., 149-191; E. Giannarelli, I cristiani e la medicina, Cosma e Damiano, ibid., 7-65.

E. Giannarelli

COSMAS Indicopleustes. The author of the Χριστανικὴ τοπογραφία was an *Egyptian, probably *Alexandrian, who traveled to the Black Sea and E *Africa but did not reach India or the island of Taprobane (Ceylon, Sri Lanka), since his information on them is secondhand; thus the name Indicopleustes is not really appropriate. Even the name Cosmas seems to derive from the subject of the work, i.e., the form of the universe (cosmos). In Photius's time (Bibl., cod. 36) it circulated anonymously: he calls it the Book of a Christian and only in 11th-c. MSS does the name of Cosmas first appear. Nor is it certain that the author later became a monk on *Sinai. Cosmas, who received no systematic education, claims to have learned everything from the *Nestorian *catholicos Mar *Aba (540–552), and he does indeed show Nestorian tendencies: in *exegesis he follows *Diodore of Tarsus, *Theodore of Mopsuestia and *Severian of Gabala (Antiochene school). The work was probably written in the decade before the council on the *Three Chapters (553) and published anonymously. Its purpose is clearly theological-exegetical-polemical. He wishes to demonstrate, against Greek science and Christians who follow it, that the universe has the same form as Moses's tabernacle, i.e., not spherical but cuboid. At the base is the earth, a long flat rectangle, its length twice its width, bordered by uninterrupted walls which meet at the top to form the celestial vault, or upper heaven. Between the upper heaven and the earth is the firmament, which divides the universe into two levels: the higher, where God and the just dwell, first entered by Christ after his *resurrection; and the lower, seat of human beings in this life. The inhabited world is surrounded by an ocean with various indentations or inlets, forming the inner seas; in its N part rises a very high mountain which hides the sight of the sun during the night; the stars are moved by angels, who live beneath the firmament. These and other statements meet with *Photius's disapproval; he also severely criticizes its style. Historically the work attests to Christian attitudes opposed to Greek culture and science; it is also important for its conscientious description of the geography of the countries visited, the historical information attached and the illustrations that accompany the text.

CPG III, 7468; PG 88, 52-470; W. Wolska-Conus, Cosmas indicopleustes. Topographie chrétienne, Paris 1968ff. (SC 141.159.197); Bardenhewer 5, 95-97; DACL 8, 820-849; Beck 416-417; S. Impellizzeri, La letteratura bizantina, Florence 1975, 186-189 and 423; Altaner 554; Patrologia V, 401-404.

A. De Nicola

COSMAS of Maiuma (674/676–751/752). Also called Cosmas of *Jerusalem, Cosmas Hagiopolites or Cosmas Melodus. Born ca. 674/676 at *Damascus; orphaned, he was raised, according to the legend, with *John of Damascus. He became a monk in the *laura of St. Sabas and in 735 was made bishop of Maiuma. Died 751/752. It seems that he spurred the Damascene to compose the Fount of Knowledge. His fame is linked to the composition of very refined hymns for the feasts of Our Lord and Our Lady. Doubts remain about their attribution, however, because of the tradition which has confused them with the works of his teacher, *Cosmas the Monk. We have some of his hymns in *Syriac translation. Besides poetry, he wrote commentaries on the poetry of his favorite author, *Gregory of Nazianzus.

Recently A. Kazhdan has questioned almost all of the information we have on the life of this person, emphasizing the inconsistency of the biographical tradition; his conclusions are very different from those commonly accepted and have not gained much support.

PG 98, 455-524; W. Christ - M. Paranikas, Anthologia Graeca carminum Christianorum, Leipzig 1971, 161-204 (a large part of the texts which are considered genuine in the PG are here rejected). Individual editions of new discoveries: A. Papadopoulos-Kerameus: ByzZ 14 (1905) 519-526; H.J.W. Tillyard, A Canon by Saint Cosmas: ByzZ 28 (1928) 25-37; H.G. Beck, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich, Munich [2]1977, 515ff.; Th.E. Detorakes, Κοσμᾶς ὁ Μελωδός. Βίος καὶ ἔργο, Thessalonica 1979 (the only monograph currently available); Testi mariani del primo millennio, ed. A. Gharib, II, Rome 1988, 594-610; Marienlexikon 3, 651-652 (important); Testi mariani del primo millennio, ed. A. Gharib, III, Rome 1988, 594-610; A. Kazhdan - S. Gero, Kosmas of Jerusalem: A More Critical Approach to His Biography: ByzZ 82 (1989) 122-132 (these scholars question Detorakes's earlier proposals); G. Menestrina, Note al commento di Cosma di Gerusalemme ai Carmina di Gregorio Nazianzeno, in C. Moreschini - G. Menestrina, Gregorio Nazianzeno teologo e scrittore, Bologna 1992, 217-226 (it is uncertain whether this commentary should be attributed to Cosmas the Elder [Cosmas the Monk] or Cosmas the Younger); G. Lozza (ed.), Commentario ai carmi di Gregorio Nazianzeno, Naples 2000.

C. Dell'Osso

COSMAS the Monk (or Cosmas the Elder) (7th-8th c.). Teacher of *John of Damascus, according to the latter's biography by John of Jerusalem (probably the patriarch who died in 970). A native of *Italy, Cosmas was captured by *Saracens and ransomed by John of Damascus's father, who charged him with John's education and that of his foster brother Cosmas, the future ecclesiastical poet. Cosmas was part of the *monastery of St. Sabas, near *Jerusalem. He wrote spiritual hymns, which tradition has confused with those of his disciple Cosmas.

Information on Cosmas the Monk comes from the biography of John of Damascus, written by John of Jerusalem (PG 94, 439-445); G. Menestrina, Note al commento di Cosma di Gerusalemme ai Carmina di Gregorio Nazianzeno, in C. Moreschini

- G. Menestrina, Gregorio Nazianzeno teologo e scrittore, Bologna 1992, 217-226 (it is uncertain whether this commentary should be attributed to Cosmas the Elder [Cosmas the Monk] or Cosmas the Younger).

J. Irmscher - C. Dell'Osso

COSMAS Vestitor (after 750; Βεστήτωρ designates an employee of the imperial wardrobe). A layman and author of some homilies preserved in MSS. We know nothing of his life. Flourished sometime between 740–850; useful as terminus a quo is the reference in one of his "encomia" to the Λειμωνάριον of *John Moschus (d. 619) (PG 87, 3, 2992-2993); as terminus ad quem, the presence of one of his works in cod. Ba 56 of Grottaferrata, 9th-10th c. In the manuscript tradition, his name is accompanied by the epithet μακάριος. One of his favorite subjects is *John Chrysostom: we have his Life (BHG 876 m), two Laudationes (BHG 880 a-b, c: the second unpublished), an Oratio de exilio (BHG 880 d); these are works of confused tradition, which repeat each other and give very common information known from other sources. Five Orationes (BHG 877 v-w-x, y, z, 878, 878 a) celebrate the translation of the saint's *relics (but the Synaxarion attributes others to him, incl. CPG III, 8162: Wenger, L'assomption . . . , 151): they are all—in chronological order, as Dyobouniotes has established—in cod. 231 of Athens National Library, and the fourth is also in other MSS. Ballerini (Sylloge, Rome 1856) has published Cosmas's Oratio in Ioachim et Annam (BHG 828); three laudationes Zachariae (BHG 1881 q-r, BHGn 1881 s) are unpublished. Four Orationes in dormitionem b.v. Mariae survive only in *Latin translation (cod. Aug. 80) and seem to be influenced by *Germanus I of *Constantinople: Mary's death and assumption are described in a way analogous to her son's death and *resurrection; legendary facts and theological statements are closely interwoven. There are doubts about the attribution to Cosmas of the very short fragmentum ascetico-physiologicum, ed. Wenger, L'assomption . . . , 152 n. 2.

CPG 8142-8163 (see Suppl. Noret, 2003); PG 65, 829-831; 106, 1005-1012; K.I. Dyobouniotes, EHBS 2 (1925) 50-83, 16 (1940) 151-155; A. Wenger, L'assomption de la T.S. Vierge dans la tradition byzantine du VI^e au X^e siècle, Paris 1955, 140-154, 315-333; F. Halkin, Douze récits sur saint Jean Chrysostome, Brussels 1977, 429-444; A. Wenger, Les Homélies inédites de Cosmas Vestitor sur la dormition: REByz 11 (1953) 284-300; Beck, 502; F. Halkin, Douze récits byzantins sur saint Jean Chrysostome, Brussels 1977, 429-442; Id., Zacharie, père de Jean Baptiste, Trois panégyriques par Cosmas Vestitor: AB 105 (1987) 151-163; LTK³ 6, 394-395; A.P. Orbàn, CCM 154, 99-126; Marienlexikon 3, 652; Testi mariani del primo millennio, ed. A. Gharib, II, Rome 1988, 572-577; BBKL 4,545–4,546; E. Follieri, Iota mutum: ripristino o eliminazione in alcuni testi bizantini: RCCM 36 (1994) 271-280.

A. Labate

COSMOCRATOR/KOSMOKRATOR. Already in *John's gospel the ruler of the material world is identified with the principle of *evil (Jn 12:31: "now shall the prince of this world be cast out"; 14:30: "the prince of this world is coming"). St. *Paul relates darkness to the powers that rule the world, presenting them as enemies against whom human beings fight (Eph 6:12: "We are not contending against flesh and blood, but against the principalities, the powers, the rulers of this present darkness"). *Origen has this Pauline passage in mind when he speaks of the light of the logos (λόγος) reaching into the darkness: "it has reached the dwelling of the principalities [κοσμοκράτορες]," Comm. in Jo. II, 26 (84, 2-3 Preuschen). In *gnosticism, the *Valentinians identify the "ruler of this world" (called the prince of this world—ἄρχων—as in John's gospel, or cosmocrator—κοσμοκράτωρ—under the influence of the Pauline passage cited above) with the devil, and relates him closely to the spirits of evil, produced by the grief (λύπη) of Sophia (Σοφία), the aeon expelled from the pleroma: see *Hippolytus, Ref. VI, 33 and 34 (162, 2 and 13 Wendland) and *Epiphanius, Pan. 31, 19, 4-6 (I 414, 23-415, 8 Holl); the biblical demiurge, the psychic being generated by Sophia, resides in the seventh heaven, or Hebdomas (ἑβδομάς), while the cosmocrator (κοσμοκράτωρ), created by the demiurge, inhabits the lower parts of the material universe (see Epiphanius, ibid.). *Basilides speaks of two princes (ἄρχοντες) of the material world, produced by Panspermia: the great prince (μέγας ἄρχων) who resides in the eighth heaven (ὁ ὀγδοάς) (Hippolytus, Ref. VII, 23, pp. 200, 24-25, 201, 8-9 and 15-16), and the second prince, inferior to the first, architect and immediate administrator of the whole material world, who resides in the Hebdomas (Hippolytus, Ref. VII, 24, p. 202, 5-10).

F.L. Cross - E.A. Livingstone (eds.), Cosmocrator: ODC 422.

S. Lilla

COSMOPOLITANISM. In ancient *philosophy, the conception of cosmopolitanism was developed above all by the Cynics and the *Stoics, who thought that the wise person was first of all a citizen of the "city of Zeus," inhabited by the deities and the rational creatures. Hence their claim that the wise person is at home everywhere and, therefore, the exile is not a κακόν or malum. Early in the Christian era, the Roman Stoic Musonius Rufus is a brilliant example of these conceptions.

In the Christian age, the city of Zeus was replaced by the city of God. That a Christian's πολίτευμα is first and foremost in heaven—and thus his or her patria is the *kingdom of heaven before any particular fatherland—was already stated in Phil 3:20. Between the 2nd and the 3rd c., the Christian philosopher *Bardesanes of Edessa, who fought against *Marcionism and *gnostic and *pagan determinism, in Liber legum regionum attests with satisfaction that the Christians in his day had spread in every nation and followed the law of Christ everywhere in the world. Before being citizens of a given state and following its laws, the Christians are citizens of the universal kingdom of Christ and obey Christ's law. The only parallel that Bardesanes draws for this transcendent citizenship of the Christian is that of the Jews, who, wherever in the world they may be, follow the Mosaic law before observing the laws and traditions of the places where they live.

It is interesting to observe that the Greek term κοσμοπολίτης in the Christian era is almost exclusively attested in *Hellenistic Jewish authors, such as *Philo of Alexandria—who was read and appreciated by many Christian *Fathers—and Christian ones. Philo in Opif. 3,4 refers it just to Moses, the author of both the law and *Genesis, the narrative on the creation of the cosmos (κοσμοποιΐα), presented by him as a preparation for the law. Thus, νόμος and κόσμος are in reciprocal harmony (συ κοσμοπολίτης νᾴδω), and the man who respects the law is immediately a citizen of the world, because he obeys the law of nature that governs the whole cosmos: τοῦ νομίμου ἀνδρὸς εὐθὺς ὄντος κοσμοπολίτου πρὸς τὸ βούλημα τῆς φύσεως τὰς πράξεις ἀπευθύνοντος, καθ' ἣν καὶ ὁ σύμπας κόσμος διοκεῖται. In Opif. 142,2 Philo maintains that, in particular, the first human being created by God was a real κοσμοπολίτης, who inhabited the whole cosmos without fear, and was endowed with authority over all other creatures and knew no war and, again, used the same law as the entire cosmos, i.e., the natural logos that is divine law: τῷ κοσμοπολίτῃ χρῆσθαιζπολιτείᾳ ᾗ καὶ σύμπας ὁ κόσμος αὕτη δέ ἐστιν ὁ τῆς φύσεως ὀρθὸς λόγος, νόμος θειος ὤν. In Gig. 61,2 Philo explains that the "men of God" are not κοσμοπολῖται in the sense of being inhabitants of this world, since they inhabit the other world, the noetic and divine world. Moses, in particular, is called κοσμοπολίτης in Conf. ling. 106,3, because "he inhabited the cosmos as a city and a patria." In Migr. 5,3 he takes up the Stoic idea that the wise person is κοσμοπολίτης. Indeed, in Vita Mos. I,157 the wise are described as participating in all divine goods, without possessing anything personally, not even themselves, and are κοσμοπολῖται, so that they do not belong to any particular city, because God is the king of all nations. Such persons are true κοσμοπολῖται in that they regard the whole cosmos as a city; the citizens of this city are all those who devote their life to wisdom, and the city is presided over by virtue (τὸν μὲν κόσμον ἐνόμισαν εἶναι πόλιν, πολίτας δὲ τοὺς σοφίας ὁμιλητάς, ἀρετῆς ἐγγραφούσης, ᾗ πεπίστευται τὸ κοινὸν πολίτευμα πρυτανεύειν, Spec. leg. II 45): Philo clearly inherited the Stoic ideal of the City of Zeus. In Somn. 1,243 Philo observes that the whole heaven and the cosmos are a votive offering to God, who has also made them, and the souls who inhabit the cosmos and love God make a votive offering of themselves and sanctify themselves (ὅσαι μέντοι κοσμοπολίτιδες ψυχαὶ καὶ θεοφιλεῖς, ἑαυτὰς ἀνιεροῦσιν). *Didymus the Blind in his Commentary on Psalms 29-34 (cod. 186,18) defines the κοσμοπολῖται as the inhabitants of the noetic world (γίνονται κοσμοπολῖται καὶ ὑπερβαίνουσιν τοῦτον καὶ τὸν ὑπὸ τούτου δηλούμενον κληρονομοῦσιν). The Apos. Con. VII, 34.39 present the human being as an inhabitant of the cosmos and—with a pun—an ornament to it: Καὶ τέλος τῆς δημιουργίας τὸ λογικὸν ζῷον, τὸν κοσμοπολίτην . . . κόσμου κόσμον αὐτὸν ἀναδείξας (the very same ideas are expressed in VIII 12.41). The human being must learn the reason why the cosmos was created and he was made its inhabitant (κοσμοπολίτην), so to learn his own nature. Eustathius of Thessalonica, De emendanda vita monachica 1, calls the monks οὐρανοπολῖται rather than κοσμοπολῖται, in that they inhabit heaven rather than this world. The only *pagan authors for whom the use of κοσμοπολίτης is attested in the Christian era are Diogenes Laertius (VI 63), who ascribes the term to Diogenes the Cynic, who proclaimed himself an inhabitant of the cosmos (ἐρωτηθεὶς πόθεν εἴη, κοσμοπολίτης, ἔφη), and *Proclus (Chrest. 12): many cities claim to be Homer's homeland, but he would better be called κοσμοπολίτης.

It is evident that in Philo and in the Fathers the ancient Stoic ideal has been not only transferred but also transformed. In *Late Antiquity, moreover, a further issue closely related to this presented itself to the attention of the Fathers: if Christianity is fundamentally cosmopolitan, but in a transcendent sense, and all Christians are citizens of a kingdom that is not of this world, then Christianity should not limit itself to remaining within the boundaries of the Roman Empire but should extend to barbarian peoples too. As a matter of fact, this conclusion was not widely shared by Christian intellectuals, who often tended to conflate Christianity and the empire. *Rufinus of Aquileia was one of the very few who supported the *evangelization of barbarian peoples also beyond the boundaries of the Roman Empire, whereas *Horosius, for instance, rather than for the conversion of the barbarians outside the empire, hoped for their destruction. Before Rufinus, another admirer of *Origen, *Eusebius of Caesarea, the celebrator of the emperor who ceased the anti-Christian persecutions in the empire and paved the way for the Christian Roman Empire, held a universalistic notion of the empire, as an image of the heavenly kingdom ruled by God. Ideally, the empire should expand until it included all nations, all the earth, and all seas (an ideal that is found in *Themistius, and especially in his newly edited Πρὸς βασιλέα fragment, which I suspect was directed to *Theodosius). The ideal would have been that both Christianity and the empire could embrace all humanity. When it became clear that the empire could not conquer the barbarians, the problem arose whether to try to convert them all the same and expand Christianity beyond the boundaries of the empire, so that the Christians could share a common heavenly citizenship if not Roman citizenship. *Augustine's city of God, indeed, certainly did not coincide with the empire.

A. Lauras - H. Rondet, Le thème des deux cités dans l'oeuvre de saint Augustin, Études augustiniennes (Paris 1951), 97-160; R. Farina, L'impero e l'imperatore cristiano in Eusebio di Cesarea. La prima teologia politica del Cristianesimo, Zürich 1966; H.-I. Marrou, Theologie de l'histoire. Paris 1968; D.F. Donnelly, The "City of God" and Utopia: A Reevaluation, Augustinian Studies 8 (1977) 111-123; P. Piret, La Destinée de l'homme: la Cité de Dieu: un commentaire du De civitate Dei d'Augustin, Bruxelles 1991; M. Schofield, The Stoic Idea of the City, Cambridge 1991; J.L. Moles, Cynic Cosmopolitanism, in R. Bracht Branham - M.-O. Goulet-Cazé, eds., The Cynics, Berkeley 1996, 105-120; R.J. Dougherty, Magnum opus et arduum: the Structure and the Argument of St. Augustine's De civitate Dei, Ann Arbor 1997; I. Ramelli, L'Europa e i Cristiani, in Studi sull'Europa antica, ed. M. Sordi, II, Alessandria 2001, 263-283; Id., La Città di Zeus di Musonio Rufo nelle sue ascendenze vetero-stoiche e nell'eredità neostoica e cristiana, Stylos 11 (2002) 151-158; P. Kleingeld - E. Brown, Cosmopolitanism, in E.N. Zalta, ed., The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, http://plato.stanford.edu/entries/cosmopolitanism; I. Ramelli, "Nostra autem conversatio in caelis est" (Phil. 3.20). Note su conversatio nei classici latini, nelle antiche versioni bibliche e nella patristica, Sileno 31 (2005) 139-158; Id., L'inedito Pròs basiléa di Temistio, con due postille e due tavole, in collaboration with E. Amato, ByzZ 99 (2006) 1-67; Id., Bardesane Kata Heimarmenes, Bologna 2008; Id., Stoicismo romano minore, Milan 2008; D. Konstan, Cosmopolitan Traditions, in R. Balot, ed., A Companion to Greek and Roman Political Thought, Oxford 2009.

I. Ramelli

COSMOS (Kosmos). In all of Greek thought, the idea of "universe" is closely associated with that of "order": this is clear from the term kosmos itself, which has both meanings in Greek. Two main motifs characterize the Greek conception of the cosmos: the tendency to consider it a living being, beautiful, animate, intelligent, blessed and divine, in which harmony and concord reign supreme; and the idea of its contemplation, first origin of philosophy, of human ethics and of the conviction of the existence of a supreme ordering principle, immanent or transcendent. Both ideas were taken into *patristics.

For Plato, the universe is the best, most beautiful and most perfect of things that have come into being (Tim. 29a, 92c; cf. Philebus 30a, 30b), a living being with *soul and intelligence, born through the providence of the demiurge (Tim. 30b; cf. Politicus 269 c-d; Philebus 30a), a happy and sensible god (Tim. 34b, 92c) governed by its own soul (Tim. 34c; Laws X,896 d-e). Contemplation of the order of the heavens is the origin of the greatest gift given to human beings, namely, philosophy (Tim. 47 a-b); through contemplation the ordered revolutions of the heavens become the model of the order that must reign in the human mind (Tim. 47 b-c); contemplation always produces in human beings the belief in a higher, ordering intellect (Philebus 28e; Laws XII, 966 d-e); the study of astronomy prepares us to understand transcendent realities (Rep. VII, 529b). In the young *Aristotle, still under Plato's influence, we see both the idea of the divinity of the cosmos (Perì philosophias, Rose fr. 26 = Walzer fr. 26) and that of contemplation of the heavens as origin of belief in the gods and in a higher cause (op. cit., Rose fr. 10, 11 and 12 = Walzer fr. 12 and 13). For the mature Aristotle, the universe is divine (De caelo I,270 b 10-11), animate (De caelo II,285 a 29), eternal and unalterable (De caelo I,270 a 12-14; 270 a 25-27; 270 b 1-2).

The author of the ps.-Aristotelian treatise De mundo emphasizes the close relationship between philosophy and contemplation (391 a 1-8) and says that nothing is more excellent than the contemplation of the universe and the heavenly bodies (391 a 24–b 3), and he links the cosmos indissolubly to the idea of order safeguarded by God (391 b 9-12). For the *Stoics, the cosmos is a living, intelligent, rational, animate, absolutely perfect being (SVF I,110, 111, 113, 114; II,633, 634, 638, 641), governed by providence (SVF II,633, 634), ruled and pervaded by the divine pneuma immanent in it (SVF II,638), a real god (SVF II,637 and 641): the logos, the divine principle that permeates it and is identical with the pneuma (SVF I,85, 87, 88, 160; II,441), is also its law (nomos) (SVF I,162); and the law that regulates it, determined by the logos, is the same law that must regulate human ethics, since human reason (logos) is nothing but a fragment of the universal logos (see, e.g., SVF II,634). The concept of "sympathy" (or interrelation) between the elements of the universe, the first cause of its harmony, goes back esp. to the Stoic Posidonius (see K. Reinhardt, Kosmos und Sympathie, Munich 1926, 103-121; the section "Die Harmonie im Weltraume" in K. Gronau, Poseidonios und die jüdischchristliche Genesisexegese, Leipzig - Berlin 1914, 142-146; and M. Pohlenz, Die Stoa, Göttingen 1959, I,217 and II,108, where the relevant material is collected). In Stoicism too we see the idea of contemplation of the order of the universe, which allows human beings to believe in the divine principle immanent in it (SVF I,528; Manilius, Astron. IV,916-919; Cicero, De nat. deor. II,2, 4; II,21, 54-55).

*Philo of Alexandria adopts the Stoic concept of nature governed by the universal logos, which is also nomos (Opif. 3 and 143; Prob. 62), and of the cosmos as a state, of which human beings become citizens (Opif. 3 and 143; cf. SVF II,1127-1131); he repeatedly insists on contemplation of the sky, which allows one to ascend to its cause (see the passages cited in S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 171 n. 2).

The idea of a close relationship between contemplation of the stars and the existence of a creating and ordering principle recurs in Corp. Herm. V,3-4 (Nock- Festugière I,61, 8-10 and 22-23). In *Middle Platonism, Alcinous says that astronomy makes it possible for one to pass from the sensible to the intelligible world and to attain an idea of the demiurge (Did. 161, Hermann 22-28 and 30-32).

In *Neoplatonism, Plotinus, arguing against the *gnostics, who despised the material world and thought it the product of an inferior diety, celebrates the beauty, symmetry and order of the sensible world, and maintains that its contemplation cannot fail to inspire the judicious person with a religious feeling which brings him to believe in its cause (Enn. II 9, 16 (II 134, 49-135, 55 Bréhier).

In patristics, *Clement of Alexandria says that the human being's upright posture is to allow him to contemplate the heavens (Strom. IV,163,1), that this contemplation is one of the "gnostic's" main occupations (Strom. IV, 163, 1) and that through astronomy the "gnostic" can raise himself to the heavens and approach the power of the Creator (Strom. VI,80,3 and 90,3). Abraham's interest in astronomy is for him, as for Philo, the ideal model of this "gnostic" attitude (Strom. I,31,2; V,8,6; VI,80,3). He also follows Philo in adopting the Stoic concept of the universe ruled by the logos (cf. the two parallel passages of Clement, Protr. 5,2 and Philo, De Plant. 9 in S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 211). *Origen fully approves *Celsus's description of the cosmos as a complete and perfect work of God (Cels. IV,99 [I,373,6-8]) and, like Plotinus, says that contemplation of the order of the cosmos produces a sense of veneration for its Creator (Cels. 1,23 [I,73,23-24], VIII,38 [II,253,17-18]). The Posidonian concept of "sympathy," "concord," "communion" and "harmony" which prevail in the universe reemerges in *Basil the Great (Hom. II in Gen. 14 B [ed. Giet, SC 26 bis, 148, 11-14; PG 29, 33 A 11-15]). *Gregory of Nyssa too, in a passage strongly influenced by Stoic ideas, states that whoever contemplates the celestial revolutions, the conjunctions and the separations of the stars will be convinced of the existence of "a wise and creative divine power, which reveals itself in beings, pervades the whole and adapts the parts to the whole" (De an. et res.: PG 46.25 C 8-28 A 12; cf. De beatid. hom. VI in GNO VII/II 141,2-10, 142,2-4). Ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite sees the universe as the effect of the ordering work of the Good (Nomi div. IV, 4: PG 3,697 B; PTS 33, 146,13–147,1), and in the peace, concord and union that reign in the cosmos he sees the expression of the divine power that pervades, unifies and holds together the whole (Nomi div. XI,1-4: PG 3, 948C-952D; PTS 33, 217,5–220,17; this section echoes Posidonian ideas, filtered through Neoplatonism).

K. Gronau, Poseidonios und die jüdisch-christliche Genesisexegese, Leipzig and Berlin 1914; K. Reinhardt, Kosmos und Sympathie, Munich 1926; A.J. Festugière, La révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste II, Le Dieu cosmique, Paris 1949; M. Pohlenz, Die Stoa, Göttingen 1959, I, 217 (It. tr. Florence 1967); W.L. Rowe, The Cosmological Argument, Princeton 1975; W.L. Craig, The Cosmological Argument from Plato to Leibniz, London 1980; S. Lilla, Neuplatonisches Gedankengut in den Homilien über die Seligpreisungen Gregors von Nyssa [Suppl.to VChr LXVIII] Leiden 2004, 117-136.

S. Lilla

COUNCIL. A formal assembly of bishops and other church dignitaries, to deliberate and legislate on ecclesiastical questions. The ecumenical council represents the universal church; particular councils (general, plenary, national, provincial etc.) represent more or less extensive regions. The institution arose naturally from the need felt, from the church's beginnings, by the leaders of the Christian communities to consult each other on common problems of faith and discipline. From the 2nd c. the bishops of *Asia consulted each other about *Montanism; at the urging of Pope *Victor (193–203), councils met in *Pontus, *Palestine and *Syria to pronounce on the date of *Easter. In ca. 220 Bishop *Agrippinus of *Carthage asked an *African council to declare the nullity of *baptism administered by *heretics. Toward the mid-3rd c. the council was already an established institution at the regional level. The peace of *Constantine gave it new growth, while metropolitan and patriarchal structures became fixed, in turn giving rise to provincial and general councils. In 314 Constantine convoked the bishops of the Western part of the empire at *Arles to resolve the problem of *Donatism; in 325 he decided to gather an assembly of bishops from all parts of the empire at *Nicaea (the first ecumenical council).

The form, frequency and influence of councils have varied considerably in the course of the church's history. Besides the ecumenical and provincial councils whose origin we have described, we should mention the African plenary councils, above all those guided by the episcopal activity of *Aurelius (391–428); the Germanic national councils of the early Middle Ages, particularly those of *Frankish and Merovingian *Gaul; and the councils of *Visigothic *Spain. The African councils manifest the vitality of that church in its golden age; the national councils attest the church's political and social weight in the life of the young nations converted to the Catholic faith; the princes and nobility of the Visigothic kingdom attended councils with the bishops; all the major decisions for the life of the kingdom were taken by common consent.

The functions of councils were essentially *dogmatic (definitions on the truths of faith), liturgical (regulation of rites) and canonical (ordering of ecclesiastical discipline). The first of these was the essential business of ecumenical councils; the seven great ecumenical councils of antiquity (I Nicaea, 325; I *Constantinople, 381; *Ephesus, 431; *Chalcedon, 451; II Constantinople, 533; III Constantinople, 680; II Nicaea, 787) laid the foundations of *Christology and are recognized by Catholics and Orthodox. The majority of the ecumenical councils, but also the regional councils of antiquity (*Ancyra, 314; *Neocaesarea, ca. 315; *Gangra, ca. 340; *Antioch, ca. 341; *Laodicea, ca. 380), laid the basis of a universal discipline, passed down through the generations by the canonical collections. National and provincial councils sought to adapt this discipline to changing times. Sometimes the councils of the first centuries exercised judicial functions: in fact the aim of the provincial council was to regulate local controversies both through legislative rules and by exercising genuine jurisdiction. A noteworthy fact in the councils of antiquity is the important role the emperor played in them: he called them, fixed the order of the day and confirmed their decisions; by ratifying them, he gave conciliar decisions the value of imperial laws (since every citizen had to profess orthodox faith), subjecting those who opposed them to coercive secular justice.

J.K. Hefele - H. Leclercq, Histoire des conciles, t. I-VIII (in 16 vols.); var. aus., Le concile et les conciles. Contribution à la vie conciliaire de l'Église, Chevetogne 1960; DDC 3, 1268-1301; DTC 3, 636-676; LTK³ 6, 346-348; Histoire des c. œcuméniques, publiée sous la direction de G. Dumeige: t. II, Th. Camelot, Ephèse (431) et Chalcédoine (451), Paris 1962 (It. tr., Vatican City 1997); t. I, Ortiz de Urbina, Nicée (325) et Constantinople I (381), Paris 1963 (It. tr., Vatican City); F.X. Murphy - P. Sherwood, Constantinople II et III, Paris 1974; R. Metz, Histoire des conciles, Paris ²1968; H.J. Sieben, Die Konzilsidee der Alten Kirche, Paderborn 1979; L.D. Davis, The First Seven Ecumenical Councils (325-787): Their History and Theology, Collegeville, MN ²1990 (It. tr., Storia e cronaca dei sette concili che definirono la dottrina cristiana, Casale Monf. 1998); G. Alberigo (ed.), Storia dei concili ecumenici, Brescia 1990; R. Aubert - G. Fedalto - D. Quaglioni, Storia dei concili, Cinisello Balsamo 1995; J. Wohlmuth, Konzilien des ersten Jahrtausends von Konzil von Nizäa (325) bis zum vierten Konzil von Konstantinopel (869-870), Paderborn ²1998; J.H. Sieben, Vom Apostelkonzil zum Ersten Vatikanum: Studien zur Geschichte der Konzilsidee, Paderborn 1996; J.A. Fischer - A. Lumpe, Die Synoden von den Anfängen bis zum Vorabend des Nicaenums, Paderborn 1997.

Ch. Munier

CREATION. Following the Judeo-Christian belief in one God, creator of heaven and earth, and carrying on the Jewish interest in biblical cosmology, expressed esp. in *Genesis (see Theoph. Ant., Autol. II, 10-32: first Christian commentary), *patristic theology gave a tremendous amount of space to the doctrine of the origin of the world: considering the wholly free action of God the Creator, stressing the universal extent of this divine action and admiring the goodness and harmony of the whole universe, created and preserved by the one God. Indeed, they presented this doctrine, perhaps not always with the same conviction, as one of the characteristics that distinguished Christianity from *paganism. It is quite true that the great dogmatic debates of the 4th and 5th c. were not directly concerned with the creation of the world, but the Christian idea of God the Creator was nonetheless their all-important background. Worked out substantially during the 2nd c., it was an undisputed part of the patrimony of faith of those times. This is attested by the primitive confessions of faith which, inspired by biblical formulas but not without suggestions of *Hellenism, profess God as the Father Almighty, i.e., sole author and preserver of all things (Justin, 1 Apol. 61; 67: DS 1; 10; Iren., Adv. haer. I,10,1 etc.). Later confessions merely explain the same truth with new variations (cf. the forms of the Roman *creed, and the Eastern formulas: DS 11-76, esp. that of Nicaea: DS 125; 150), keeping the economic orientation of the primitive formulas. It is notable that the idea of creation—of God's free, potent action—is applied by the *Fathers, as in the Bible, to the establishment of the church, the conversion of sinners and the final perfection of all things. The evolution by which the simple repetition of the biblical doctrine of creation, with the aim of motivating praise of God (see Did. 10,3; 1 Clem. 60,1), right living among the faithful (see Did. 1,2; Barn. 19,2) or order in the community (see 1 Clem. 19,2-20,12), developed into a conscious and methodological development of themes, effected through the categories of Greek cosmology (demiurge, father of the universe) and explored through the theory of the Creator-Logos, can be explained primarily by the polemic against *gnosticism and against *philosophy, considered the basis of gnosticism (see May 151-152). Against the *Marcionites and *Valentinians, in some sense *Justin but still more *Tatian, *Theophilus and *Irenaeus, while recognizing the creative mediation of the Word, made clear that the God of salvation was himself the creator of all things, while rejecting the *Platonist idea of the eternal existence of matter and elaborating, in line with the Bible and the Judeo-Christian tradition (see esp. Herm., Mand. 1,1, cited by Iren., Adv. haer. IV, 20,2), the theory of creation ex nihilo. Thus Tatian, in response to certain debates raised at *Rome, was the first to declare that God also created matter (Orat. 5,3). Theophilus went further, not only stressing that God created everything through the Word and Wisdom (Autol. II, 18), but also using, in a philosophical perspective, the idea of creation ex nihilo (Autol. I, 4; II, 4,10.13; May 159-167). Irenaeus, finally, was the most complete. He declared more clearly than Theophilus that God had no need of anything to create the world, which he did by his own power, the Son and the Holy Spirit (Adv. haer. IV, 20,1). Reinterpreting in a clearly voluntarist way, he insisted still more on the fact that God created everything by his will (see May 170-171, 178-179).

This doctrine of creation ex nihilo was accepted by the authors of the 3rd c., by *Tertullian, *Hippolytus and *Origen. Radicalized, probably under the influence of philosophical debates on the eternity of the world (see Ricken), it provoked, or at least decisively determined, the *Arian controversy, which was a matter of distinguishing the creation of the world from the eternal generation of the Son (see the creed, with the anathemata: DS 125-126), and then the question of the Holy Spirit, not created, but proceeding from the Father, creator of all things visible and invisible (see Basil., De Spir. S. 18,45: DS 150). But this creationist orientation, expressed above all in the adage omnia opera ad extra communia sunt, risked compromising the trinitarian consideration of creation, as ante-Nicene theology had developed it, following esp. *Paul and *John. In the field of *Christology, the radical distinction made at *Nicaea between God the immutable Creator and creatures created once from nothing, per voluntatem divinam, and hence mutable, led to the exploration of the distinction between the divine and the human in Christ, and to the establishment of the one person of the divine Word as principle of union between these two distinct elements (see the formula inconfuse, immutabiliter, indivise, inseparabiliter of the Chalcedonian Creed: DS 302). But the doctrine of creation ex nihilo (in more concrete terms, the doctrine that one almighty God created all things without outside help and, in his totally gratuitous goodness, continually preserves them), which was presupposed in the great dogmatic controversies and then explicitly dogmatized against certain *Manichean tendencies (see DS 285-286), did not find the same resonance in every theologian who elaborated it or took it up. Indeed, in Irenaeus, who in his polemic against the *dualistic and pessimistic tendencies of gnosticism and Marcionism took it to its clearest expression, it is inserted in a profoundly economic context. Profiting from all the resources of the Bible (including the NT) and of *tradition, the great defender of the goodness of all creatures, spiritual and material, explains with great clarity that God, needing nothing, created humanity and the world to demonstrate his love. Placing humanity in the world, he began a patient process of education through which, by means of many economies, but especially through the *incarnation, he accustoms humanity to being his children, finally to resemble the divine immortality (see Adv. haer. III,21,10; IV,5,1; V,36,1-3).

While remaining more or less faithful to this economic approach to the theology of creation, later authors put it in a mainly rational and ontological perspective. Thus Tertullian not only explored the idea of the creative action of the Word (Adv. Prax. 7) but also brought out what is "proper" to the world and to human beings, who nonetheless depend entirely on their Creator (see Scheffczyk 47-48). *Origen, feeling his way to a Christian gnosis, tried to integrate the now traditional doctrine of creation ex nihilo into his unified vision of the world. Distinguishing, with *Philo and *Clement of Alexandria, two creations—first the creation of rational beings, then the postlapsarian creation of material things, destined to be the place in which fallen beings would be led back to the divine unity, and not even ruling out of this historical process a succession of different worlds—he refused to compromise the economic perspective that Irenaeus had introduced into Christian theology from the Bible (see De princ. II,1,4; I,8,1; II,5,3; III,6,4). The *Cappadocian Fathers, though greatly indebted to Origen, revised his cosmology according to the needs of *orthodox faith and hence strengthened the historical elements of Irenaeus's cosmological vision. We should also point out the pains *Basil of Caesarea took to illustrate the biblical doctrine of creation with the data of the natural sciences of his time (see Hexaemeron).

*Augustine, leaning on Eastern and Western traditions and developing especially the voluntarism of Tertullian, *Marius Victorinus and *Ambrose, gave the relatively most complete doctrine of creation (see Scheffczyk 61-62; Mayer). Faced with contemporary Latin *Neoplatonism and with the *Manichean heresy as it had developed in N *Africa, he tried not just to keep the right balance between Platonist-inspired dualism and *Stoic monism but also to respect the links between creation and *redemption. In his many studies of the first chapters of Genesis (Gen. imp.; Gen. Man.; Gen. litt.; Conf. 11-13), his most important contribution to the theology of creation was his very elaborate distinction between eternity and time. Intimately uniting the beginning of time with creation itself, he managed not just to explore the distinction between the eternal Creator and creation in time but also to make possible, in principle, a unitary perspective of creation and preservation, and thus to avoid a purely protological consideration (see Smulders 677; Studer, Gratia Christi, 198-201, with the classical distinction between conditio and administratio; Mayer 86-97: rationes causales). It is quite true that Augustine did not overcome all the risks of a direct confrontation with the non-Christian tendencies of his time. He conceded too much to the Neoplatonist ideas of the "ladder of existence" (see Mayer 100-103), nor did he eliminate all the dualistic traces of Manicheism. The philosophical orientation imposed on him also led him to unite, in too risky a way, *providence (gubernatio mundi) with *predestination in his explanations of the encounter between the freedom of the transcendent God and human *free will, and above all to disregard to a considerable degree the economic perspectives of the Bible. Regarding this last aspect, it is difficult to see the nexus that, according to Augustine, exists between creation and sacred history, i.e., between the origin of all things and the historical realization of the civitas Dei. It is attested particularly by his way (too christocentric, however) of speaking of Christ as creator et recreator, conditor et redemptor, formator et reformator. This "christocentrism," however, was counterbalanced by a significant reflection on the creative act of the whole *Trinity (see Mayer 71-74). Along these lines we should mention Augustine's schema of creatio, conversio, formatio, by which he explored both creation and the new creation in *baptism (cf. Mayer 81ff.; 97-100, with Conf. 11-13). In any event, Augustine's theology of creation became the foundation of all later Western theology.

In the East, ps.-*Dionysius allowed the Neoplatonism of *Plotinus and esp. of *Proclus to make an even greater impression on him. According to him the goodness of God, who transcends all beings, makes his light irradiate all beings, giving them, in a descending gradation, being, life and knowledge (Div. nom. IV,1-3). Though the creation of this whole hierarchy comes about in a sort of emanation (Div. nom. V,8), this does not mean that the emanation puts in question divine freedom, or that there is a confusion of the divine and the created, i.e., that the divine, in becoming the principle of being, order and number, ceases to remain completely transcendent (Div. nom. V,10; cf. Scheffczyk 67). *Maximus the Confessor, in his loyalty to the Council of *Chalcedon, added the necessary corrections to this grandiose vision of the universe. Considering the incarnation of the Word as the goal of all divine manifestations (Cap. theol. 1,66f.: PG 90, 1108 AB), he restored the unique economy of creation and redemption.

DTC 3, 2034-2084; W. Theiler, Demiurgos: RAC 3, 694-711; J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, London (It. tr. Bologna 1972); C. Tresmontant, La métaphysique du christianisme et la naissance de la philosophie chrétienne, Paris 1961; L. Scheffczyk, Schöpfung und Vorsehung: HDG II/2a, Freiburg 1962 (bibl.); R.A. Norris, God and World in Early Christian Theology, London 1966; F. Szabó, Le Christ créateur chez s. Ambroise, Rome 1968; F. Ricken, Nikaia als Krisis des altchristlichen Platonismus: TheolPhilos 44 (1969) 321-341; P. Smulders, Creazione: Sacram. mundi 2 (1974) 669-682 (bibl.); G. May, Schöpfung aus dem Nichts, Berlin 1978 (bibl.); J.C.M. van Winden, Hexaemeron: RAC 14 (1988) 1250-1269; M.-A. Vannier, "Creatio," "Conversio," "Formatio" chez s. Augustin, Fribourg 1991; B. Studer, Gratia Christi, Rome 1993, esp. 196-207; C. Markschies, Demiurg, II. Vätertheologie: LTK[3] 3, 82-83; J. Fantino, L'origine de la doctrine de la création ex nihilo: RSOhTh 80 (1996) 589-602; C. Mayer, Creatio, Creator, Creatura: AugLex II/1-2 (1996), 56-116 (vast bibl.); C. Scholten, Antike Natur-Philosophie und christl. Kosmologie, Berlin 1996; G. May, Schöpfer/Schöpfung, V. Alte Kirche: TRE 30 (1999) 296-299 (texts and studies); H. Kessler, Schöpfung IV. Theologieu. dogmengeschichtlich: LTK[3] 9, 226-230; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Creazione: Origene (2000), 98-102. See also the introductions in the editions of the commentaries on Genesis, like SC 7; 26; 160; BAug 48-49.

B. Studer

CREATION (double). We speak of "double creation" when the creation of the world and of man is held to be the work of two creators (or one "primary" creator and one or more collaborators), or of a single creator working at two successive moments, with emphasis on a disparity in value between the "first" and "second" creations. As regards cosmogony, the notion of a "second" personage working with the Supreme Being as a coworker or an adversary appears in many primitive mythologies, which often ascribe an animal nature to it (Coyote among N American Indians, Crow among Old Siberians). Where he acts in opposition to the Creator, modifying or wrecking his work, the cosmogonic context takes on *dualistic connotations. In relation to anthropogeny, the concept of double creation differs according to whether it implies the presence of a Creator and coworkers entrusted by him with a part of the creative process, or of adverse entities working against the Creator himself or, finally, of a single Creator acting at successive moments.

In the case of the *gnostic systems of the first centuries AD, the creation of the human being is double because the body, formed by the Demiurge and the wicked archons, is opposed—in a clearly dualistic framework—to the spiritual element (intellect, soul, pneuma), whose origin is the divine world. Plato's Timaeus offers the example of an anthropogeny in which, together with the Demiurge who provides the higher part of the soul (= intellect), subordinate beings (the "young" gods identifiable in the astral divinities) intervene to provide its lower parts, more directly compromised with the body and the senses. In Plato the intervention of these coworkers, who act on behalf of the great Demiurge, has the aim of rendering the latter "inculpable" (anaitios) for man's negative ethical choices. *Philo of Alexandria's *anthropology, though biblically based, implies the notion of human double creation, both in that it admits "coworkers" of God and that it contemplates two creative acts of God himself. Both these possibilities are affirmed in De opificio mundi, through a particular *exegesis of the two accounts in Genesis (1:26-27 and 2:7). Philo distinguishes humanity created "in the image and likeness of God" from humanity "formed," understanding the former as an ideal prototype belonging to the first, intelligible level of the creation carried out by the Logos (Opif. 134), while the latter is the perceptible human being composed of body and soul. Sometimes for Philo "man as image and likeness" is the intellect (nous*), i.e., the higher component of humanity (Opif. 66). Together with this notion of two moments (respectively, ideal-intelligible and sensible) in human creation goes that of the coworkers, asserted by Philo on the basis of the plural ("Let us make") used by the biblical author apropos of humanity as image. God entrusts his coworkers (angels, Powers) with the creation of that element in the rational soul which can incline toward evil, i.e., the faculty of choice (autexousion), which defines the human as a "liminal" (methorios) being, placed between mortal and immortal nature, between vice and virtue (Opif. 73-74; De conf. 179). *Origen, on the basis of Philo's exegesis of the two biblical accounts of hunan creation, drops the notion of God's "coworkers" but keeps that of the two successive creative acts, which, in a broad cosmological perspective, regard the world of intelligent beings, all equal and free, and then, after the graded fall of these due to a departure from the divine unity and love, the world of heavy bodies. Between the first creation (that of intellects, noes) and the second (that of the visible cosmos and bodies) came the transgression of the rational creatures, which, though differently graded and not universal (some noes fell only minimally or not at all), became the motive of God's second creative act. The human being has internally both the element of "image" (intellect or higher part of the soul), fruit of the "first creation," and the "formed" element (the body with its functions), pertaining to God's second creative act. *Gregory of Nyssa's anthropology, abandoning the Origenian idea of the preexistence of noes and the "antecedent fault," nevertheless retains a formula of double creation when, in De hominis opificio, he says that God's original plan contemplated a humanity which, created in God's image and likeness and endowed with a material body, was yet intended to reproduce itself "in the manner of the angels," i.e., without sexuality. Foreseeing the fall, which would consist in a decline toward sensibility, God provided humanity with sexual organs distinguished into male and female. The distinction of the sexes, then, though contemporaneous with the spiritual "image" element and the formation of the body, amounts to a "second creation," "added" in foreknowledge of the sin that would prevent the multiplication of the human race in the way God had originally intended.

U. Bianchi (ed.), La "doppia creazione" dell'uomo negli Alessandrini, nei Cappadoci e nella gnosi, Rome 1978; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Origene. Studi di antropologia e di storia della tradizione, Rome 1984; Id., "Doppia creazione" e origine del male nella tradizione cristiana antica: osservazioni storico-religiose, in C. Gianotto (ed.), La domanda di Giobbe e la razionalità sconfitta, Atti del Convegno di Trento, 25-26 novembre 1992, Trent 1995, 53-76; Id., Origene e la tradizione origeniana in Occidente: letture storico-religiose (Biblioteca di Scienze religiose 142), Rome 1998.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

CREEDS and CONFESSIONS of FAITH. There are many doctrinal formulas, local or more widespread, in the NT (e.g., Rom 1:3-4; 4:24-25; 1 Cor 8:6; 1 Tim 2:5; 3:16; 2 Tim 2:8; 1 Pet 3:18) and in early Christian literature (e.g., Ign., Eph. 18,2; Trall. 9; Smyrn. 1,1-2; Polyc., Ep. 2,1), but they cannot be identified as rudimentary creeds, being too diversified and lacking later parallels. But in the primitive church we can discover two distinct predecessors of the later creed. The first is the *trinitarian formula directly based on or taken from Mt 28:19 and connected, as the text implies, with the baptismal rite; indeed, there is no evidence (against Cullmann, Les premières confessions de foi chrétienne) that it was used on other occasions outside the baptismal rite. We can trace its gradual growth in length and content down the first two centuries through the examples of *Justin, *Irenaeus, Tertullian and the Epistula Apostolorum. Its form is interrogatory, i.e., it was presented to the candidate for *baptism in a series of questions. The second form of profession of faith is a christological confession or kerygma ("preaching"), doubtless derived from the very old confession "Jesus is Lord" (1 Cor 12:3). But in Justin's time (ca. 150) it had become a "developed christological kerygma" (Kelly, Early Christian Creeds, 75-76), briefly outlining the earthly and heavenly life of Jesus Christ, and a form of this kind can be traced in Irenaeus and Tertullian. Some scholars (e.g., Kelly) have thought that this formula was originally independent of the baptismal rite; but the evidence of the Western tradition in the MSS (Rome, ca. 120?) which interpolated in Acts 8:37 (baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch) the confession: "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God" (with variants), and Pope *Stephen's claim (mid-3rd c.) to know a form of baptism in the name of Jesus Christ alone (and accepted as valid; Cypr., Ep. 73,4,1; 16,1,2), decidedly suggest that this christological confession too may have been associated with baptism, though perhaps it was also used on other occasions. Around 200, this developed christological confession was included in the simplest trinitarian formula to produce the predecessor of the type of credo known today as the *Apostles' Creed, though both the separate formulas and the resulting formula differed from church to church. We find this baptismal creed enlarged in *Hippolytus, *Clement of Alexandria, *Origen and *Cyprian.

Toward the mid-2nd c., however, another type of doctrinal formula appeared: the rule of faith (Greek: κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας, κανὼν ἐκκλησιαστικός, κανὼν τῆς πίστεως, ὅρος, etc.; Latin: regula fidei, regula veritatis, mensura fidei, regula pietatis* etc.). The idea and the terminology are first found in Irenaeus (ca. 160–200), but it can also be seen in Tertullian, Hippolytus, the Syriac Didascalia Apostolorum, Origen, Cyprian, *Novatian, *Dionysius of Alexandria and *Victorinus of Petovium, and we can find references elsewhere. It is certainly not identical with the baptismal creed (against Harnack, Kattenbusch and practically all the first scholars of the origin of the creeds) but consists of a generalized summary of the Christian faith as taught and preached in the churches of the writers who speak of it, summarized in slightly different terms according to the writer's predilections, but everywhere containing the same essential doctrine. Origen not only lists the themes not included in the rule (and so open to the development of speculation), but he also encourages his more advanced disciples to investigate them (e.g., the *resurrection of the body). All the ancient writers see the rule of faith as the proof of *orthodoxy and a safeguard against erroneous and heretical doctrines, while the baptismal creed, mentioned by many of them, is thought of as a simple model or summary, an epitome (Iren.), "the major and more important points, a summary, holy seeds" (Orig.). We have no clear evidence that in these very early times the baptismal creed was understood or used as a criterion of correct doctrine. Some *gnostic sects used a creed of their own.

In the second generation of the 3rd c., according to Kelly (op. cit., 49), the custom of traditio and redditio symboli began to be widely practiced in the church: the creed was handed over to the *catechumens at some initial moment of their instruction, and they repeated it later during the course of instruction, and again in the baptismal rite itself. Why the West used the word symbolum for the profession of faith is not well known, but this practice is evidence that, at the time it was adopted, two different types of profession of faith must have been in use: the interrogatory, put to the candidate when he was baptized, and the declaratory, a continuous profession of faith made by the candidate in the first person. The declaratory creed was certainly modeled on the baptismal creed in its content but must have also been influenced by the rule of faith. In the West its particular form, developed ca. 330 in the Church of *Rome (the old Roman Creed, known to scholars as R), originally drawn up in an early 2nd-c. Greek formula, became the model of all Western creeds of this type. The Eastern baptismal creeds varied considerably according to their place of origin. The Apostles' Creed as we know it today is a slightly enlarged and modified version of R (known as T), which probably came from SW France (Septimania) and was widely adopted in western Europe before finally being accepted by the conservative Roman Church sometime between 800 and 1000. The legend that each apostle formulated one article of this credo was widely accepted by the end of the 4th c.

In the 3rd c. we can trace two examples of the use of an accurate doctrinal formula as proof of sound faith: the formula proposed by Bishop *Heraclides, in discussion with Origen ca. 246, to prove his orthodoxy (Entretien d'Origène avec Héraclide, SC 67, 118-220), and the so-called Letter of Hymenaeus, probably proposed to *Paul of Samosata sometime between 264 and 268 (Mansi I,1033-1040). But the first certain example of a declaratory creed used as a proof of orthodox doctrine is in the letter written by *Eusebius, bishop of *Caesarea in *Palestine, to his congregation immediately after the Council of *Nicaea of 325 (ed. H.G. Opitz, Urkunden zur Geschichte des arianischen Streites, 1.22, 43-44), which he maintains is the credo he studied during his own prebaptismal catechetical instruction. To avoid a certain past misconception, we must make clear that no Christian writer of the first four or five centuries followed modern levels of meticulous literal accuracy in citing or reproducing creeds. The ancients were interested in the substantial content, not in the precise wording of their formulas of faith (see Greg. Naz., Ep. 58, 9, 10, 11; Greg. Nyss., Con. Eunom. II, 137). Eusebius states that his baptismal creed was identical with that newly drawn up by the council he had just attended. This creed, the Nicene Creed of 325, was the work of a council of bishops called by the emperor *Constantine in the city of Nicaea, in *Bithynia, to resolve the controversy over the definition of Christ's divinity which had arisen between *Alexander, bishop of *Alexandria, and *Arius, one of his *presbyters, and was threatening to divide the church which the emperor had just freed from the danger of *persecution and given his support to. This was the first time a general council had been held or a credo drawn up which was intended to be valid as a criterion of orthodoxy for all believers. Its original form was certainly not that of Eusebius's church but probably came from *Syria or Phoenicia. The bishops at Nicaea introduced into this creed certain expressions intended to avoid an Arian interpretation of their statements: e.g., the words applied to the Son, "generated from the Father's substance," "generated, not made," and, especially, "of the same substance as the Father" (ὁμοούσιον, Lat. consubstantialem). A series of anathemata, or condemnations, of particular Arian doctrines ("there was a time when he was not," "before he was generated he did not exist," "he was made from nothing," he derives "from a different Person [ὑπόστασις] or substance" (than that of the Father), he is "changeable or alterable") were added with the same purpose. This very important creed is called N by scholars.

In fact, this historic formulation of an ecumenical conciliar creed did not immediately serve the purpose it had been made for. In the West it did not circulate very widely, and soon after the Council of Nicaea it practically disappeared from the controversies that continued to rage for another 56 years. Nevertheless, N had shown a way to formulate creeds, and the years between 341 and 362 saw a series of attempts to resolve the differences of opinion in East and West by formulating a creed that could satisfy all the parties, or at least express the faith of the majority. Toward the end of this period even the emperor played a part. The most important examples of the written creeds of this period were the "Creed of the Dedication" or "Second Antiochene Creed," drawn up by the Synod of *Antioch of 341: it omitted homoousion, described the persons of the *Trinity as "three in person" (ὑπόστασις) but one in harmony (συμφωνία) and the Son as "the Father's image, without differences of substance [ousia]," and anathematized many Arian opinions. For some time (until ca. 370), there was a strong possibility that this creed could become an alternative to N; its attribution to *Lucian of Antioch, *martyr and theologian of the first years of the 4th c., is controversial. The "Fourth Antiochene Creed" (also of 341) was sent by the Eastern bishops to Emperor *Constans in the West in an attempt to conciliate Western opinion without returning to N. It too omitted homoousion and anathematized some Arian propositions, but it called Christ simply "God from God." Though of little importance in itself, this creed became the basis and substance of numerous other creeds, such as that of the Eastern bishops at Philippopolis (343), the "Fifth Antiochene Creed"—called Ekthesis makrostichos,* drawn up at Antioch in 344 and containing a lengthy appendix condemning an ample series of heterodox opinions, esp. those that inclined to *Sabellianism (the refusal to see distinctions of persons in the deity), in particular that of *Marcellus of Ancyra—and the "First Creed of *Sirmium," formulated by the II Council of Sirmium (351) and largely aimed against Marcellus and his more radical disciple *Photinus of Sirmium.

A completely new direction was taken with the appearance in 357 of the "Second Creed of Sirmium," which later opponents would call the "blasphemy of Sirmium." Here, for the first time, something like a consistent Arian theology emerged: it rejected any use of "substance" (ousia) as a term to define the Son's relation to the Father, on which it refused to speculate, and drastically subordinated the Son to the Father, together with the rest of creation. The creed provoked a reaction among a number of Eastern theologians which led to the "Third Creed of Sirmium," at the IV Council of Sirmium (358): it opted for ὁμοιούσιον rather than ὁμοούσιον and rejected the Arian alternatives of 357. An intermediate creed, known as the "Dated Creed," was drawn up at the V Council of Sirmium (May 359) in preparation for a divided general council (Easterners at *Seleucia in *Cilicia, Westerners at *Rimini in *Italy); this creed rejected the use of ousia and its derivatives but described the Son as "like the Father in everything." The credo that resulted from this general council, after theological conflicts and imperial interference had had their way (Creed of Nike, 360), was a watered-down version of the "Dated Creed" and defined the Son simply as "like according to the Scriptures," which left ample room for the Arian interpretation. From then until the Council of *Constantinople, which in 381 put an end to the Arian controversy, the creeds formulated were of little importance, perhaps because everyone recognized that the procedure of creating creeds had not necessarily allayed the controversy. The opponents of Arianism now aimed at attempting to restore N under the leadership of *Athanasius of Alexandria (ca. 296–373), who had long led the fight against Arianism and semi-Arianism. The Council of Constantinople (381) represented the triumph of his doctrine and that of the three great *Cappadocians, *Basil of Caesarea (ca. 330–379), *Gregory of Nazianzus (329–389) and Basil's brother *Gregory of Nyssa (ca. 330–ca. 395). To it has been traditionally attributed the best-known and most important creed in the history of Christianity, commonly known as the Nicene or Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed (C to scholars). Whether the council of 381 did actually draw up this creed is the subject of a lively controversy (see Kelly, op. cit., ch. X). Before 451, contemporary or later attestations of the creed being drawn up in those circumstances are practically nonexistent, and the first clear evidence of C's existence is in the final declaration of the Council of *Chalcedon (451), which in fact cites C to the letter. All in all, it seems preferable to agree with Kelly (following Ritter's theory in Das Konzil von Konstantinopel) that this credo was drawn up by the council of 381 in a fruitless attempt to reach agreement with the moderate opponents of a full recognition of the *Holy Spirit's divinity but was long considered by the majority of theologians as little more than a retrieval of N; the Western authorities in particular ignored it for a long time, as the fruit of a council which they only slowly and reluctantly acknowledged as ecumenical. The credo that was the basis of C was not N but may have been that of the Church of Jerusalem: homoousion was restored and the Son's eternal generation and noncreaturality were assured; a small and curious clause, "his kingdom will have no end," was inserted in opposition to the (by now almost extinct) doctrine of Marcellus, and the reference to the Holy Spirit, very brief in N, was greatly expanded to describe it as "Lord and giver of life," as proceeding from the Father, and "with the Father and the Son worshiped and glorified" (according to the teaching of the Cappadocians, particularly Basil).

As time passed, C became the central and universally recognized creed of Christianity, as it is today. At some point (ca. 700–800) it was also adopted in a *Latin formula as the baptismal creed of the Church of Rome (it was finally replaced by T). To this credo, over time, the Western Latin church made an addition not approved by any fully ecumenical council. First in *Spain, probably under the pressure of *Visigothic Arianism, then all through western Europe and finally (1014) in Rome, to the expression "who proceeds from the Father" were added the words "and from the Son" (Filioque). For more than a thousand years this addition has been a cause of discord and friction between Eastern and Western (including Protestant) churches, and still is today. The practice of reciting C during the *Eucharist was introduced in the Eastern church in ca. 500 as an indirect consequence of the intense theological and ecclesiastical conflicts between groups divided by their conceptions of *Christology and was rapidly adopted throughout the East. It established itself more slowly in the West: traces of it can be found at the Council of *Toledo in Spain (589), then in the Irish church, and finally in Charlemagne's empire in the 8th and 9th c. The Church of Rome adopted it only in 1014.

Two relevant formulas remain to be examined. The first is called the Chalcedonian Definition and was drawn up by the ecumenical council held at Chalcedon in Bithynia in 451. Its intention was to resolve a controversy over the meaning of the doctrine of the *incarnation of the Son of God, a controversy agitated by theological thought ever since the ecumenical Council of *Ephesus (431) had condemned the doctrine of Bishop *Nestorius of Constantinople, which tended to divide the Son into a human element and a divine element, and the latrocinium of Ephesus (449), hastily convened and tumultuously conducted, had tried to impose on the church a *monophysite (Alexandrian) rather than a *dyophysite (Antiochene) description of the incarnation. The definition worked out at Chalcedon had to maintain the balance between these two conflicting Christologies with equity and exactness, and to great extent succeeded. By confirming N and C and approving the relevant theological dissertations of *Cyril of Alexandria and Pope *Leo I, the definition laid down that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, had two natures, one fully divine, the other fully human, and that they were united in one person, "without confusion, without change, without division, without separation." This definition did not succeed in settling the controversy, which continued to rage, despite the efforts of many *Byzantine emperors to find a compromise or reconciliation, until it was suffocated by the coming of Islam. At any rate, the definition has remained ever since the basic statement of christological orthodoxy for the majority of Christian churches, including those of the Reformation.

The other formula requiring attention is the so-called Athanasian Creed or, as it is called from its opening words in Latin, Quicumque vult*. Its origin and date have long been subjects of lively dispute; by the 16th c. it was understood that its traditional attribution to *Athanasius of Alexandria (which can be traced back to the 6th c.) was totally impossible. Its doctrine is evidently derived from *Augustine (354–430) and still more from the Commonitorium of *Vincent of Lérins (434); the creed was almost certainly known to *Caesarius of Arles (470–543). It is clearly aimed at the errors of Arius and Nestorius but shows no discernible influence of the Chalcedonian Definition. It consists of a concise, lapidary exposition, in late Latin, of the Western form of the trinitarian doctrine (with explicit affirmation of the Filioque), followed by a rather short exposition of the doctrine of the incarnation, which inter alia excludes *Apollinarianism, the doctrine that Christ lacked a human soul. Its "condemnatory clauses," which consign anyone who does not accept its doctrine to eternal damnation, made it decidedly suited to the temper of the Middle Ages but have induced moderns to keep their distance from it. Its treatment is completely Western, and it was never formally approved by the Eastern church. The most recent authority, Kelly (The Athanasian Creed), holds that it was composed in the *monastery of Lérins (off the S coast of *Gaul) or in a group associated with Lérins, between ca. 440 and ca. 520, perhaps in the circle of Caesarius of Arles, even if not directly by him.

F.J.A. Hort, Two Dissertations, London 1876; F. Kattenbusch, Das apostolische Symbol, Leipzig 1894, 1900 (2 vols.); A. Harnack, Apostolisches Symbolum: RE 1 (1896) 741-755; Id., Konstantinopolitanisches Symbol: RE 11 (1931-1932) 12-28; F. Loofs, Das Nicänum, in Festgabe für K. Müller, Tübingen 1922, 68-82; E. Schwartz, Das Nicänum und das Konstantinopolitanum auf der Synode von Chalkedon: ZNTW 25 (1926) 38-88; H. Lietzmann, Symbolstudien: ZNTW 21 (1922) 1-34; 22 (1923) 257-279; 24 (1925) 193-203; 26 (1927) 75-95; B. Capelle, Les origines du symbole romain: RecTh 2 (1930) 5-20; D. van den Eynde, Les normes de l'enseignement chrétien dans la littérature patristique . . ., Gembloux - Paris 1933; I. Ortiz de Urbina, El símbolo Niceno, Madrid 1947; O. Cullmann, Les premières confessions de foi chrétienne, Paris 1943, [2]1948 (It. tr. Rome 1948); R.P.C. Hanson, Tradition in the Early Church, London 1962; J.N.D. Kelly, The Athanasian Creed, London 1964; A.M. Ritter, Das Konzil von Konstantinopel und sein Symbol, Göttingen 1965; G.L. Dossetti, Il simbolo di Nicea e di Costantinopoli, Rome 1967; J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds, London [3]1972; R.P.C. Hanson, Dogma and Formula in the Fathers: SP 13 (II) (1975) 169-184; J.M. Perosanz, El símbolo atanasiano, Madrid 1976; G.L. Bray, Creeds, Councils and Christ, Downers Grove 1984; S. Sabugal, Credo. La fe de la Iglesia. El símbolo de la fe. Historia e interpretación, Zamora 1986; M.-Th. Nadeau, Foi de l'église: évolution et sens d'une formule, Paris 1988; D. Spada, Le formule trinitarie: da Nicea a Costantinopoli, Rome 1988; Id., Le confessioni di fede da Nicea a Costantinopli, Rome 1988; M.C. Zaffi, Formulazioni di fede della chiesa antica: un contributo allo studio delle radici e teologia della "confessione" cristiana, Rome 1989; S.M. Heim (ed.), Faith to Creed: Ecumenical Perspectives on the Affirmation of the Apostolic Faith in the Fourth Century, Papers of the Faith to Creed Consultation, Commission on Faith and Order, NCCCUSA, October 25-27, 1989, Waltham, Mass.-Grand Rapids 1991; H.J. Vogt, Bilder der frühen Kirche: Bildworte der Bibel bei den Kirchenvätern: kleine Geschichte des Credo, Munich 1993; J. Ulrich, Die Anfänge der abendländischen Rezeption des Nizänums, Berlin 1994; R. Staats, Das Glaubensbekenntnis von Nizäa-Konstantinopel: historische und theologische Grundlagen, Darmstadt 1996; W. Kinzig - Ch. Markschies - M. Vinzent, Tauffragen und Bekenntnis: Studien zur sogenannten "Traditio Apostolica," zu den "Interrogationes de fide" und zum "Römischen Glaubensbekenntnis," Berlin - New York 1999; A. Merkt, Symbolum. Historische Bedeudung und patristische Deutung des Bekenntnisnamens: RQ 96 (2001) 1-36; L.H. Westra, The Apostle's Creed: Origin, History and Some Early Commentaries, Turnhout 2002; D. Spada, Le formule trinitarie da Nicea a Costantinopoli, Rome [2]2003; G. Riedl, Hermeneutische Grundstrukturen frühchristlicher Bekenntnisbildung, Göttingen 2003; Creeds and Confessions of Faith in the Christian Tradition, J. Pelikan - V. Hothkiss (eds.), New Haven 2003.

R.P.C. Hanson

CRESCONIUS. *Donatist grammarian, friend of Petilian of Constantine. Native of Proconsular Africa ("Afer in Africa"*: Aug., C. Cresconium IV,71,83). In 401–402 he wrote a treatise defending Petilian's ideas, as presented in the latter's encyclical to his clergy and attacked by *Augustine in C. Litteras Petiliani I. Cresconius defended Petilian's baptismal theology, accused the Catholics of having their origin in traditio and in their forefathers' *apostasy (C. Cresc. II,22,27; 36,41), and defended the readmission of *Maximian's followers to the Donatist church by the fact that they had repented of their *schism within the time set by the Council of Bagai (C. Cresc. III,15,18; 17,20), while the Catholics continued to persecute the Donatists. Cresconius is a typical example of the many educated laymen in the ranks of the Donatists, who held that the essential quality of a church lay less in its numbers than in its integrity (In paucis frequenter est veritas; errare multorum est: C. Cresc. III,66,75 and cf. IV,18,21) and who disapproved of *rhetoric as something *pagan (C. Cresc. IV, 2, 2). Augustine's long books against his arguments, written ca. 406, contain important documentation of the origin of the schism, as well as on the Maximianist schism (303) within Donatism. Nothing is known of Cresconius after this.

Extracts of Cresconius's work are preserved by Augustine, Contra Cresconium (ed. M. Petschenig, CSEL 52, 325-382); Monceaux VI, 2; P. Langa, La Autoridad de la Sagrada Escritura en "Contra Cresconium": Augustiniana 41 (1991) 691-721; M. Moreau, Cresconium grammaticum partis Donati (Ad-) and Cresconius grammaticus, in AugL II/1-2, 1996, 131-139.

W.H.C. Frend

CRESCONIUS, canonist (6th c.). The work Concordia canonum by the otherwise unknown Cresconius, who describes himself as Cresconius Christi famulorum exiguus (PL 88,829), is dedicated to Bishop Liberinus (or Liberius). This Cresconius should not be confused with the 6th-c. poet Fl. Cresconius Corippus; the name Cresconius was common in *Africa. His purpose, as declared in the prologue, is to complete *Ferrandus's collection, bringing together cuncta ecclesiastica constituta (PL 88,831), and organizing the material according to arguments, as Ferrandus had done. Whereas Ferrandus had considered only conciliar decisions, Cresconius is much more complete; he uses the Canones Apostolorum, the Eastern and African councils (*Nicaea, *Ancyra, *Neocaesarea, *Gangra, *Antioch, *Laodicea, *Chalcedon, *Serdica, *Carthage) and passages from the decretals. It seems that Ferrandus was the only source for the councils, but while Ferrandus, in the Breviatio, reports the texts only partially, Cresconius includes them in their entirety. *Dionysius too is a source for Cresconius. Cardinale offers a comparative synopsis of the collections of Ferrandus, Dionysius and Cresconius. The Concordia canonum, also called Liber canonum, was composed of 300 titles or chapters. Although the arrangement is somewhat imperfect, it had a wide circulation and was much used for its peculiar characteristics. We know 20 manuscripts which report the whole text, as can be seen from the recent studies of Cardinale, Landau and Schmitz. In France it was taken up, with some additions, by the Collectio XII librorum (or Cresconius Gallicanus).

CPL 1769; PL 88, 829-842. H. Mordek, Kirchenrecht und Reform im Frankenreich, Berlin 1975, 253-255; P. Pinedo, Concordia canonum Cresconii: Ius canonicum 4 (1964) 35-64; E.J. Kilmartin, Early African Legislation Concerning the Liturgical Prayer: EphLit 69 (1985) 105-127; H. Mordek, Analecta Canonistica I: BMCL 16 (1986) 1-16; M. Cardinale, La "Concordia canonum" di Cresconio e la sua diffusione nella cultura giuridica dell'Europa medievale, I, Prolegomeni generali e criteri metodologici: Apollinaris 62 (1989) 283-331; P. Landau, Kanonessammlungen in der Lombardei im frühen und Hohen Mittelalter, in Milano e il suo territorio (XI-XII sec.), Atti dell'XI Congresso internaz. di studi sull'alto Medioevo, Milano 26-30 October 1987, Milan 1989, 424-457; G. Schmitz, Vier-Bücher-Sammlung des Cod. Köln, Diözesan- und Dombibliothek 124. Zur kirchenrectlichen Kenntnis im 10. Jahrhundert, in Ex ipsis rerum documentis, Fest. H. Zimmermann, Sigmaringen 1991, 233-255.

A. Di Berardino

CRETE

I. Origins of Christianity - II. Council - III. Archaeology.

I. Origins of Christianity. The Mediterranean island of Crete (Κρήτη) was an ecclesiastical province. It fell under Roman rule in 67 BC; in 27 BC *Augustus joined it to Cyrene to make a single senatorial province with the governor's residence at Gortyna. There were Cretans at *Jerusalem on the day of *Pentecost (Acts 2:11). In AD 60 the ship carrying *Paul prisoner to *Rome (Acts 27:7-26) touched at Crete. After being freed, he returned (63–67?) and left Titus there (Tit 1:12), writing to support him when his apostolic activity was obstructed by Judaizers. Besides Titus and the group of 10 *martyrs under *Decius, Crete venerates its *confessors from the time of the *persecutions, later inscribed in the *Byzantine Synaxaria: Cyril, Hermaius, Gregory of Akritas; and other saints: Eumenius the thaumaturge, Peter the neomartyr and the better-known Andrew. Morally established by 170, if we consider the eminent place assigned to Gortyna in a letter of *Dionysius of Corinth (Euseb., HE IV, 23, 5), the metropolis of Crete was officially established at the start of the 5th c. In the Cretan episcopate's letter to Emperor *Leo I on the murder of *Peter of Alexandria (454), the metropolitan of Gortyna is supported by eight suffragans (Mansi 7,621-622). The 22 cities listed in *Hierocles's Synekdemos (624) occur in a different order in the first Notitia episcopalis (8th c.), which attests the passing of the metropolis of Gortyna from the jurisdiction of Rome (Illyricum orientale) to that of *Constantinople, after the imperial coup de force of 730 (Darrouzès, 216 n. 10; 221 n. 208-227). Suffragan sees included Knossos, ancient capital of the island. A volcanic eruption in the N part of the island was interpreted as divine disapproval, giving Emperor Leo III an occasion for the first iconomachy (733). Crete was occupied by Arabs in 823.

DB 2, 1111-1116; DBS 2, 159-175; DHGE 13, 1033-1037; EC 4, 870-871; LTK³ 6, 439-440; V. Laurent, Le corpus des sceaux de l'empire byzantin, V, 1, Paris 1963, 463-465; J. Darrouzès, Notitiae episcopatuum Ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae, Paris 1981; D. Tsougarakis, The Byzantine Crete, Oxford 1984; ODB 1, 545-547.

D. Stiernon

II. Council. Since Crete was part of Illyricum, it depended directly on the Roman Church until 730. In 667 a council was called there by Peter, metropolitan of Gortyna, to depose John, bishop of Lappa: the deposed bishop, who appealed to the pope, was imprisoned; he escaped and fled to Rome, where he proved his innocence before a council called by Pope *Vitalian. Among the island's bishops was St. *Andrew of Crete.

Mansi, Supplem., I,501; Mansi XI, 99; A.C. Peltier, Dictionnaire des Conciles, I, Paris 1847, col. 787; Hfl-Lecl III, 1, 306; Palazzini 1, 349.

C. Nardi

III. Archaeology. Religious building in Crete underwent particular development in the early Byzantine period, at least up to the Arab invasion (it was reconquered by the Byzantines only in 961), reaching its greatest heights in the 6th c. In general the prevalent type is the three-aisled basilica, like that of Syias in the W of the island, which is preceded by a narthex, with ample remains of geometrical pavement mosaics (except for two squares with animals near the altar) in the nave and narthex (see A. Orlandos, La basilica paleocristiana di Syias [in Greek], 337-359). The Christian basilica of Knossos (appointment of a bishop to this see is attested in ca. 170), near an older cemetery, is of the same type, also with geometrical pavement mosaics (see W.H.C. Frend, The Byzantine Church at Knossos, 186-238). Also three-aisled is the "early Christian" building in whose nave the small church dedicated to St. Nicetas was installed in the middle Byzantine period; the original building had geometrical pavement mosaics, of which scant fragments remain, and marble capitals decorated with crosses (see K. Lassithiotakè, Chiese di Creta [in Greek], 95-177, esp. 118-119). The basilica of Elounda has three aisles with remains of pavement mosaic: in this building are the remains of a marble ambo with Greek inscription (see BCH 100 [1976] 728).

Recent finds include the discovery by the Italian team of two superimposed basilicas at Gortyna (the earlier one destroyed by an earthquake ca. 620), of which columns and capitals remain in situ (see BCH 104 [1980] 676), and the five-aisled basilica of Almyris Apokoronou at the foot of the hill of Phoinikia, excavated in 1973, with remains of pavement mosaics in the nave: of particular interest is the insertion into the large mosaic carpet of two squares with a large cross with the letters alpha and omega beside its shaft, an unusual motif in pavement mosaics, esp. after *Theodosius II's decree of ca. 427 forbidding representation of the cross on floors (see AD 1973-74 [1980], Chronika, 941-943, see bibl.). In addition to basilica-plan churches (the most common type on the island), the Church of St. George at Episkopi is an interesting central-plan building, part of a group that includes a baptistery from which comes a monolithic baptismal font similar to those outside Istanbul Arch. Mus.: by comparing it with Syrian central-plan churches, e.g., those of Ezra and Bostra (to me an unconvincing comparison), it has been dated to the 6th c. (see K. Lassithiotakè, Chiese di Creta, 203-208). The most important early Byzantine building is undoubtedly St. Titus at Gortyna, which attests the adequacy of the local workmen to metropolitan, in this case Constantinopolitan, traditions. Here, following a "fashion" attested in the 6th c., esp. in the period from *Justinian to *Justin II, two apses were added on to the side of the basilica-plan building: analogous cases are the Church of the Nativity at *Bethlehem and the cathedral of Dvin in *Armenia (apses added in the time of Justinian) and the Church of the Blachernae at *Constantinople (apses added under Justin II). The Church of St. Titus is also part of the limited group of peculiar late-6th- and early-7th-c. church buildings, such as, in Greece, basilica B of *Philippi and the Katapoliani of Paros, whose model was Hagia Sophia at Constantinople, though the metropolitan idea was filtered, distorted and simplified by local workmen.

In general see the following journals: Kretika Chronika, Bulletin de Correspondence Hellénique e l'Archaiologikon Deltion. In particular: A. Orlandos, La basilica paleocristiana di Syias (in Greek): KretikaChr 7 (1953) 337-359; A. Ferrua, Le iscrizioni cristiane di Creta: RivAC 30 (1954) 137-142; W.H.C. Frend, The Byzantine Basilica Church at Knossos: ABSA 57 (1962) 186-238, cf. SP V (= TU 80) (1962) 34-39; G. Rizza - V. Santa Maria Scrinari, Il santuario sull'acropoli di Gortyna, Rome 1968, esp. 68-96; K. Lassithiotakè, Chiese di Creta (in Greek): KretikaChr 21 (1969) 203-208; 23 (1971) 95-177; AD 29 (1973-1974); 35 (1980) 908-912; 941-943; BCH 100 (1976) 728; BCH 104 (1980) 676; BCH 105 (1981) 873ff.; EAA² 4,606-608; I.F. Sanders, Roman Crete, Warminster 1982; RBK 5,811-1174; N. Poulou-Papadimitriou, Le monastère byzantin de Pseira-Crète: La céramique, in Akten des XII Intern. Kongresses f. christl. Archäologie, II, Münster 1995, 119-131; LTK³ 6,439-440; S.A. Curuni, Creta bizantina, Quaderni di architettura 1, Rome 1987; G.W.M. Harrison, The Romans and Crete, Amsterdam 1993; R. Farioli Campanati, I mosaici pavimentali della basilica di Mitropolis a Gortyna nell'ambito della produzione musiva di Creta, in La mosaïque grécoromaine. 8, Actes du VIII^e colloque international pour l'étude de la mosaïque antique et médiévale, vol. I, Lausanne 2001, 261-265; D. Michaelides, Some Characteristic Traits of a Mosaic Workshop in Early Christian Cyprus, ibid., 314-325; C. Tsigonaki, La sculpture architecturale en Crète à l'époque proto-byzantine (IV^e-VII^e siècle), Université Panthéon-Sorbonne (Paris) 2002.

M. Falla Castelfranchi

CRIMEN laesae romanae religionis. In *Roman law the term crimen, in the strict sense, meant a crime of particular gravity, publicly punished after a public accusation. Specifically, crimen laesae romanae religionis was a transgression against Roman religion, its beliefs and customs. For Christians this crimen, which usually consisted in the refusal to publicly recognize and practice the traditional religion—identified with the official religion of the civitas—was considered intolerable sacrilege and went together with the accusation against them of atheism. Numerous attestations are found in 2nd- and 3rd-c. apologetic writings: see, e.g., *Justin, I Apol. 4,7ff.; 6,1; *Athenagoras, Suppl. 3, 1; 4, 1ff. *Tertullian devotes particular attention to this accusation (Apolog. 10,1–28,1).

Brasiello: Novissimo Digesto Italiano 5, 1960, 1ff.; F. Raber, KLP 2, 1964, 1334-1335; B. Santalucia, Diritto e processo penale nell'antica Roma, Rome 1989; V. Giuffré, La repressione criminale nell'esperienza Romana, Padua ³1993.

P. Siniscalco

CRIMEN maiestatis imminutae. Crime against the greatness and sovereignty of the Roman people, personified in the first centuries by the emperor. Christians thus incurred crimen maiestatis, provided for by an apposite law (lex de maiestate), when they refused to swear by the genium Caesaris or to take part in the sollemnia Caesaris. The accusation was often paired with that of crimen religionis: Deos . . . non colitis et pro imperatoribus sacrificia non penditis (Tertull., Apolog. 10, 1; see also 28, 2ff.). We can read many examples of it in the acts and passions of the martyrs. See, e.g., Mart. Polycarpi 9,2; 10,1; Acta Scilitanorum 3.

C. Callewaert, Les premiers chrétiens et l'accusation de lèse-majesté: RevQuHist 76 (1904) 5-28; B. Santalucia, Diritto e processo penale nell'antica Roma, Rome 1989; V. Giuffré, La repressione criminale nell'esperienza Romana, Padua ³1993.

P. Siniscalco

CRISPINA (d. 304). A native of Tagora (Taoura, Algeria), suffered *martyrdom at *Tebessa (where remains of the martyrium and basilica in her honor survive), 5 December 304. She is mentioned in Cal. carth. and Mart. hier. We have her Passion, which cites part of the court proceedings that pronounced her condemnation (BHL 1989). *Augustine, who eulogized her more than once (En. in Ps. 120, 137; Serm. 286, 354; De s. virginitate 44), knew a more precise version of it. Crispina appears in the procession of martyrs in S. Apollinare Nuovo, *Ravenna.

DACL 15, 2002-2004: Vie des SS. 12, 162-168: BS 4, 309-311; V. Saxer, Saints anciens d'Afrique du Nord, Vatican City 1979, 133-136; J.L. Maier, Le dossier du Donatisme. v. I: Dès origines à la mort de Costance II (303-361), Texte und Untersuchungen 134, Berlin 1987, 105-112; Y. Duval, Loca sanctorum Africae, I, 127-128; II, 693-695; F.E. Consolino, La donna negli Acta martyrum, in La donna nel pensiero cristiano antico, ed. U. Mattioli, Genoa 1992, 95-117; J. Fontaine, Littérature narrative sur le martyre et l'ascèse, de 280 à 370 aprés J.C., in Nouvelle histoire de la littérature latine, V: Restauration et renouveau. La littérature latine de 284 à 347 après J.C., ed. R. Herzog, Turnhout 1993, 583-584; V. Saxer, Afrique latine, in Hagiographies. Histoire internationale de la littérature hagiographique latine et vernaculaire en Occident dès origines à 1550, ed. G. Philippart (CC. Hagiographies I), Turnhout 1994, 60-64; LTK³ 2, 1347; K. Rosen, Passio sanctae Crispinae: JbAC 40 (1997) 106-125; F. Scorza Barcellona, L'agiografia donatista, in M. Marin - C. Moreschini (eds.), Africa cristiana. Storia, Religione, letteratura, Brescia 2002, 138-140.

V. Saxer

CRISPINUS and CRISPINIANUS, martyrs. The Auxerre recension of Mart. hier. records Crispinus and Crispinianus on 25 October. Natives of Soissons in *Gaul, there was a basilica in their honor there (Greg. of Tours, Hist. Franc. 5,34; 9,9). But a legendary Passion of the Riciovar cycle, perhaps from the 8th c., says that the two holy brothers were Roman shoemakers who suffered *martyrdom at Soissons under *Diocletian; by their torture and death, inflicted on them by the judge Riciovar, they witness to eternal life. The itinerary in William of Malmesbury's Gesta regum Anglorum (12th c.) puts their tomb in the basilica of SS. Giovanni e Paolo on the Caelian hill at *Rome (also BHL 1989d), the Mart. rom. at S. Lorenzo in Panisperna. It is clear from the chronology of their cult that they cannot have been of Roman origin or buried at Rome; their cult must have been imported to Rome as part of the Franco-Roman cultural exchanges of the Carolingian era. Through a play on words (Crispinus/Crispinianus, κρηπίς/crepida), they became shoemakers who served the poor free of charge.

BHL 1990-1994; AB 102 (1984) 178; BS 4, 313-318; LCI 6, 3-7; M.I. Allen, The Metrical Passio Sanctorum Crispini et Crispiniani of Henry of Avranches: AB 108 (1990) 357-386.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

CRITICAL EDITION. Ancient and *patristic texts, with few exceptions (e.g., epigraphical texts and some works on papyrus), have been passed down to us not in the original but through later manuscript copies, some even many centuries distant from the original. Since, through the entire time of transmission until a printed version, every work has undergone an inevitable process of progressive evolution or corruption, the purpose of a critical edition is to restore the original text to the degree possible, accompanied by an apparatus of documentation (critical apparatus). In the first two centuries of the age of the printing press, editors had scant or no knowledge of the historical process of the manuscript transmission of the ancient work they were about to print. More often than not the first editions (editiones principes) were based on a single manuscript, whose text was emended based on subjective criteria (ope ingenii). The 18th c. began to see an awareness of the importance of the systematic study of the manuscript tradition. Later, the recognition that a text's tradition proceeded genealogically, from one manuscript to another, and that the main factors that caused it to deteriorate during its transmission were recurrent and classifiable, allowed 19th-c. philologists to elaborate a scientific method of critical edition (K. Lachmann's method), which has two main stages: the recensio codicum and the constitutio textus. Recensio refers to the tracking down of all the manuscripts and also of indirect testimonies to the work, their historical, codicological and paleographical study, their collation, and the definition of their relations of dependence: the results of this work are represented in a stemma codicum (genealogical tree of the tradition), which gives information useful or even decisive for the choice of lectiones. When the manuscript tradition has been contaminated, the construction of the tree may not be possible. It is usually easier to reconstruct the path of the tradition of patristic-era works than that of ancient works, since we rarely have direct and certain evidence of the diffusion of the latter in the ancient period. For patristic works the archetype (the reconstructable manuscript, from which the entire known or knowable tradition has descended) is often a codex near to the original, or even the codex of the original edition, whereas for ancient works, when they exist, it is usually a codex from the period between the 5th and 8th c.

The second phase of the editorial work is the constitutio textus, the point at which the editor, judging the authenticity of the various lectiones, performs the selectio, or perhaps the emendatio, if the entire tradition is corrupted. The results of the recensio and the criteria that preside over the constitution of the text are described in the praefatio of the edition. The traditional rule, according to which the praefatio must be written in Latin, is today often ignored. The manuscripts used for the edition are listed in a conspectus siglorum. These characters (letters of the Latin alphabet for preserved codices, Greek letters for reconstructable lost MSS) serve to synthetically compile the apparatus criticus, where the variae lectiones which the editor did not approve are recorded, and the conjectures of the editor himself or of other scholars or past editors are indicated. The apparatus fontium contains internal references and parallel passages with works of the same or different authors, and the identification of citations, allusions and sources. A conventional system of diacritical signs highlights particular accidents that have happened to the text: omissions, interpolations, lacunae, irreparable corruptions. Texts passed down by a single witness (inscriptions, papyri, palimpsests) are usually published in a diplomatic edition. When there are various original redactions, it is possible and useful to publish them in parallel. Specific models have been worked out for the publication of fragments. Often the edition is provided with a specialized bibliography. It is considered important, and even more so before the recent advances in technology, that the critical edition be provided with good indexes.

P. Maas, Textkritik, Leipzig 1927; G. Pasquali, Storia della tradizione e critica del testo, Florence [2]1952; H. Fränkel, Testo critico e critica del testo, Florence 1969; M.L. West, Textual Criticism and Editorial Technique Applicable to Greek and Latin Texts, Stuttgart 1973; S. Timpanaro, La genesi del metodo del Lachmann, Padua 1981; Seminario Discipline umanistiche e informatica: il problema dell'integrazione (Roma, 8 ottobre 1991), ed. T. Orlandi. Accademia Nazionale dei Lincei, Rome 1993.

F. Gori

CROSS – CRUCIFIX. In pre-Christian antiquity the cross was a widespread symbol of life and hence of divinity. Its different forms were later developed in Christianity as well (ansate or Egyptian cross, ♀; St. Anthony's or Greek cross, T; immissa, capitate, open or Latin cross †; in the form of an X [chi]; gammadion or hooked cross, Γ; and the swastika or tetragammadion, symbol of rotary movement and so of everlasting life). The monogrammatic cross was much developed by the Christians (in Ep. Barn. 9,8, we find Iesus shortened to IH) in the composite forms ⚹ (chi iota), ☧ (chi rho) and the cruciform monogram ⳩. In the *gnostic movement, it indicated the separation and simultaneous conjunction of the pleromatic and sensible worlds.

*Patristic literature and the evidence of *archaeology have their own point of reference on the cross, the feast of the inventio crucis, which arose out of the dedication of the Constantinian basilicas of the Holy Sepulchre and Calvary in 325. From that point the cult of the cross developed, giving rise to a whole identifiable *homiletic and *iconographic series. Before that date, the cross in the *Hellenistic-Roman world was simply a servile supplicium, and it appears as such in the NT. As for Christian evidence, if we except some elements in *Ignatius of Antioch (Ad Eph. 9,1 and 18,1; Ad Trall. 11,2; Ad Philad. 8,2), it is absent from the Apostolic Fathers and has a secondary place in the *Apologists. In *Justin, it is mentioned in connection with the anima mundi, of Platonic-Stoic extraction, graphically represented by an X (chi) (Apol 1, 60, 1 and 5); and with the testimonia ligni of the OT, in polemic against Judaism (Dial. 86). Particular attention was given to the cross by Christian circles in *Asia Minor, *Jewish Christians who celebrated *Easter according to the *quartodeciman tradition. In that context the cross was not the lowly wood of execution but the cross of life: it was the Lord himself signified as "Life suspended." The quartodeciman communities, celebrating Easter not in the Synoptic tradition of the Last Supper but in the Johannine tradition of the Lord's death, understood the passion as the fulfillment of the Jewish Passover (the true paschal lamb is Christ sacrificed on the cross) and so as victory over death. So, in their Easter homilies we have the encomium of the cross as encomium of the Pasch, light and life (giving rise to the interlaced monogram φως-ζωη), spread through the whole universe; for this reason Passion Friday (14 Nisan) was not a day of mourning, but "fasting absolutely had to end" on that day (Euseb., HE V, 23, 1). After the disappearance of the quartodeciman tradition of Easter (the Asians conformed to the Roman mos of celebrating it on the Sunday after the Spring equinox), the understanding of the cross as light and life gave way to other considerations: theological (*soteriology, reconciliation, *sacraments issuing from the cross), *ascetic (acceptance of suffering and perseverance), *liturgical (the tendency of poems de veneranda cruce and the sermo de adoratione pretiosae crucis). Then the inventio crucis led to the treatment of the cross as signum victoriae, the crux invicta so common in ancient *iconography, no longer related to the crucifixion but to the Lord's glorious *parousia (jeweled cross). The terminology of the cross, quartodeciman in context, received special treatment in its application to *ecclesiology. Also important in antiquity was the signum crucis, used before any action (Cyr. of Jer., Cat. 13,36) and raised to having a ritual value of sacramental efficacy (Aug., In Io. ev. tr. 118,5) and as a sign of belonging to Christianity. (They became a Christian when, upon admission to the audientes catechumens, they were signed on the forehead with a cross.)

The oldest monument with a Christian cross is held to be the Palmyra inscription (136); then those of *Dura Europos and Medula in *Syria (232 and 197–198). In Western Christian *cemeteries, no pre-Constantinian cross has been dated; the inscription of St. Rufina at S. Callisto in *Rome is dated no later than the end of the 2nd c. After the finding of the cross at *Jerusalem, it appeared on *sarcophagi as the crux invicta (Wilpert, Sarcofagi, pl. 142,3 and 146,3) which, in iconography, assumed the connotations of a symbol or trophy (tropaion) of victory, whether carried like the Roman labarum or substituted for, e.g., the sepulcher (as anastasis), as it appears in post-Constantinian "passion" *sarcophagi. It is the Christus victor with a cross-headed scepter who celebrates his victory over death (Barberini diptych, Louvre, first half of the 6th c.) or appears, dressed as emperor, with the enthroned cross in the center (ivory, Musée des Beaux Arts, Lyons, also 6th c.); and Christus cosmocrator who is surrounded by nature participating in his crucifixion.

As for depiction of the crucifixion, apart from the 2nd-c. Palatine graffito (a crucifix with ass's head) it does not appear until the 1st half of the 5th c. The oldest (Christ naked on the cross) so far known is in the British Museum (420–430?); that on the wooden door of S. Sabina (top left panel) must be slightly later. In the East, a dramatic depiction of the crucifixion with Christ on the cross wearing a colobium developed in the 2nd half of the 6th c.: it appears in its mature phase in the gospels of *Rabbula (586). A similar but more symbolic type, very common in later Christian art, is that of the ampullae of Monza and Bobbio. The first cemeterial example of the depiction of the crucifixion is in the cemetery of S. Valentino (7th c.).

A separate mention is required by the golden crosslet obtained by the technique of beating out a thin gold leaf placed in contact with a mold of metal, ivory or hardwood, with the decorative motif in relief. Though having the form of a cross, varying from Latin to Greek with arms more or less extended, the ornamentation reproduced on its surface did not necessarily contain elements proper to Christian culture; indeed, we frequently find animal interlacing, typical Mediterranean and "*Byzantine" motifs; sometimes the human face, rarely the whole human body, reproductions of coins, simple punched motifs and, finally, Christian figurative motifs such as christograms, crosses, eagle, dove, deer etc. The use of the golden crosslet is connected with the *funeral rite of inhumation, since it was sewn, as the holes in the corners of the arms attest, onto the funeral veil put over the face of the deceased, whose high social rank it also denotes.

J. Gretser, De cruce Christi, 3 vols., Regensburg 1734; O. Zöckler, Das Kreuz Christi, Gütersloh 1875; Croix et Crucifix: DACL 3, 3045-3139 (Paris 1914); M. Sulzeberger, Le symbole de la Croix et les Monogrammes de Jésus chez les premiers chrétiens: Byzantion 2 (1925) 337-448; G. de Jerphanion, La représentation de la Croix et du Crucifix aux origines de l'art chrétien, in La voix des monuments, Paris 1930, 138-164; G. Guala Campiello, Il valore della croce prima e dopo Gesù Cristo. Studio storico-religioso dalle origini al V secolo, Rome 1930; H. Rondet, La croix sur le front: RSR 42 (1954) 388-394; A. Grillmeier, Der Logos am Kreuz, Munich 1956; F.J. Dölger, JbAC 1958-1963; H. Rahner, Symbole der Kirche, Salzburg 1964, 239-564 (antenna crucis) (It. tr. Alba 1971); G.Q. Reijners, Tbe Terminology of the Holy Cross in Early Christian Literature, Nijmegen 1965; P. Stockmeier, Theologie und Kult des Kreuzes bei Johannes Chrysostomus, Trier 1966; E. Dinkler, Signum crucis, Tübingen 1967; B. Leoni, La croce e il suo segno. Venerazione del segno e culto della reliquia nella antichità cristiana, Verona 1968; V. Grossi, La Pasqua quartodecimana e il significato della croce nel II secolo: Augustinianum 16 (1976) 557-571; P. Yousif, Le symbolisme de la croix dans la nature chez s. Ephrem de Nisibe, Symposium Syriacum (OCA 205), Rome 1978, 207-227; H.J. Klimmert, Das Kreuzessymbol in der zentralasiatischen Religionsbegegnung: Zeitschrift f. Relig. u. Geistesgeschichte 31 (1979) 99-115; P. Testini, Arte mitriaca e arte cristiana, Mysteria Mithrae, Rome 1979, 429-457, in particular 443-454; S. Heid, Kreuz, Jerusalem, Kosmos, Aschendorf 2001.

V. Grossi

CROWN

I. Symbology and terminology - II. Iconography.

I. Symbology and terminology. The oldest Jewish literature speaks of the crown, initially probably in connection with the feast of tabernacles as a sign of dominion and power, then used in symbolic language about the Messiah: the crown symbolized the future earthly messianic kingdom and its glory. In Jewish *apocalyptic literature the crown is not used in reference to the messianic kingdom but as a religious symbol of participation in the *eschatological kingdom and its glory: the crown is granted to the just as a reward. In contrast, in *Hellenistic culture the crown (στέφανος) was a prize that exalted the earthly glory obtained through victory in battle or in an athletic contest. At Olympia, victors received a crown of olive branches as sign of triumph; the crown at Delphi was interwoven with laurel leaves; at Nemea, with celery leaves, and on the Isthmus, initially with pine leaves and later with fresh celery. Later, the Roman army rewarded its victorious heroes with the glory of the laurel wreath.

The Jewish literature of the Hellenistic and Roman period was influenced by this competitive notion of the crown. *Philo of Alexandria prized virtue as a "holy" crown (Agriculture 112-119), since it is a "crown which is the vision of God" (Praem. et poen. 27). The fourth book of Maccabees applies agonistic terminology to *martyrdom: "The fear of God crowned his athletes," since "the prize was incorruptibility" (4 Macc 17:11-15). The Pauline epistles take up this Judeo-Hellenistic idea of the crown: "Do you not know that in the races at the stadium, all run, but only one wins the prize? So, you also, run so as to win! But every athlete is temperate in everything; they do this to obtain a corruptible crown, but we, an incorruptible one" (1 Cor 9:24-25). "In the athletic contests, one is not crowned who has not fought according to the rules" (2 Tim 2:5). "I have fought the good fight, I have finished my race, I have preserved my faith. Now all that remains for me is the crown of justice that the Lord, the just judge, will give me on that day" (2 Tim 4:7-8). The fight to keep one's faith is rewarded by the Lord. Like 2 Timothy, the Apocalypse presents the virtue of faithfulness as a prerequisite for being crowned: "Be faithful unto death, and I will give you the crown of life" (Rev 2:10). Likewise: "You will receive the crown of glory that does not fade" (1 Pet 5:4).

The Hellenistic Jewish and NT texts show clearly how the crowning after an athletic contest inspired metaphors applied to the spiritual victory of virtue (justice, faithfulness), leading to eternal life. This also explains the passage from the earthly crown of athletic and military victory to the crown of the martyrs, soldiers of Christ. Three reasons contributed to this transformation. The first and most important was rooted in the symbolic strength of the crown: as a symbol of victory in the *persecutions, the crown was apt for characterizing what Christians considered the highest victory, i.e., death by martyrdom; indeed, *Tertullian says explicitly: "Persecution can be seen as a battle" (De fuga 1,5). The second reason was that the crown of victory is simultaneously the prize of eternal glory and, in this sense, a direct analogy with the Jewish idea of victory. The third reason, somewhat external, was the concrete circumstance that many Christians suffered martyrdom precisely on a field of contest (circus, amphitheater etc.). The crown of martyrdom symbolized the highest Christian victory and expressed the heavenly prize granted to the martyr immediately upon death. As such, this crown is a sign of heavenly glory and is opposed to human fame; the dual function of the crown—sign of victory and expression of reward—refers to a double meaning, earthly and transcendent.

In the *Martyrdom of Polycarp, the "crown of incorruptibility" (Mart. Pol. 19,2) symbolizes not so much the earthly victory of the martyr as the heavenly prize. In contrast, twenty years later the Martyrdom of the Martyrs of Vienne and Lyons stresses the earthly victory of the martyrial struggle. Thus, already at the beginnings of Christian martyrial literature (2nd c.), the two aspects of the corona martyrum were appreciated, though they quickly developed in very distinct ways.

Tertullian also holds fast to the NT images of the crown, indicating by it the heavenly prize in particular. Only on one occasion does Tertullian clearly allude to the earthly dimension of the martyrial victory, when he calls the martyrs "crowned" (De scorp. 6,2). A few years later, in *Hippolytus's Commentary on Daniel, the term στέφανος acquires a new value, expressing in particular the earthly victory of the martyr and his good reputation (Comm. in Dan. 2,22,2; 2,35,4); Hippolytus does show, however, that he knows the traditional meaning of crowning as heavenly prize (Comm. in Dan. 3,38,5). Around 250 the Didascalia Apostolorum* presents the martyrial crown as mainly earthly glory: the martyr, his head adorned with the crown of victory, rises from this world and ascends to heaven (Didascalia 19-20).

From the 2nd half of the 3rd c., martyrdom itself was considered a crown of victory and a sign of glory which, by God's grace and action, adorns the martyr forever. The works of *Cyprian of Carthage show this, at a time when the pressure of persecution was strong. Cyprian's martyrial theology thus shows in Latin the same development found in Hippolytus and in the Didascalia: "The soldier of Christ, instructed in his commands and in his teaching, does not fear the battle, but is ready to receive the crown" (Cyprian, Ep. 58,11). One notes this same evolution in the Passiones and the Legendae martyrum. In Latin the words corona and coronari are increasingly enriched with a significance of earthly glory, and become a technical term. We see this same symbolic evolution in Greek as well. *Eusebius of Caesarea, an expert in Hellenistic culture, has recourse to the image of the crown in competitive contexts, mainly to designate the martyr's victory; nonetheless, this meaning of earthly glory is found only in the noun στέφανος, while the verb στεφανοῦσθαι, "to be crowned," keeps it meaning of the prize of eternal life and can be equated with τελειοῦσθαι, "to become perfect," in such a way that this latter verb acquires a martyrial connotation (see Eusebius, Mart. Nicephori 9).

This martyrial symbology persists in 4th- and 5th-c. patristic literature. It is enough to listen to any homily of *Augustine or *John Chrysostom on the feast of a martyr to note that a crown of victory awaits martyrs. In later works, the martyrial symbology of the crown is sometimes applied to the church, which is crowned with the glory of the martyrs: "The church grew with the persecutions, it was crowned with the martyrs" (Jerome, Ep. 82, 10).

II. Iconography. Early Christian art iconographically shaped the conception of a "crown of glory" along the same lines as martyrial literature. In Christian *iconography the crown is the exclusive symbol of victory. Sometimes Christ alone, sometimes the martyrs are represented with a crown of glory on their heads. Considering that in the period before the peace of *Constantine (313) the martyrs were depicted without symbols of glory, we must maintain that during the first three centuries the crown was not used in Christian art, despite the fact that the literature of this period made frequent reference to it. This reserve is explained by the fact that the crown still had a strong connection with *pagan ceremonies and *sacrifices. The crown of Christian martyrs, on the other hand, "does not fade" (1 Pet 5:4), since they have chosen the crown of heavenly glory rather than that of human fame: Cyprian, e.g., speaks of the martyrs who, as Christians, bear a sign engraved on their foreheads from *baptism and, because of it, cannot wear a diabolical crown on their heads: "A forehead, sealed with the sign of God, cannot be encircled by the crown of the devil; it is destined for the Lord's crown" (De lapsis 2). This antithesis explains why the early Christians refused to represent the exclusively spiritual idea of glory with a crown of laurels, which, moreover, was an expression of *idolatry.

Only once the persecutions ended and the opposition between profane crown and heavenly crown ceased did the crown begin to occupy a preeminent place in Christian art, from the 4th c. on. After the *Edict of Milan (313), the crown ceased to be a symbol of pagan worship and was used in Christian monuments. This was the result of a gradual process. Before AD 350 martyrs and the apostles were represented with crowns on their heads, but especially between 350–400 this depiction became more frequent. Sometimes Christ himself crowns them, sometimes the hand of God. Often they are depicted in procession, offering their crowns to Christ or encircling the trophy of the *cross, in praise. Such representations continue after 400, reaching their monumental perfection in the churches of Santa Pudenziana, SS. Cosma e Damiano and San Vitale. Not just in basilicas but also in baptisteries the *apostles appear offering their crowns to Christ. Except when depicted on medallions, wearers of crowns are always depicted in some kind of action, since the crown was a rich symbol of vitality. From 400, crowns acquired the character of a sign or attribute of the martyr himself and lost much of the rich significance they had in the 4th c. An important circumstance is the fact that the martyrs never wear the crown on their heads or on their shoulders; rather, the crowns are placed in their hands or near their heads, or it is Christ, or the Father, who places it on their heads; the same iconography recurs in the case of Christ himself. This peculiarity is explained by the fact that for Christians the significance of the crown of martyrdom was symbolic, not functional, whereas for pagans it was both functional and symbolic; for Christians the crown had the spiritual meaning of glory—corona vitae aeternae—and therefore iconographical depictions of the crowned martyrs had to avoid suggestions of idolatry.

K. Baus, Der Kranz in Antike und Christentum, Bonn 1940; A.I. Vermeulen, The Semantic Development of Gloria in Early-Christian Latin, Nijmegen 1956, 91-108; A.J. Brekelmans, Martyrkranz. Eine symbolgeschichtliche Untersuchung im frühchristlichen Schrifttum, Rome 1965.

A. Viciano

CRYPTOGRAPHY. Cryptography, from the Greek words κρύπτειν ('to hide') and γραφή ('writing'), is when a writer contrives to conceal in a text certain thoughts and words to which he attaches particular importance. His motive may be the practical one of hiding those thoughts from the uninitiated, but it may also assume an ideal aspect: the pure pleasure of rendering mysterious a concept expressed through seemingly insignificant letters. Cryptography is closely related to the letter game which purposefully combined—though at first sight in a disorganized manner—the letters of the alphabet. This letter game, already attested from the 3rd millennium BC and later widely practiced in the Egyptian and Greek worlds—in particular during the *Hellenistic period—was quickly put to use for religious ends and played a decisive role in the creation of cryptography. Drawing for the most part on the symbolic-literal repertoire already widely used by the *pagans (e.g., the famous palindrome rotas opera tenet arepo sator), the Christians—also tying into *gnostic philosophical-religious currents—produced properly cryptographic documents, attested mainly through epigraphical evidence. As has been well shown—especially through the research of Margherita Guarducci—even the very earliest Christian literary sources decisively document the widespread use of cryptography (famous, e.g., were the carmina figurata of the African Publius Optatian Porphyry, who lived in *Constantine's time). A great contribution to the knowledge of symbolic letters and of the use of mystical cryptography resulted from Guarducci's deciphering, in 1953–1958, of the many Christian graffiti incised between 290–320 on the so-called wall G, near the tomb of the *apostle *Peter under the papal altar of the Vatican basilica. These were mainly the names of deceased persons and devout invocations, in which the letters of the inscribed graffiti were ingeniously "elaborated" in a way that introduced and displayed the main concepts of the faith. It has thus been possible to understand, from the precise deciphering of the *epigraphs, that the early Christian faithful attributed a special value not only to the letter T (for its obvious similarity to a cross, thus a symbol of salvation) and to the *apocalyptic formula AΩ (applied to Christ-God as the beginning and end of all things, or in a congratulatory sense to the passage from death to the beginning of eternal life), but other letters were also incised, assuming an apparently hidden symbolic value. The letter N (in the Greek sense of victory), e.g., or the letters R (resurrectio), S (salus) or V (vita) could thus conceal within a name or a word which contained it (or also graffiti not comprised of whole words) a much deeper meaning than what one would have been led to expect. The evalution of cryptographic epigraphical documents in a religious context is nonetheless a very delicate work requiring much attention and considerable critical sense.

M. Guarducci, I graffiti sotto la Confessione di San Pietro in Vaticano, I-III, Vatican City 1958; Id., La crittografia mistica e i graffiti vaticani: ArchClass 13 (1961) 183-239; Id., Dal gioco letterale alla crittografia mistica, in Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt, II.16.2, Berlin - New York 1978, 1736-1773.

M. Ghilardi

CUBICULARIUS. In the Roman world, this term designated the individual attached to the bedroom (cubiculum) of persons, normally, of high political and social rank. Particularly important was the cubicularius of the imperial house, who superintended the emperor's personal service and all the domestic staff of his cubiculum, constituting in practice the princeps's most trusted bodyguard. (In the late empire, the praepositus sacri cubiculi was at the head of this service.) The persons mentioned in the Christian inscriptions (ICUR I, 1461; II, 6109; Diehl 226) must have been cubicularii of the imperial court or of some noble family.

The duties of the cubicularius attached to the person of the pope cannot have been much different from those of the imperial cubicularius. We do not know when this service was instituted; only that the ministerium cubiculi pontificalis was held by laymen until the time of *Gregory the Great (590–604), who replaced them with clerics or monks so that these could profit by contact with the pontiff's private life (Greg. Gt., MGH Ep. I, 363). In Ordo Romanus I (nn. 23, 33), it is the cubicularii who carry the pontifical ornaments and the chair on which the pope will sit into the sacristy of the stational church. The custodes qui dicuntur cubicularii had a totally different function: they were instituted—as we know from the Liber pontificalis* (Duchesne LP I, 239)—by *Leo the Great (440–461) to be in charge of the apostolic tombs (super sepulcra apostolorum). These persons, chosen ex clero romano and comparable to the mansionarii, who looked after and maintained venerated tombs (near which they often lived), are frequently attested by *epigraphy, partly referring to the cubicularii of the two apostolic basilicas of Ostiense and the Vatican (ICUR I, 2043; II, 4852, 4865, 5088, 5179, 5180, 5725; CIL VI, 9315), partly relating to tituli urbani and other, extraurban, martyrial basilicas, to which this service had evidently been extended (ICUR VII, 17865, 27470). Two mosaic inscriptions at Grado mention cubicularii whose precise function is hard to establish (guards of relics, employees of some noble family or of the civil administration?).

G.B. De Rossi, La Roma sotterranea cristiana, III, Rome 1877, 531; Duchesne LP, 153, note 2, 239, 241, note 14; L. Cesano, s.v. cubicularius: Diz. Ep. Ant. Rom. II (1910), cols. 1280-1292; Ph. Lauer, Le Palais de Latran. Étude historique et archéologique, Paris 1911, 75; DACL III, col. 3166; M. Andrieu, Les Ordines Romani du haut Moyen Âge, II, Louvain 1948, 40; M.A. Cavallaro, Intorno ai rapporti tra cariche statali e cariche ecclesiastiche nel basso impero. Note storico-epigrafiche sul cubiculariato: Athenaeum 50 (1972) 158-175; J.-P. Caillet, L'évergétisme monumental chrétien en Italie et à ses marges d'après l'épigraphie des pavements de mosaïque (IV^e-VII^e s.), Rome 1993, 216-217, 247; O. Mazzoleni, L'epigrafia della "Venetia et Histria" nel V secolo, in Atti del Convegno "Attila Flagellum Dei?," Aquileia, September 1990, Rome 1994, 200-201.

V. Fiocchi Nicolai

CUMMIAN (d. 662). By his proper name (Cuumian, Cuimíne, Cumméne), variously transcribed (Cuiminus-Cuminus-Cummianus), he is not easily identified. He was perhaps *abbot at Durrow in S *Ireland but also thought to have been the abbot Cummeneus Albus at Iona (this does not seem probable). He could also be identified with Cuimmíne Fota (Cummianus Longus), who died in 661. His name was absorbed into the legendary cycle of Guaire Aidni, which makes him a globe-trotter. He could have been the abbot of Clonfert (ca. 590–662). Some texts can be listed under Cummian's name: the letter addressed to abbot Segienus of Iona and the hermit Beccanus (Beccán), to induce the *Celtic churches to adopt the *Roman date of *Easter (De controversia paschali), written ca. 632/633; he insists on church unity regarding the date of the Easter celebration. To him, or to another Cummian (a monk in Ireland who later lived at Bobbio in the 1st half of the 8th c.), is attributed a Liber poenitentialis or Poenitentiale (seu Iudicia) Cummeani, in which the author reviews the major vices and their penances. The hymn Celebra, Iuda, in sanctorum apostolorum, attributed to him, is an evocation in 22 distichs of the names of the *apostles, *evangelists and some other saints. Also attributed to him is a Commentarius in evangelium secundum Marcum (CPL 632; BCLL 345) and the De figuris apostolorum (BCLL 292).

CPL 1136, 1882, 2310; BCLL 289; De controversia paschali: PL 87, 969-978; Poenitentiale Cummeani: PL 87, 978-998: PLS, 4, 2039-2051; Hymn Celebra, Iuda: PLS, 4, 2051-2052; L. Bieler, The Irish Penitentials, Dublin 1963, 108-135 (text and Eng. version); Dreves u. Blume, Anal. hymnica M. Aevi, Leipzig, 51 (1908) 308-311; J.F. Kenney, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland I, New York 1929, n. 73, 93; T. Oakley, A Great Penitential and Its Authorship: Romanic Review 25 (1934) 25-33; J.E.L. Oulton, The Epistle of Cummian "De controversia paschali": SP 1 = TU 63 (1957) 128-133; BS IV, 393; D. O Cróinín, A Seventh-Century Irish Computus from the Circle of Cummianus: PRIA 82 C (1982) 405-430; W. Walsh - D. O Cróinín (ed. and tr.), Cummian's Letter De controversia Paschali and the De ratione conputandi (Studies and Texts 86), Toronto 1988; Patrologia IV, 457-461; LACL 167-168.

L. Dattrino

CURA SANITATIS TIBERII. See *HEALING of TIBERIUS

CURSUS PUBLICUS. The Romans were great builders of roads, which initially had a military purpose but then became an essential tool for the government of the empire, the movement of people and goods, and the spread of news, books and culture. In the republican period there was a private service of tabellarii (Hemerodromoi) maintained by important men, also for use by the government. With *Augustus began the cursus publicus (evectio) for the entire empire, i.e., the imperial service for the transport of public persons and goods (Suetonius, Aug. 49,3), thus only for government use. This had no connection with the public postal service or with the movement of private persons but provided the infrastructure for magistrates and personnel who traveled throughout the empire: thousands of stationes (or smaller mansiones), located at a distance of ca. 12 km (7.5 mi) along the Roman roads, offering horses, mules or other animals, and a carriage. A diplomata was required to use it (see Pliny, Ep. 10,120), but abuses were frequent; the person's dignitas did not matter, only official permission. The cursus functioned at the expense of provincials or of allies, who had to provide the hospitalitas and the means of transport for magistrates, their officials and for soldiers. Instead of diplomata (later called evectio), a sum of money (viaticum) was paid to cover the cost of transport; the administration and the army sometimes used other modes of transport, but always at provincial expense. From the 3rd c. there was a change: the traveling courts, the fact of multiple emperors, the growth of the bureaucracy, the provisions and centralization of the administration led to a reform, under *Diocletian, consisting in a more speedy cursus velox, and a cursus clavularius for the transport of goods, increasingly important in the 4th c. The involvement of local communities became more burdensome with the system of munera. Now, instead of tabellarii (or frumentarii), we find messengers and spies (agentes in rebus, curiosi); the number of stationes (mansiones, mutationes) increased everywhere, with the consequent increase in the speed of the cursus velox. The Itinerarium Burdigalense, the pilgrim who went to *Jerusalem from Bordeaux, gives an idea of the new state of the system.

*Dioscorus wrote to *Augustine from *Carthage, requesting an urgent response: "My brother Zenobius has been appointed director of the imperial chancellery (magister memoriae) and sent me, along with the expenses for the trip, the permit to travel using the state services" (et misit nobis evectionem cum annonis: Augustine, Ep. 117,1). Augustine himself, when he was appointed rhetor in the imperial capital, was proud of the fact that he was granted use of the cursus publicus to go to *Milan (Conf. 5,23: impertita etiam evectione publica). Ancient late-imperial literary, epigraphical and legal sources attest to the care given by authorities to the regulation and upkeep of this service. At first the empire guaranteed the service and authorized specific persons and the transfer of goods and news at the administrations' expense. In the 4th c., however, the cursus publicus belonged to the government, who managed it itself. There was no sea transport exclusively for passengers, who had to use cargo ships. The empire also used private commercial transport, by contract (naulum).

For the first time bishops had the privilege of use of the cursus publicus to go to the Council of *Arles in 314 (letter to Elaphius for the African bishops, through *Numidia, *Mauretania, *Spain: see Maier, Le dossier, 156; also for the return, there is mention of some *Donatist bishops for their return to *Africa, Maier 188: in this case by sea, meals included). *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE 10,5,23-24) reports Emperor *Constantine's letter to the bishop of *Syracuse, called to the Council of Arles: he could bring with him two persons of lower rank (i.e., *presbyters: Bardy) and three servants (paidas); likewise for participation at the Council of *Nicaea of 325 (Eusebius, Vita Const. 3,6; 4,43). Emperor *Constantius, to encourage participation at the Council of *Rimini, made transportation available, which was refused by many orthodox bishops to defend their independence: the bishops of Illyricum, *Italy and Africa, Spain and *Gaul: quibus omnibus annonas et cellaria dare imperator praceperat. The bishops of *Aquitaine, Gaul and *Britain refused because: indecens visum: repudiatis fiscalibus, propriis sumptibus vivere maluerunt. Tres tantum ex Britannia inopia proprii publico usi sunt, cum oblatum a caeteris collationem respuissent, sanctius putantes fiscum gravare quam singulos (SC 341,318). Severus praises the attitude of these bishops, poor as they were, and not having other means, made use of the government provision. *Ammianus Marcellinus also criticizes the use of the cursus publicus: ut catervis antistum iumentis publicis ultro citoque discurrentibus per synodos, quos appellant, dum ritum omnem [Constantius] ad suum trahet conatur arbitrium, rei vehiculariae succideret nervos (21,6,18).

With respect to the nascent phenomena of Christian *pilgrimages, until the start of the 4th c. we observe no differences from the normal means of travel. The *Peregrinatio Egeriae allows us to glimpse some changes underway in lodging, at least during the journey itself. The mansiones did not have a good reputation, so *clergy were prohibited from staying there; specific structures were thus set up for the assistance of pilgrims and clergy. Hospitia arose esp. in cities like *Rome and *Jerusalem that were pilgrimage destinations (deversoria peregrinorum). Ecclesiastical contacts also followed the route of the cursus publicus. After the Council of *Serdica of 343, the acts were circulated in the West to obtain the signatures of the absentees; the list of these is given in the MS of the Archive of Verona: the subscriptions were according to the order in which they were collected, along the usual route followed by the cursus publicus (see Codex Veronensis LX: letter to the church at Mareotis: Turner, doc. 21; esp. Pietri, Storia del crist., 284). In the "early medieval" period one notes a change: with the progressive withdrawal of civil authorities came an increase in the role of the church and of ecclesiastical and *monastic structures, which almost exclusively replaced the places for rest and hospitality along the road network, even after the drastic reduction in the volume of exchange and movement of persons. The collapse of the empire in the West led also to the decay of the cursus, even if some essential structures remained; in the East it lasted longer, as the Codex Justinianus* attests.

DACL; E.J. Holmberg, Zur Geschichte der Cursus Publicus, Uppsala 1913; D. Gorce, Les voyages, l'hospitalité et le port des lettres dans le monde chrétien des IVe et Ve siècles, Paris 1925; H.-G. Pflaum, Essai sur le Cursus publicus sous le haut Empire, Paris 1940; E. Mohly, Le port des lettres dans la correspondance de saint Basile, Louvain-la-Neuve 1973; S. Mitchell, The Requisitional Transport in the Roman Empire: A New Inscription from Pisidia: JRS 66 (1976) 106-131; B.M. Levick, The Government of the Roman Empire: A Sourcebook, London 1985, 99-115; R. Chevalier, Voyages et déplacements dans l'Empire Romain, Paris 1988; J. Vilella, Le transport maritime de voyageurs et de correspondance entre l'Espagne et l'extérieur pendant l'Antiquité Tardive: Pact 27 (1990) 57-62; M.-Y. Perrin, Ad implendum caritatis ministerium. La place des courriers dans la correspondance de Paulin de Nole: MEFRA 104 (1992) 1025-1068; E.W. Black, Cursus Publicus: The Infrastructure of Government in Roman Britain, Oxford 1995; Ch. Vogler, Les permis d'utiliser le courrier public dans la législation du Bas-Empire: RHD 73 (1995) 67ff.; G. Uggeri, Le stazioni postali romane nella terminologia tardoantica: Caesarodunum 29 (1995) 137-144; L. Di Paola, Viaggi, trasporti e istituzioni: studi sul "cursus publicus," Messina 1999; A. Kolb, Transport und Nachrichtentransfer im Römischen Reich, Berlin 2000; C. Corsi, Le strutture di servizio del cursus publicus in Italia, Oxford 2000.

A. Di Berardino

CUTHBERT, saint (Cuthbertus, ca. 634–20 March 687). Saint, bishop of *Lindisfarne (Scotland). A native of Northumbria, he entered *monastic life in 651. He was at Melrose, Ripon and Lindisfarne, where he became prior and, in obedience to the decisions of the Council of Whitby, got the Roman Easter (664) adopted. Retired to eremetical life on Farne Island (675), he was sought out by *pilgrims from all of *England. He was elected bishop, first of Hexham then of Lindisfarne, and abbot of the cloister three years before his death. In his last years he worked hard preaching and converting the local people. He is commemorated 20 March as the patron of Anglo-Saxons and of sea-travelers. From 999 his *relics were preserved in the cathedral of Durham, but the sanctuary was destroyed during the Reformation and its contents dispersed: still there today are the reliquary, some pieces of furniture and a *cross. Cuthbert wrote a monastic rule (lost). We have some biographies of Cuthbert: a Vita Cuthberti by an anonymous confrere (CPL 1379), and two by *Bede, one in prose (CPL 1380), another older one in verse (CPL 1381). Bede gives considerable attention both to Cuthbert's role as a pastor and to his numerous miracles and visions (Rosenthal), emphasizing his sufferings as a testimony to faith (Foley), along the lines of *Gregory the Great's thought.

Editions: for Bede's Vita metrica, W. Jaeger: Palaestra 198 (1935) 58-133; for the vitae in prose, B. Colgrave, Two Lives of St. Cuthbert, Cambridge - London - New York ²1985; A.I. Jones, Aelfric's Life of St. Cuthbert: Parergon n.s. 10 (1992) 35-43; Ch.F. Battiscombe (ed.), The Relics of St. Cuthbert Studies Collected and Edited, Oxford 1956. Studies: BHL 2019-2021; A Rimoldi: BS 4, 413; A.M. Tommasini: EC 4, 1098-1099; D.W. Rollason: LMA 3, 397; E. Craster, The Miracles of St. Cuthbert at Farne: AB 70 (1925) 5-19; C.J. Stranks, The Life and Death of St. Cuthbert, London 1964; G. Culkin, Cuthbert: P. Manns (ed.), Die Heiligen in ihrer Zeit, I, Wiesbaden ²1966, 360-364 = I Santi. 1: Dagli apostoli al primo Medioevo, Milan 1988, 330-334; L.E. Stoltz, The Development of the Legend of St. Cuthbert, diss. Tucson 1969; E. Temple, A Note on the University College Life of St. Cuthbert: BLR 9 (1978) 320-322; J.T. Rosenthal, Bede's Life of St. Cuthbert Preparatory to the Ecclesiastical History: CHR 68 (1982) 599-611; G. Bonner - S. Rollason - L. Stancliffe (eds.), St. Cuthbert, His Cult and His Community to A.D. 1200, Woodbridge 1989, and the essays therein; C. Stevens, St. Cuthbert: The Lindisfarne Years: Cistercian Studies Quart. 26 (1991) 25-39; D.P. Kirby, The Genesis of Cult: Cuthbert of Farne and Ecclesiastical Politics in Northumbria in the Late Seventh and Early Eighth Centuries: Journal of Ecclesiastical History 46 (1995) 383-397; B. Abou-El-Haj, Saint Cuthbert: The Post-Conquest Appropriation of an Anglo-Saxon Cult, in P.E. Szarmach (ed.), Holy Men and Holy Women, Albany 1996, 177-206; G. Bonner, Saint Cuthbert—Soul Friend, in Id. (ed.), Church and Faith in the Patristic Tradition, Aldershot 1996, 23-42; W.T. Foley, Suffering and Sanctity in Bede's Prose Life of St. Cuthbert: JTS 50 (1999) 101-116.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

CYPRIAN, poet (4th-5th c.). The hexametric paraphrase of the first 7 books of the OT was first edited between 1852 and 1888 by J.B. Pitra, except for the poem on *Genesis, for which he completed the editions of Morel, Sirmond and Martène. Pitra attributed the poems to *Juvencus on the basis of the inscriptio of the two codices and linguistic and metrical affinities. In 1891 R. Peiper published it for the Corpus Vindobonense under the title Cypriani

Galli Poetae Heptateuchos, thus bringing to an end the age-old problem of its paternity and unity—previous critics had tended to detach the first book (Genesis) from the other six. The best MSS attest the author's name, Cyprian, but do not justify the name Gallus, probably derived from the place where the work was written and its linguistic peculiarities. Peiper, rejecting a previous identification of the poet with Cyprian, disciple of *Caesarius of Arles and bishop of Touloun (d. 546), fixed the composition of the Heptateuchos between 397 and 450; the work imitates *Claudian and is imitated by *Marius Claudius Victorius, *Aldhelm (7th c.) and *Bede (7th-8th c.). Subsequently Brewer identified Cyprian the poet in all probability with Cyprian the *presbyter, recipient of *Jerome's Ep. 140, who lived in N *Italy between 360 and 430.

The poem, in which Cyprian follows, along the lines of Juvencus, a historical-grammatical versification of Scripture without poetic or theological ambitions, is of 5250 verses, divided thus: Gen 1498, Ex 1330, Lev 309, Num 777, Dt 288, Josh 585, Jgs 760. Unlike the other paraphrastic poets, Cyprian makes no use of proems; he disdains digressions or ornatus; he is sober and concise in his descriptions (only 72 verses to describe creation and paradise and 6 for the flood); he employs rare expressions and neologisms sparingly; he Latinizes biblical names (e.g., Noelus, Sethus, Lodus etc.) and carefully avoids any reference to classical mythology. Despite his frequent prosodic and metrical irregularites, his versification is quite elegant and has some verses of exquisite craftsmanship. He uses Phalaecean hendecasyllables in the versification of the Canticle of Moses, which praises God for the miraculous crossing of the Red Sea (Ex 507-542), that of the Israelites at the well of Beer (Num 557-568) and that of the dying Moses (Dt 152-178). This metrical skill prevents one from attributing to inability the lack of freedom in paraphrase. Rather, we must consider it a deliberate abstention from any form of ornamentation, a sort of "monastic Atticism" (Fontaine).

Cyprian has a wide knowledge of the Christian poets *Prudentius and Paulinus, and of *pagans, esp. Virgil, of whom he uses entire verses and many clausulae, sometimes reelaborating them (as, e.g., in Gen 597: magnificusque senex frigus captabat in umbra, which recreates Buc. 1,51f. Fortunate senex . . . / . . . frigus captabis opacum), and whose colores he takes up esp. for his descriptions of nature. He uses a pre-Vulgate version of the biblical text, and in some cases goes back directly to the LXX (Gen 234-237 paraphrase, e.g., Gen 6,2, in the LXX text [angeloi] and that of the Vetus [angeli], but not that of the Vulgate [filii]). In *exegesis Cyprian gives preference to the literal sense. This preference and his disinterest in *allegorical and theological exegesis may rule out that Cyprian was an ecclesiastic; he may have been a layman and rhetor from a Christian family.

CPL 1423. Editions: CSEL 23; PLS 3,1151-1245. Studies: Patrologia III, 295-297; J.E.B. Mayor, The Latin Heptateuch, London - Cambridge 1899 (philological-linguistic comm.); S. Gamber, Le livre de la Genèse dans la poésie latine au Ve siècle, Paris 1899; H. Brewer, Über den Heptateuchdichter Cyprian und die Caena Cypriani: ZkTh 28 (1904) 92-115; F.E. Robbins, The Hexaemeral Literature: A Study of the Greek and Latin Commentaries on Genesis, Chicago 1912; DTC 3 (1923) 2470-2472; RAC 3 (1957) 477-481; Ch. Witke, Numen litterarum, The Old and the New in Latin Poetry from Constantine to Gregory the Great, Leiden - Cologne 1971, 190-191; A. Longpré, Traitement de l'élision chez le poète C. G.: Phoenix 26 (1972) 63-67; Id., Structure de l'hexamètre de C.G.: Cahiers EtAn 1 (1972) 75-100; K. Smolak, Lateinische Umdichtungen des biblischen Schöpfungsberichtes: SP 12 (1975) 350-60 (= TU 115); J. Fontaine, Naissance de la poésie dans l'Occident chrétien, Paris 1981, 246-248; G. Malsbary, Epic Exegesis and the Use of Vergil in the Early Biblical Poets: Florilegium 7 (1985) 55-81; K. Pollmann, Der sogenannte Heptateuchdichter und die "Alethia" des Claudius Marius Victorius. Anmerkungen zur Datierungsfrage und zur Imitationsforschung: Hermes 120 (1992) 490-501; M.R. Petringa, I "Sei giorni della creazione" nella parafrasi biblica di Cipriano Poeta. Tecnica compositiva e moduli espressivi: Sileno 18 (1992) 133-156; Id., Verg., Aen. 6, 520 and Cypr. Gall., Gen. 349: Orpheus 17 (1996) 108-125; D.J. Nodes, Doctrine and Exegesis in Biblical Latin Poetry, Arca 31, Leeds 1993, 25-36; A.V. Nazzaro, Poesia biblica come espressione teologica fra Tardoantico e Altomedioevo, in F. Stella (ed.), La Scrittura infinita. Bibbia e poesia in età medievale e umanistica, Florence 2001, 119-153; M.R. Petringa, *La fortuna del poema dell'*Heptateuchos tra VII e IX secolo, ibid., 511-536.

A.V. Nazzaro

CYPRIAN, presbyter (4th-5th c.). A personal friend and correspondent of *Jerome, whose Ep. 140 answers Cyprian's request for a plain, simple explanation of Ps 89[90]. Jerome praises Cyprian as one who meditates on God's law day and night. This letter, written ca. 414, as F. Cavallera prefers (Saint Jérôme . . . , t. II,54-55; 164), or 418, when the anti-*Pelagian struggle was still raging, contains a clear statement of the need for *grace to do good works (see chs. 5 and 21). This Cyprian may be the same as *Cyprian the poet.

F. Cavallera, Saint Jérôme. Sa vie et son œuvre, Louvain - Paris 1922; EC 3, 1685.

S. Zincone

CYPRIAN of Antioch. The old *martyrologies are unaware of any Cyprian, bishop of *Antioch. From the 4th c., stories circulated about him: his Conver- sion, Confession and Passion belong to the genre of *hagiographical fiction in opposition to *pagan wisdom. The magician who sells his soul to the devil and the girl victorious over her seducer are themes of universal folklore, recurring in Faust. The Confession, an enlargement of the Conversion and the Passion, answers the need to finish a story. The fact that this legend was known to *Gregory of Nazianzus (PG 35, 1169-1193), *Prudentius (Perist. 13, 21-24), *Eudoxia (PG 103, 537-541) and is found in Greek, *Latin, *Syriac, Arabic, *Coptic, Ethiopic and *Palaeoslavonic can be attributed to the mentality of the times. His cult, in turn, is the fruit of his legend. From *Bede on, Cyprian and *Justina appear in all the martyrologies on 26 September, in the Synaxaria on 2 October. *Rome claimed to possess his *relics.

BHG 452-461; BS 3, 1281-1285; BHL 2047-2054; AASS, Sept. VII, 180-243; T. Zahn, Cyprien von Antiochien, Erlangen 1882; H. Delehaye, Cyprien d'Antioche et Cyprien de Carthage: AB 39 (1921) 314-332; A.D. Nock, Cyprian of Antioch: JTS (1927) 411ff.; A.J. Festugière, La révélation d'Hermès Trismegiste, I, Paris 1944, 37-40; 369-383; II, Paris 1953, 211-218; 251-257; H.M. Jackson, A Contribution Toward an Edition of the Confession of Cyprian of Antioch. The Secreta Cypriani: Muséon 101 (1988) 33-41; Cipriano di Antiochia, Confessione, ed. S. Fumagalli, Milan 1995; Q. Lampe, Zur Entstehung der Kyprianoslegende, in Vir bonus dicendi peritus, Fest. A. Weische zum 65. Geburtstag, Wiesbaden 1997, 287-289.

A. Di Berardino

CYPRIAN of Carthage (d. 258)
I. Life and works - II. Character and activity - III. Martydom and cult.

According to P. Monceaux, Cyprian was "one of the finest figures of a bishop that the history of Christianity offers" (Hist. litt. Afr. Chr. 2, 237). Bishop of *Carthage from 249–258, he died a *martyr during *Valerian's persecution.

I. Life and works. Cyprian's life can be traced only inasmuch as it is reflected in his work. His biography by the deacon *Pontius is not so much a history as a *panegyric. The acts of his martyrdom are the only document that comes close to what actually occurred.

Reconstruction of the years before his episcopate remains hypothetical. But from his letter Ad Donatum (ca. 246) we learn not just that his conversion was recent but also the reasons for that conversion. His biographer mentions the role the priest *Caecilian played in it. Also from his first years of adherence to Christianity (246–249) come two works which attest Cyprian's reading: Quod idola dii non sint, marginal notes to *Tertullian and *Minucius Felix, and the Testimonia ad Quirinum, a *florilegium of biblical citations arranged by subject.

He quickly became a priest but even before then had renounced his inheritance as a landowner. In 249 he was elected bishop of the city, arousing the jealousy of candidates whom his unexpected nomination defeated. His first work as a bishop seems to have been De habitu virginum, perhaps written in connection with the episode behind Ep. 4. The work is certainly modeled on Tertullian, but as a person of refined sentiments and a pastor speaking with authority. The treatises De oratione dominica (250), De lapsis, De unitate ecclesiae (early 251) and no doubt De zelo et livore (251/252) were published in the sad days of *Decius's persecution, in the climate of disputes and *schisms arising out of the reconciliation of *apostates. While De oratione dominica starts from Tertullian's De oratione, but in a new *eucharistic and *ecclesiological dimension, De lapsis defines the procedures of their reconciliation, in the manner and the terms later formalized by the Councils of *Carthage and *Rome of 251. De unitate is the first treatise on the church; in it Cyprian adduces the principles of its unity and sees in the apostolic college the foundation of its structure, established by Christ. Chapter 4 exists in two versions. The oldest, according to general opinion, is that which comes out in favor of the primacy of Rome; the other, taking opposite positions, would be a revision by Cyprian himself at the time of the controversy over *baptism. De zelo et livore would preserve the echo of the controversies aroused against him, at the time of the schisms at Carthage, by his unlucky rivals to the episcopate.

The plague of 252, with its train of public calamities, provided the cue for three more treatises: De mortalitate, De opere et eleemosynis, Ad Demetrianum. The first is Cyprian's most original work: not merely an exhortation to Christian *Stoicism, it presents a theology of death, seen as God's summons, accersitio dominica. Regarding almsgiving, it is not just an urgent necessity in disastrous times like these, but a duty, since in the poor we serve God, and "God comes before our own children." In Ad Demetrianum he opposes and resolves the objections that *Augustine would come up against in the City of God: present evils are God's punishment, not because of Christianity, but for the crimes and persecutions of the *pagans. While the Christians resolve to "return love instead of hate; for the torments and pains inflicted on us, we show you the way of salvation." De bono patientiae depends on Tertullian's De patientia more directly than any other of Cyprian's works. Mentioned at the end of the letter to Jubaianus (Ep. 73,26), it must date from 256, the time of the baptismal controversy. Cyprian's last work may be the exhortation to martyrdom Ad Fortunatum, which is certainly connected with a persecution, probably that of Valerian in 257–258. It consists of a selection of biblical passages on the duties of Christians in time of persecution. Some would identify its recipient as the bishop of Thuccabor, who attended the council of 1 September 256 (Sent. epp. 17). Finally, it is in Cyprian's letters that the man appears most clearly. They cover the whole period of his episcopate and allow us to fix sure reference points in the chronology of his life and works, from the start of Decius's persecution to the last days of his life (d. 14 September 258).

II. Character and activity. Cyprian's character was fully formed in his conversion: he remained celibate and put his fortune at the service of the church and the poor; on many occasions he was generous to the needy (Ep. 62, 76); he showed supreme magnanimity to his executioner. His conversion also had an intellectual character: apart from the letter Ad Donatum, where at every sentence the rhetor peeps out from under the convert, his literary work shows that he totally renounced secular literature. He now had only two teachers, but knew them thoroughly: the Bible and Tertullian, which made up his daily reading; this abandonment itself was for him a sort of *ascesis. But what his contemporaries praised in him was the rectitude of his thought, the firmness of his teaching, the nobility of his character, his generosity and availability to others, his faithfulness to his Christian commitment and to his duties as bishop, all finally crowned with martyrdom (see Ep. 77; Passio Mariani et Jacobi 6; Passio Lucii et Montani 13).

His activity played out above all during *Decius's persecution, from which, like *Dionysius of Alexandria, he escaped by flight. From his hiding place he continued to direct his community, enjoining them to assist prisoners, bury the dead and keep a register of martyrs. When the persecution became more harsh and defections multiplied, and when *confessors in prison began unduly to promote the reconciliation of apostates, Cyprian recommended patience and *penitence to the lapsi, reminded the confessors of the respect due the bishop's authority, and deferred resolution of the problem to after the persecution. He did not subsequently change his attitude on this, save for speeding up the readmission of penitent lapsi in danger of death. Instead of restoring calm, the bishop's decision displeased both apostates and confessors; they joined up with five priests who from the start had accepted Cyprian's election with bad grace. They promoted a schism and were *excommunicated. There were similar difficulties at Rome, where the election of *Cornelius led to *Novatian's schism. Meanwhile, around *Easter 251, the persecution ended, and soon afterward a general council of all *Africa was held at Carthage, which ruled on the question of lapsi in accordance with Cyprian's proposal. The schism of Carthage was rapidly reabsorbed, while that of Novatian spread to the whole church. In this difficult situation, Cyprian's support for his Roman colleague *Cornelius and his successor *Lucius was unwavering. The situation deteriorated with Pope *Stephen. Already the question of the deposed Spanish bishops (Ep. 67), and then that of *Marcian of Arles (Ep. 68), had caused friction between Rome and Carthage; the baptismal controversy made the differences between the two men public. Under what conditions should *heretics and schismatics who had received baptism outside of the Catholic church be readmitted to it? At Rome such baptism was considered valid and hands were merely laid on those who returned to the community, but at Carthage baptism by heretics was considered null, and those who had been baptized by heretics or schismatics were rebaptized. This practice had become traditional in Africa after *Agrippinus (ca. 220). The two churches might have continued to live in harmony with different customs, as in the past. This was not possible, however, since Stephen believed it his duty to bring the African bishops around to his point of view. When Cyprian became aware that the bishop of Rome was intervening in the internal affairs of the African churches, he felt it a blow to his authority. But there was more: Stephen seemed to have interpreted the primacy of Rome, expressed in ch. 4 of Cyprian's De unitate, too widely. Cut to the quick, the bishop of Carthage rewrote the passage in question, passing over Peter's primacy in silence. Both sides took up arms and sought supporters: Cyprian found one in *Firmilian, bishop of *Caesarea in *Cappadocia, a decisive and impassioned man. Meanwhile councils succeeded one another in Africa, aimed at reinforcing and asserting the unity of the African church: that of 1 September 256 showed it unanimous on Cyril's positions. Would they have reached the point of mutual excommunication if providence had not brought peace by taking Pope Stephen to itself? We cannot know, but the baptismal controversy between Stephen and Cyprian certainly shows that they enjoyed equal moral authority in the eyes of their contemporaries. It also shows how far Cyprian had succeeded in forging his country's unity, i.e., the unanimity of the African churches. This episcopate, scattered at the time of Decius's persecution, was united behind its leader by the time of Valerian's—and ready, in part, to follow him to martyrdom. There can be no doubt that this was the result of Cyprian's influence.

III. Martydom and cult. The acts of Cyril's martyrdom reflect the stages of the persecution. On 30 August 257, summoned before the proconsul, Cyprian was notified of the imperial rescript on the basis of which bishops had to take part in pagan ceremonies, but he felt it incompatible with his profession of Christian faith—an incompatibility not just contingent but essential, and so his resolution was final. He was exiled for a year, and during his exile he wrote his last letters (Ep. 76-81). His penultimate letter cites the imperial rescript intensifying the persecution: immediate execution of bishops, priests and deacons; loss of rank for Roman senators, nobles and knights, confiscation of their goods, and condemnation to death if they persisted; exile and confiscation of goods for matrons; for soldiers, confiscation of goods and reduction to slavery. The letter refers to the execution of *Sixtus II, 6 August 258, so it must have been written that August. Returning to Carthage soon after, Cyprian was rearrested on 13 September and beheaded the next day in agro Sexti. He was buried not far away, in the cemetery of the procurator Macrobius Candidianus, on the Mappalia road. His cult was immediate. At the end of the century, according to the Passio Maximiliani, Christians were buried near his tomb. In the next century his name appears in the Roman Depositio martyrum*, and his feast was celebrated on 14 September in the cemetery of Callistus. In Augustine's time there were three sanctuaries in his honor at Carthage: the mensa Cypriani on the site of his execution, the basilica in Mappalibus over his tomb, and a memoria near the sea. Augustine preached in his honor repeatedly. His cult is attested in *Spain at the time of *Prudentius; in the East he became the hero of a *hagiographical romance (*Cyprian of Antioch). In the Carolingian era his *relics were transferred, and from that period his feast was universally celebrated.

CPL 38-67; Acta Cypriani (BHL 2037); Sp. tr.: BAC 75, 756-761; It. tr.: M. Pellegrino, Vita e martirio di S. Cipriano, Alba 1955, 191-199; Fr. tr.: V. Saxer*, Saints anciens d'Afrique du Nord*, Rome 1979; Atti e passioni dei martiri. Introduzione di A.A.R. Bastiaensen, testo critico e commento ed. A.A.R. Bastiaensen et al., Fondazione Lorenzo Valla, Milan 1987, 193-231; J.L. Maier, Le dossier du Donatisme. I: Des origines à la mort de Costance II (303-361), Texte und Untersuchungen 134, Berlin 1987, 122-126; M.A. Tilley, Donatist Martyr Stories: The Church in Conflict in Roman North Africa (Translated Texts for Historians, 24), Liverpool 1996*,* 1-5; Pontius's Vita Cypriani (BHL 2041); Sp. tr.: BAC 75, 724-750; It. tr.: M. Pellegrino, op. cit., 89-187; M. Simonetti, CTP 6; L. Canali, in Vite dei Santi, Fondazione L. Valla, Milan 1975, 5-49; V. Saxer, Afrique latine, in Hagiographies. Histoire internationale de la littérature hagiographique latine et vernaculaire en Occident des origines à 1550, sous la direction de Philippart G. (CC. Hagiographies I), Turnhout 1994, 35-43; Id., Atti dei martiri, 179-191; A. Wlosok, Actes des martyrs et Passions, in Nouvelle histoire de la littérature latine, V: Restauration et renouveau. La littérature latine de 284 à 347 après J.C., ed. R. Herzog, Turnhout 1993, 426-427; 433-435; J. Aronen, Indebtedness to Passio Perpetuae in Pontius' Vita Cypriani: VChr 38,1 (1984) 67-76; Y. Duval, Loca sanctorum Africae, II, Paris 1982, 671-695; Histoire des saints, II, 121-130; T. Baumeister, Der heilige Bischof. Überlegungen zur Vita Cypriani, in SP XVIII, Kalamazoo 1989, 275-282; S. Deleani, Le récit de la mort de Cypriens dans la Vita Cypriani: structure et signification, in La narrativa cristiana antica. Codici narrativi, strutture formali, schemi retorici. XXIII Incontro di Studiosi dell'Antichità Cristiana. Roma 5-7 maggio 1994, Rome 1995 (SEA 50), 465-477; H. Montgomery, Pontius' Vita Cypriani and the Making of a Saint: SO 71 (1996) 195-215; V. Saxer, La Vita Cypriani du diacre Pontius, "Première biographie chrétienne," in Orbis Romanus Christianusque ab Diocletiani aetate usque ad Heraclium. Travaux sur l'Antiquité Tardive rassemblés autour de rechérches de Noël Duval, Paris 1995, 237-251; Cyprian's Works (PL 4; CSEL 3,1-2; CCL 3, A-C; 3D Prolegomena); Epistulae (Fr. tr.: L. Bayard, Paris 1925); De unitate ecclesiae (Fr. tr.: P. de Labriolle, Paris 1942; V. Saxer, in Les Pères dans la foi, 1979); De lapsis (Sp. tr.: BAC 75, 562-597); Ad Demetrianum (ed. and It. tr.: E. Gallicet, CP 4); Monceaux 2; M. Bévenot, St. Cyprian's De Unitate Chapt. 4 in the Light of the Mss.: AG 11 (1937); DHGE 13, 1149-1160; V. Saxer, Vie liturgique et quotidienne à Carthage vers le milieu du IIIe s., coll. Studi di antichità cristiana 29, Rome 1969; Ch. Saumagne, S. Cyprien, évêque de Carthage, "pape" d'Afrique (coll. Études d'antiquités africaines), Paris 1975; A. d'Alès, La théologie de S. Cyprien, Paris 1922; E.W. Benson, Cyprian, His Life, His Time, His Work, London 1897; J.A. Faulkner, Cyprian the Churchman, Cincinnati - New York 1906; H. Koch, Cyprianische Untersuchungen: Arbeiten zur Kirchengeschichte, IV, Bonn 1926; D.D. Sullivan, The Life of the North Africans Revealed in the Works of St. Cyprian, Washington, DC 1933; J.P. Brisson, Autonomisme et christianisme dans l'Afrique romaine de Septime Sévère à l'invasion arabe, Paris 1958; M.A. Fahey, Cyprian and the Bible: A Study in Third-Century Exegesis, Tübingen 1971; L. Duquenne, Chronologie des lettres de S. Cyprien: Subsidia hagiografia, 54, Brussels 1972; M. Girardi, Scrittura e battesimo degli eretici nella lettera di Firmiliano a Cipriano: VetChr 19 (1982) 37-67; M. Pellegrino, Eucarestia e martirio in San Cipriano, in Convivium dominicum, Catania 1959, 135-150 (repr. Ricerche patristiche I, Turin 1982, 525-540); E. Gallicet, Cipriano e la Chiesa, in La concezione della Chiesa nell'antica letteratura Cristiana (Pubblicazioni dell'Istituto di Filologia Classica e Medievale, 100), Genoa 1986; V. Saxer, La Bible chez les Pères latins du IIIe siècle, in Le monde latin antique et la Bible, sous la direction de J. Fontaine et Ch. Pietri, Paris 1985, 339-369; W. Wischmeyer, Der Bischof im Prozes. Cyprian als Episcopus, Patronus, Advocatus und Martyr vor dem Proconsul, in Fructus centesimus. Mélanges offerts à Gerard J.M. Bartelink (Instr. Patr. 19), Dordrecht 1989, 363-371; A.G. Hamman, Ascèse et virginité à Carthage au IIIe siècle, in Memoriam sanctorum venerantes. Miscellanea in onore di Monsignor Victor Saxe, Studi di Antichità Cristiana, 48, Vatican City 1992; P. Siniscalco, La lettera 63 di Cipriano sull'eucarestia. Osservazioni sulla cronologia, sulla simbologia, sui contenuti, in Storia e interpretazione degli antichi testi eucaristici, Genoa 1995, 69-82; E. Zocca, La "Senectus mundi." Significato, fonti e fortuna di un tema ciprianeo, in Studi sul cristianesimo antico e moderno in Onore di Maria Grazia Mara, eds. M. Simonetti and P. Siniscalco (= Augustinianum 35 [1995] 641-677); H. Montgomery, The Bishop Who Fled: Responsibility and Honour in Saint Cyprian, in SP XXI, Louvain 1989, 264-267; I. Pereira Lamelas, Una domus et ecclesia dei in saeculo. Leitura socio-antropológica do projecto de ecclesia de S. Cipriano de Cartago, Lisbon 2002. Annual bibliographical update: Chronica Tertullianea et Cyprianea, REAug 1986ff.

V. Saxer

CYPRIAN of Toulon (d. before 549). Born at Marseille or *Arles ca. 475, he was a pupil and follower of *Caesarius of Arles. As bishop of Touloun he took part in numerous Gallican councils (from that of Arles of 524 to that of Orléans of 541), in which questions regarding *grace and *predestination were discussed. On Caesarius's death he was commissioned with the writing of his biography by *Caesaria, second *abbess of the female *monastery founded by Caesarius at Arles. The work, in two books, one of the most important products of Gallican *hagiography, was written with the help of collaborators (the two bishops Firminus and Viventius, the *presbyter Messianus and the deacon Stephen) but displays a unitary plan and a solid structural harmony. Cyprian is also author of a letter to Maxim, bishop of Geneva, in which he defends himself against the charge of *theopaschism. He died before 549 (date of the Council of Orléans, in which his successor Palladius participated). Venerated as a saint and copatron of the city of Touloun, his feast is 3 October.

CPL 1020-1021; Vita Caesarii: CPL 1018; BHL 1508-1509; PL 67, cols. 1000-1024; MGH, Script. rer. Merov. 3, 433-501; S. Caesarii episcopi opera omnia 2, Maretioli 1942, 296-323; La Gaule chrétienne: Vie de saint Hilaire d'Arles. Vie de Césaire d'Arles, Paris 1997; L. Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule 1, Paris 1907, 208; C. Wawra, Ein Brief des Bischofs Cyprian von Toulon an des Bischofs Maximus von Genf: ThQ 85 (1903) 575-594; P. Lejay, Le rôle théologique de Césaire d'Arles: RHL 10 (1905) 217-266; BS 3, 1280-1281; F.E. Consolino, Ascesi e mondanità nella Gallia tardoantica, Naples 1979, 73ff.; W. Berschin, Biographie und Epochenstil im lateinischen Mittelalter, 1, Stuttgart 1986, 249ff.; W.E. Klingshirn, Caesarius's Monastery for Women in Arles and the Composition and Function of the Vita Caesarii: RBen 100 (1990) 441-481; Patrologia IV, 297-299.

V. Saxer

CYPRUS

I. History and councils - II. Archaeology.

I. History and councils. Cyprus (Κύπρος), which had a flourishing Jewish colony (Josephus, Ant. Iud. XVI, 129), was first evangelized by Christians fleeing from the persecution at *Jerusalem after the *martyrdom of Stephen (Acts 7:59-60). Barnabas, a *Hellenistic Jew, was a native of Cyprus, of a Levite family (Acts 4:36). In the first missionary journey (44–49), *Paul, Barnabas and *Mark evangelized the island from Salamis to Paphos, residence of the proconsul *Sergius Paulus, in whose presence Paul disputed with the pseudo-prophet Bar-Jesus (Acts 13:4-12). After the so-called Council of Jerusalem (49), at the start of the second missionary journey (49–52), Barnabas separated from Paul and returned to Cyprus (Acts 15:39). After the apostolic age we have only legendary information on John Mark, Barnabas and *Heraclides, the presumed first bishop of Cyprus, ordained by Paul and Barnabas. We do know for sure that under *Diocletian some Palestinian Christians were exiled to Cyprus (Eusebius, De mart. Palaest.) and that at *Nicaea (325) three Cypriot bishops subscribed (H. Gelzer, Patrum Nicaenorum nomina, Leipzig 1898). Between 399 and 401, at the request of *Theophilus, patriarch of *Alexandria, *Epiphanius, archbishop of Salamis, called a council at Cyprus at which the reading of *Origen's works was forbidden, although Origen himself was not expressly condemned. This was the climate of the late 4th-c. *Origenist controversies, which involved *John Chrysostom; Epiphanius invited other episcopates to hold synods for the same purpose. Early in the 5th c. the metropolitans of *Antioch—capital of the diocese of the East—claimed the right to elect the metropolitan of Cyprus; Pope *Innocent I (415) supported Antioch, while the Council of *Ephesus (431) tacitly recognized the autocephaly of the Church of Cyprus. The question came up again at the time of the emperor *Zeno (474–491) and was resolved in Cyprus's favor with the help of the discovery, by metropolitan Anthimus of Salamis, of the tomb of the *apostle Barnabas. On 29 May 643 *Sergius, bishop of Constantia, called a provincial council (second council of Cyprus) of his suffragans to condemn *monothelitism. The decree of condemnation was sent to Pope *Theodore (642–649) with an accompanying letter recognizing the primacy of the see of *Rome. Subject to incursions from 632, Cyprus was eventually conquered by the Arabs. The *Byzantine reconquest began in the mid-9th c. and ended in the mid-10th c., when Cyprus came under the Comneni.

J. Hackett, A History of the Orthodox Church of Cyprus, London 1901; S. Vailhé, Formation de l'Église de Chypre (431): EO 13 (1910) 5-10; V. Laurent, Les fastes épiscopaux de l'Église de Chypre: REByz 6 (1948) 153-166; DTC 2, 2424-2434; DHGE 12, 791-827. First council of Cyprus: Mansi, Supplem. I, col. 275; Mansi III, cols. 1019-1022; A.C. Peltier, Dictionnaire des Conciles I, Paris 1847, col. 560; Hfl-Lecl II, 122; Palazzini 1, 289-290 Second Council of Cyprus: Mansi X, cols. 913-916; Hfl-Lecl III, 400; Palazzini 1, 290; C. Petinos, La naissance de l'église orthodoxe autocéphale de Chypre: Istina 37 (1992) 43-54; C. Petinos, L'Église de Chypre entre Constantinopel et Antioche (IVe-Ve siècle): ByzF 25 (1999) 131-141.

C. Nardi

II. Archaeology. Despite Antioch's attempts at ecclesiastical subjugation, the island managed to remain independent. Recent excavations have uncovered several churches. Salamina, now Salamis, is one of the island's most important centers. Old excavations revealed a 4th-c. Christian basilica, that of St. Epiphanius, one of the largest in the Levant (Gunnis, Historic Cyprus, 425); originally with seven aisles, it was renovated at the time of *Justinian. The basilica at Kampanopetra is from the early 6th c. Near Famagosta, at Sykada, part of a marble altar mensa with remains of Greek inscription datable to the 5th c. was found. Also in the E, archaeologists at Yalusa all'Agia Trias found a 5th-6th-c. church, destroyed in the 7th c., with geometrical mosaic floors. In the N of the island, at Chrysokava, near Kyrenia, archaeologists found a Christian *cemetery (Karageorghis, Masterpieces, 1). Further W, Soloi has uncovered an early Christian basilica with floors of geometrical mosaic and opus sectile. In the center, E of Nicosia, at the *monastery of St. Spyridion at Tremetuschia was found the mosaic floor of an old Christian church with an inscription of Bishop Cartarius. S of Nicosia, near Politiko, at the monastery of St. Heracleides, 5th-6th-c. mosaic pavements were found whose geometrical designs included Solomon's knot. In the S, at Amatus, near Limassol, an old church, buried for centuries, was found on the N side of the road, and a basilica with mosaics in the E necropolis. Kurion has Roman buildings with a mosaic representing Achilles, baths built in Christian times with mosaics and remains of a three-aisled Christian basilica with mosaic floor and baptistery on the N side. In the W, Paphos has remains of a church of the patristic period, with geometrical mosaics, in the district of the Panagia Limeniotissa ("lady of the port"). Built in the 5th c., it was destroyed in 653 (Philactou, Paphos, 88-89). Near St. Paul's pillar is an old basilica with mosaic.

At Peyia, in the basilica of St. George, remains were found of an earlier basilica with mosaic pavement, recently relaid on a new bed. St. George's has a curious altar formed from two Byzantine capitals (Gunnis, Historic Cyprus, 380).

Two Cypriot churches preserve wall mosaics with religious subjects. In the church of Panagia Kanakaria near Lytrankomo, remains of a Virgin and child with angels are preserved in the apse. Once assigned to the 9th c. (Gunnis, Historic Cyprus, 332), after comparison with similar works they are now dated to the 6th c. (Stylianou, Painted Churches, 43-48; Karageorghis, Masterpieces, 11-12). The materials of the old church were reused in the present 12th-c. church. The church of Panagia Angeloktistos at Kiti, with mosaic representing the Virgin and child with the archangels *Michael and *Gabriel holding the globe, is better preserved. Once assigned to the 9th or 12th c., comparison with mosaics from *Ravenna suggest a 7th-c. date (Stylianou, Painted Churches, 49-51; Karagheorghis, Masterpieces, 9-10). Christian paintings are preserved at Salamis in a cistern transformed into a church: the figure of the Lord and an inscription invoking Sts. Epiphanius and Barnabas (Karagheorghis, Masterpieces, 11-12). In the pavements of the baths of Kurion we should note the figures of Ktisis (creation) and Phoebus, symbols of Christ, and the inscription of one Eustolios, in which Christ is mentioned.

Moveable objects of the Christian period include a series of nine silver plates depicting scenes from the stories of David (see Pierides, Jewellery), found at Lapithos (Gunnis, Historic Cyprus, 317-318) and datable to 610–630 (Fobelli, "Piatti argentei"), and a hexagonal silver censer with depictions of Jesus Christ, the Virgin Mary and Sts. *Peter, *Paul, *James and *John (Stylianou, Painted Churches, 28-29). Then, as now, there were ceramic factories in Cyprus; some 4th-c. terracotta lamps, found at Salamis and elsewhere, have particular forms with *crosses (Oziol, Salamine, 238-239).

V. Karagheorghis, Masterpieces of the Byzantine Art of Cyprus, Nicosia 1965; A. Pierides, Jewellery in the Cyprus Museum, Nicosia 1971; R. Gunnis, Historic Cyprus, Nicosia 1973; T. Oziol, Salamine de Chypre. VII. Les Lampes du Musée de Chypre, Paris 1977; A.C. Phylactou, Paphos, Nicosia 1977; A. Stylianou - J.A. Stylianou, The Painted Churches of Cyprus: Treasures of Byzantine Art, London, 1985; A. Paribeni, Cipro, secoli 6°-7°: EAM 4, 800-804, Rome 1993; M.L. Fobelli, Fonti e cronologia dei piatti argentei di Cipro con le storie di Davide: RIA, serie III, 6 (1983-84) 191-219; S. Curcic, Middle Byzantine Architecture on Cyprus: Provincial or Regional? (Annual Lecture on the History and Archaeology of Cyprus 13), Nicosia 2000; D. Michaelidis, Archeologia paleocristiana a Cipro: CCAB 44 (2001) 179-239.

B. Bagatti - C. Pappalardo

CYRIACUS. Saint, patriarch of *Constantinople (January/March 596–29 October 606). Priest and oeconomos of Hagia Sophia, he was called to succeed *John IV. He reacted negatively to the usurpation of *Phocas (23 November 602), murderer of Maurice, whose widow Cyriacus protected after obtaining guarantees of *orthodoxy and peace from Phocas.

No patriarchal act of his survives. We know from the protests of *Gregory the Great that in his letters to the pope (597) he assumed and defended the title of ecumenical patriarch. Other letters (602) are mentioned in the Life of St. Theodore of Sykeon. He built a church dedicated to the *Theotokos in the urban quarter "of the Diaconissa." Commemorated 30 October in the Byzantine Synaxaria, 27 October in Mart. rom.

DHGE 13, 1167-1168; BS 3, 1294-1295; J. Mateos, Le Typicon de la Grande Église, II, Rome 1962, 83; A.N. Stratos, Bisanzio nel secolo VII, 1, 602-626 (in Greek), Athens 1965, 93-105 and passim; R. Janin, Les églises et les monastères de Constantinople, Paris 1969, 181-182; V. Grumel, Regestes, 273-277a; L. Magi, La Sede Romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini (VI-VII sec.), Rome-Louvain 1972, 183-191.

D. Stiernon

CYRIACUS of al-Bahnasa (Oxyrhynchus). Cyriacus was bishop of al-Bahnasa, perhaps in the 8th c., but his activity can also be dated to the 14th/15th c. We have eight homilies under his name, including four discourses on Mary, preserved in Arabic (two on the flight into Egypt, the third on the Virgin's grief at her son's tomb, the fourth important for mariology on the *assumption, with strong anti-*Docetist elements); ascribed to him is the Ethiopic Martyrdom of Pilate, in which Pilate and his wife Procla are presented as saints; an Ethiopic *anaphora under his name is not authentic.

Editions: Abdel Massih Sulaiman, Cairo 1927; V. Arras: CSCO 351-352/Aeth 67-68, 1974, 34-55, 26-42; P. Dib, Deux discours de Cyriaque, evêque de Behnesa sur la fuite en Égypte: ROC 15 (1910) 157-161.

Translations: Erbetta 1,2, 616-618; G. Gharib (ed.), Testi mariani del primo millennio, 4, Rome 1991, 756-763; G. Giamberardini, Il culto mariano in Egitto, 2, Jerusalem 1974, 55-87; E. Lanchantin, Un homélie sur le "Martyre de Pilate" attribuée à Cyriaque de Behnessa: Apocrypha 13 (2002) 135-202; R.G. Coquin: Coptic Encyclopaedia 3, 669-671.

M. Starowieyski

CYRIL CELER (early 4th c.). Bishop of Laodicaea Combusta (Phrygia), at the beginning of Emperor *Constantine's reign he built a large church. His inscription survives: "Having been made bishop by the will of almighty God, and having administered the episcopate for 25 years with great distinction, and having rebuilt from its foundations the whole church and all the adornment around it, consisting of stoa and tetrastoa and paintings and mosaics and fountains and the outer gateway, and having provided for its entire construction in stone and, in a word, with everything, and being about to depart the life of this world, I made for myself a *sarcophagus and a base on which it must be placed, for the distinction of the church and of my family."

Monumenta Asiae Minoris Antiqua, W.E. Calder (ed.), Manchester 1928, I, 89, n. 170; cf. P. Brown, in Age of Spirituality, New York 1979, 19-20.

A. Di Berardino

CYRIL of Alexandria (370/380–444). Born at *Alexandria sometime between 370 and 380, he entered religious life and may have spent some time as a monk. He was nephew to the powerful Bishop *Theophilus, whom he accompanied in 403 to the Synod of the *Oak, which deposed *John Chrysostom, and whom he succeeded as bishop of Alexandria, 17 October 412. He inherited his uncle's power and ambitions, as well as his energy, political capacity, harshness to his enemies and lack of scruples. Only in 417 did he decide, for political reasons, to readmit Chrysostom's name to the *diptychs of his church. The policy of violence that he initiated against *pagans and *heretics caused, among other things, the murder of the famous Platonist philosopher *Hypatia by a gang of fanatical monks. The election of *Nestorius, representative of the rival see of *Antioch, as bishop of *Constantinople could not have pleased him; so he made the most of the opportunity offered by the protests aroused by Nestorius's imprudent statements on *Christology, and criticized him (429) in various letters, including some to Nestorius himself. The appeal of both parties to Pope *Celestine (430) ended in the Roman condemnation of Nestorius. Charged with communicating *Rome's decision to Nestorius, Cyril supplemented it with the famous 12 anathemata, a series of christological propositions formulated in terms unacceptable to any Antiochene. Nestorius's appeal to the emperor *Theodosius II resulted in the calling of an ecumenical *council at *Ephesus for spring 431. Cyril, exploiting the Antiochenes' delayed arrival, began proceedings on 22 June without waiting for them and rapidly obtained Nestorius's condemnation. Arriving four days later, the Antiochene bishops, led by *John of Antioch and favorable to Nestorius, condemned Cyril's actions and Cyril himself. Theodosius at first declared both Nestorius and Cyril deposed and had them imprisoned; but Cyril managed to return to Alexandria, which he entered in triumph, 30 October. He later thought it opportune to seek a reconciliation with the Antiochenes, with whom he concluded the Pact of Union (433); they left Nestorius to his fate, and Cyril dropped the anathemata. He spent the next years defending and clarifying his christological doctrine against rivals and friends unconvinced of the soundness of his actions. Around 438–440, he joined the attacks against *Diodore of Tarsus and *Theodore of Mopsuestia, accused of having been Nestorius's precursors, but retracted in the face of John of Antioch's protest. He died 27 June 444. Cyril wrote much, and the rise of the Nestorian controversy divides his output into two parts: at first, he dedicated himself mainly to scriptural *exegesis and wrote against *Arianism; once the controversy began, it directly and indirectly polarized all of his activity, including his literary work. We also possess ca. 20 of his homilies and ca. 100 letters.

Cyril's surviving exegetical works on the OT are: Adoration and Worship of God in Spirit and Truth, in 17 books in dialogue form interpreting passages of the Pentateuch with reference to Christ, not in systematic order, but following a line of reasoning aimed at demonstrating that the Mosaic law is abrogated in letter but not in spirit, since it is fulfilled in Christ. The same material is systematically expounded in 13 books of Glaphyra. Not a collection of chosen passages, but overall interpretations, are the Commentary on Isaiah and Commentary on the Minor Prophets. The *catenae cite much fragmentary material on the Psalms, Song of Songs, Proverbs etc., not always certainly authentic. On the NT, only the Commentary on John survives complete; the Commentary on Luke, a systematic collection of homilies, is largely incomplete. We also get from the catenae many fragments on Matthew and on the Pauline Epistles. The Cyrillian interpretation of the OT is based on the traditional christological reading of the text, i.e., seen as a prophetic or symbolic anticipation (typos) of Christ and of the church, and is developed through traditionally Alexandrian criteria: distinction of several interpretative levels (literal, *typological and moral); recourse to other Greek translators and to the Hebrew text to supplement the LXX; use of etymologies of Hebrew names, numbers, animals etc., as a basis for *allegory. In contrast to *Origen and *Didymus, however, Cyril refrains from interpreting almost every detail of the OT as a prefiguration and anticipation of Christ. He states more than once that not all the OT authorizes this type of interpretation: Moses is a figure of Christ, but not everything about him is suitable to be transferred typologically to Christ (PG 71, 600-601). Cyril also gives much more room to the literal interpretation of prophetic texts than his predecessors had allowed: to them the OT had interest only inasmuch as it foretold, in a more or less hidden form, Christ; to Cyril, however, Israel's historical vicissitudes were interesting in their own right, apart from their christological reference. In the Commentary on the Minor Prophets, there are ample treatments of the history of Israel and the neighboring peoples as an end in themselves, without any typological implications. Cyril took great account in his exegesis of the criticisms made by the Antiochenes against the excessive allegorism of the Alexandrians, and he preferred to confine this type of interpretation to passages better adapted to it. The same approach is followed in his Commentary on John, i.e., on a text that particularly invites a *symbolic type of interpretation, in which Cyril, obviously without renouncing symbolic interpretation, also concedes a very large part to literal interpretation, with evident interest for the doctrinal dimension of the gospel text.

In the doctrinal field, before 429, Cyril gave his attention to fighting Arianism, whose ghosts still seemed alive to him, in two comprehensive works of similar content: the Treasure on the Holy and Consubstantial Trinity and The Holy and Consubstantial Trinity, the latter a dialogue. The *trinitarian doctrine expounded here was that which had been canonized by the long dispute of the 4th c., which testifies to the acceptance by the Alexandrians of the trinitarian formula of the *Cappadocians: one divine ousia articulated in three hypostases. From Cyril's last phase comes an isolated work, For the Holy Religion of the Christians Against the Books of the Impious Julian, of uncertain date (between 433 and his death), in which he refutes in detail the work Against the Galileans written more than 70 years earlier by the emperor *Julian the Apostate, thus confirming the topicality of the book and the persistent vitality of *paganism. Books 1-10, which refute Julian's books 1-3, and fragments of books 11-20 survive. The work's original dimensions are not known with any certainty. The fact that Cyril refutes Julian by means of ample citations of his text allows us to know something of that work as well.

Cyril's earliest activity against Nestorius is contained in several letters, three of them sent to Nestorius himself: the second (Ep. 4) contains a complete and balanced exposition of Cyril's Christology and was approved not just at Ephesus (431) but also at *Chalcedon (451); the third (Ep. 17) contains the 12 anathemata, which present this Christology in radicalized form for polemical ends. But in 430 Cyril published five books Against Nestorius, in which he refuted his rival's doctrines in great detail; and he answered *Andrew of Samosata's and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus's refutations of his anathemata with Against the Eastern Bishops and the Letter to Euoptius. While in prison after the council, he wrote the Explanation of the 12 Anathemata on the same subject. From the outset he understood the importance of having the emperor, or at least some members of the imperial family and the court, on his side: this explains the three texts On the True Faith, the first addressed to *Theodosius II, the second and third to the emperor's wife and sisters, in 430. After his return to *Egypt came the Defense to the Emperor, in which he justified his actions before and during the council. The post-431 Scholia de incarnatione unigeniti, in which Cyril clarified the mode of union of the two natures in Christ, without confusion but also without division, survive entirely only in *Latin translation. We have only extracts, albeit copious ones, of Against Diodore and Theodore, written ca. 438 as part of the campaign unleashed by implacable anti-Nestorians against these two great Antiochene doctors, accused of having anticipated Nestorius's divisionist Christology. We should also note Against Those Who Will Not Admit That the Holy Virgin Is Mother of God and Christ Is One, and, among the many letters dedicated to the controversy and its aftermath, Ep. 39, to John of Antioch, in which Cyril rejoices over the reconciliation of 433, Ep. 45 and 46 to *Succensus and Ep. 40 to *Acacius of Melitene, in which he defends his Christology against its critics, insisting particularly on Christ's unity of nature.

The spirit that animates Cyrillian Christology is that of the logos/sarx approach, traditional to Alexandria from the last decades of the 3rd c. Though Cyril, after the condemnation of that christological approach in the person of *Apollinaris, was very careful to bring out the integrity (soul and body) of the Logos's human nature, he saw the union essentially in terms of the preeminence of the divine nature over the human nature, which is only a passive instrument of it. So Cyril is at the other extreme from Antiochene Christology, which valued the autonomy of Christ's human nature to the point of making it a second subject alongside the divine Logos: for Cyril this meant dividing Christ. So he heavily stressed the unity of subject in the union, in the sense that there is only one hypostasis ("person"), that of the Logos, which has assumed a whole and complete humanity. (Cyril was always loath, with some exceptions, to define the humanity assumed by Christ as a nature.) Indeed, Cyril gradually became more and more diffident toward the traditional terminology of homo assumptus, which spoke of assumed humanity, in which the divine Logos was clothed, since it seemed to him to present the union in too extrinsic a form; he preferred to speak, with Jn 1:14, of the Logos which became man. With even greater reason, he rejected certain typical Antiochene expressions which presented Christ's body as the temple in which the deity had made its dwelling.

Cyril always clearly specified that, in the union, the characteristics (idiōmata) of humanity and divinity were not confused, though, by virtue of the union, we can predicate of one what is proper to the other, i.e., we can say that God suffered and died, when, properly speaking, only his humanity died (communicatio idiomatum). He repeatedly put forward the example of the union of *soul and *body in humanity as an example in some way suitable for describing the union of humanity and divinity in Christ. But his terminology was not always consistent, partly because of political requirements: he sometimes spoke of two natures in Christ, divine and human, but his preferred terminology, esp. after 433, was that of a single nature resulting from the union, which he defined as "union of nature, natural union" (Anat. 3). Accustomed to appealing widely to earlier theologians, esp. to *Athanasius, to support his statements, he summed up his thought in the formula: "A single nature of the incarnate Logos," which he believed to be Athanasius's when in fact it was Apollinaris's. He admits that we must speak of two natures, but only before the union, i.e., only theoretically, since, at the moment of union, the resulting nature is only one, that of the incarnate Logos, in which the characteristics, whole and unconfused, of humanity and divinity subsist united in a single subject. Cyril was in fact the father of *monophysite Christology, and it was with good reason that the monophysites went back to him as to the supreme authority.

CPG III, 5200-5438.

Editions and translations: PG 68-77; ACO I, 1.3.5, etc. (see CPG); Ed. Pusey, 7 vols., Oxford 1868-1877; SC 97.231.237.246; Cyrille d'Alexandrie. Lettres Festales, W.H. Burns (ed.) et al. = SC 372, 1991; 392, 1993; 434, 1998; Cirillo di Alessandria. Epistole cristologiche, ed. G. Lo Castro, Rome 1999; C. Ferrari Toniolo, Cyrilliana in Psalmos. I frammenti del Commento ai Salmi di Cirillo di Alessandria nel codice Laudiano greco 42, Catania 2000; Resources: B. Sesboüé - M. Fédou, Bulletin de théologie patristique grecque: RSR 86 (1998) 221-236.

Studies: Quasten II, 118-143; DTC 3, 2476-2527; A. Kerrigan, St. Cyril of Alexandria Interpreter of the Old Testament, Rome 1952; A. Grillmeier, Christ in the Christian Tradition, London 1965, 329-333, 400-412; M.O. Boulnois, Le paradoxe trinitaire chez Cyrille d'Alexandrie. Herméneutique, analyses philosophiques et argumentation théologique, Paris 1994; J.A. McGuckin, St. Cyril of Alexandria: The Christological Controversy: Its History, Theology and Texts, Leiden 1994; P. Rosa, Gli occhi del corpo e della mente. Cirillo alessandrino; testi ermeneutici, Bologna 1996; B.

Meunier, Le Christ de Cyrille d'Alexandrie. L'humanité, le salut et la question monophysite, Paris 1997; D. Pazzini, Il Prologo di Giovanni in Cirillo di Alessandria, Brescia 1997; L.R. Wickham, Cyrill von Alexandrien: ThQ 178 (1998) 257-271: the entire issue of ThQ is dedicated to Cyril of Alexandria; S. Wessel, Nestorius, Mary and Controversy in Cyril of Alexandria's Homily IV (De Maria deipara in Nestorium, CPG 5248): AHC 31 (1999) 1-49; A. Camplani - A. Martin, Lettres festales et listes épiscopales dans l'Église d'Alexandrie et d'Égypte. À propos de la liste épiscopale accompagnant la première lettre festale de Cyrille d'Alexandrie conservée en copte: JJP 30 (2000) 7-20; S.A. McKinion, Words, Imagery, and Mystery of Christ: A Reconstruction of Cyril of Alexandria's Christology, Leiden - Boston - Cologne 2000; N. Russell, Cyril of Alexandria, London - New York 2000; T.G. Weinandy - Daniel A. Keating (eds.), The Theology of Cyril of Alexandria: A Critical Appreciation, London 2003.

M. Simonetti

CYRIL of Jerusalem (ca. 315–ca. 387). Cyril was born, conjecturally, ca. 315 at *Jerusalem. He was a priest there; in 348, Bishop *Maximus died and Cyril was ordained bishop by the *Eusebians *Acacius of Caesarea and *Patrophilus of Scythopolis, instead of the priest Heraclius whom the dying Maximus seems to have designated as his successor. Having quarrelled with Acacius, for doctrinal reasons but mainly because Cyril sought to establish his see's independence of the metropolitan see of *Caesarea, he was deposed at a *council held at Jerusalem in 357. When the Eusebians split (357–358) into several groups, Cyril supported the *homoiousians, who reinstated him at the Council of *Seleucia (359). But in 360 the Council of *Constantinople, which saw the triumph of Acacius and the *homoians, deposed him again. Returning to his see when *Constantius died (362), he was exiled again as a result of *Valens's pro-*Arian policy, either in 367 or some years later. He returned in 378 and took part in the Councils of Constantinople of 381 and 382, the latter of which confirmed the validity of his episcopal ordination, which had been questioned. He died probably 18 March 387.

Cyril left a series of 24 catecheses, preached either when he was still a priest or immediately after his election as bishop. The first is introductory (procatechesis); the next 18 (2-19) are addressed to the phōtizomenoi, i.e., those to be baptized the coming *Easter, and turn mainly on the detailed interpretation of the baptismal creed used at Jerusalem. Nos. 20-24, called Mystagogical Catecheses, are addressed to the newly baptized and explain the meaning of the *sacraments they have just received (*baptism, *confirmation, *Eucharist) and of the *liturgy of the *Mass. These last catecheses are attributed by MSS either to Cyril or to his successor John, or to both together; modern scholars fail to agree on this question. The series of catecheses gives us much important information on the *catechumenate and on the liturgy in use at Jerusalem. Of Cyril we also have a homily on Jn 5:5 (healing of the paralytic) and a letter to Emperor Constantius, describing the appearance of a luminous *cross in the sky over Jerusalem on 7 May 351.

Cyril's reputation suffered much from his election promoted by the Eusebians and from subsequent events (Ruf., HE I, 23; Jer., Chron. s.a. 348), and he was considered a pro-Arian who only gradually passed over to the orthodox camp (Socr., HE V, 8; Soz., HE VII, 7). In fact, in the variegated Eusebian coalition of ca. 350, he represented the tendency closest to Nicene orthodoxy, though he avoided using homoousios either out of prudence or, more probably, because he considered it open to *Sabellianism. In fact Cyril did not confine himself to refuting the radical Arian position that derived the Son from nothing but stated clearly that Christ is the real Son of God, by nature and not by adoption, really generated from the Father and like him in all things. Alone in the Eusebian group, he explicitly stated that the Son is coeternal (aidios) with the Father. In polemic with the Sabellians and with *Marcellus of Ancyra, Cyril has a clear idea of the personal subsistence of the Son, who with the Holy Spirit partakes of the Father's divinity. He confirms God's unity on the basis of the classical passages of Jn 10:30 and 14:9-10, and sees it dynamically, in the manner of the Easterners, as unity of will and as harmony. He also affirms the *Holy Spirit's personal distinctness from the Father and the Son, and his full divinity. So there are only a few traces of traditional ante-Nicene *subordinationism in Cyril. This doctrinal approach, not Nicene but very far from true Arianism, explains why he adhered at first to the homoiousian movement and later crossed over, with many homoiousians, to the Nicene ranks on the basis of the interpretation of homoousios provided by the Council of *Antioch of 363 (which he did not attend) and subsequently by *Basil of Caesarea.

CPG II, 3585-3618. Editions and translations: PG 33; SC 126; Reischl-Rupp, Cyrilli Hierosolymitani opera, I-II, Munich 1848-1860; Cirillo e Giovanni di Gerusalemme. Catechesi prebattesimali e mistagogiche, tr. and commentary, ed. V. Saxer, Milan 1994; Studies: Quasten II, 365-380; DTC 3, 2527-2577; J. Lebon, La position de saint Cyrille de Jérusalem dans les luttes provoquées par l'arianisme: RHE 20 (1924) 181-210, 357-386; A. Paulin, Saint Cyrille de Jérusalem catéchète, Paris 1959; Simonetti 586; H.M. Riley, Christian Initiation: A Comparative Study of the Interpretation of the Baptismal Liturgy in the Mystagogical Writings of Cyril of Jerusalem, John Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia and Ambrose of Milan, Washington, DC 1974; A. Bonato, La dottrina trinitaria di Cirillo di Gerusalemme, Rome 1983;

R.L. Mullen, The New Testament Text of Cyril of Jerusalem, Georgia 1997; A.J Doval, Cyril of Jerusalem, Mystagogue: The Authorship of the Mystagogic Catecheses, Washington, DC 2001.

M. Simonetti

CYRIL of Jerusalem (pseudo) (7th-8th c.). Ascribed to *Cyril of Jerusalem is a homogeneous group of *Coptic homilies, written probably between the 7th and 8th c.: On the Passion, On the New Sunday, On the Resurrection, On the Holy Cross, and On the Virgin Mary (two versions), an important testimony of the tradition of the *assumption of Mary. These homilies have been published by H. Hyvernet, Bibliothecae Pierpont Morgan codices coptici photographice expressi, Rome 1922; E.A.W. Budge, Miscellanous Coptic Texts, London 1915; A. Campagnano, Milan 1980; Encomion di Maria Maddalena, R.G. Coquin, G. Gordon: BIFAO 90 (1990) 169-212. Still unpublished is the Homily for the Wednesday After Easter (CPG 3598-3604, CPGS 3605-3606). There is also another homily in Arabic and in Ethiopic on the help given by Mary to Matthias when he was in prison. Finally, also under Cyril's name is a collection of homilies in *Georgian: On the Apparition of the Cross at the Time of Constantine; On the Discovery of the Nails of the Cross; On the Discovery of the Cross; On the Silence of Zechariah; On Pentecost (CPG 3607).

T. Orlandi, Coptic Encyclopaedia 3, 681-682; Id., Cirillo di Gerusalemme nella letteratura copta: VetChr 9 (1971) 93-100; A. Campagnano, introduction, op. cit.; S. Mimouni, Dormition et l'Assomption de la Vierge, Théol. Hist. 98, Paris 1995, 188-194. It. tr.: Erbetta/2, 604-615; Testi mariani del primo millennio, 4, Rome 1991, 686-697 (frag.); G. Giamberardini, Il culto mariano in Egitto, 2, Jerusalem 1974, 100-104; R. Basset, Les apocryphes éthiopiens, 5, Paris 1894 (Milan 1999), 48-71; V. Arras: CSCO 351-352/Aeth 67-68, 1974, 1-33, 1-25.

M. Starowieyski

CYRIL of Scythopolis (ca. 525–after 557). Born at *Scythopolis (now Beit She'an), capital of *Palestine II, in 543 he went to *Jerusalem to be present at the dedication of the new basilica of the *Theotokos built by *Justinian, visit the holy places and enter a *monastery. On the advice of John the Hesychast (see John the Silent) and after an inconclusive experience in a first monastery, he entered the *laura of *Euthymius in 544 and stayed there until 555. He was then part of a group of orthodox monks who went to occupy the New Laura after the expulsion of the *Origenists. In 557 he went to the Great Laura of *Sabas, where he stayed until his death. He owes his fame to the series of biographies of monks of the Judean *desert, which he wrote partly from archival evidence and partly from the stories of monks who had known the protagonists or their original circle (in particular *Cyriac for Euthymius and John the Hesychast for Sabas). For those whom he could still approach himself, he wrote their lives, adding his own personal testimony. Cyril shows the qualities of a sincere, trustworthy historian, as is shown especially by his concern for precision in the chronology of events. We must know, however, how to free the essential historical elements from a style which reflects the laws of the *hagiographical literature of the time. Thanks to him, we have a precise knowledge of the life of the lauras of Palestine of the 5th and 6th c., along with precise information on the *patriarchate of Jerusalem between the fourth and the fifth ecumenical councils and on the second Origenist crisis, which shows him a firm adversary of the monks who followed *Evagrius. For length and content, the two most important lives are those of Euthymius (d. 473) and Sabas (d. 532), respectively the inspirer and the organizer of the *Chalcedonian monasticism of the Judean desert. The other five are much shorter: John the Hesychast (d. after 557), Cyriac of the laura of Souka (d. 557), *Theodosius (d. 529), Bishop Theognios (d. 552) and Bishop Abrahamios (a contemporary). Cyril's work was quite popular in the *Byzantine world. We have translations in *Georgian, Arabic, *Syriac, *Palaeoslavonic and *Latin.

CPG 7535-7543; crit. ed. E. Schwarz (TU 49, 2), Leipzig 1939; tr. A.J. Festugière (Les moines d'Orient, III, 1-3: Les moines de Palestine, Paris 1962-63); R.M. Price, with introduction and notes by J. Binns, Lives of the Monks of Palestine by Cyril of Scythopolis, CSS 114, Kalamazoo, MI 1991; DSp 2, 2687-2690; E. Stein, Cyrille de Scythopolis. A propos de la nouvelle édition de ses œuvres: AB 62 (1944) 169-186; F. Dolbeau, La Vie latine de saint Euthyme: une traduction inédite de Jean, diacre napolitain: MEFRM 94 (1982) 315-335; B. Flusin, Miracle et histoire dans l'œuvre de Cyrille de Scythopolis, Paris 1983; L. Perrone, Il deserto e l'orizzonte della città. Le Storie monastiche di Cirillo di Scitopoli, in Cirillo di Scitopoli. Storie monastiche del deserto di Gerusalemme, Praglia 1990, 9-90; J. Binns, Ascetics and Ambassadors of Christ: The Monasteries of Palestine, 314-631, Oxford 1994; J. Patrich, Sabas, Leader of Palestinian Monasticism: A Comparative Study in Eastern Monasticism, Fourth to Seventh Centuries, Washington, DC 1995; G. Filoramo, Profezia e politica. Aspetti politici del profetismo cristiano: CrSt 20 (1999) 521-544; B. Flusin, Un hagiographe saisi par l'histoire: Cyrille de Scythopolis et la mesure du temps, in J. Patrich (ed.), The Sabaite Heritage in the Orthodox Church from the Fifth Century to the Present, Louvain 2001, 119-126; P.W. van der Horst, The Role of Scripture in Cyril's of Scythopolis' Lives of the Monks of Palestine, ibid., 127-145; D. Hombergen, The Second Origenist Controversy: A New Perspective on Cyril of Scythopolis' Monastic Biographies as Historical Sources for Sixth-Century Origenism, Rome 2001; Grillmeier II/3.

J.-M. Sauget - L. Perrone

CYRILLONA (Qurillona). The codex of the British Library, add. 14591, pp. 54-67 and 72-83, preserves six interesting poetical texts, titled as follows: (1) On the Institution of the Eucharist; (2) On the Washing of the Feet; (3) On the Pasch of Our Lord by Mar Qurillona; (4) On the Scourges, by Qurillona; (5) On Zacchaeus; (6) On the Grain of Wheat. Only nos. 3 and 4 bear the name of Qurillona, but stylistic criteria and content allow us to conclude that the whole contained in the London MS can be attributed to the *Syrian poet (though Griffin [13-23] dissents regarding On the Grain of Wheat). The allusion in On the Scourges to the *Hun invasion (395) also allows us to date it to between the last quarter of the 4th c. and the first quarter of the 5th c. A certain Absamya, nephew of Ephrem of Nisibis according to the Chronicle of Edessa and Barhebraeus's Ecclesiastical Chronicle, composed poems or homilies on the Hun invasion: a few critics have maintained the identification of the two, supposing that Absamya took the name Cyrillona at his priestly ordination. Recently the hypothesis has been proposed that the last poem, which presents parallels with both *Gregory of Nyssa and with Cyrillona's other texts, was actually the product of a later editor. The images and religious language closely recall those of 4th-c. prose and poetic texts, in particular those of Ephrem of Nisibis.

G. Bickell, Die Gedichte des Cyrillonas: ZDMG 27 (1873), 566-598; Duval 335-336; Baumstark 67-68; Chabot 33; Ortiz de Urbina 86-88; C. Vona, I carmi di Cirillona. Studio introduttivo - traduzione - commento (Scrinium Patr. Later. 2), Rome 1963; F. Graffin, Deux poèmes de Cyrillonas: le lavement des pieds et le discours après la Cène: OrSyr 10 (1965) 307-330; Cyrillonas. L'Agneau Véritable. Hymnes Cantiques et Homélies. Intr., tr. D. Cerbelaud, Chevetogne - Paris 1984; C.W. Griffin, Cyrillona: A Critical Study and Commentary, diss. Washington DC, 2011.

A. Camplani

CYRUS of Alexandria (d. 642). Patriarch. As bishop of Fasi (Sebastopolis), in 626 he adhered to the *monothelitism of *Sergius of Constantinople, becoming a pawn in Sergius's and *Heraclius's plan for religious unity. He was appointed *Byzantine patriarch of *Alexandria in 631, also with the functions of prefect of *Egypt and military governor, so as to suppress *monophysitism more effectively. In 633 he called a council at Alexandria promulgating an act of union under 9 headings (Kephalaia) based on monothelitism. In 640, during the Arab advance on Egypt, Heraclius accused him of high treason and deposed him. Restored in 641, in November of that year he negotiated the capitulation of Alexandria. Died 21 March 642. Besides the Kephalaia, we possess three letters from Cyrus to Sergius (Mansi X, 1003-1006; XI 559-668).

CPG 7610-7613. Fliche-Martin 5 (It. ed.), Turin 1971, passim; EC 3, 1734; Coptic. Enc. 3, 682-683.

E. Prinzivalli

CYRUS of Edessa (mid-6th c.). *Nestorian doctor, disciple of Mar *Aba and *Thomas of Edessa. Studied at the school of *Nisibis, taught at *Seleucia-Ctesiphon and probably at al-Hira. Of his works we have only six treatises on as many liturgical celebrations, which continue two treatises of Thomas of Edessa and in which we can see a strong influence of the positions of *Theodore of Mopsuestia.

Ortiz de Urbina 127-128; W.F. Macomber, The Theological Synthesis of Cyrus of Edessa, an East Syrian Theologian of the Mid-Sixth Century: OCP 30 (1964) 5-38 and 363-384; Id., Six Explanations of the Liturgical Feasts by Cyrus of Edessa, an East Syrian Theologian of the Mid-Sixth Century, CSCO 355-356/Syr. 155-156, Louvain 1974; M. Van Esbroeck, Peter the Fuller and Cyrus of Edessa: Aram 11-12 (1999-2000) 467-474.

S.J. Voicu

CYRUS of Panopolis (d. ca. 457). Official of the Eastern empire, poet. Born at Panopolis in *Egypt, he distinguished himself precociously as the author of epic poems and epigrams. Thanks to the empress *Eudoxia, a lover of poetry, he was able to exercise a certain influence on *Theodosius II; in 435 he was praefectus urbis Constantinopolitanae, then praefectus praetorio Orientis, and finally consul in 441. He completed the city walls of *Constantinople, built a church to *Mary *Theotokos and oversaw urban development. He was the first prefect to issue his rulings in *Latin and Greek. Accused of aspiring to the crown and of being a bad Christian, Cyrus lost his post and was made bishop, against his will, of Cotyaeum in *Phrygia. He succeeded in calming the inhabitants of that city, known for their fanaticism, with a Christmas homily of just two sentences (published by Theophanes the Chronicler and commented on by T.E. Gregory, The Remarkable Christmas Homily of Kyros Panopolites: GRBS 16 [1975] 317-324). At Cotyaeum he also composed the epigram to *Daniel the Stylite (Anthologia Graeca 1, 99). After a time he was forced out of his bishopric by a new accusation. He lived on a private income as a landowner until his death.

PWK 12, 188-190. His poetical works: Anthol. graeca 1, 99; 7, 557; 9, 136, 623, 808-809, 813; 15, 9 with Ger. tr. and concise notes by H. Beckby, Anthologia Graeca, 4 vols., 2nd ed., Munich (1965-); H. Delehaye, Un épigramme de l'Anthologie grecque (1,99): REG 9 (1896) 216-224; D.J. Constantelos, Kyros

Panopolites, Rebuilder of Constantinople: GRBS 12 (1971) 451-464; PLRE 2, 336-339; B. Baldwin, Cyrus of Panopolis: A Remarkable Sermon and an Unremarkable Poem: VChr 36 (1982) 169-172; A. Cameron, The Empress and the Poet: Paganism and Politics at the Court of Theodosius II: Yale Classical Studies 27 (1982) 217-289.

J. Irmscher - C. dell'Osso

CYRUS of Tyana (6th c.). The 7th-c. Greek *florilegium Doctrina Patrum contains two fragments of a letter to the miaphysite bishops Julian and Severus, attributed to Cyrus, bishop of *Tyana. The work, miaphysite in tendency, was written probably between 508–511, when both recipients were at *Constantinople, protected by the policy of the emperor *Anastasius. In a letter of 519–520, written by *Severus of Antioch to the *Cappadocian bishops *Proclus and *Eusebius and preserved in the *Syriac collection of Athanasius of Nisibis (ed. Brooks), the bishop condemns a certain Cyrus and invites his recipients to abandon their sophistical errors. If he is referring to the same Cyrus, he must have modified his christological beliefs.

CPG 7111; Diekamp 313; Patrologia V, 164; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieur au VI^e siècle (CSCO 127, Subsidia 2), Louvain 1951, 113-114; A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus 2/2, Freiburg 1984, 263-264.

K. den Biesen

D

DACIA TRAIANA. In Dacia—conquered and made a Roman province by the emperor Trajan (105–106) and later abandoned by *Aurelian (271–275)—and N of the lower Danube generally in what is now Romania, the spread of Christianity was due above all to the permanent contacts between the local Daco-Roman population on both banks of the river, conscious of their common origin. An important part was played in the persistence of these contacts and in the propagation and preservation of the Christian religion in present-day Romania by the uninterrupted possession of certain bridgeheads on the left bank of the Danube after Aurelian's withdrawal, and esp. by the expansion of the Roman Empire N of the Danube, first under *Constantine and his successors, and later under *Justinian (527–565).

A series of small, typically Christian objects found in Dacia Traiana constitute important proof of the spread of Christianity in this area before the *Edict of Milan (313), and perhaps even prior to the abandonment of the N Danubian province by Aurelian. Among these objects is the Potaissa (Turda, in Transylvania) gem (intaglio), whose four symbolic representations—the inscription ΙΧΘΥΣ, the figure of the Good Shepherd (symbols of Christ), Jonah (symbol of the resurrection) and the arbor evangelica (symbol of the divine kingdom)—make it one of the most important finds of early Christian minor art: symbolic in character, it may date from the period of the persecutions. To the same period are assigned a gem depicting the Good Shepherd, found in Transylvania, and two other gems found in Dacia Inferior at Romula, one with two upright fish with a *cross between them, the other with two peacocks supporting a cross with their beaks. The gnostic gems discovered in Dacia Traiana constitute a special category: two at Porolissum (Moigrad, Transylvania), three with the inscription Abrasax at Romula and at Orlea (district of Olt), and a gold disk with the epigraph Iao Adonai, found at Dierna (Orsova). These attest the presence of a significant number of Christian heretics, whether soldiers, merchants or small government employees, who arrived in Roman Dacia from the East (Syria or Egypt) from the 2nd to the early 4th c.

The large-scale spread of Christianity took place in Dacia Traiana at the time of Constantine and his successors. Left sole emperor (324), Constantine began an offensive policy in the Lower Danube, rebuilding fortresses on both sides of the river, adding new ones and building the bridge between Oescus and Sucidava (328). He also repaired the Roman road running N of Sucidava and re-annexed to the empire the plain between the river and the Carpathians. The most numerous Christian remains of Dacia Traiana have been found at Sucidava (Celei - Corabia, district of Olt). An important find N of the Carpathians in Transylvania (once Dacia Superior) was the Biertan (district of Sibiu) donarium, consisting of two bronze pieces: a tabella ansata with the perforated epigraph Ego Zenovius votum posui, and a Constantinian monogram of Christ (chi-rho) inscribed in a circle; the objects were found with two bronze vases used for worship. A ceramic with monogram and an epigraph similar to that of Biertan were recently found at Porolissum (Moigrad, Transylvania; 4th c.). Also probably used in worship was a small bronze lamp ornamented with a cross and a dove found near the city of Dej (Transylvania; 4th-5th c.). Christian objects from the same period from Transylvania include a clay lamp found at Apulum (Alba Iulia), thought to be of Italian origin, and two local lamps of the same material, one at Ulpia Traiana (Sarmizegetuza) and the other at Apulum. Two older Roman monuments, "Christianized" with the sign of the cross, have been found at Cluj-Napoca and Ampelum (Zlatna). After the great Hun invasion (376–453), the last Eastern emperor to consider reconquering Dacia was Justinian. To this end he rebuilt the old bridgeheads on the left bank of the Danube, and together with the military offensive he began another, religious, one, founding the archbishopric of Iustiniana Prima, which included territory N of the Danube. To this period belong the Christian basilica found at Sucidava and various objects found S and E of the Carpathians: terracotta lamps at Drobeta (Turnu Severin), a beautiful bronze lamp at Luciu (district of Ialomita), molds for small crosses found at Olteni (district of Ilfov), Straulesti (Bucharest), Cindesti (district of Buzau) and Botosana (district of Suceava). This material shows the continuity of links between the Daco-Roman population and the Roman world (later Byzantine) S of the Danube.

I. Barnea, Les monuments paléochrétiens de Roumanie, Vatican City 1977; Id., Christian Art in Romania, 1, Bucharest 1979; A. MacKenzie, Archaelogy in Romania: The Mystery of the Roman Occupation, London 1986; Roman Limes on the Middle and Lower Danube, Belgrade 1996; D.M. Pippidi - I.I. Russu, Inscriptiones Daciae Romanae, Bucharest 1977–1988; E. Popescu, Christianitas daco-romana: florilegium studiorum, Bucuresti 1994; I. Piso, Inscriptions d'Apulum, Paris 2001; EAA[2] 4,576-583.

I. Barnea

DADISHO' of Beth Qatraya (7th c.). Native of the region of Qatar, which in antiquity extended along the entire northern coast of the Persian Gulf, Dadisho' lived as a monk and then a recluse in two monasteries, those of Rab-Kennare and Holy Apostles; we have no further information regarding Holy Apostles Monastery, hypothesized to have been located in the mountains of Bet Huzaye (Susania or Khuzistan, in modern S Iran). It is certain that Dadisho' also lived for a period in the famous monastery of *Rabban Shabur. His most important work—a high point of Syriac literature for quality, erudition and writing style—is a commentary on the discourses of Abba Isaiah. In it, the account Dadisho' gives of various episodes of the life of Rabban Shabur suggests that he wrote it not long after the latter's death, perhaps in the third quarter of the 7th c.

Like his contemporary and compatriot *Isaac of Nineveh, Dadisho' was a passionate defender of the solitary life in a strict sense, at a time when it seems to have been little appreciated. His description, in his Discourse on Solitude, of the various types of monks then present in the Eastern Church is interesting: he basically distinguishes between monks who live in monasteries near the large public streets and practice agriculture and hospitality, and hermits who live in or near more isolated monasteries. These latter are then divided into six categories, from novices who live permanently in community to hermits who live entirely by themselves. We also have two treatises On the Silence of the Seven Weeks, in which he speaks of the practice of the temporary reclusion of "advanced" monks in their cells during the three times of fasting of the Eastern Church's liturgical year.

Dadisho' is a sober writer, strongly influenced by *Evagrius of Pontus. He defends a monastic, i.e., "spiritual," reading of the Bible, decidedly different from Antiochene-style "historical" reading or from "homiletic" reading. He develops his vision of the spiritual life mainly as marginal notes to the writings of the monastic tradition. He also wrote a commentary (almost entirely unpublished) in this manner on the Paradise of the Fathers, which had just been published by *Henanisho, but also seems to have been inspired by the apophthegmata, the Macarian homilies and *Mark the Hermit. Dadisho's writings show him to have been a meticulous philologist, careful to note and discuss the textual variants attested by the various copies available to him, a balanced exegete, and a gifted and tested monk.

Editions and translations: A. Mingana, Early Christian Mystics (Woodbrooke Studies VII), Cambridge 1934, 201-247 (tr. 76-143): Discorso sulla solitudine, followed by five other pamphlets or extracts from later writings; R. Draguet, Commentaire du livre d'Abba Isaïe par Dadisho' Qatraya (CSCO 326-327), Louvain 1972; A. Guillaumont - M. Albert, Lettre de Dadisho' Qatraya à Abkosh sur l'hésychia, in Mémorial A.-J. Festugière. Antiquité païenne et chrétienne, Geneva 1984, 235-245 (Fr. tr.); S. Brock, The Syriac Fathers on the Spiritual Life (Cistercian Studies 101), Kalamazoo 1987, 306-310: tr. of one of the extracts published by Mingana.

Baumstark, 226f.; BO III/1, 98f.; Bettiolo, Lineamenti, 586-588; DSp 3, 2-3; P. Bettiolo, Esegesi e purezza di cuore. La testimonianze di Dadisho' Qatraya (VII sec.), nestoriano e solitario: AnSE 3 (1986) 201-213; R. Beulay, La lumière sans forme. Introduction à l'étude de la mystique chrétienne syro-orientale, Chevetogne (see index); N. Sims-Williams, Dādīšo' Qaṭrāyā's Commentary on the Paradise of the Fathers: AB 112 (1994) 33-64.

K. den Biesen

DALMATIA. The province of Dalmatia, on the eastern shore of the Adriatic, extended from the River Rosa (Arsa) in Istria to the Mat in Albania, although its southern part was separated and included in the province of Prevalis in 293 (S of the Mouths of Cattaro). Its N border coincided with the northern line of the Dinaric Alps, S of the Sava. Its main city was *Salona, metropolitan see and later also seat of the vicariate of West Illyricum.

In one letter (Rom 15:19), the apostle Paul wrote that he had spread the faith as far as Illyricum, in another (2 Tim 4:10), that he had sent Titus to Dalmatia. Legends also claim that Luke the evangelist visited Dalmatia. Christianity did not develop significantly, however, until the arrival of eastern missionaries in Dalmatia toward the mid-3rd c. The first known martyr was a bishop *Venantius. The martyrs Domnius, Septimius, *Anastasius, *Asterius, *Gaianus, *Paulinianus, Telius, Antiochianus and probably others died during the *Diocletian persecutions of 304. After the *Edict of Milan, Christian cemeteries developed around the tombs of the Salonitan martyrs. During the 4th c. Christianity became Dalmatia's most important religion. Other dioceses in Salona besides Dalmatia were Arba (Rab), Senia (Senj), Iader (Zadar/Zara), Skradin (near Šibenik), Muccur (Makarska), Narona (Vid near Metkovic), Epidaurum (Cavtat near Dubrovnik/Ragusa), Rhisinium (Risan in the Mouths of Cattaro); and in the hinterland Ludrum (Otok near Senj), Baloie (Spovo in Bosnia?), Bistue (Zenica), Martari (Mostar?) and Sarsenterum (Arzano near Imostski?). There were very probably other dioceses, now unknown. The list of the bishops of Salona is rather complete from the 4th-7th c., although this not the case for the other Dalmatian dioceses, with the exception of the names of the participants at the councils of Salona of 530 and 533. The ancient cities of Dalmatia were destroyed during the early 7th-c. Avar and Slav invasions. The first Christian churches arose in the early 4th c. within and outside the cities. The first church building (domus ecclesiae) was found at Salona: it was probably built in the last decades of the 3rd c. and is preserved as an oratory in the cathedral complex. A domus ecclesiae was also built at Iader, later included in the episcopal complex and turned into a catecumeneo; it was embellished with floor mosaics (motif: a spring flanked by deer). Many churches have been found at Salona; there must also have been churches elsewhere. Very large, sumptuous churches arose at Salona and elsewhere in the 5th c., generally longitudinal-plan with projecting semi-circular apses and rooms for liturgical services (baptisteries, etc.). In the cities basilicas were often three-aisled (Salona, Iader, Arba, Apsorus, Narona, etc.). Sometimes the apse is inscribed and attached to the E wall of the church, as at Iader, Salona, Epetion, Povlja (island of Brač), Polace (island of Mljet) etc., although basilicas of this type are less frequent than the normal plan: both types go back to the 5th c. In the 6th c. other plans began to appear: central, cruciform, trilobate, etc., very often with a central dome. The 6th c. also saw the Christianization of the pagus, as numerous churches of various sizes, many with baptisteries, appeared in rural areas; there are indications that they were used for both daily and memorial worship.

One characteristic of the churches of Dalmatia is the so-called basilicae geminae, built in cities, but also in rural areas (Srima near Šibenik). In Dalmatia, according to St. *Jerome (letters to Julian 11, 85 and to Heliodorus 60, 10: PL 22, 594 and 965), there must have been groups of hermitages in caves and other isolated places, esp. on islands, though few of these have been identified. Cenobitic monasteries have been found near Salona (Rizinice and Crikvina), at Klapavica (N of Salona), in the isles of Stipanska (near Solta) and Majsan (near Korcula/Curzola). These monasteries were very small: a small church, some cells for the monks and a courtyard. Building activity in Dalmatia decreased during the Gothic occupation, ca. 480–535; a new period of prosperity began with the *Justinian conquest. A basilica with baptistery at Salona was attributed to the Goths, but identification with the cathedral of the Goths is uncertain. Other arts besides architecture also developed in Dalmatia, such as hypogea with barrel vaults, often preserving 4th-c. frescos in the manner of the last phases of Roman catacomb painting; in the late 5th c. and 6th c. a more decadent style prevails. Sarcophagi, esp. at Salona, better express the artistic tendencies of 4th-c. sculpture: some were imported, but most of those produced locally were smooth. Importation of pieces from *Rome continued until the early 5th c., the most numerous and valuable being from the second half of the 4th c.: one depicting the Flight of the Israelites through the Red Sea (Split Archaeological Museum) and another with the figure of the shepherd (Split cathedral) stand out. Many other sarcophagi were made in the workshops of Salona. A group of the most luxurious are in Proconnesian marble, with front decorated with architectural elements: usually the spouses are depicted full-length in the side arcades, with an inscription in the central tabernacle; or, the surface was smooth. The most famous and richly decorated depicts the Good Shepherd (Split Archaeological Museum) in the tabernacle and minor scenes that are hard to interpret and so continually debated. Production of these sarcophagi ceased ca. the mid-4th c.

Even more numerous, but of decadent quality, are sarcophagi in local limestone, similar to earlier pagan sarcophagi: on the front is a central tabula, replaced by a central *cross; very often these sarcophagi were undecorated. Decoration inside Dalmatian churches, at times truly sumptuous, consisted of marble imposts, capitals, plutaei, cornices, etc.; in churches of the Dalmatian hinterland, however, certain reliefs show a technique so primitive as to make dating difficult. Many private and liturgical furnishings have been found in Dalmatia: crockery, amulets, lamps, gold-glass, thuribles, crosses, etc.

Two valuable reliquaries were recently found at Novalja (island of Pag), one of silver with Christ among the apostles, the other a laminated bronze scrinium decorated with five OT and five NT scenes. The period of prosperity under Justinian was followed by one of decadence (early 7th c.), with the consequent collapse of the ancient civilization of the E Adriatic.

J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans la province Dalmatie, Paris 1906; W. Gerber, Altchristliche Kultbauten Istriens und Dalmatiens, Dresden 1912; W. Gerber, Forschungen in Salona I, Vienna 1917; R. Egger, Forschungen in Salona II, Vienna 1926; J. Brondsted - F. Weilbach - E. Dyggve, Recherches à Salone, Copenhagen 1927; D. Rendic-Miocevic, Battisteri in ambienti rurali nell'Adriatico orientale, CCAB, Ravenna 1972, 281ff.; Disputationes Salonitanae I, Split 1975; N. Cambi, in Prop. Kunst. Gesch. Spätantike und Frühes Christentum, ed. B. Brenk, Berlin 1977, 301ff.; N. Cambi, Starokršcanska crkvena arhitektura na podrucju salonitanske metropolije: Arheološki vestnik 29 (1978) 606ff.; B. Migotti, Ranokršcanska topografija na podrucju izmedu Krke i Cetine, Zagreb 1990; D. Basler, Spätantike und frühchristliche Architektur in Bosnien und der Herzegowina, R. Pillinger - A. Pülz - H. Vetters (eds.), Vienna 1993; P. Vežic, Zadar na pragu kršcanstva: Diadora 15 (1993) 29ff.; N. Cambi, Sarkofag Dobrog pastira i njegova grupa - The Good Shepherd and Its Group, Split 1994; Salona I. Recherches archéologiques franco-croates à Salona. Catalogue de la sculpture architecturale paléochrétienne de Salone, N. Duval - E. Marin - C. Metzger (eds.), Rome-Split 1994; Salona Christiana, E. Marin (ed.), Split 1994; J. Jelicic-Radonic, Ranokršcanske dvojne crkve u Starom Gradu na Hvaru, Split 1994; J. Jelicic-Radonic, Gata crkva Justinijanova doba, Split 1994; J. Belamaric - R. Bužancic - D. Domancic - J. Jelicic-Radonic - V. Kovacic, Ranokršcanski spomenici otoka Braca, Split 1994; P. Chevalier, Salona II. Ecclesiae Dalmatiae. L'architecture paléochrétienne de la province romaine de Dalmatie (IVe-VIIe s.). I-II, Rome-Split 1995; E. Marin et al., Starokršcanska bazilika i krstionica u Naroni, srednjovjekovno groblje, novovjekovna crkva: Vjesnik za arheologiju i historiju dalmatinsku 87-89 (1994–1996) 9ff.; Acta Congressus Internationalis Archaeologiae Christianae, Split-Porec 1994, II, Vatican City-Split 1998; J. Dresken Weiland, Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarkophage, II, Mainz 1998; N. Cambi - A. Gamulin - S. Tonkovic, Starokršcanska bazilika u Zmijavcima, Split-Zmijavci 1999; Salona III. Recherches archéologiques franco-croates à Salone. Manastirine. Établissement préromain, nécropole et basilique paléochrétienne à Salone, D. Duval - E. Marin (eds.), Rome - Split 2000; N. Cambi, Povijest umjetnosti u Hrvatskoj. Antika, Zagreb 2002; A. Uglešic, Ranokršcanska arhitektura na podrucju današnje Zadarske nadbiskupije, Zadar 2002; E. Marin et al., Erešove bar. Villa suburbana iz 3. st. i starokršcanska crkva iz 7. st. u Naroni: Vjesnik za arheologiju i historiju dalmatinsku 94 (2002) 9ff.; N. Cambi, Sarcofagi con la croce nel centro della cassa, in Akten des Symposiums "Frühchristliche Sarkophage," Marburg 1999; Sarkophag Studien II, Mainz 2002, 47ff.

N. Cambi

DALMATIUS, monk (d. ca. 440), archimandrite of *Constantinople. Saint. Feast 3 August. Initially an officer in the imperial guard, he became a monk later in life with his son Faustus and succeeded his teacher Isaac as archimandrite of the chief convent of Constantinople. He came to *Cyril's help at the Council of *Ephesus (431). After 48 years he left his monastery and led the city's monks in solemn procession to appear before *Theodosius II, who responded by calling the opposing parties to Chalcedon for clarifications. Dalmatius wrote two letters to the Council of Ephesus and an apology.

CPG III, 5776-5778; DHGE 14, 27-28. The letters and the apology are respectively in PG 85, 1799–1800 (Epistula ad Synodum); 1800–1801 (Epistula cleri constantinopolitani ad Synodum); 1801 (Apologia); Patrologia 5, 32.

E. Prinzivalli

DALMATIUS of Cyzicus (5th c.). A monk of Cyzicus, elected bishop by the people in preference to *Proclus, who had been designated by *Sisinnius, archbishop of *Constantinople (Socr., HE 7, 28). He took part in the Council of *Ephesus (431). His collection of documents of the Council of *Nicaea (325) was used by *Gelasius of Cyzicus as a source for his Storia Ecclesiastica.

LTK[3] 2, 1381.

E. Prinzivalli

DAMASCIUS (d. after 538). Last representative of the *Neoplatonist philosophical school. Born at *Damascus in Syria, probably ca. 462. He began his studies at *Alexandria, then went to *Athens ca. 482–483 (ca. 491–492 according to some scholars) as a teacher of rhetoric. In 492 he converted to philosophy under the influence of *Isidore, a Neoplatonic philosopher he had known in *Alexandria, and began his studies under the guidance of *Marinus, then head of the Athenian school. He took over as head of the Athenian school after 515, upon returning from a trip to Syria with *Isidore. In 529 an ordinance of *Justinian ratified the closing of the school, which was again flourishing under Damascius's energetic reorganization. According to Agathias (Hist. 2,30,3–31,9), the philosopher went into exile to the king of Persia, where he tried in vain to resurrect the school. He died in Syria after 538.

Of his works we have two commentaries On the Phaedo, a commentary On the Philebus, a treatise On first principles and a commentary On Parmenides. Sizeable fragments of the Paradox, Life of Isidore, Treatise on Aristotle's Meteorology, Commentary on Aristotle's "De Coelo," Treatise on Number, Space and Time and a Commentary on the First Alcibiades are found in *Photius, *John Philoponus, *Simplicius and *Olympiodorus.

Damascius effected a profound reorganization of the Neoplatonic school of Athens, restoring its philosophical values in the face of Christianity and the spread of theurgy, haughtily introduced by *Iambli-chus. His writings show how he completely reestablished the traditional Neoplatonic cursus based on the study of Aristotle, Plato and the Chaldean Oracles. Damascius's metaphysics tended to exacerbate some aspects of Plotinus's negative theology: the separation between the one and the many, already analyzed by earlier Neoplatonists, became in Damascius an unhealable rupture. The originary being is prior to both unity and multiplicity, and thus only through hyperagnoia (a sort of hyper-ignorance) can one have a kind of presentiment of this being. Human thought is incapable of deducing multiplicity, the knowable or the determinate.

Editions: De Primis Principiis, J. Kopp, Frankfurt 1826; A. Chaignet, Paris 1898 (repr. Brussels 1964); C.E. Ruelle, Paris 1889 (repr. Brussels 1964); L.G. Westerink - J. Combès, Paris 1986–1991; In Platonis Parmenidem, C.E. Ruelle, Paris 1889 (repr. Brussels 1964); Vita d'Isidoro, A. Chaignet, Paris 1903 (repr. Frankfurt 1962); C. Zintzen, Hildesheim 1967; R. Henry, Paris 1960; P. Athanassiadi, Athens-Oxford 1999; L.G. Westerink, Lectures on the Philebus: Wrongly Attributed to Olympiodous, Amsterdam 1959; Id., The Greek Commentaries on Plato's Phaedo, Amsterdam 1977.

Studies: A very competent study on Damascius is in the intr. to the ed. of the works edited by Westerink; C.G. Steel, The Changing Self. A Study on the Soul in Later Platonism: Iamblichus, Damascius and Priscianus, Brussels 1978; J. Bertier - L. Brisson - J. Combès, Recherches sur la tradition platonicienne (Platon, Aristote, Proclus, Damascius), Paris 1977; J. Combès, Études néoplatoniciennes, Grenoble 1989; P. Athanassiadi, The Philosophical History, Damascius, Athens-Oxford 1999.

M. Conti

DAMASCUS. Ancient city of S Syria, located 100 km (62 mi) from the Mediterranean, near the Anti-Lebanon Range at the edge of the desert in an oasis crossed by the River Barada. A Roman colony from 222, Damascus was visited in AD 38 by St. Paul, who was baptized there by Ananias. The episcopal see is attested at least from 325; two centuries later the city became the metropolitan see of the province of Phoenicia Libanensis, with jurisdiction over some suffragans. Damascus's checkerboard street plan is partially preserved; the decuman, the famous Straight Street mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, is partially recognizable. Archaeologically, only scant traces remain of Christian churches: the vacuum is in part compensated for by the sources. The most important building was the cathedral: built under *Theodosius I (380–395) and dedicated to the Baptist, whose head it preserves, it rose over the grandiose temenos of the temple of Damascene Jupiter, in line with the edicts (390–391) prohibiting sacrifices in temples (CTh XVI, 10-12). For the period before the Umayyad conquest in 635–636, the sources also mention the churches of the Theotokos, St. Ananias, St. Thomas, St. Sergius, St. Leontius—the latter built at *Justinian's expense, as attested by *Procopius (De Aed. 5,9,26); for some of these the location or date of construction can only be hypothesized.

With the Arab takeover, the cathedral dedicated to the Baptist was divided between Christians and Arabs; the latter oriented their part of the building S, toward Mecca, according to a practice widely employed in Syria, Mesopotamia, and later in southern Spain and Sicily. The cathedral was definitively destroyed when Damascus replaced Medina as the Umayyad capital, the grandiose Umayyad mosque rising in its place, built by the caliph Walid from 705–715. Artists were called from Byzantium for its decoration: it was covered, internally and externally, with nonfigurative mosaics, in part still extant; the mosaic tesserae were in part reused, as the sources emphasize. The mosque also reemployed much Roman and Byzantine period material, esp. columns and capitals: still preserved on the S side are two entrances that belonged to the cathedral complex, with Greek inscriptions on the jack arch. A new cathedral, dedicated to the Virgin, was built following the demolition of the old one; it was rebuilt numerous times. Simultaneously with these events, Syro-Eastern/Nestorian and Syro-Western/Jacobite hierarchies developed alongside the Orthodox diocese. With the ascent to power of the Abbassid dynasty in 750 and the subsequent relocation of the caliphate to the E toward the new capital of Baghdad, the city underwent a period of decline: the end of the golden age seems to have coincided with the death in 749 of one of the greatest eastern theologians, St. *John Damascene, bard of the Virgin and vigorous defender of images, born at Damascus during the previous century to an Arab-Christian family.

H. Kennedy, The Last Century of the Byzantine Syria. A Reinterpretation: Byzantinische Forschungen 10 (1985) 141-183; J. Nasrallah, Damas et la Damascène: leurs églises à l'époque byzantine: Proche Orient Chrétien 35 (1985) 37-58, 264-276; Fedalto, II, 729ff.; G.H. Salies, Die Mosaiken der Grossen Moschee von Damaskus, Corso di Cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina 35 (1988) 295-313; D. Sack, Damaskus. Entwicklung und Struktur einer Orientalisch-Islamischen Stadt, Mainz 1989; J. Nasrallah, De la cathédrale de Damas à la mosquée omayyade, in La Syrie de Byzance à l'Islam, Colloque Int., Lyon 1990 (Damas 1992), 139-144; M. Mundell Mango, s.v. Damascus: ODB I, 580; P. Cuneo, s.v. Damasco: EAM V, 614-619.

M. Falla Castelfranchi

DAMASUS. Bishop of *Rome (1 October 366–11 December 384), among those who contributed most, with *Innocent and *Leo, to the evolution of the "papacy." Though the Liber pontificalis says he was of Spanish origin (39, ed. Duchesne LP, 212), Damasus was a member of the Roman clergy. His father, Antonius, a Roman ecclesiastic who died while Damasus was still young, perhaps was a suburban bishop after having been deacon of Rome (Epigram. 57, Ferrua, 210); his mother, Laurentia, belonged to the order of widows and died in her nineties (Epigram. 10, Ferrua, 106); a sister, Irene, made a vow of virginity (Epigram. 11, Ferrua, 108). Damasus, already a deacon at the time of Pope *Liberius and later accused of having supported the antipope *Felix—imposed by the pro-Arian emperor *Constantius II in place of Liberius, whom he had exiled to Beroea (Thrace; 365)—had a modest affluence, sufficient to bring a titulus with a small landed estate in central Italy to the paternal home and to have a small mausoleum built (not yet identified archaeologically) near the tomb of Sts. Marco and Marcellino on the via Ardeatina. Damasus is one of the first Roman bishops whose attitude and intellectual capacities we can glimpse; he sometimes used *Jerome as a secretary (Jerome, Ep. 18; 19; 21; 127), esp. for scriptural difficulties, and may have asked him to undertake an edition of Paul's epistles (Epigram. 1, Ferrua, 82; A. Vaccari, Biblica 1 [1920] 534). His poetry (Ferrua; Fontaine, Poésie, 110ff.), despite its roughness, shows a certain artistic sensibility (also seen in his employment of *Philocalus) and an intent to nourish Christian interpretation with the language of traditional secular culture. The most conspicuous and characteristic part of his production is found in the corpus of epigrams, in its present state comprising seventy compositions, reaching us in their epigraphic originals and/or in Late Medieval copies preserved in syllogisms.

His ascension to the episcopate was marked by grave difficulties (see in particular in Coll. Avellana 1, the Gesta . . . inter Liberium et Felicem, CPL 1570), because a rigorist minority accused him of usurping Felix's succession, opposing him (24 September 366) with the deacon *Ursinus. The conflict between the two parties, during which Damasus's partisans assaulted the basilica Iulii (Trastevere) and the basilica Sicinini (perhaps the basilica Liberii, later S. Maria Maggiore), provoked riots (366–368), which forced the prefect of the city and later Emperor Valentinian to intervene (Coll. Avellana 5-12, CPL 1574). Ursinus, back in Rome after a first exile, was again expelled (16 November 367). Damasus, having obtained imperial consent, sought to definitively close the question of Ursinus, including by synodal condemnation: on the third anniversary of his election (1 October 368), he convoked a council and sought unsuccessfully to have the bishops condemn Ursinus. During the following two years Ursinus's activity gradually diminished, and in 371 he was expelled from all the regions of suburbicarian Italy and sent to *Gaul. Damasus's relations with the emperor deteriorated at the time of the great trials of the urban aristocracy on charges of magic: a constitution of *Valentinian I's western chancellery, emanated from Trier 30 July 370, forbade Roman clerics from frequenting the homes of widows and from receiving inheritances from women with whom they had religious dealings (CTh XVI, 2,20), and criminal proceedings were instituted against Damasus, related to the accusation of a converted Jew, Isaac. These difficulties unquestionably stirred up the activity of the pope's adversaries, esp. Ursinus, who still agitated from exile in 378; they also explain the energetic and unified policy, carried out with varying success, against the sects present at Rome (*Luciferians, *Donatists; see the Libellus precum, a long sequence of complaints, presented in 384 to *Valentinian II, *Theodosius and *Arcadius, by two Luciferian presbyters, *Marcellinus and *Faustus; CPL 1571). In any case, *Gratian's new policy and occasionally a prefect's intervention favored the conversion of the pagans. Damasus intervened with *Ambrose of *Milan (382) to obstruct the senate's attempt to restore the Altar of Victory to the Roman curia, a request it had made to the court of Milan.

Although Damasus's work in the field of *liturgy is not known, his intervention seems to have been decisive for the organization of the cult of the martyrs. While a theology of martyrdom was developing, his elogia martyrum placed on martyrs' tombs marked out venerated sepulchres, already indicated in the Roman ordinary (of 336), thus making new cults official in most of the cemeteries that had become communal, except perhaps that of via Latina. During his time three tituli (of Anastasia, Fasciola and Damasus) were built, and the sites of S. Clemente and S. Pudenziana prepared. At St. Peter's, the entrances to the basilica and a baptistery were organized; he intervened a number of times in the catacombs (esp. in the Appian zone), and it is likely that he founded the large three-aisled "semipogea" basilica dedicated to Sts. Nereus and Achilleus in the area of the cemetery of Domitilla on the via Ardeatina.

Damasus's relations with the other churches marked a real turning point in papal policy. At first in Italy he attempted to win back the *homoian episcopate that existed from Milan to Illyricum: a council of the Nicene bishops at Rome (368/372) forcefully confirmed the condemnation of Auxentius of Milan (Ep. 1: PL 13, 748). In 378 another Roman council asked that the pope could be judged directly by the emperor in criminal matters; but Damasus refrained from intervening at the Council of *Aquileia (381), organized by *Ambrose. Damasus, who would not accept an invitation sent by *Priscillian, addressed the first common decretal to Gaul (ed. Babut, Paris 1904), a small disciplinary manual for a missionary church, in response to a request. Pressing entreaties gradually began to arrive from the East, where the emperor *Valens favored Arianism: Damasus finally delegated the priest *Evagrius (374) and entered into communion with the little church of Paulinus at *Antioch, ignoring *Meletius, who was supported by *Basil of Caesarea; but he broke with Vitalis, an Antiochene priest favorable to the ideas of *Apollinaris of Laodicea, and, after many attempts by the envoys of Basil and the East, called a Roman council (377), which published, in the presence of *Peter of *Alexandria, a list of anathemata (Ep. 4, ed. C. Turner; see CPL 1633), in fact a volume which sketched out a refutation of Apollinarism and the pneumatomachi. In 380 the emperor Theodosius issued an edict (CTh XVI, 1,2) imposing communion with Damasus and Peter of Alexandria as a test of Catholic unity; the Council of Constantinople, however, to which Damasus delegated Acholius of Thessalonica, marked the restoration of an orthodox episcopate in the East, centered on Constantinople, which claimed the rights of a second Rome. Damasus responded in a Roman council (382), where the pericope Mt 16:18 was explicitly applied to Roman primacy for the first time.

A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damasiana, Vatican City 1942; see also the recension of A. Vaccari, Biblica 24 (1943) 190-194: M.A. Norton, Pope Damasus: Leaders of Iberian Christianity, ed. J. Marique, Boston 1962, 13-80; A. Lippold, Ursinus und Damasus: Historia 14 (1965) 105-128; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Recherches sur l'Église de Rome (311–440), I, Rome 1976, ch. VI-X; Patrologia III, 260-264; J. Fontaine, Naissance de la Poésie dans l'Occident chrétien, Paris 1981, ch. VII; Saecularia Damasiana. Atti del convegno internazionale per il XVI centenario della morte di Papa Damasus I (11-12-384–10/12-12-1984), Vatican City 1986; EPapi I, 349-372; G. Pilara, Problemi ancora aperti nel pontificato damasiano. Lo scisma ursiniano e i concili romani nel pontificato di Damaso: Clio 28/1 (2002) 115-133; R. Lizzi Testa, Senatori, popolo, papi. Il governo di Roma al tempo dei Valentiniani, Rome 2004.

Ch. Pietri - M. Ghilardi

DAMIAN of Alexandria (d. 605), anti-Chalcedonian patriarch of *Alexandria from 578–605. Of Syrian origin, he was elected at the end of a period of grave organizational crisis in the anti-Chalcedonian Egyptian church, in the wake of the measures of *Justinian and his successors aimed at restoring unity to the church of the empire. Damian succeeded brilliantly in reconstituting the Egyptian clergy in his hierarchy, a work that endured. He was less successful, however, in the other serious problem, that of relations with the other important anti-Chalcedonian church—the Syrian—creating a theological and personal conflict that was resolved only during the time of his successor *Anastasius. Of his works, probably written in Greek, we have only an important synodal letter sent to the Syrian church and fragments of the *Coptic translation of a homily on the incarnation (ed. Orlandi). An important school of Coptic writers developed during his patriarchate—authors of homilies, encomia of saints, exegesis and polemic: Constantine of Assiut, John of Ashmunein, *Rufus of Shotep, *John of Paralos.

CPG 7240-7249. Jean Maspéro, Histoire des patriarches d'Alexandrie, Paris 1923; W.E. Crum, Theological Texts from Coptic Papyri, Oxford 1913; BBKL 1,1205; Patrologia V, 394-401; Coptic Encyclopedia 2, 688-689; Ph. Blaudeau, Le voyage de Damien d'Alexandrie vers Antioche puis Constantinople (579–580), motivations et objectifs: OCP 63 (1997) 333-361; T. Orlandi, Papiro di Torino 63000, 1: Damiano di Alessandria, Sul Natale: H. Melaerts (ed.), Papyri in Honorem Johannis Bingen Octogenarii (P. Bingen), Louvain 2000, 593-613.

T. Orlandi

DAMIAN of Pavia (late 7th c.). Western bishops were invited by Constantine IV, emperor of the East, to attend the 6th ecumenical council (681–682), III Constantinople, convoked to discuss and condemn *monothelitism. *Mansuetus, archbishop of *Milan, gathered a local council to respond to the invitation. At his request the Greek-educated Damian, future bishop of Pavia (elected ca. 680), in 679 drafted in Greek the letter to the emperor and an extensive profession of trinitarian and christological faith; the letter has been preserved in Latin (Paul the Deacon, Hist. Lang. 6,4). The two texts, together with the synodica of Pope *Agatho, were accepted by the council, and constituted the basis of the council's decisions. The letter praises Constantine for his works, inviting him to imitate *Constantine I and *Theodosius; it also proclaims fidelity to the first five ecumenical councils and praises the orthodoxy of the *Longobard kings.

CPL 1170-1171; PL 87, 1261-1265 (Mansi 11, 203-208); Rbe 32 (1905) 512; Expositio fidei: PL 87, 1265-1267 (PL 13, 651-655); G.P. Bognetti, Storia di Milano, II, Milan 1954, 190-193; DBI 32, 339-343; A.M. Orselli, La città altomedievale e il suo santo Patrono: (ancora una volta) il "campione pavese," Rome 1979; Diocesi di Pavia, A. Caprioli et al. (eds.), Brescia 1985, passim.

A. Di Berardino

DAMNATIO AD BESTIAS. "Condemnation to the beasts" is considered a lighter punishment among some scholars than execution, perhaps because in some cases the condemned were armed or otherwise able to defend themselves. It was applied to parricides, murderers, rebels, prisoners of war and sometimes Christians (Polycarp, the martyrs of Lyons, Perpetua and companions, etc.). It was a favorite entertainment of the ancients; we possess depictions of it.

DACL I, 449-462; J.P. Callu, Le Jardin des supplices au Bas-Empire, in Du Châtiment dans la cité. Supplices corporels et peine de mort dans le monde antique, École Française de Rome 1984, 313-357; D. Grodzynski, Tortures mortelles et catégories sociales. Les summa supplicia dans le droit romain aux IIIe et IVe s., ibid., 361-403; C. Vismara, Il supplizio come spettacolo, Rome 1990; K.M. Coleman, Fatal Charades: Roman Executions Staged as Mythological Enactments: JRS 80 (1990) 44-73; R. Rea, I cristiani, vittime e spettatori nel Templum demonum: il Colosseo, in Aurea Roma. Dalla città pagana alla città cristiana, S. Ensoli - E. La Rocca (eds.), Rome 2000, 129-133; D. Augenti, Spettacoli del Colosseo nelle cronache degli antichi, Rome 2001, 34-39 (mosaic depictions of torture ad bestias); I. Rivière, Constantin, le crime et le christianisme: contribution à l'étude des lois et des mœurs de l'Antiquité Tardive: Antiquité Tardive 10 (2002) 344-353.

V. Saxer

DAMNATIO AD METALLA. "Condemnation to the mines" or quarries, equivalent to modern "hard labor." The harshness of the punishment and poor sanitary conditions led to the rapid death of the condemned, among whom were Christians.

Tertullian, Apol. 9,2; Cyprian, Ep. 76-79; Eusebius, Mart. Palest. 7-8; V. Const. 2,32; Victor of Vita, Hist. pers. Afr. 5,19; DAGR 3/2,1840-74; DACL I,467-474; A. Bellucci, I martiri cristiani dannati ad metalla nella Spagna e nella Sardegna, Naples 1959; F. Millar, Condemnation to Hard Labour in the Roman Empire from the Iulio-Claudians to Constantine: PBSR 39 (1984) 124-147 (in part. 137-143); C. Domergue, Les mines de la péninsule ibérique dans l'antiquité romaine, École Française de Rome 1990, 348.

V. Saxer

DANCE. Popular among the pagans at spectacles and in worship: with contortions and gyrating movements to induce ecstasy (Apulieus, Metam. 7, 27), or in orgiastic feasts such as those for the goddess Syria, accompanied by religious songs and instrumental music (Lucian, Dea Syria 50). Among the Jews: in plazas (Chrys., Adv. Iudaeos 1,3; PG 48, 847; Aug., Enarr. in Ps. 91,2; PL 37, 1172; ". . . there is no difference between the theater and the synagogue": Chrys., l.c.) and in synagogues (Philo of Alex., De vita contemplativa 83-90; G.P. Wetter, La danse rituelle, 259). Among heretics: the Melitians (4th c.) would dance, while singing, clapping their hands and ringing bells (Theod., Haer. fab. comp. 4, 7; PG 83, 426), the *Priscillianists and Manicheans doing so promiscuously (Epiph., Haer. 80,8-9). The Fathers disapproved of the use in church of dance moves taken from the theater, or from pagan, Jewish or heretical worship. "Where dance is, so is the devil" (Chrys., In Matth. hom. 48,3: PG 58, 491). Dances are attested, however, in honor of the martyr Polientus, late 4th c. (L. Gougaud, La danse, 5-22), and at *Antioch after *Julian's death, in the churches and precincts of the martyrs (Euseb., HE X, 9: PG 20, 904). Whether cultic dance derived from the Greek mysteries (G.P. Wetter, La danse rituelle, 75) or from the synagogue (R. Eisler, Dance macabre, 195) is disputed. The church's directives were not uniform: perhaps allowed at first, it was later prohibited because of intemperances (R. Torniai, La danza, 115).

L. Gougaud, La danse dans les églises: RHE 15 (1914) 5-22; Th. Gérold, Les Pères de l'Église et la musique, Paris 1931; R. Eisler, Dance macabre: Traditio 6 (1948) 187-225; R. Torniai, La danza sacra, Rome 1950; R. Kraus, History of the Dance, Englewood Cliffs 1969; O. Pasquato, Gli spettacoli in S. Giovanni Crisostomo. Paganesimo e cristianesimo ad Antiochia e Costantinopoli nel IV secolo (OCA 201), Rome 1976, 258-265; P. Riché, Dances profanes et religieuses dans la haut Moyen Âge, in Mélanges Robert Mandrou, Paris 1985, 159-167; M. Dania, La danza sacra: esperienze antiche e nuove, Rome 2000; G.P.Wetter, La danse rituelle dans l'église ancienne, Paris 1961.

O. Pasquato

DANIEL
I. In the Fathers - II. Iconography.

I. In the Fathers. The name Daniel, which means "God is judge" or "God judges," was very common in the Middle East in the centuries before Christ. The OT prophetic book of Daniel contains many stories, the most important of which are the prayer of Azariah, the song of the three young men (3,24-90), the story of Susanna (13,1-64), the dragon (13,64–14,42); the last three are preserved only in the Septuagint and other versions. This apocalyptic book has various characteristics: history is divided into several very distinct periods; the author believes in the resurrection of the body, awaits the coming of the future world, provides a detailed doctrine of angels, and attaches great importance to the revelation of mysteries: Daniel, the book's central figure, prepares by fasting to learn the revelation. The historicity of the man Daniel is problematic: the OT books make no mention of a prophet living in exile; only the book of Ezekiel (14:4, 20 and 28:3) speaks of a wise man, a Daniel it compares with Noah and Job, but who was not of Jewish origin. The figure of Daniel also significantly resembles that of Joseph, in the two parallel episodes in which the prophet interprets the dream of Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 2:1-49) and the patriarch that of Pharaoh (Gen 41:1-42). The book had a great influence on Jewish and rabbinic apocalyptic literature: in the latter, Daniel became the type of the just one tested and saved by God. The church fathers used *Theodotion's translation. The NT authors focused esp. on ch. 7. The figure of Daniel was of notable importance in early Christian writings, esp. for the episodes of Daniel in the lions' den, the three young men in the furnace and the story of Susanna. For *Origen, Daniel in the lions' den prefigured Christ's triumph (C. Cels. 7,57). *Hippolytus saw a rich baptismal symbolism, esp. in the story of Susanna: Susanna represents the church; her husband, Joachim, Christ; the gardens, the community of saints; Babylon, this world; the lying old men, those who persecute Christians; the bath, baptism; the oil, the post-baptismal myron (Comm. in Dan. 1, 15-16; 3,31). The Apos. Con. (V, 7, 12) follow this interpretation.

In patristic works, Daniel in the lions' den represents the just one, persecuted and then saved by God (1 Ep. Clem. 45,6-8); he attained great importance at the time of the persecutions (Cypr., Ep. 57,8), since he was considered a prototype of the martyr. The Fathers included Daniel among the OT saints (Greg. Naz., Or. 48,74; Cypr., De laps. 19); his fidelity to the covenant was interpreted as an example of Christian faith (Cyr. of Jer., Cat. 5,4); the image of Daniel was frequently used to represent virtue and the power of prayer (Cypr., De or. dom. 21; Orig., De or. 13,3; Hipp., Comm. in Dan. 2,29 and 38; Greg. Elv., Tract. 18).

Daniel the "sage," full of wisdom and prudence, became the archetype of the Christian (Just., Dial. 87,4; Cypr., Ad Fort. 11; Aster., Hom. VI in Dan. et Susannam: PG 50, 241; Greg. Nyss.: PG 45, 1017D; 46, 857C; Did.: PG 39, 1397C; Theodoret: PG 81, 1268A), whose actions (fasting and abstinence) very clearly reveal the weakness of the human mind before divine revelation (Cyr. of Jer., Cat. 9,1; 12-14; John Chrys., De incompr. Dei nat. 3,4). We have only two Eastern commentaries on Daniel from the patristic era, both Syrian: one is attributed to *Ephrem, but is certainly later, and the other to Isho'dad. Both commentators focus on Daniel's visions, which they interpret in both a messianic sense (esp. Dan 2:34-35) and a purely historical sense, explaining in detail how the prophet conceals the future events of the succession of the empires of the Babylonians, Medes and Persians, until the battles of the Diadochi and the Maccabean revolts. The figure of Daniel thus becomes, in Syrian circles, that of the prophet-historian, who precisely anticipates the events that prepare the coming of Christ.

DTC 4, 55-103; RAC 3, 575-585; RGG³ 2, 26-30; LTK³ 3, 10-13; TRE 8, 325-349; K. Koch, Das Buch Daniel, Darmstadt 1980; A.S. Van der Woude (ed.), The Book of Daniel in the Light of New Findings, Louvain 1993; E. Haag, Daniel, Neue Echter-Bibel, Würzburg 1993.

L. Vanyó

II. Iconography. One of the four great OT prophets, model of wisdom and type of the just man persecuted but freed by God: as such Daniel takes an active part in the judgment of Susanna and is depicted refusing to adore Nebuchadnezzar's statue, beside the three young men in the furnace (Rome, cemetery of Priscilla: 4th c.; cemetery of Callistus: 4th c.); Daniel was depicted to express the hope of salvation and resurrection from the dead.

1. This symbolism is attributed to the most popular episode—numbered by *Eusebius of Caesarea (Vita Const. 3,49) among the σύμβολα of Constantine—that of Daniel's condemnation to the lions' den; the scene appears in cemetery paintings from the 3rd c. (Rome, cemetery of Callistus, area of Lucina: 220–230; cemetery of Domitilla, gallery of the Flavii: second half 3rd c.) and on sarcophagi, probably for the first time on a sarcophagus of the Museo Nazionale di Napoli (mid-3rd c.) and, in time, on a great variety of monuments (Brescia, Museo Cristiano, lipsanotheca: 4th c.; London, British Museum, glass cup from St. Severinus, Cologne; Cologne, Römisch-germanisches Museum, blue glass cup; St. Petersburg, Museum of the Hermitage, glass cup from Podgoritsa: 5th c.; Cividale del Friuli, Tesoro del Duomo, cameo: mid-5th c.; London, British Museum, ivory pyx: 6th c.) and on "barbarian" lamps, bronze medallions and bronze fibulae. Daniel is shown in the attitude of an orans among the lions, standing, youthful, beardless, from the 4th c. mostly naked in Roman depictions, usually clothed in non-Roman depictions (Istanbul Archaeological Museum, fragmentary stele: 5th c.; ibid., plutaeus: 5th c.; Ravenna, Museo Nazionale, sarcophagus of the Traditio legis, right side: 5th c.; Ravenna, church of S. Vitale, sarcophagus of the exarch Isacius: 5th c.; Ravenna, baptistery of S. Giovanni in Fonte, stucco: 5th c.; Ravenna, S. Apollinare Nuovo, plutaeus: mid-6th c.; Ecija, sarcophagus: 6th c.; Rome, Museo dell'Alto Medioevo, ivory pyx from Nocera Umbra: 6th c.; Washington, ivory pyx from Moggio: 6th c.—the presence here of two angels holding the lions' jaws shut has no parallels); these last also differ in the number of lions, often more than two (Cagliari, Museo Archeologico Nazionale, funerary relief: late 3rd or early 4th c.; Alcaudete, sarcophagus: first half 5th c.). Sometimes also depicted among the lions helping Daniel, in reference to the second condemnation (Dan 14:31-39), is the prophet Habakkuk (Vat., Museo Pio Crist., sarcophagus 135, right side: second quarter 4th c.; ibid., sarcophagus "of the two brothers": second third 4th c.), or Habakkuk and an angel (Vat., Museo Pio Crist., child's sarcophagus: first third 4th c.; ibid., sarcophagus 189: first third 4th c.; ibid., sarcophagus 175: second quarter 4th c.). The same characters also appear in a fuller depiction of the same episode, i.e., at the moment when the angel seizes Habakkuk by the hair and carries him to Daniel to relieve his hunger; the scene is very frequent in the East and can assume various aspects (Istanbul Archaeological Museum, plutaeus from Thasos: 5th c.; Rome, Basilica of S. Sabina, wooden doors [Daniel among the lions is absent]: second half 5th-6th c.; Trier, ivory pyx: 6th c.; Rome, Museo dell'Alto Medioevo, ivory pyx from Nocera Umbra: 6th c.; London, British Museum, ivory pyx: 6th c.).

2. The episode of the killing of the Babylonian dragon occurs between Daniel's first and second condemnations: though never painted, it was depicted on other classes of monument; Daniel offers a cake to the dragon, rearing up or wrapped around a tree-trunk, often near an altar with lit fire—divine worship of the reptile—(Vat., Museo Pio Crist., sarcophagus lid: second third 4th c.; Rome, Villa Doria Pamphili, sarcophagus; London, British Museum, fragment of glass plate; Brescia, Museo Cristiano, lipsanotheca: 6th c.) and before the entrance to a temple (Crozon, Ardèche, sarcophagus of the Coll. R. Giraud).

3. Finally, Daniel is depicted among the prophets, with rotulus closed or unrolled, for the first time in the Gospels of Rabbula (fol. 8v: 6th c.) and again, among others, in chapel no. 12 of the convent of Bawit (6th-7th c.).

G. Carandente, EC IV, 1146ff.; Th. Klauser, RAC 3, 575-585; K. Wessel, RBK I, 1113-1120; H. Schlosser, LCI I, 469-473; Wp 39; Ws II, 251ff.; G. Wilpert, Il simbolismo eucaristico del cibo di Daniele nella fossa dei leoni: Rend. PARA 9 (1933) 89-94; H. Kuhn, Die Danielschnallen der Völkerwandeungszeit: Jahrbuch für prähistorische und etnographische Kunst 15-16 (1941-42) 140-169; W. Deonna, Daniel, le "maître des fauves." A propos d'une lampe chrétienne du musée de Genève: Artibus Asiae 12 (1949) 119-140, 347-374; J. Schneider, Daniel und der Bel zu Babylon: Zeitschrift für schw. Archäologie und Kunstgesch. 15 (1954) 93-99; G. Wacker, Die Ikonographie des Daniel in der Löwengrube, Marburg 1954; G.C. Menis, Un malnoto cammeo cividalese con Daniele fra i leoni vestito alla persiana: RivAC 49 (1973) 183-193; TIP 162-164; M. Dulaey, Daniel, les trois hébreux et Suzanne, in Id., Le berger divin: "Des forêts de symboles." L'initiation chrétienne et la Bible (Ier-VIe siècle), Paris 2001, 157-189.

G. Santagata

DANIEL (d. 744). Bishop of Winchester (705–744). He and *Aldhelm were assigned the two parts of the diocese of the western Saxons when it was divided in 705. Three of his letters to *Boniface are preserved, written over a rather long period of time. The first (718) is a sort of safe-conduct, recommending *Boniface (then still Wynfrith) to the king, princes and abbots; the second (723/724) is full of advice on the best way to evangelize still-pagan populations; the third, much later (742/744), addresses the theme of the difficult oversight of a Christian community in which even priests committed the most atrocious crimes (homicide, adultery, etc.): Daniel invites Boniface to use tolerance and persuasion. *Bede, in the preface of the Ecclesiastical History of the English People, mentions his correspondence with Bishop Daniel, who had sent him information on the history of the Saxon church and the surrounding regions.

M. Manitius, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 2/1, Munich 1911, 72-73 and 146; T. Schieffer, Winfrid-Bonifatius und die christliche Grundlegung Europas, Freiburg 1954; P. Lendinara, Un popolo privato dei suoi dèi. Notizie sul paganesimo nelle prime opere anglolatine: Mythos 1 (1989) 103-126; Patrologia IV, 412-413.

V. Milazzo

DANIEL bar Maryam. Contemporary of the catholicos Isho'yahb III the Great (649/50–660), he is the author of an ecclesiastical history in four parts, almost entirely lost, which seems to have been an important source of the Chronicle of Seert and which had a profound influence on Syro-eastern historiography. A manual of chronology is also attributed to him.

Baumstark, 207; BBKL 20, 359f.; BO III/1, 231; E. Degen, Daniel bar Maryam. Ein nestorianischer Kirchenhistoriker: OC 52 (1968) 45-80; E. Degen, Die Kirchengeschichte des Daniel bar Maryam – eine Quelle der Chronik von Se'ert: ZDMG Suppl. 1 (1969) 511-516.

K. den Biesen

DANIEL of Salah (6th c.). Monk of the monastery of Salah in Tur 'Abdin and miaphysite author of a commentary on the Psalms, written ca. 541/542, only partially published. The commentary is in the form of homilies in three volumes, each commenting on 50 psalms; it is dedicated to a certain John, *hegumen of the monastery of St. Eusebius of Kephar Bartā in the region of Apamea. Daniel also seems to have written a commentary on Qoheleth (fragments of which are preserved in Severus's catena) and a treatise on the plagues of Egypt. His work is interesting because it allows us to grasp the exegetical methods in use in the anti-Chalcedonian Syrian circles of his time. He in fact uses some methods and results of Antiochene exegesis, while at another level developing a reading of the prophetic, christological and spiritual senses of the text. He also loves to compare the lessons of the Hebrew and Greek texts, which offers him yet another method of approach.

Baumstark, 179; BBKL 21, 304f.; BO I, 495; Patrologia V, 473; G. Dietrich, Eine jakobitische Einleitung in den Psalter in Verbindung mit zwei Homilien aus dem grossen Psalmenkommentar des Daniel von Salah, Giessen 1901 (with Ger. tr.); S.P. Cowe, Daniel of Salah as Commentator on the Psalter: SP 20 (1989) 152-159; L. Van Rompay, The Christian Syriac Tradition of Interpretation, in Hebrew Bible/Old Testament. The History of Its Interpretation I, Göttingen 1996, 612-641 (esp. 639f.); D.G.K. Taylor, The Manuscript Tradition of Daniel of Salah's Psalm Commentary, in Symposium Syriacum VII (OCA 256), Rome 1998, 61-69.

K. den Biesen

DANIEL of Scete (6th c.?). The collections of Apophthegmata Patrum*, such as the ascetic Paterika, preserve in Greek and in various eastern versions a series (more or less extensive in different cases) of edifying stories in which Daniel of Scete, an elder or hieromonacos, appears, more as narrator than protagonist. Only one of the works seems to offer biographical information on Daniel who, as a young monk, was thrice captured by barbarians; the third time he killed his captor to return to his cell. Confessing his crime to the ecclesiastical and civil authorities and finding that no one would impose a penance on him, he imposed one on himself. The *Coptic and Ethiopic recensions contain an episode not yet found in the Greek, in which Daniel appears as a fierce anti-Chalcedonian. All of the texts in question seem to unanimously place Daniel in the 6th-c. G. Garitte, however, the latest scholar to have examined the accessible sources (while awaiting a systematic study of the collections not yet fully analyzed), concludes that "the stories of Daniel" have all the characteristics of edifying fables; it is likely that not all refer to the same Daniel; it is impossible to say whether they contain any historical element; it remains unclear whether a famous abbot named Daniel existed at Scete in the 6th c.

BHG Nov. Auct. 2099z-2102c; BHO 241ff.; CPG 7363; DHGE 14, 70-72; S.P. Brock, A Syriac Narratio attributed to Abba Daniel of Sketis: AB 113 (1995) 269-280; LTK[3] 3, 14-15.

J.-M. Sauget

DANIEL the Stylite (d. 493). Feast 11 December; born ca. 409 in Syria, near Samosata. Died at Anaplesa near the Bosporus, not far from *Constantinople. He became a monk very young and, on pilgrimage to Jerusalem, met St. *Simeon the Elder, the first *stylite, at Qennesrin, or Qalat Shiman. He hesitated long before imitating this lifestyle, ascending a column only in 460. *Leo I consulted him on some christological questions. He helped *Acacius in his difficulties with *Basiliscus, deigning on that occasion to descend from his column.

H. Delehaye, Les saints stylites, Paris 1923; Id., AB 32 (1913) 121-216; I. Peña - P. Castellana - F. Romualdo, Les Stylites syriens, Milan 1975; C. Tcherakian, Daniel the Syrian's Exegesis of the Psalms of David: Bazmavep 125 (1987) 69-74.

M. van Esbroeck

DASIUS. Four martyrs bear this name. The first belonged to an unidentifiable group, the so-called group of Damascus. The second, a soldier, died at Durostorum in Mesia on 20 November 303, and in a legendary Passio became the hero who opposes a New Year's feast similar to Saturnalia and a feast of Chronos (R. Pillinger, Das Martyrium des heiligen Dasius, Vienna 1988). Probably in ca. 579, when Durostorum was invaded by the Avars, his body was transferred to Ancona. The third was a soldier of Lower Egypt, martyred under *Diocletian, feast 30 August. The last belonged to a group of Nicomedian soldiers; his feast in the Mart. syr. and the Mart. hier. is 21 October.

BHG 491-492; BS 3, 1153-1154; 4, 483-485.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

DAVID

I. In the Fathers - II. Iconography.

I. In the Fathers. David is the "father" of the Messiah: the Christ who will be born of his flesh will be called the "son of David" (Mt 1:1 and 21:9). He is king, prophet, shepherd. The people await a liberator from David's family whose "kingdom will not end" (Lk 1:33; 2 Sam 7:16). The Essenes seem to have expected a Davidic ("kingly") Messiah and an Aaronic ("priestly") Messiah (CD XX, 1 and 1 QS 9,11). Jesus, inheriting "the throne of David his father" (Lk 1:32), is presented as a spiritual and universal king who also possesses prophethood and the priesthood (Mt 22:41-45; Jn 18:36-37). In the day of judgment the "shoot of David" (Rev 5:5 from Is 11:1) will hold in his hand "the key of David" (Rev 3:7 from Is 22:22), the key of the heavenly Jerusalem.

The Fathers identified David with Christ. He has "the heart of God" (1 Sam 13:14; Hipp., Dav. 2,1), and is a righteous man because he is able to ask for forgiveness (Clem. of Rom. 18,1-17). Gnostics saw in Jesse's eighth son a symbol of the "ogdoad" (Iren., Adv. haer. I 18,3); Ebionites were hostile to David (Ps. Clem. Hom. XVIII 13,3-4). Taking up the figurative traditions of the synagogue, churchmen discovered in each Davidic likeness the image of Christ, who, as "seed of David," is man and, as "seed of the Holy Spirit," is God (Ign., Eph. 18,2 and Trall. 9,1; Tertull., Carn. Chr. 21,5-22,6). Jesus is "the holy vine of David" and the "God of David" (Did. 9,2 and 10,6; cf. Clem. Al., Quis div. 29,3). *Hippolytus, sensing David's Messianic centrality, dedicated an entire treatise to him, as did *Ambrose and *Chrysostom. In De David et Goliath (CSCO 263-264), David's victory over the giant, allegorized in every detail, is a sign of the victory of Christ over evil, in which every person who puts on the armor of God participates (6,1–15,4). Christ, defeating death and proclaiming the resurrection, reveals the salvific import of Davidic election: God chose David that from him the Messiah, begotten in the Spirit by the Father, might be born in the flesh. David, consecrated king with the anointing of immortal life (2,2–4,5), was "begotten of the Father's heart" so that he could beget the man Jesus: "As the Word was begotten from my heart, so the man was born of David! Indeed he says: I have found David, a man after my own heart: my heart has begotten the Word and, through David, also the man" (Hipp., In. Ct. 2,23; cf. Dav. 4,6 and 11,4; Antichr. 8). Mary, born into David's family, in accepting Jesus accepts in her flesh the humanity of all those who have loved justice, interweaving it with the Spirit received from God to form Christ's humanity (In. Ct. 27,1-12; Co. Dan. II 27,6-7; Ben. Jacob 16; Antichr. 4). Hippolytus's interpretation is the foundation of patristic exegesis: David is king, prophet and priest (Dav. 2,1-2 and 12,2).

1. King. Anointed by God, the king of Israel foreshadows the universal king (Hipp., Dav. 16,2-5; Tertull., Marc. III 20,1-10; IV 36,8-14; Hilary, In Ps. 51,4). The "true David" is Jesus (Hipp., Dav. 11,4; Ambr., Apol. I 17,81; Aug., In Ps. 96,2). Christ, the king who becomes a servant, is persecuted as was David (Melit., Hom. 59,434 and 69,504; Aug., In Ps. 51,1-5), but victorious over the lion and the bear, who represent death and sin, and over the giant, who is Satan: "as David threw down Goliath, it is Christ who kills the devil. . . . It is humility that kills pride" (Aug., In Ps. 33,1,4; cf. Hipp., Dav. 11,1-4; Cypr., Test. 2,16; Greg. Naz., Or. 5,30; Aug., Serm. 32,1-28). The king, as Bathsheba's husband, prefigures Christ's marriage with the purified church (Ambr., Apol. I 3,14; II 8, 40ff.; cf. Orig., In Rom. 2,14). The bread that David ate in the sanctuary prefigures the *Eucharist (Ambr., In Lc. 5,37; Theodoret, In I Reg. 52).

2. Prophet. David is "the perfect prophet" because he makes prophecy into a song of life (Hipp., Dav. 1,1 and 11,2; Ambr., In Ps. 118, 10,32). The "sweet singer of Israel" (2 Sam 23:1), considered the father of music and physician of the soul, "drove away demons with his music of truth," revealing that the "all-harmonious, well-tuned, holy instrument" of the divine music is man made in God's image; the Word "plays to God with this instrument of a thousand voices and sings with the instrument that is man" (Clem. Al., Protr. I 5,3-4; cf. Strom. VI 88,1-5; Greg. Naz., Or. 5,30 and 17,2; Ambr., In Ps. 1,7; Jerome, Ep. 53,8; Theodoret, In I Reg. 46). The Word is the "plectrum" that makes the prophets resound like lyres (Hipp., Antichr. 2). David's "lyre" (1 Sam 16:23) is "the musical instrument of humanity; its song is the word revealed to us by him who became incarnate" (Greg. Nyss., In Ps. 2,16). His "psalter" is made "in the form of the body of the Lord" (Hilary, In Ps. prol. 7). Christ uses his humanity like a lyre (Hipp., Antichr. 2; Dav. 5,2). "In our communities David sings Christ because, through David, Christ has sung himself" (Tertull., Carn. Chr. 20,3). David is the "instrument of the divine voice" for that most sweet song that is "the remission of sins and the resurrection of the dead"; in his Psalms "Christ in person" speaks: history becomes prophecy in a superhuman musical language that exalts the sweetness of the word and spurs to virtue (Ambr., Iac. II 9,39; Apol. I 17,80). These themes enrich the Fathers' numerous Commentaries on the Psalms, esp. Psalm 50.

3. Shepherd. David is the "true shepherd" (Hipp., Dav. 5,1), exemplar of all the virtues: meekness, humility, patience, wisdom, generosity, faith (Hipp., Dav. 12,1-2; Did., In Ps. 50; Greg. Nyss., Melet.; Ambr., Apol. I 6,30 and 17,81). Repentance for sin is a fundamental example: David the king, sign of human frailty, through the cry of the psalm begging pardon reveals that the saint is a pardoned sinner who proclaims the mercy of God and the resurrection of man (Cyr. of Jer., Cat. 2,11-12; Ambr., Apol. I 7,35 et passim; Interp. Job et David IV 1,1; In Lc. 3,37-39). One who sees the saints fall, says *Augustine, "observes the greatness of the wound, but does not despair of the majesty of the physician": he can "rise again with David" (Aug., In Ps. 50,3-5). Meekness and humility make of David a model for those who desire to live the beatitudes: "be meek like Moses and David, because the meek will possess the earth" (Apos. Con. VII 7,3; cf. Greg. Naz., Or. 14,2). David prefigured Christ the good shepherd: "he who will be raised up to pasture the saints is not David the patriarch, but Christ" (Ezek 34:23, in Orig., In Jo. I 23,146; cf. Aug., Serm. 47,20). Jesus is "the true David, the truly humble," who emptied himself in the incarnation and the *cross (Ambr., In Ps. 118,14,4).

H. Leclercq, David: DACL 4, 295-303; L. Pirot, David: DBS 2, 287-330; S.M. Harris, St. David in the Liturgy, Oxford 1940; J. Daniélou, David: RAC 3, 594-603; P. Hadot - M. Cordier, Ambroise de Milan. Apologie de David, SC 239, Paris 1977; L.F. Pizzolato, La dottrina esegetica di Sant'Ambrogio, Milan 1978, 117-129; P. Meloni, La chitarra di David: Sandalion 5 (1982) 233-261.

P. Meloni

II. Iconography. A prefiguration of Christ and his victory over the forces of evil. David is depicted in the Goliath episode from the first half of the 3rd c. to symbolize the soul saved from death (*Dura Europos, baptistery: 244–245). The same episode is a favorite in cemeteries: in painting, of which we have only one example (Rome, cemetery of Domitilla: 4th c.), and on sarcophagi (Ancona, Museo Diocesano, sarcophagus of Flavius Gorgonius: late 4th c.; Vienne, Museum, sarcophagus lid; Vienne, sarcophagus lid of Place de l'Hôtel de Ville); and on various other monuments, including the reliquiary of Brescia (4th c.) and a fresco of S. Maria Antiqua (705–707), in which David prepares to cut off Goliath's head. David is usually depicted as a shepherd with baculum, sling and/or bag of stones; Goliath is fully armed. Episodes from David's life begin to be depicted from the 4th c. (Brescia, Museo Cristiano, reliquiary: 4th c.; Milan, S. Ambrose, wooden doors: late 4th c.); such episodes—Samuel anointing David; David comforting Saul with the lyre; David killing the bear and the lion, and snatching the lamb out of the lion's jaws; Saul preparing David's armor; David's marriage—are repeated, though with variations and additions, in monuments of later ages (Baouît, convent, chapel no. 3, frescos, unique type of David as cupbearer: 6th-7th c.; Nicosia of Cyprus, National Museum, treasure of Karavas, near Kyrenia: 613–629/630; New York, from Cyprus, silver plate: 7th c.). David is also shown in prophet's dress, esp. to symbolize, as the author of royal and messianic psalms, the concordance between the OT and NT (Rossano, purple Codex: 6th c.; Sinope, gospels, Paris, Bibl. Nat. suppl. gr. 1286: 6th c.). Finally, we should mention David as victor over the two-headed serpent in, among others, a relief of Niederdollendorf near Bonn (early 7th c.) and in the Durham manuscript of the Lindisfarne school (probably the work of *Bede). In the field of epigraphy, an inscription on a Visigothic bronze basin (6th-7th c.) mentions David's victory.

J. Daniélou, David: RAC 3, 594-603; K. Wessel, RBK I, 1145-1161; R. Wyss, LCI I, 477-490; Wp 356f.; Ws II, 264f.; P.V.C. Baur, David and Goliath on an Early Christian Lamp: Yale Classical Studies 1 (1928) 41-51; M. Calberg, David vainqueur de Goliath: BullMusRoyArtHist (1952) 29-34; J. Guyon, L'évolution des sites urbains en Provence (Antiquité et haut Moyen Âge): Ktèma 7 (1982) 129-140; F. Bisconti, Un fenomeno di continuità iconografica: Orfeo citaredo, Davide salmista, Cristo pastore . . . , in Cristianesimo e giudaismo: eredità e confronti: Augustinianum 28 (1988) 429-436; TIP 164f.; T. Nagasawa, Notes sur l'évolution de l'iconographie du "Combat de David contre Goliath," des origines au Xe siècle: Byzantion 58 (1988) 123-139; M. Dulaey, Les combats de David, in Id., "Des forêts de symboles." L'initiation chrétienne et la Bible (Ier-VIe siècle), Paris 2001, 243-264.

G. Santagata

DAVID of Wales (d. ca. 601). Patron saint of Wales, mentioned for the first time—indicating the date of his death in 601—in a manuscript of the 10th-c. Annales Cambriae. Very little is known for certain of his life and work, and many of the deeds attributed to him seem to belong solely to late Celtic hagiography's rich and copious strain of fantasy. Although mention of and information on him is found sporadically in various 8th-10th-c. documents, the first official biography—very fanciful and influenced by St. *Benedict's biography—was written only in the late 11th c. by Bishop Rhygyfarch (sometimes written Rythmark, Rithmarch, Ryddmarch or Ricemarchus). This version was a major source for the later editions—enriched by even less-probable elements—of Giraldus Cambrensis, William of Malmesbury, Geoffrey of Monmouth, John of Tinemouth and John Capgrave. According to those writers, David was the son of Sant or Sandde ab Ceredig ab Cunnedda, prince of Keretica province (in the present-day county of Cardiganshire), and Non or Nonna or Nonnita (sometimes also called Melaria), and was born ca. 454 near the Rhos valley, near Hen-Meneu or Hen-Mynyw (ancient Vetus Menevia, later St. Davids).

Raised and educated initially by St. Illtyd at Caerworgorn (later called Llanilltyd Fawr or Lanwit Major, five miles from Cowbridge in the Glamorganshire), he then spent ten years studying Sacred Scripture at Whitland in Carmarthenshire under the guidance of St. Paulinus. Later embracing an austere monastic life, he evangelized Britain, founding or restoring twelve monasteries in his missionary wanderings (among which stand out those of Glastonbury, Bath and Leominster). Miraculously saved from an attempted poisoning by some monks, he went to Jerusalem, where he was ordained bishop and, back in Wales, succeeded Dubricius as bishop of Caerleon; from there he transferred to the see of Menevia. He presided at numerous and important synods that discussed complex liturgical and disciplinary questions of the Celtic churches; it is certain that he had a preeminent role in the anti-Pelagian synod of Brefi (Llanddewi Brefi in Cardiganshire, perhaps identifiable with the Roman military outpost Loventium). According to hagiographers, he died at the ripe old age of 147, and his tomb quickly became a pilgrimage destination. In 966 his relics were transferred to Glastonbury; he was canonized ca. 1120 by Pope Callistus II.

Nothing remains of the church and monastery founded by David at Menevia in the 6th c. Precious iconographical evidence is in the frescos of the church of Saint-Divy de Landerneau, where the famous episode of the Council of Brefi is depicted: while the saint was preaching against the Pelagians, the earth arose miraculously to form a hill so that he could be seen, while the dove of the Holy Spirit alighted on his shoulder. He is commemorated 1 March in the Celtic and Irish calendars and in the Mart. hier.

DCB 1, 791-793; EC 4, 1243; DHGE 14, 114-115; BS 4, 514-515; LTK 3, 42; A.W. Wade-Evans, Life of St. David, London 1923; S.M. Harris, Saint David in the Liturgy, Cardiff 1940; J. Wyn Evans, St David and St Davids: Some Observations on the Cult, Site and Buildings, in J. Cartwright (ed.), Celtic Hagiography and Saints' Cults, Cardiff 2003, 10-25.

M. Ghilardi

DAVID the Armenian. Name of various authors who are often confused in the manuscript tradition and whose identity and chronology are still uncertain. The main ones are (1) David the invincible (anyałt'; 6th c.?), translator of the Hellenophile school of numerous philosophical (Aristotle, Porphyry, Dionysius Thrax) and theological (*Cyril of *Alexandria, *Dionysius the Areopagite, *Nemesius of Emesa) treatises and author of some philosophical treatises, and (2) David of Hark' (7th c.?), author of some homilies (On the cross; Against the heretics).

Patrologia V, 999; Koriwn vardapeti, Mambrēi vercanołi ew Dawt'i Anyałt'i matenagrowt'iwnk' [Writings of Koriwn teacher, Mambrè lector and David the Invincible], Venetik 1833, 103-635; N. Akinian, Dawit' Anyałt' ew Dawit' Hark'ac'i. Yownaban dproc'i t'argmanič' ern ēst Hay awandowt'ean ew VI.-VII. darow Dawit' imastasērnerě [David the Invincible and David of Hark': the Graecophile translators according to the Armenian tradition and the philosophers of the 6th-7th c. called David]: HA 70 (1956) 123-163; 301-320; Id., Dawit' Hark'ac'woy targmannowt'iwnerě [The translations of David of Hark']: HA 71 (1957) 267-281; V.K. Čalojan, Filosofia Davida Nepobedimogo, Erevan 1946; S.A. Arevšatjan, Formirovanie filosofskoj nauki v drevnej Armenii (5-6 vv.), Erevan 1973; Id., David Anakht (Nepobedimyi). Analiz "Vvedenija" Porfirija . . . , Erevan 1976; S.S. Arevšatjan, David l'Invincible et sa doctrine philosophique, REArm n.s. 15 (1981) 33-43; B. Kendall - R.W. Thomson, Definitions and Divisions of Philosophy by David the Invincible Philosopher, English Translation of the Old Armenian Version with Introduction and Notes (University of Pennsylvania Armenian Texts and Studies 5), Chico 1983; A.K. Sanjian (ed.), David Anhaghth, the "Invincible" Philosopher, Atlanta 1986; P. Ananian, Dawit' P'ilisop'ac'i erek' growt'iwnnerì ew anor ašakert T'eodoros Dakoni anyayt growt'iwně. Tre scritti di Davide il filosofo e un discorso inedito di Teodoro Dacon, Venice-S. Lazzaro 1985 [It. sum. 48-49]; S. Ajamian, An Introduction to the Book of Psalms by David Anaght: Ch. Burchard (ed.), Armenia and the Bible. Papers Presented to the International Symposium held at Heidelberg, July 16-19, 1990 (University of Pennsylvania Armenian Texts and Studies 12), Atlanta 1993, 15-21; A. Topchyan, David the Invincible, Commentary on Aristotle's Prior Analytics: Critical Old Armenian Text with an English Translation, Introduction and Notes, Philosophia Antiqua, Leiden 2010.

S.J. Voicu

DEACONESSES. The Greco-Roman world with its concept of a woman's dignity in the family, the Jewish world with its marginalized vision of women, and the Christian world with the figure of Mary mother of Jesus, and the women who accompanied Jesus' mission and to whom he entrusted the mission of the first proclamation of the resurrection, all came together to establish the service that women offered in the church's internal life during the first centuries. In Rom 16:1 Paul speaks of Phoebe, a deaconess of the church of Cenchreae, but it is difficult to determine her exact role, and whether her diaconate was a ministry in the proper sense. *Origen, commenting on the passage (Comm. in Rom. 10,17), speaks of a diaconate of women, to which should belong women who have given "assistance to many, and with their good works have merited the praise of the Apostles." The diaconate of women is attested in the East. *Pliny the Younger, in the letter to Trajan (Ep. 10,96,8), speaks of the tortures to which two ministrae were subjected so as to extort information from them about their coreligionists.

*Clement of *Alexandria (Strom. 3,6,53), commenting on 1 Cor 9:5, speaks of the women who, accompanying the *apostles, collaborated in their ministry, "causing the Lord's teaching to reach the women, without giving rise to malicious gossip."

The Didascalia of the Apostles 2,26,4-6 (first half 3rd c.) lists the tasks of women: the domestic evangelization of women; assistance in the baptism of women, anointing those who descend in the water with oil and receiving them when they come out of the water, and teaching them how to preserve intact the seal of baptism; visiting and helping sick women. They could not teach, however, or administer baptism, though the Didascalia had such an elevated concept of woman as to present her as a "type" (typus) of the Holy Spirit. The prohibition of teaching and baptizing—of OT and Jewish influence and derivation—also appears in the Apostolic Constitutions 3,6,1-2.

The feminine diaconate took form after the first two Christian centuries. From the 4th-c. testimonies regarding women became more numerous, but they were not considered part of the clergy, even if ordained with the laying on of hands (χειροτονία); virginity or being the widow of one husband were an indispensable requirement. This form of institutionalized feminine diaconate remained exclusive to the East and was never introduced in the West. Deaconesses should not be confused with widows, since the diaconate expressed a function whereas widowhood indicated a higher, ascetical state of life. Among heretical sects, esp. the *Montanists, women taught, baptized, administered the *Eucharist and carried out episcopal or presbyterial tasks.

DACL 4, 725-733; DIP 3, 469-470; ODC 455-456, 1761-1762; J. Leipoldt, Die Frau in der antiken Welt und im Urchristentum, Leipzig 1954; J. Daniélou, Le ministère des femmes dans l'Église ancienne: La MaisonD 61 (1960) 70-96; R. Gryson, Il ministero della donna nella Chiesa antica, Rome 1974; M.G. Mara, Le funzioni della donna nella Chiesa antica: RivPastorLit 19/2 (1981) 5-16; E. Pasztor, La donna nei movimenti religiosi del Medio Evo: RivPastorLit 19/2 (1981) 17-30; A.G. Martimort, Les diaconesses, Rome 1982; L. Cracco Ruggini, La donna e il sacro, tra paganesimo e cristianesimo, in Atti del II Convegno Nazionale di Studi su La donna nel mondo antico (Turin 18-19-20 aprile 1988), Turin 1989, 243-275; C. Militello, La donna nella Chiesa: problemi aperti: Studi ecumenici 6 (1988, 1) 59-102; G. Duby - M. Perrot, Storia delle donne in occidente, I, L'antichità, Rome-Bari 1990, 487-496; P. Sorci, Ministeri liturgici della donna nella Chiesa antica, in C. Militello (ed.), Donna e ministero, un dibattito ecumenico, Rome 1991, 17-30; P. Sorci, Diaconato ed altri ministeri liturgici della donna, in U. Mattioli (ed.), La donna nel pensiero cristiano antico, Genova 1992, 331-364; A.D. Salapatas, The Liturgical Role of the Deaconess in the Apostolic Constitutions: OCP 68 (2001) 561-578.

M.G. Bianco

DEAD, Ceremonies for the

I. Funerals - II. Remembrance of the dead.

In honoring their dead, the living display, more or less consciously, the belief that the dead survive their disappearance and need appropriate care in the afterlife. When this care, besides being a natural expression of affection, is clothed in religious expression, we may speak of ceremonies for the dead. Christians initially followed contemporary Jewish and *pagan customs. Only over time were these Christianized and a specifically Christian attitude to death created, but even then they remain a vehicle of ideas and customs whose origins are lost to us.

I. Funerals. Care for the dead began in the home from the moment of death. The series of practices that succeeded each other from death to burial were called funus and can be divided as follows:

1. The funerary toilette. After expiring, the dead person was called by name (conclamatio) to ensure that death had actually occurred, a rite still observed at the death of a *pope. The eyes and mouth were closed, and then the body was washed, perfumed and dressed as befitted one's station: all this by professionals. Meanwhile, rather than abandon themselves to grief like pagans, relatives were invited to sing psalms. Prayers seem to have been said by a priest.

2. Laying out. Laid out on a bed prepared for the purpose (feretrum), crowned with flowers (this custom, rebuked by *Tertullian, took root among Christians, as texts and *archaeology show), surrounded by family, the deceased received at home (monks later at church) the traditional (incense, candles) and Christian honors (prayer for the deceased with night vigil if necessary). Burial was originally on the day of death, so laying out lasted only a day. If death was in the evening, there was a night vigil. Sometimes laying out was prolonged for some days to allow relatives to come to the funeral from a distance.

3. The funeral procession. According to old Roman custom, which *Julian the Apostate vainly attempted to revive, the dead person was carried to the tomb at night by torchlight. This custom is still attested by *Cyprian (Act. Cypr. 5, 6) and perhaps by epigraphy (CIL 11, 2538), but it disappeared in the course of the 4th c., when daytime burial began. The deceased was carried on the feretrum, followed by relatives and friends, men with head covered, women with hair unfastened, both dressed in dark colors or black. Psalms and hymns were sung during the procession.

4. Deposition. Christians always practiced burial, never cremation. Upon arrival at the tomb, the stretcher was placed on the ground, and the family took leave of the dead with a kiss. For an important person there would be a funeral eulogy; in all cases an acclamation. For *Monica's funeral rites a mass was celebrated near the tomb before interment, a custom not attested in other cases. The body was laid in the tomb on a bed of flowers and fragrant herbs, and covered with quicklime: the tomb was then closed and sealed. An identifying sign was put on it, perhaps an inscription on the enclosing slab giving the name, day, month and sometimes year of depositio. The funerary banquet (refrigerium) celebrated nearby closed the funeral.

II. Remembrance of the dead. The funeral ceremonial was periodically renewed, though only in part, and completed in particular aspects. The elements that made up these commemorations were:

1. In pagan times, portraits of the dead appeared in the funeral procession and were preserved in patrician dwellings; among Christians, this was formally prohibited as idolatrous (Cypr., Quod idola dii non sint).

2. The period of mourning that followed burial involved a commemorative celebration of the deceased on the 3rd, 7th, 9th, and 30th or 40th day: essentially a funeral banquet and celebration of the Eucharist. These rites had parallels among pagans and Jews; they were related to ancient beliefs about the formation of the embryo and the decomposition of the corpse.

3. Annual celebrations. First, the personal anniversary of the deceased. Among pagans the celebration was that of birth: natalitium; among Christians that of death: ἡμέρα γενέθλιος, natale* or dies natalis. Tertullian says expressly that, in commemorating the dead, Christians had replaced the day of birth by that of death (Cor. 3,3). There were also communal commemorations for all the deceased. While the rosalia and violatio seem to have had little following among Christians as feasts of the dead (DACL 15, 8-9), this was not so for the parentalia, which ended 22 February with the caristia: the period of mourning lasted ten days, followed on the eleventh by a feast in which the family gathered around its dead. All these celebrations, personal and communal, included a mass and a banquet.

4. Mass for the dead. This Christian custom is universally attested on the third day (Act. Iohan. ed. Bonnet, I, 156; Pallad., Hist. Laus. 21; Const. App. 8,42, ed. Funk, I, 552; Evodius, in Aug., Ep. 158,2). The anniversary mass is explicitly attested by Tertullian (Cor. 3,3; Exh. cast. 11,1; Monog. 10,1), but there is indirect testimony in texts on the anniversaries of the martyrs (Saxer, Morts, martyrs, reliques . . . , 105-107, 171-173): qui potest plus potest minus. At these masses the names of the dead, individually or as a group, were included in the reading of the diptychs (Saxer, 162-165).

5. Funerary banquets. These had different names in different times and places: refrigerium, convivium, etc.; and different "menus," in which bread, fish, wine, water, sometimes milk, gruel occupied an important place. Sobriety does not seem to have been a rule: Tertullian speaks of people returning drunk from elegant dinners (Test. an. 4,3-6); Augustine, of "copious libations and revelry" (Ep. 22,3). Indeed, guests in banquet scenes in catacombs have a merry air. We may state that the custom was general: texts and monuments prove it. These banquets were intended both to nourish the dead, as certain funerary furnishings demonstrate (channels for libations), and to strengthen the bonds of friendship among the living on the one hand, and between the living and the dead on the other. Over time there were attempts to turn them into love-feasts, or at least occasions for charity. The custom survived long, if under different forms.

The form finally taken by ceremonies for the dead, in their totally Christinaized aspect, must be sought in the Ordines romani and, later, in the Romano-Gallican rituals of death: as these show, it was the church that cared for Christians, accompanying them with its prayers from last illness to the tomb and beyond, in the hope of the resurrection.

RAC 9, 924-939, 1000-1006; M. Righetti, Manuale di Storia liturgica 2, Milan [3]1969, 471-516; C. Vogel, L'environnement cultuel du défunt durant la période paléochrétienne, Ephemerides Liturgicae, Subsidia 1, Rome 1975, 381-413; P.-A. Février, Le culte des morts dans les communautés chrétiennes durant le III[e] siècle, Atti del IX Congr. Int. di Archeologia Cristiana 1, Vatican City 1978, 211-274; D. Sicard, La liturgie de la mort dans l'église latine des origines à la réforme carolingienne, Münster 1978; B. Kötting, Die Tradition der Grabkirche, in K. Schmid - J. Wollasch (eds.), Memoria, Munich 1984, 69-78; A. Angenendt, Theologie und Liturgie der mittelalterlichen Toten-Memoria, in ibid., 79-199; G. Tellenbach, Die historische Dimension der liturgischen commemoratio im Mittelalter, in ibid., 200-214; Ph. Harnoncourt - H. Auf der Maur, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit 2,1, Regensburg 1994, 81-83; A. Samellas, Death in the Eastern Mediterranean, Tübingen 2002; U. Volp, Tod und Ritual in den christlichen Gemeinden der Antike, London-Boston 2002; M. Costambeys, The Culture and Practice of Burial in and Around Rome in the Sixth Century, Ecclesiae Urbis 1, Vatican City 2002, 721-731.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

DEATH. In the Greco-Roman world, various conceptions of death are found in different philosophical and religious sects. Parmenides, in line with his assertion of the existence of the sole Being and not of Non-Being, in fact denied death; he refused to admit the existence of birth and death and the transformations entailed by the idea of "becoming." To this effect, he even assigned a form of sense-perception and knowledge to corpses. The Heraclitean perspective was dialectic: the death of each individual being is but a moment in the whole universal rhythm, in the perpetual renewal of life (frags. 22B26, 36, 48, 77 Diels-Kranz). In Orphism, Pythagoreanism and *Platonism, physical death is the liberation of the soul from the bonds of matter (Plato, Phaedr. 64Aff.; Plutarch, De facie 28), although this liberation may be continually challenged by the danger of a reincarnation, which is avoided only by the pure and wise. The atomist Democritus and his followers, Epicurus and the Epicureans, embraced a materialistic perspective according to which death is the dissolution of the atomic compounds of our body and our soul, the latter too being material and made of atoms. This is why, according to Epicurus, "As long as we are, death is not, and when death is, we no longer are" (Ep. ad Men. 4,124-125), and Lucretius repeats: "Death is nothing for us, nor does it touch us at all" (DRN 3,924-925). Cicero understood this claim, but he objected: "I am not without my fears that this itself is an evil: I do not mean the immediate deprivation of sense, but the fact that we shall hereafter suffer deprivation" (Tusc. 1,12). The Stoic perspective is also materialistic: the soul is material just as every other existing being, and it will dissolve in the universal Logos at the end of each cosmic cycle, thus totally losing its individuality. But each being and each event will return, identical, over and over again in each cosmic cycle, in infinitum. Rather soon, Stoicism seems to have accepted the theory of astral immortality at least for the virtuous, as, e.g., Hercules Oetaeus, ascribed to Seneca, attests. But already in Greek pagan philosophy the notion of a moral and spiritual life and death began to appear, e.g., in the *Middle-Platonist *Philo and in the Stoics Seneca and Juvenal: indeed, in the imperial period Stoicism was receptive of Middle-Platonic motifs. In Satire 8, 85-86, in reference to a dissolute man, Juvenal says: dignus morte periit, coenet licet ostrea centum / Gaurana, "He who is worthy of death is already dead, even though he may have a hundred prized oysters at dinner." He is distinguishing between physical and spiritual life: a dissolute person may be alive bodily, but spiritually dead. Seneca, shortly after Juvenal, likewise affirmed that the otiosi, affected by existential emptiness, even if they are still alive, are in fact spiritually dead: aeger est, immo mortuus est (Brev. Vit. 12,19).

Philo of *Alexandria in Heres 293 similarly asserts: "According to the legislator [Moses], only the wise person enjoys a good old age and a very long life, whereas the fool has an extremely short life, and is always learning to die, or rather is already dead [ἤδη τετελευτηκότα] to life according to virtue [τὴν ἀρετῆς ζωήν]." Similar reflections on true life and true death are expressed by Philo also in Det. 49, Praem. 70 and Fug. 55. In Praem. 79 Philo clarifies the difference between the two kinds of death: physical, which is an "indifferent" (ἀδιάφορον) and may even be a good, and spiritual, which is an evil, and states that one may endure for long, and even forever, in spiritual death, which is the punishment (τιμωρία) for sins. In Fug. 55 Philo states again that one can be apparently alive but spiritually dead (ζῶντες τεθνήκασι), which is the case with vicious and foolish persons, even when they live very long. He calls them "dead" (νεκρούς), because they are deprived of the virtuous life. The wise and virtuous, on the contrary, live forever (ζῆν εἰσαεί), even though their earthly life is very short or they have already died (τεθνηκότες ζῶσι). A sentence ascribed to the Pythagorean Sextus, 7, also refers to the same notion of being apparently alive but spiritually dead (νεκρὸς ἄνθρωπος ἐν σώματι ζῶντι). Of course, the gist of this conception goes back at least to Socrates in Plato's Apology, e.g., 40C-41D and 42A, and, even more, Phaedo. Indeed, it has its roots in the Orphic, Pythagorean and Platonic notion that the life of the soul is opposed to that of the body and is perfected after death, i.e., after the liberation of the soul from the body, as is precisely expressed in Plato's Phaedo, e.g., 80C-81B; 114Cff.; 118A and passim. That the idea of being physically alive but spiritually dead is basically Platonic is indicated by its presence not only in Plato and Philo and the Pythagorean tradition, but also in the Neo-Academic Cicero, Ad Att. 12,2: "Is not life all over with a man who makes only pleasure, and not right, his aim?"

Notably, this very same concept is also expressed in one of the New Testament passages that are most influenced by Hellenistic moral philosophy, 1 Tim 5:6: the author, referring to a widow who devotes her life to pleasures, says: "She who gives herself to a life of pleasure, even if she is alive, is already dead [ζῶσα τέθνηκεν]." But in Rev 3:1-2, too, the meaning conveyed is exactly the same: the person who acts badly is morally and spiritually dead or deadly ill: "I know your deeds: you are said to be alive [ζῇς], and yet you are dead [νεκρός]. Get up, and strengthen what remains which is about to die [ἔμελλον ἀποθανεῖν]; for I did not find your deeds perfect before my God." As is evident, John does not conceive of this condition as definitive and irredeemable: he looks to the future and invites the dying to improve and live. This notion of the spiritual death of the immoral person can be compared to Paul's description of the death of the soul in Rom 7:6-25 and 8:1-13. Here Paul depicts spiritual life as death to sin and spiritual death as the result of sin: "sin began to live [ἀνέζησεν], while I died [ἀπέθανον]" (7:9-10); "this body of death [θανάτου]" (7:6); "the law of sin and death [θανάτου]" (8:2); "the way of thinking proper to the flesh is death [θάνατος], that of the spirit is life [ζωή] and peace" (8:6); "your body is dead [νεκρόν] due to sin, but your spirit is life [ζωή] thanks to justification" (8:10). Rom 7:7-25 has been rightly connected by Emma Wasserman to Philo's conception of spiritual death; as I have shown, there are many other authors and texts that are influenced by this idea. The same notion of sinners finding themselves in spiritual death is conveyed by the Shepherd of Hermas, Sim. 6.2.3: those who are represented as sheep living a life of pleasure (σπαταλῶντα, exactly the same verb used in 1 Tim 5:6, ἡ σπαταλῶσα) are doomed to death (θάνατος).

Related to this set of ideas is the widely attested notion that the death of a Christian—at first the day of a martyr's death, then extended to all Christians—is his or her dies natalis, his or her birth to the other life, regarded as the true life, or the more important life, in that it is eternal. Now, already in 4 Macc 16:12-13 the idea is attested that the death of the martyrs is their birth to immortality. But even in a pagan author contemporary with the first Christians, in Seneca, there is a passage that expresses a strikingly similar concept: the day of one's death is his or her dies aeterni natalis. In his Epistulae ad Lucilium, dating to the last years of his life, in the 60s of the 1st c., and in particular in one of the last, roughly contemporary with the first anti-Christian persecution under Nero, which produced the first Christian martyrs, Seneca observes: "When the day comes to separate the heavenly from its earthly blend, I shall leave the body here where I found it, and shall of my own volition find my way to the gods. I am not apart from them now, but am merely detained in a heavy and earthly prison. . . . As the mother's womb holds us for ten months, . . . just so, . . . we are making ourselves ready for another birth. A different beginning, a different condition, await us. That day, which you fear as being the end of all things, is the birthday of your eternity" (Ep. 102,22-26).

Of course, both the above-mentioned passages and the whole biblical conception of death, in addition to the philosophers' views (esp. Platonic), provide the basis for the Fathers' thinking concerning death. In the Bible, Gen 3:19 presents death as the consequence of original sin, a conception that is echoed in Rom 5:12 ("death entered the world due to sin"), 5:17 ("death began to reign because of one human being"), 5:21 ("sin reigned in death," ἐβασίλευσεν ἡ ἁμαρτία ἐν τῷ θανάτῳ), and 6:23 ("the wages of sin is death"); 1 Cor 15:21 ("death came into being because of one human being"), and Jas 1:15 ("sin . . . generates death"). Thus, as is also emphasized in the book of Wisdom, death was not part of God's original plan; it was not created by God, who created only good things, but it entered the world through sin, by a deception, due to the devil's fraud (Wisd 2:24). Death is not good, since it is not a creation of God; it is an evil, and this, as I shall point out, at least for some NT and patristic authors has momentous consequences in respect to its future disappearance.

While in the ancient books of the OT death is seen as entering the "bosom of Abraham," in more recent books references to life after death take the form of ζωὴ αἰώνιος or ἀΐδιος, a key concept in the NT as well. In Tobias 3:6, the place of the afterlife is said to be a τόπος αἰώνιος, the first passage in the OT in which αἰώνιος undoubtedly refers to the world to come (see τόπος αἰώνιος in Is 33:14). In 2 Macc 7:9, the doctrine of resurrection is affirmed and αἰώνιος is used with reference to life in the future world: God "will resurrect us to a return to life in the world to come" (εἰς αἰώνιον ἀναβίωσιν ζωῆς ἡμᾶς ἀναστήσει) and 4 Macc 15:3: "which saves, leading to life in the world to come" (τὴν σώζουσαν εἰς αἰωνίαν ζωήν). In 4 Macc 13:15 (cf. 9:9), the evil will suffer "in torment in the world to come" (ἐν αἰωνίῳ βασάνῳ); this language will be picked up in NT references to "αἰώνιος life" and "αἰώνιον fire." In Dan 12:2-3, another late book of the OT, the prophecy of resurrection runs as follows: "They will rise, some to life in the world to come [εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον], some to reproach, and some again to dispersion and shame in the world to come [εἰς διασπορὰν καὶ αἰσχύνην αἰώνιον]." In Wisd 3:12, another later book, those honored by God are said to be going to rise "to life in the world to come" (εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον). 4 Macc 10:15 describes the martyrs' life after death as "the eternal life [ἀΐδιον βίον] of the pious"; which is opposed to the death of their persecutor, the tyrant, in the world to come (αἰώνιον ὄλεθρον). This contrast between the parallel but antithetical expressions ὄλεθρος αἰώνιος and βίος ἀΐδιος is notable and will consistently return in patristic authors, as has been pointed out by Ramelli and Konstan. Both adjectives refer to life after death, but while retribution is described with the general and polysemous term αἰώνιος, life in the beyond is denoted by means of the more technical term ἀΐδιος, denoting a strictly endless condition.

In the NT, Jesus Christ is the destroyer of death and is Life itself. In John 11:25-26 he proclaims: "I am the Resurrection and the Life [ζωή]. Whoever believes in me will continue to live even though he will die [κἂν ἀποθάνῃ], and whoever lives and believes in me will certainly not die [οὐ μὴ ἀποθάνῃ] in the world to come." This declaration comes just before the resurrection of Lazarus (Jn 11:44: "the one who was dead came out" of the tomb, ἐξῆλθεν ὁ τεθνηκός) and Caiaphas's prophecy that Jesus' death will be "for the sake of the nation," to which John adds: "and not only for the sake of the nation, but in order to gather into unity the children of God now dispersed" (Jn 11:51-52). So, 1 Jn 2:2 repeats that Jesus with his death was an expiatory victim (ἱλασμός), "not only for our sins, but also for the whole world." If Jesus is Life, those who follow his commandment will not experience death, and his commandment is love: "We have passed from death to life because we love our siblings; whoever does not love remains in death" (1 Jn 3:14). Paul foretells the eschatological resurrection (Rom 8:11; 1 Cor 15; 1 Th 4:16 etc.), for not even our bodies will remain in death forever: they will rise again and be made glorious like that of Christ (Phil 3:21).

Paul claims that neither life nor death will be able to separate us from God's love (Rom 8:35-39). Above all, in 1 Cor 15:24-28 he foretells the eventual annihilation of death: "Then the end will come, when he will hand the kingdom to God the Father, after destroying every principality, power and force. For he must reign until he has put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy will be destroyed: death. . . . Then the Son himself will submit to him who has subjected all to him, so that God will be all in all." Paul distinguishes between submission of creatures and complete destruction of the powers of evil and death, which are not creatures.

Likewise, in Rev 14:15 death and Hades are thrown into "the lake of fire, the second death": this is the death of death, its annihilation. The author of Revelation, in a visionary fashion, predicts the eventual eviction of evil and elimination of death, which is also foretold in 1 Cor 15:24-28, certainly known to him. For death is not alive; it is no creature of God; it was not created at the beginning. It appeared as a result of sin, and will not subsist in the end, as Paul maintained. Thus, death and hell will die and disappear. In Rev 21:4 the statement, "death will no more exist" (ὁ θάνατος οὐκ ἔσται ἔτι, Vulgate: mors ultra non erit) does not concern only the heavenly Jerusalem, but is an absolute declaration, perfectly consistent with the casting of death into the second death. Indeed, it is first of all the symbols of the powers of evil that are said to be cast into this lake: the beast and the pseudo-prophet. According to *Origen, Schol. Ap. 38, the beast represents all evil, all iniquity (πάσης τῆς ἀδικίας), so that every force of apostasy (πᾶσα δύναμις ἀποστατική) from the Good may be cast into the fire. The whole of Revelation strongly conveys the idea of the eventual destruction of evil: this is essentially what its author prefigures in his visionary account, which is eschatological.

In Rev 21:8 the sinners too, who cannot yet enter the heavenly Jerusalem, are said to be cast into the lake of fire, "which is the second death": but their presence there is in no way declared to be eternal (although elsewhere both Jesus and Paul do speak of eternal fire and eternal suffering, see Mt 18:8; 25:41,46; Mk 3:29; 2 Th 1:9; Heb 6:2). I think that the second death in the case of death itself means the death of death, i.e., its total disappearance; in the case of human beings, it means spiritual death as opposed to merely physical death, the second death after the first death, which was the death of the body: the second death, which involves, not all humans, but only sinners, is seen as the exclusion from the Good, from communion with God, from the holy Jerusalem. The second death that sinners will experience will be the death occurring in the other world as opposed to that occurring in this world; for humans it is their κόλασις αἰώνιος (eternal punishment/correction), whereas for death itself it is its elimination, the death of death. Since death will be no more, the "death" of human beings in the lake of fire will be, not their annihilation, but their purification from evil, a view which is akin to what some of the Greek fathers such as Origen held in their view of the apokatastasis, although others such as Augustine held that the second death was eternal (Civ. Dei 13,2 and 8; 14,1). It seems to be the same as that which is mentioned in 1 Cor 3:13-15 as testing the works of each person and destroying the evil works while purifying the sinner, who will suffer a loss (ζημιωθήσεται; Vulgate: detrimentum patietur), but will be saved through fire (αὐτὸς δὲ σωθήσεται, οὕτως δὲ ὡς διὰ πυρός).

A close analysis of Rev 19-22 indeed suggests that the lake of fire has a purifying function for humans, the ceasing of all κατάθεμα indicates the end of all exclusion and malediction, and the "nations," which repeatedly seem to be destroyed, continue to reappear anew and are said to finally benefit from a healing deriving from a tree that is Jesus' *Cross (Rev 22:2; cf. Didymus, Comm. Prov. 1625BC). The nations' death is a purifying suffering: what is eliminated is evil, not the people themselves. This is why they can reappear afterwards, receive the healing that comes from the Cross, and finally enter the heavenly Jerusalem. Origen clearly held this: in Hom. Jer. 1.16 he observes that, when Scriptures speak of death and destruction of kingdoms and nations (ἔθνη), they do not refer to the realms of this world, nor to the elimination of any human beings: it is the kingdom of evil that will be destroyed and demolished down to its very roots by God, in order to purify human beings and prepare a basis for a good planting and edification; it is sin, in all its varieties, that will be eradicated and destroyed (ἀπολλύναι) and abolished, so that upon the ruins of evil God may build his Temple and plant "the garden of Good, the new Paradise." The concept of the final eviction of evil and its substitution with good emerges again in Hom. Jer. 16, 6, where the destruction of evil is directly connected to the end of punishment—expressly assimilated to death—for sinners: for God gives death only in order to give life again. Indeed, all the aforementioned Pauline and Johannine passages on the eventual elimination of death will be fundamental for several Fathers' reflection, esp. for Origen and *Gregory of Nyssa, who will interpret this "death" that will be utterly destroyed not only as physical death, but also as spiritual death.

Philo—whose conception of spiritual death I have already mentioned as a parallel to that of other Platonists, some Stoics and some NT passages—and Origen, who was very well acquainted with Philo, both take "death" in at least a twofold sense: physical death, i.e., the detachment of the souls from the body, and spiritual death, that is, the death of the soul. Philo seems to maintain that death is the natural condition of both our bodies and our souls without the grace of God. Indeed, he thinks that eternal life is a privilege granted by God's grace exclusively to virtuous souls, whereas the others seem to be destined to die. For only the rational soul is immortal and incorruptible and destined to return home, and only those who have exercised it will survive: "another life without a body, which only the soul of the wise will live" (Quaest. in Gen. 3.11; cf. Spec. 3.206-207; Cher. 144; Sacr. 6; Prob. 117-118). For only a purified soul is really incorruptible (Her. 276).

Origen was likewise convinced that the vicious soul perishes, as the soul is not immortal in respect to "the true death" (ἡ ὄντως θάνατος), i.e., spiritual death, as he explains in Dial. Heracl. 25. Here, he distinguishes three different meanings of the noun death: one is the death that consists in the separation of the soul from the body, which is also the most common meaning of "death." With respect to this death, the soul is immortal. Another sense of death is death to sin, which is an enormous good; "blessed is the soul that dies to sin," he says. But there is another meaning of death: the death to God, which is caused by sin. This is the most serious kind of death, a positive evil, and to this death the soul is liable: "the soul is mortal in respect to the true death" (θνητὴ τοῦ ὄντως θανάτου ἐστιν ἡ ψυχή). But Origen, differently from Philo, as it seems, did not regard this death of the soul, this perdition and state of "being lost" (ἀπόλωλα), as eternal, because Christ has come to rescue the lost sheep, and the Bible everywhere announces resurrection after death ("can you see throughout all Scriptures the announcement of the resurrection of the dead?"— ἐπαγγελίαν ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν), as Origen emphasizes in his Homilies on Jeremiah, on the basis of his twofold conception of resurrection, both physical and spiritual, which forms an apt pendant to the different meanings of death theorized by him. In the end, in the beatitude, all souls will become immortal also to sin, which will exclude the possibility that there may be a new fall (Dial. Heracl. 26-27).

This same idea will be taken up by *Ambrose, In Luc. 7.39: "cum autem, firmitate beatitudinis roborata, coeperit obnoxia non esse peccato, iam non erit mortalis." For in the end death will no more exist; no soul will be mortal any longer in the telos. To this effect, Origen presents an argument that is both philosophical and based on Scripture. He claims that eternal life and eternal death cannot coexist, because they are contradictory and absolute; therefore, one of them cannot be eternal and must disappear; now, according to Origen, Paul in 1 Cor 15:26 foretells that it will be death that is eliminated: "For an eternal will not be contrary to an eternal, but identical. But now it is certain that death is contrary to life, therefore it is certain that if life is eternal, it is not possible for death to be eternal . . . for when the death of the soul, who is the last enemy, should be destroyed, then this shared death, which we have said is like the shadow of the other, will necessarily be abolished, . . . and the reign of death will be destroyed equally with death" (Orig., Comm. in Rom. 5,7). The eventual destruction of death, in Origen's view, depends on Christ's own death on the cross, which occurred only once, but was so powerful as to be enough to save all rational creatures, living in all eons, which is not at odds with their free will. "Christ died for sin once, and he is no longer dead, and because he lives, he lives to God. . . . We indeed do not deny that free will always remains in the rational nature, but the power of the cross of Christ and his death is so great, which is received at the end of the age, we assert, that not only does it bring healing and a remedy for the present and the future ages, but even for those of the past, and this not only suffices for our human existence, but also for the heavenly powers and ranks. For according to the passage of the Apostle Paul himself, Christ has brought peace through the blood of his cross not only for those who are on earth, but also those in heaven" (Comm. in Rom. 5,10).

The conception of life and death at both levels, physical and spiritual, is typical, not only of Origen, but also of Bardesanes (Bardaisan). For this reason he was accused of denying the resurrection, the same accusation that was leveled against Origen: in the case of Origen, this charge is unfounded; I suspect that the same may be the case with Bardesanes, who probably intended resurrection both in the physical sense (as the restoration of the perfect body before the fall) and in the spiritual sense (as the salvation of the soul, its resurrection from the death of sin). Bardesanes in his antignostic polemic (parallel to that of Origen) distinguished, not human beings in general into different classes, but each human being into (1) body and animate soul, both mortal and subject respectively to nature and fate, and (2) the rational/intellectual soul (or spirit), immortal and endowed with free will.

In Prose Refutations (II p. 158, 20ff.) *Ephrem attests that Bardesanes attributed to the human being a body, a soul and a spirit, and that the soul—clearly understood here as the animate soul, not as intellectual soul—does not possess knowledge, which belongs only to the spirit, i.e., the intellect or logos, the rational or intellectual soul, which is the divine component in the human being. "The logos, they say, is the unknown leaven hidden in the soul, which is deprived of knowledge and is extraneous both to the body and to the logos. If this be the case, the body cannot adhere to the soul, nor can the soul adhere to the logos, which is divine." It is again Ephrem who attests that Bardesanes thought that, just as Adam introduced spiritual death, in addition to physical, so Christ has made it again possible to have access to salvation, which was previously prevented by Adam's sin. The death of our present, corruptible body, in that it paves the way to its restoration to the perfect, incorruptible body, was defined by Bardesanes as "an advantage," as attested by Ephrem in Carmina Nisibena 51: Bardesanes "called the damage produced by the serpent 'an advantage.'" It is evident that the damage produced by the serpent can be considered to be "an advantage" only if one understands it as physical death, certainly not as spiritual death, which can by no means be deemed a benefit.

This confirms that, according to Bardesanes, the original sin caused, not only spiritual death, but also physical death. This gives the lie to Ephrem's assertion that in Bardesanes's opinion Adam's sin produced only spiritual death, not physical death; that, even without this sin, the human body would have been corruptible and with no hope for resurrection, and that the life brought about by Christ is exclusively spiritual life, the salvation of the soul, and not also the resurrection of the bodies. Such an idea is not confirmed by any fragment of Bardesanes: none contains an explicit denial of the resurrection. I rather suspect that Bardesanes, like Origen, understood the death caused by Adam and the life brought about by Christ on both planes: (1) the death and the resurrection of the body; (2) the death of the soul, spiritual death, sin, and spiritual life, i.e., salvation.

My suggestion seems to me to be further supported by Beck's investigation (E. Beck, Bardaisan und seine Schule bei Ephräm, Le Muséon 91 [1978] 271-333: 300-307) into the gradation that, according to Bardesanes, leads from a heavy and corruptible corporeality to a lighter and lighter one, typical of the spiritual elements. The spiritual body is fine, light and incorruptible; it characterized human nature before the fall and will characterize it again in the resurrection, which Origen maintains as well. That Bardesanes conceived of an incorruptible body, different from the heavy, corruptible and mortal body of present human life, is proved with certainty by a fragment from his De India, quoted by Porphyry, in which the cosmic Adam-Christ is characterized by a living but incorruptible body, material but of a different matter from those constituting this world: it seems to be the incorruptible body of the origin, before the fall, and of the resurrection, presumably composed by pure elements without commixture of darkness.

Our present, corruptible body, instead, just like the whole of the present world, according to Bardesanes is constituted not only by pure elements, but also by some particles of darkness, which is pure negativity and a symbol of evil. However, our present body is far from being entirely composed by the "nature of evil" mentioned by Ephrem (Prose Refutations I, p. 147, 18ff.). After death, our body returns to "dust" (ibid., II, p. 143, 1-24), but this is perfectly consistent with the Bible. Bardesanes does not deem our body evil as though he were a *Manichean (although Ephrem tends to assimilate him to a Manichean): evil is the fruit of a choice of our free will, as for Origen. The body per se is neither evil nor good; its death is not a punishment for it being evil, nor a sign of its evil nature.

In Prose Refutations (II p. 153) Ephrem accuses Bardesanes of evacuating both Adam's sin and Christ's work, in that neither of them brings, respectively, the death and resurrection of the body. Now, according to Bardesanes what depends on Adam is first of all—but not necessarily exclusively—the spiritual death that comes from sin, and what depends on Christ is spiritual resurrection and eternal salvation, as is clear from the following fragment coming from a section of Prose Refutations (II, 143-169) generally known as Against Bardesanes: "According to Bardesanes, the death initiated by Adam was an impediment to souls, in that they were impeded in the place where they had to cross, because Adam's sin impeded them. And the life—he says—that our Lord has brought about consists in the fact that he taught the Truth and was lifted up, and had them cross over and enter the kingdom. Thus—he says—our Lord taught us that 'Whoever observes my word will not taste death forever,' because—he says—his/her soul is not impeded when it crosses in the crossing place, unlike the old impediment by which the souls were impeded before the coming of our Savior." Bardesanes here intends "life" and "death" in a spiritual sense, just like Origen and Gregory of Nyssa.

Now, this does not entail that Origen or Gregory denied the resurrection of the body (the latter even devoted his De Anima et Resurrectione in support of it), and this per se does not mean that Bardesanes denied it either. The notion that Adam caused spiritual death and Christ brought spiritual life does not imply the denial of the resurrection of the body. What is clear is that for Bardesanes, just as for many other Fathers, the worse death is the death of sin, and what Christ has brought is first of all spiritual life. The fragment in Prose Refutations II, 164, 18-26, "death is sin," precisely corresponds to the main and most serious meaning of "death" indicated by Origen in Dialogus cum Heraclide 25ff.: this is the only death in respect to which our soul is mortal. In Comm. in Io. 20.25.221 Origen observes that "Adam and Eve died the very same day in which they transgressed, and they were killed by no other than the devil, who kills the human beings." This is not physical, but spiritual death, and yet Origen did not deny that Adam introduced also the death of the body, and that there the resurrection of all bodies will occur. Neither did Bardesanes necessarily deny this.

Ephrem, who in the 4th c., as I have mentioned, polemicized with Bardesanes in his Hymni contra Haereses and Prose Refutations, emphasized Christ's victory over death, Sheol and the devil. He thus situates himself within an important Christian tradition that meditated upon Christ's descensus ad inferos (= sheol) after his death and before his resurrection and upon the universally salvific meaning of this event, which assumes an esp. important weight in both Origen's thought and Gregory of Nyssa's De tridui spatio. Now, just as in Gregory, in Ephrem, the emptying of sheol immediately takes on an eschatological meaning as well: it is the announcement of the universal resurrection of all the dead. For this descensus takes place in a sacred place and time; therefore, it does not belong to a specific historical moment, but has its fulfillment only in the telos. That sheol, which is the place of death, will be completely emptied in the end, is grounded in the unity of the whole of humanity, realized in Christ and deeply felt also by Gregory of Nyssa.

Ephrem says that it is impossible to repent when one is in sheol (Carm. Nis. 3,16), but not after the resurrection, if one is in hell (gehenna). According to Ephrem, those who will surely remain forever in hell will be death itself, sheol, satan and sin, which will lose every power. In Carm. Nis. 59,8-9 the prosopopoea of death foretells to Satan that "Hell will probably be emptied thanks to mercy, and you will remain there alone with your servants." Similarly Ephrem says that some will enter Paradise because they deserve it and some thanks to mercy (Carm. Nis. 35,1-5; 39,7; Hymni de Paradiso 5,12-14; 10,14-15; 9,3-6). Ephrem often celebrates Christ's victory not only over physical death (sheol), but also over spiritual death (hell, gehenna), Satan and sin (see Hymns on Unleavened Bread 4,1-19; 3; 52; Hymni de Nativitate, 26,9). In Hymni de Nativitate 3,18 Ephrem proclaims that Christ "has killed death through his own death" and says that Christ's benefits "have emptied the left side." Ephrem declares that Jesus has killed "our enemy" (ibid. ,18,27) and Satan (Hymni de verginitate 14,11-13; Hymni de fide 38,7); "mortal sin has been put to death" by him (De Domino 21). Christ's descensus ad inferos upon his death is indeed crucial to several Fathers' reflection.

*Methodius, who follows Origen in many respects, in Symp. 9,2 claims that God, without being responsible for death—since the cause of death is sin, not God—has given physical death to humanity as a providential gift, so that human beings could not sin forever, and thus should not risk being punished forever ("that the human being might not sin forever and might not be liable to an eternity of condemnation"). Therefore, the very possibility of an eternal punishment is excluded, according to Methodius—and surely in line with Origen—thanks to God's providential gift of physical death. A similar idea is found in Ephrem's Commentary on Genesis 3, where Ephrem interprets the exile of Adam and Eve from Eden after their sin, and thence the introduction of physical death, as a sign of God's mercy, in that God wanted to make their suffering only temporary, not eternal. It is God's providence that decided to give physical death to humanity after the fall, in order to shorten human tribulation in the present condition of decay and illness.

Gregory of Nyssa maintains that death entered the world as a consequence of sin; it was not created by God. A biblical basis for this conception is obviously found in Wisd 1:13, "The Lord did not create death," and 2:24: "Death entered the world because of the devil's envy." Indeed Gregory ascribes a good deal of responsibility for the fall directly to the devil's deception, which tends to merge with the deception of the senses. So, he states that the original sin was a wrong judgment due to the deceit of the senses (Or. cat. 21,4-5). This sin, however, was also facilitated by a lack of love for God. The "skin tunics" (Gen 3:21) represent the present condition of mortality and liability to passions, which associates humans with irrational animals. The identification of the skin tunics with death is particularly clear in Or. cat. 8: after the fall, God takes off from the human beings the garments of their original happiness, i.e., immortality, confidence (parrēsia), and apatheia, and puts death on them. Since the skin, once it is separated from the animal, is dead, God, in covering the human beings with skin tunics, covers them with death, which is proper to irrational animals. Gregory emphasizes that this garment, i.e., death and mortality (νεκρώτης), remained something alien and external (ἔξωθεν) to the human being. Precisely because death is fundamentally alien to humanity—since it is not a creature of God—Gregory can explain Christ's victory over death as extending to the whole of humanity (Or. cat. 26): by means of his own death, Jesus Christ destroyed the power of death in the same way that light dispels darkness. Christ, who is Life, approached death in order to utterly destroy it, just as fire purifies gold by eliminating all that is alien to it.

Gregory's interpretation clearly derives from Origen. Unlike Philo (Quaest. in Gen. 1.53; Iren. AH 1.5.5) and the Valentinians (Tert. Adv. Val. 24), and contrary to certain accusations brought against him, Origen did not identify the skin tunics with the body tout court. Already *Clement had warned that such an identification, endorsed by the *Encratite Cassian, was incorrect (Strom. 3,14). Origen held that the skin tunics conceal a mystery that is deeper than that of the fall of the soul according to Plato (C. Cels. 4,40). *Procopius of Gaza (Comm. in Gen. PG 87/1.221A) likely attests to Origen's interpretation of the skin tunics: these are not the body, since the human being in paradise already had a body, fine (λεπτομερές) and luminous (αὐγοειδές) and immortal, but these are the mortal and heavy corporeality that was given to the anthrōpos after the sin. But after death, at the resurrection, all humans will recover immortality. An important confirmation to Procopius's attestation is provided, to my mind, by his quasi-contemporary Simon Gobar (ap. Phot. Bibl. cod. 232,287b-291b), who knew Origen and his admirers very well and often reports his thought. Concerning the skin tunics, he too reports their identification with mortality and heavy corporeality and liability to passions, which arrived after the fall, but which we shall lose at the resurrection (ὅπερ καὶ ἀποτιθέμεθα ἐν τῇ ἀναστάσει, 288a). The key term αὐγοειδές is used here, too, which confirms the identity of source with Procopius.

Gregory stresses that the skin tunics are not the body, but "a fleshly mentality" (De virg. 12-13). The skin tunics are "the dead and earthly kind of vision." (Vit. Moys. GNO 7/1,39-40). Thus, they are directly linked to death. And in De mort. (GNO 9,55-62) Gregory explains that God inflicted death upon the human being after the fall as a good: through the experience of evil (πεῖρα), the human being would discover that it is finite and, since it is foreign to our nature, it cannot endure forever. The resurrected body will take off the skin tunics when it will be transformed at the resurrection, and death and fire have purified it from mortality and passions and all the scoriae (dross) of the present life, which are totally extraneous to life in the next world: "The body will be transformed when it is created again at the resurrection into something more divine: death will have purified it [θανάτου ἀποκαθάραντος] from all that is useless and superfluous to the enjoyment of the future life. After purification in fire, it will take off all that is earthly and useless, what the experts call scoriae . . . now the nature of our body has many qualities that are scoriae, which have some usefulness for the present life, but will be completely useless and alien to the blessedness we hope for."

Now, the very same idea of the deposition of the skin tunics at the resurrection was already set forth by Origen, as I have shown. Even the selfsame verb is used by Origen and by Gregory for this action of "taking off": ἀποτίθημι. Death, Gregory maintains, is a good thing, because it destroys all that is superfluous to the next, blessed life: "What happens to iron in fire, when the fusion destroys what is useless, will also happen when all that is superfluous will be destroyed through dissolution in death [διὰ τῆς ἐν τῇ νεκρότητι λύσεως], and our body will be set right through death [διὰ τοῦ θανάτου κατορθοῦται]." Physical death is thus presented in a positive and providential light. For it will free us from all passions and will direct our desires to what is really worthy of them: "Dross will disappear, those things to which the impulses of our desires are now directed: pleasures, riches, love for glory, power, anger, haughtiness, and the like. Thus, our impulse, once liberated and purified from all this, will turn in its activity only to what is worth desiring and loving: it will not altogether extinguish our natural impulses toward those objects, but will transform them in view of the immaterial participation in the true blessings." Death is good because it destroys our present body, our "earthly house," to give us our new house, not made by human hands but by God, for the other world: "It is the purified body that we should love, not the scoriae that have been taken off. For what divine Scripture says is true: after the destruction of our earthly house, then we shall find the building made by God for us: a house not made by human hands, in the next world, in heaven, worthy of being itself the home of God in Spirit." All the properties of our body will be transformed into something "more divine." So too, Gregory foresees the deposition of the skin tunics, these dead tunics taken from animals and symbolizing death (De an. 148-149).

That death does not come from God, but derives from sin, and that Christ's sacrifice was intended to liberate from death the whole of humanity is highlighted by *Faustus of Riez (or, of Lérins) in his De gratia and commenting on Paul's letter to the Romans (in particular, Paul's sentence stipendium peccati mors). Faustus polemicizes against predestinationism and insists that God's grace is not reserved to some predestined human beings, but the effects of Christ's victory over death is for all.

L.F. Mateo-Seco, La teología de la muerte en la Oratio catechetica magna de Gregorio de Nisa, Scripta Theologica 1 (1969) 453-473; I. Ramelli, *La Chiesa di Roma e la cultura pagana: echi cristiani nell'Hercules Oetaeus?*, RSCI 52 (1998) 11-31; Osservazioni sul concetto di "giorno natalizio" nel mondo greco e romano e sull'espressione di Seneca dies aeterni natalis, 'Ilu 6 (2001) 169-181; T. Buchan, Blessed Is He Who Has Brought Adam from Sheol, Piscataway, NJ 2004; M.L. Annecchino, Stipendium peccati mors, Auctores Nostri 4 (2006) 195-209; I. Ramelli, La colpa antecedente come ermeneutica del male in sede storico-religiosa e nei testi biblici, Ricerche Storico-Bibliche 19 (2007) 11-64; Id., Gregorio di Nissa Sull'anima e la resurrezione, Milan 2007; E. Wassermann, The Death of the Soul in Romans 7, JBL 126 (2007) 793-816; I. Ramelli - D. Konstan, Terms for Eternity, Piscataway 2007; Origen's Exegesis of Jeremiah: Resurrection Announced Throughout the Bible and Its Twofold Conception, Augustinianum 48 (2008) 59-78; Philosophical Allegoresis of Scripture in Philo and Its Legacy in Gregory of Nyssa, Studia Philonica Annual 20 (2008); 1 Cor 15:24-26: Submission of Enemies and Annihilation of Evil and Death: A Case for a New Translation and a History of Interpretation, SMSR 74,2 (2008) 241-258; A. Lund-Jacobsen, Gen 1-3 as Source for the Anthropology of Origen, VChr 2 (2008) 213-232: 215; I. Ramelli, La centralità del mistero di Cristo nell'escatologia di s. Efrem, Augustinianum 49,2 (2009).

I. Ramelli

DECALOGUE. Code given by God to Moses on Sinai (Ex 19:1ff.) at the moment when the second covenant was established, a summary of the Mosaic Law. We know two versions: Ex 20:1-17 and Dt 5:6-21, both of which go back to a probably shorter original. Jewish tradition considers it a jewel of ten pearls in which the Torah is summed up, and that it was already observed by the patriarchs. Its daily recital in the Temple was later prohibited, so as not to endorse the heresy that only the Decalogue was revealed by God at Sinai. In some communities it is read at Pentecost, a feast which, according to a postbiblical tradition, commemorated the Sinaitic theophany.

From the beginning, the church gave the Decalogue a special place in catechesis, as a privileged and universally valid expression of the divine will. For the Fathers it was the focus of Christian moral purity, in contrast to the grossness of polytheism (which at times was atheistic) and pagan moral dissoluteness; the permanent elements of Jewish Law are still based on it. The Decalogue contains the basic requirements of natural morality, and was written in the human heart before being written in stone. To the stages of salvation history (creation, old covenant, new covenant) corresponds a progressive revelation of the divine will: natural law, old law (in which the Decalogue occupies a special place), new law. The latter neither abrogates nor contradicts the first two, but assumes and completes them: the Decalogue came to be considered an anticipation of the law of Christ. The prologue of the Decalogue was rewritten to place it at creation rather than at the exodus, thus extending its validity to all people.

J.J. Stamm, Der Dekalog im Lichte der neueren Forschung, Bern [2]1962: Eng. tr. with additions by M.E. Andrew, The Ten Commandments in Recent Research, Studies in Biblical Theology, 2nd series, 2, 1967; G. Bourgeault, Décalogue et morale chrétienne, Enquête patristique sur l'utilisation de l'interprétation chrétiennes du décalogue de c. 60 à c. 220, Paris 1971; B. Reicke, Die Zehn Worte in Geschichte und Gegenwart, Tübingen 1973; H. Schüngel-Straumann, Der Dekalog – Gottes Gebote, Stuttgart 1973, It. ed. F. Montagnini (ed.), Decalogo e comandamenti di Dio, Brescia 1977; J. Schreiner, I Dieci Comandamenti nella vita del popolo di Dio, Brescia 1991; R.M. Grant, The Decalogue in Early Christianity, in E. Ferguson (ed.), Christian Life, New York 1993, 1-17; A. Orbe, Estudios sobre la teología cristiana primitiva, Madrid 1994, 287-322; M. Lluch-Baixauli, El Decálogo en los escritos de S. Agustín: Anuario de Historia de la Iglesia 8 (1999) 125-144.

S. Cavalletti

DECENTIUS of Gubbio (d. after 416). Bishop of Eugubium, known only from the letter sent him by Pope *Innocent I of 19 March 416 (Ep. 25; CPL 1641), responding to some liturgical problems put to him by his Umbrian diocese: (1) When should the kiss of peace occur at *Mass, before (*Gaul) or after the canon (*Rome)? (2) Should the names of those making the offering be read after the preface and before the "collectio post nomina" and the kiss of peace (Gaul) or during the "memento vivorum" of the canon (Rome)? (3) Who should consignare the neophytes, i.e., who should make the sign of the *cross on their forehead with chrism (confirmation), the presbyter (Gaul) or the bishop (Rome)? (4) Should the weekly fast be observed only on Friday as in all the churches outside Rome, or also on Saturday? (5) Should the rite of fermentum (Roman custom by which bread consecrated at the papal Mass was carried to the tituli of Rome, to be used in consecrating wine for parish Masses) be administered only intra muros or also outside of Gubbio (since it was a rural diocese)? (6) Does imposition of hands by a priest or deacon over a possessed baptized person (an exorcism?) require the permission of the bishop? (7) Regarding penitential discipline: the ordinary day for the reconciliation of public penitents is Holy Thursday. (8) Regarding the anointing of the sick (i.e., the faithful, excluding catechumens and penitents), according to Lk 5:14-15: not only the bishop, but also presbyters and laypeople have permission to anoint the sick when sacramental chrism, blessed by the bishop, is used. The letter makes it clear that ca. 416 at Gubbio the Roman *liturgy was exposed to Gallican influences, and that the pope attempted to impose the Roman liturgy in the city; his resolution in pushing for liturgical unity is surprising.

PCBE 2,1, 536-537; G. Malchiodi, La lettera di s. Innocenzo I a Decenzio vescovo di Gubbio, Rome 1921; R. Cabié (éd.), La lettre du pape Innocent I[er] à Décentius de Gubbio (19 mars 416), Louvain 1973; M.F. Connell, Church and Worship in Fifth-Century Rome. The Letter of Innocent I to Decentius of Gubbio, Cambridge 2002.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

DECIUS, emperor (d. 251). Gaius Messius Quintus Traianus Decius, Roman emperor 249–251. Born ca. 200 near *Sirmium in Pannonia, he became one of the most influential senators of his time. In 248 the emperor Philip sent him to the eastern frontier along the Danube, an area he knew well and which was deeply troubled: the usual pressure of the *Goths was increased in 248 by the mutiny of the legions of Moesia and Pannonia. Acclaimed emperor by the army, he attacked and defeated Philip at Verona (249). With him began the series of Illyrican emperors who tried to restore the power of *Rome, torn by military anarchy. Convinced that to achieve this purpose he had to restore the republican and imperial tradition and reinvigorate the old religion, he took various measures, including one that particularly affected Christians. Late in 249 he issued a general edict ordering Roman citizens to participate in a supplicatio, consisting of offerings of incense, libations and consumption of sacrificial meat, to show their loyalty to the dei publici. This was the first general edict in the history of the empire to strike at all Christians (the credibility of a passage in the Historia Augusta [Sparziano, Sept. Sev. 17,1], according to which an earlier general edict of *Septimius Severus had forbidden Jewish and Christian proselytism, is still disputed).

Decius's intention does not seem to have been to make martyrs, but apostates. Many Christians defected, some by performing the required sacrifice in full (sacrificati), some merely burning a few grains of incense (thurificati), others purchased the libellus issued by special commissions (libellatici), and finally others yielded to threats or torture.

Many, on the other hand, held firm to their faith and were killed, among them bishops Fabian of Rome (see Liber Pontificalis, ed. Duchesne, I, 4; Euseb., HE VI, 39,1), Alexander of Jerusalem (see Euseb., HE VI, 39,2-3) and *Babylas of *Antioch (see Euseb., HE VI, 39,4). Even *Origen, arrested at *Caesarea of Palestine where he was teaching, was tortured and later died from the effects. *Cyprian of Carthage, judging it necessary to continue guiding his church, which was undergoing a very difficult period because of the persecution, retired to a safe place from where he maintained contact with his flock. In his treatise on the apostates (De lapsis) he recounts the experience and, while praising the martyrs and confessors who survived the test, does not ignore the problems, including disciplinary, created by Christians who had denied the faith.

After about a year (late 250) the persecution had lost its intensity; by spring 251 it seems to have been spent. In the meantime, Decius had to face a particular threat to Moesia by the Goths and Carpi. Insufficiently supported (or perhaps betrayed) by the regional Roman military commander Trebonianus Gallus (who succeeded him as emperor), Decius was defeated and killed in the swamps of Abrittus, in present-day Dobruja (Romania), in early summer 251.

Despite his efforts to forcefully impose loyalty to the pagan tradition on his subjects (papyri preserve Egyptian libelli from June-July 250 with the prescribed formula of loyalty), Decius's religious policy, in particular toward Christians, did not achieve the hoped-for results and, despite the defections, it seems in a way to have tempered the churches in preparation for the trials of the coming years.

Information on the persecution (and its consequences) in Cyprian, De lapsis 42, PL 4, 465-498; CSEL 3, 1, 235-264; CCL 3, 217-242; Ep., 8, 25, 34, 51, 57, CSEL 3, 2, 485ff.; Eusebius of Caes., HE VI, 39-42; Catalogi Romanorum Pontificum, in L. Duchesne, LP 1, Paris 1886. On the certificates of sacrifice preserved in Egyptian papyri, see A. Biludau, Die ägyptischen Libelli und die Christenverfolgung des Kaisers Decius: RQA, Supplementheft 27, 1931; E. Liesering, Untersuchungen zur Christenverfolgung des Kaisers Decius, Würzburg 1933; A. Alföldi, Zu den Christenverfolgungen in der Mitte des III. Jh.: Klio (1938) 323-348; R. Andreotti, Religione ufficiale e culto dell'imperatore nei "libelli" di Decio. Studi in onore di A. Calderini and R. Paribeni, I, Milan 1956, 369-376; K. Gross, Decius: RAC 3, 611-629; Ch. Saumagne, La persécution à Carthage d'après la correspondance de Saint Cyprien: BSNAF, Paris 1957, 23-42; O. Giordano, I Cristiani nel III secolo. L'editto di Decio, Messina 1966; V. Saxer, Vie liturgique et quotidienne à Carthage vers le milieu du III^e siècle, Vatican City 1969; Ch. Munier, L'Église dans l'Empire romain (II^e-III^e siècle), Paris 1979, 249ff.; R. Ziegler: Festschrift Opelt 1988, 385ff.; L. Robert, Le martyre de Pionios, prêtre de Smyrne, Washington D.C. 1994.

P. Siniscalco

DECRETUM GELASIANUM. A composite document that begins with the title Incipit concilium urbis Romae, sub Damaso papa. De explanatione fidei. Its five chapters, grouped in two parts (1-3; 4-5), deal with the names of Christ and of the Holy Spirit (ch. 1); provide a list of the books of the OT and NT (ch. 2); expound the theme of the primacy of the church of *Rome, followed by those of *Alexandria and *Antioch (ch. 3); give a list of orthodox Fathers whose writings can be recommended and name the three councils of *Nicaea, *Ephesus and *Chalcedon (ch. 4); and finally give a curious list of apocryphal books beginning with the Council of *Rimini, which is condemned for eternity (ch. 5). Known since the 7th c. under the name De libris recipiendis et non recipiendis (from chs. 2 and 4), its dogmatic pretensions may be deduced from the fact that its author passed it off as the work of a 4th-c. Roman synod. Considered authentic, it was copied so often that we now have 36 manuscripts of it. The manuscript tradition reveals the precariousness of its attribution: Pope *Damasus (366–384), Pope *Gelasius (492–496), Pope *Hormisdas (514–523). Its attribution en bloc to Damasus is historically impossible. The two parts which compose the Decretum Gelesianum belong to two different periods and issue from two different mentalities. Chs. 1-3, closely related to one another, reveal the sources of authority, the guarantees of faith, listed in descending order: first Christ, in whom the Holy Spirit is manifested, then Sacred Scripture, then the Roman church followed by the two churches of Alexandria and Antioch, also bearers of old traditions. This organic block probably goes back to the time of Pope Damasus and could be the work of a Roman council datable to 382. It is important for biblical scholars, since it overcomes the distinction between proto- and deuterocanonical books.

The less systematic chs. 4-5 are not the work of an assembly but of an individual, who made a list of the subsidiary authorities of the faith and put together, from memory, a series of names of authors of previous centuries. Since nearly all of the most recent authors are datable, the latest being Peter the monk (died Alexandria ca. 489), and since it ignores the 6th-c. controversies over the *Three Chapters, *Origen and *Faustus of Riez, it was presumably composed in the late 5th or early 6th c., probably in *Gaul. The two parts were combined very soon, perhaps in 519, the year of the reconciliation between Rome and *Byzantium after the schism of *Acacius. The attribution to Gelasius seems to have come about (doubtless in the 7th c.) both because the first part of the Decretum Gelasianum issued from an assembly held by a pope, and because Gelasius in his time had a reputation as a reformer.

Decretum Gelasii: FP 19, 787-794 (chs. 1-3); CPL 1676; PL 59, 157-164, 165-180 (chs. 4-5); E. von Dobschütz, Das Decretum gelasianum de libris recipiendis et non recipiendis im kritischen Text herausgegeben und untersucht (TU 8,3/4), Leipzig 1912, 3-60; H. Leclercq, Gélasien (Décret): DACL VI, Paris 1924, 722-747; G. Bardy, Gélase (Décret de): DBS III, 579-590; A. Kleinhaus, Gelasio I, papa, santo: EC V, 1982-1983; Patrologia III, 263f.; B. Moreton, TRE 12 (1984) 273-276; P. Nautin, Gélase I^er, DHGE 20, 283-294; M. Spinelli, Gelasius I, LTK³ 4, 401-402; Bratož Rajko, Gelasio I, EPapi I, 458-462.

E. Peretto

DEDICATION of CHURCHES

I. Roman ritual - II. Gallican ritual - III. Romano-Germanic ritual - IV. Eastern rites.

The dedication of churches (dedicatio, consecratio ecclesiae) cannot be explained without apologetic and theological recourse to the dedication of the Jewish *temple at *Jerusalem (Num 7; 1 Kgs 8; Ezra 6). We know nothing of rites of dedication during the first three centuries; texts giving information on such rites are from a later period, and project onto the past the customs of their own time. *Eusebius of Caesarea says nothing of them in his passages relating the inauguration of the church of *Tyre in 314 (HE 10,3-4) and of the Anastasis of Jerusalem (or rather, the founding of the Basilica of the the Holy Cross in Jerusalem) in 335 (vita Const. 4,43-47); he speaks only of a particularly solemn *Mass, with preaching by some of the *bishops present. The consecration of a church was everywhere a right reserved to bishops, and we have some homilies given on such occasions: of Gaudentius (Tract. 17), Pseudo-Maximinus (Sermo 87: CCL 23, 355-357),

*Augustine (Sermones 336-338) and Pseudo-Hilary (Dedic. eccl.; CPL 467). Consecration had no relation to the church's name, which could depend on a variety of factors (M. Jost, Die Patrozinien der Kirchen Roms während des ersten Jahrtausends: Hagiographica 8 [2001] 1-34). An inscription often records the dedication, with anniversaries celebrated from the 4th c. (DACL 4, 398-404). Between 350-400 a new element appeared in addition to a Mass: *relics were deposited in newly built churches, first at *Constantinople (Apostoleion) and then in N Italy (Ambr., Ep. 22,1-2).

I. Roman ritual. Still in the 6th c. the first celebration of the *Eucharist was the rite of consecration of the building (Vigil., Epist. ad Profut.: PL 84, 832; Liber Diurnus 9-10; Sacramentarium Gelasianum, n. 703-714; Sacramentarium Veronense, n. 130-133), even if other rites did exist, such as the deposition of relics (Greg. the Great, Dial. 3,30), aspersion with holy water (Greg. the Great, Ep. 11,56; Bede, HE 1,30) and the erection of the cross; these latter rites were enacted esp. when a pagan temple was converted into a Christian church (S. Heid, Vexillum Crucis. Das Kreuz als Religions-, Missions- und Imperialsymbol in der frühen Kirche: RivAC 78 [2002] 191-259). Only representative relics (brandea) were placed in the altar, or the altar was built over a martyr's existing tomb, as, e.g., at St. Peter's or St. Paul's at the time of *Gregory the Great. The Gregorianum Hadrianum (n. 815-822) describes the papal rite in the mid-8th c.—a very simple rite, probably that of Gregory: arrival of the relics, aspersion of the building with holy water, deposition of the relics (in the altar), dressing of the altar, celebration of Mass. The 8th-c. Ordo Romanus 42 agrees with the Roman rite of the 6th-7th c., adding only the anointing of the altar.

II. Gallican ritual. At *Rome the central rite was the deposition of the relics, whereas in *Gaul it was the consecration of the altar. The earliest Gallican dedication ritual is cited in the Angoulême Sacramentary, which describes the rite in use until the late 7th c., before Roman influence (CPL 1905d). The ritual included a litany, aspersion of the building and altar, blessing, anointing and adorning of the altar, procession and deposition of the relics, Mass (*Gregory of Tours, Glor. conf. 20). The Gallican rite is more developed in the Missale Francorum (n. 56-58). Other rites were added in the Carolingian period, including the *Celtic alphabet rite, in the Ordo Romanus 41, and the chants (e.g., ps. 24) attested in the Gelasian Sacramentary.

III. Romano-Germanic ritual. A Roman-Gallican rite (Ordo Romanus 41) and a Roman-suburbicarian rite (Ordo Romanus 42) were in use in the late 8th c. The 9th-c. Ordo ad benedicendam ecclesiam (Eng. tr. Repsher 139-169), which fuses the Gallican and Roman rites, is part of the 10th-c. Romano-Germanic Pontifical, which also contains an explanation of the dedication (Quid significent duodecim candelae; Repsher 171-193). The Sacramentary of Drogo of Metz (13th c.) represents the near-definitive rite of dedication: vigil and arrival of the relics, aspersion of the church from the outside, entrance, writing of the alphabet, aspersion and anointing of the altar and church (12 candles symbolize the apostles), entrance and deposition of the relics, consecration of the liturgical furnishings, celebration of Mass. The ritual in this form, however, included much repetition (e.g., a triple aspersion with water), which has been eliminated by the recent reforms.

IV. Eastern rites. We do not have scientific editions of all the Eastern euchologia, thus only a few rapid notes are possible (DACL 4, 397-398). Anointing of the altar seems to have originated in Syria (ca. 400), passing then to Gaul. The Second Council of Nicaea (787, can. 7) considers the deposition of relics as obligatory for every dedication. According to Goar, the Barberini euchologion (8th c.) provides for a nocturnal vigil, consecration of the altar, censing, aspersions with holy water, deposition of relics, adorning of the altar, Mass. The orthodox rite of dedication is found in Simeon of Thessalonica, De sacro templo (PG 155, 305-361).

F.X. Kraus, Real-Encyklopädie der christlichen Alterthümer 1, Freiburg 1882, 346-348; RAC 3, 643-649; LMA 5, 1186-1188; J. Braun, Der christliche Altar in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung 1, Munich 1924, 663-750; M. Righetti, Manuale di Storia Liturgica 4, Milan [2]1959, 502-523; U. Süßenbach, Christuskult und kaiserliche Baupolitik bei Konstantin, Bonn 1977; M. Black, The Festival of Encaenia Ecclesiae in the Ancient Church with Special Reference to Palestine and Syria: Journal of Ecclesiastical History 5 (1954) 78-85; J. Wilkinson, Jewish Influences on the Early Christian Rite of Jerusalem: Muséon 92 (1979) 347-359; C. Vogel, Medieval Liturgy, Portland 1986, 180-181; J. Schwartz, The Encaenia of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the Temple of Solomon and the Jews: Theologische Zeitschrift 43 (1987) 265-281; A. Palmer - L. Rodley, The Inauguration Anthem of Hagia Sophia in Edessa: Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies 12 (1988) 117-167; M. van Esbroeck, Le discours de Jean Damascène pour la Dédicace de l'Anastasis: OCP 63 (1997) 53-98; B. Repsher, The Rite of Church Dedication in the Early Medieval Era, Lampeter 1998; T.-C. Forneck, Die Feier der Dedicatio ecclesiae im Römischen Ritus, Aachen 1999; A. Angenendt, Geschichte der Religiosität im Mittelalter, Darmstadt 2000, 431-446.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

DEDICATION, Council of the. After the Council of *Tyre (335), the bishops who had met there went, at *Constantine's wish, to *Jerusalem, to celebrate there the feast of the dedication of the basilica of the Holy Sepulchre (or Anastasis) and Constantine's thirtieth year as emperor. Constantine wanted *Arius rehabilitated and peace reestablished in the church. We possess a summary of his letter read to the council: he states that he has interrogated the Arians and attests their orthodoxy—confirmed by a profession of faith—and asks that they be readmitted to ecclesial communion. The bishops obeyed and communicated their decisions by letter to the church of *Alexandria and to all the churches of *Egypt, *Libya and *Pentapolis: once the main source of discord—*Athanasius—had been exiled, the division in the church had to end. Abbot *Anthony wrote to the emperor defending Athanasius, but Constantine was inflexible in applying the council. Arius did not enjoy his triumph, however, dying suddenly before being readmitted to the church of Alexandria.

Athanasius, Synod. 21; Adv. Arian. 84; Ad. Serap. de morte Ari; Socrates, HE I, 33-37; Sozomen, HE 11,29; Theodoret, I, 31; L. Duchesne, Histoire ancienne de l'Église, II, Paris 1910, 184f.; G. Bardy, La reazione eusebiana e lo scisma di Serdica, in Fliche-Martin, III, 1, 139-141; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975, 128-129.

C. Nardi

DEFENSOR

I. Defensor civitatis - II. Defensor ecclesiae.

I. Defensor civitatis (or plebis). Had the office of defending his city and its humiliores from oppressors both public and private (potentiores): ut innocens et quieta rusticitas peculiaris patrocinii beneficio fruatur (CTh 1,29,5). Laws were often not enforced by officials, who profited from their office. In other cases the poorest were oppressed by authorities did not apply laws for their protection (CTh 1,29,5; Augustine, Ep. 22,1 Divjak). Sometimes it was the rulers, imperial officials and heads of cities—in other words the authorities—who burdened the weakest with taxes, exempting the rich. For this reason there were defensores with the necessary function and authority to enforce laws. The defensor was instituted by *Valentinian in 368 for Illyricum as the patronus plebis (CTh 1,29,1, the 364 date is incorrect), in some regions recognizing an office already in existence (OxP 901 del 336). It was thus a western initiative; during the same period the defensor was also created in other territories where it did not already exist (CTh 1,29,4 [378]; 1,29,3 [368, or 370 or 373], sent to the prefect at the praetorium) (other laws CTh 1,29,5; CI 1,55,3; 1,55,8 [21 January 409]; CI 1,55,5 del 385).

The institution did not spread to all regions immediately; in 401 the bishops of *Africa requested a defensor propter afflictionem pauperum (can. 75: CCL 149,202). *Augustine strongly lamented (420): "the reason is clearly in the fact that there are no 'defenders' [defensores] who in some way protect them from the wickedness of the powerful who trample upon them, and who are capable of making them respect the laws in favor of the poor against those who despise them; 'defenders', I repeat, supported by an appropriate social status and elected by their fellow citizens, among whom they enjoy a good reputation, in such a way that they be characterized by honesty and authority. When these are lacking in cities or in their surrounding territories, in vain do we afflict ourselves over the misfortunes to which we could come in relief" (Ep. 22,2 Divjak).

Augustine insisted that the defensor, whether a private person or an official, have sufficient social status (dignitas) to have the authority to oppose the potentes (Ep. 22,2-4 Divjak). Late Antiquity saw frequent changes in the competence and procedure of appointing the defensor civitatis. At first he was appointed by the praetorian prefect, from 387 by the civitas (CTh 1, 29,6) and from 409 by the clergy and notables, and he had to be a Catholic (CI 1,55,8); there were also later changes. Since his powers were modified more than once, eventually becoming a municipal magistrature, we deduce that the performance of the office proved difficult (Cassiodorus, Variae 7,11,2, does not list the clergy for nomination, just the supplicatio civium). The defensor civitatis disappeared in the West, we do not know when; in the East *Justinian attempted to reenergize it (15 November 535), but the institution was linked to municipalities. The expression, however, was also used in a broad sense, for example in the case of a bishop who defended his city against invasion.

II. Defensor ecclesiae. Initially a church lawyer designated by the emperor, functioning as legal representative and defender of the interests of the local church (defensores scholastici: CCL 149,215). The first evidence is found at *Rome: a defensor ecclesiae urbis Romae. *Possidius mentions the defensor ecclesiae in 403 (Vita Aug. 12,5: PL 32, 43), when the church of Calama must have already had one. The first imperial mention of the defensor ecclesiae was by Emperor *Honorius in 407 (CTh 16, 2, 38), who responded a few months later to a specific request of the African bishops of 13 June 407 (Reg. Ecc. Carth., can. 97: CCL 149,215). The imperial provision was valid for Africa, where the institution already existed but was not widespread (regarding Rome, see Zosimus, Ep. 9,3). A letter of Augustine (20 Divjak) mentions that the defensor for Fussala created a diocese in 411–412: being a new diocese perhaps it had need of a legal representative before the civil authorities, who were not protecting the people.

Roman defensores are known mostly from literary sources; inscriptions show that they were also present elsewhere. While at first the defensor ecclesiae was a layman, later he was a cleric who had received the tonsure. The powers and appointment of the defensor ecclesiae also evolved and expanded to the point of his having diplomatic and administrative functions of every kind, helping the bishop in his nonecclesial functions. According to Pope *Pelagius II (d. 590), the duties of the defensor ecclesiae pertained to the causarum cognitio, conventiones, actus, publica litigia, et quaecumque vel ecclesiastica instituta vel supplicantium necessitas poscit (Ep. et dec. 8: PL 72, 745). A Roman defensor could be sent to *Constantinople (CSEL 25,1, 158f.), execute the bishop's directives or participate in the administration of the church's goods.

DACL 4,406-427 (defensor civitatis); NDI² 5,313-316 (defensor civitatis); RAC 3,649-656 (defensor civitatis); B. Biondi, Il diritto romano cristiano, Milan 1952, II, 198-201 (defensor civitatis); EC 4, 1302-1303 (defensor ecclesiae); RAC 3,656-658 (defensor ecclesiae); F. Martroye, Les "defensores Ecclesiae" aux Vᵉ et VIᵉ siècles: RD (1923) 597-622; S. Mochi Onory, Vescovi e città, Bologna 1933, 177ff.; P.L. Zovatto, Il "Defensor ecclesiae" e le iscrizioni musive di Trieste: RSCI 19 (1965) 1-8; L. Pani Ermini, Iscrizioni cristiane inedite di S. Saturno a Cagliari. Contributo allo studio del "defensor ecclesiae" nell'antichità cristiana: RSCI 23 (1969) 1-20; R.M. Frakes, Late Roman Social Justice and the Origin of the Defensor Civitatis: The Classical Journal 89 (1994) 337-349; V. Mannino, Ricerche sul "defensor civitatis," Milan 1984; F. Pergami, Sulla istituzione del Defensor civitatis: SDHI 61 (1995) 413-443; F. Jacques, Le défenseur de cité d'après la lettre 22 de saint Augustin*: REAug 32 (1986) 56-73; R. Barcelona, Fausto di Riez, defensor civitatis et defensor orthodoxiae. Sul ruolo del vescovo in Gallia nel V secolo, in Vescovi e pastori in età teodosiana, II, Rome 1997, 777-802; R.M. Frakes, The Syro-Roman Lawbook and the "Defensor Civitatis": Byzantion 68 (1998) 347-355; Id., Contra potentium iniurias: The Defensor civitatis and Late Roman Justice, Munich 2001; Ph. Blaudeau, Vice mea. Remarques sur les représentations pontificales auprès de l'empereur d'Orient dans la seconde moitié du Vᵉ siècle (452-496): MEFRA 113 (2001) 1058-1123.

A. Di Berardino

DEFENSOR, monk (d. after 700). Monk at Ligugé in Poitou, who compiled ca. 700 the Liber scintillarum, a collection of passages drawn from Scripture and from the Fathers (mostly Latin, some Greek and one Syrian, *Ephrem). The work, frequently copied from the 8th-16th c., is divided into 81 chapters, each with a title—generally the name of a vice or a virtue, which shows the author's purpose of moral teaching and ascetic training. The prologue has two versions, short and long; the long one, which seems authentic, mentions the monastery of Saint-Martin de Ligugé where the monk Defensor developed the collection.

CPL 1302; PL 88, 597-718; CCL 117,1-308; SC 77 and 86; A. Vaccari, Il "liber scintillarum" del monaco Defensor: StudMed 17 (1951) 86-92; H.-M. Rochais, Defensor et les Scintillae. Essai de bibliographie critique: RBen 61 (1951) 63-80; Id., Contribution à l'histoire des florilèges ascétiques du haut moyen âge latin. Le "Liber scintillarum": RBen 63 (1953) 246-291; Id., Defensoriana. Archéologie du "Liber scintillarum": SE 9 (1957) 199-264.

S. Zincone

DELPHINUS of Bordeaux (d. 403/404). The second reliably attested bishop of *Bordeaux (380–403/4), after Orientalis, who was present at the Council of *Arles in 314. Delphinus had great merit as an evangelizer of his own diocese and enjoyed great prestige. A friend of *Phoebadius of Agen, he regularly corresponded with *Ambrose of *Milan, and was considered the spiritual father of *Paulinus of Nola, to whom he administered baptism in 389 and from whom he received five letters (Ep. 10, 14, 19, 20, 35), praising his biblical knowledge. His times were disturbed by the polemic against the heretic *Priscillian and his followers: Delphinus himself participated in two councils, in 380 at *Saragossa and in 384 at *Bordeaux, in which the condemnation of the heretic was discussed. None of his works have reached us. His feast is celebrated 24 December (30 December at Bordeaux); he was considered patron of Aquitaine.

P. Fabre, Essai sur la chronologie de l'œuvre de s. Paulin de Nole, Paris 1948, 57-65; Id., S. Paulin de Nole et l'amitié chrétienne, Paris 1949, 252-261; Vies des SS. 12 (1956) 640-643; DHGE 14 (1960) 185-187 (bibl.); BS 4 (1964) 541-542 (bibl.); E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine, I, Paris, 1964, 310-312; A. Mandouze (ed.), Storia dei santi e della santità cristiana, III, Vescovi e monaci riconosciuti dal popolo (314-604), It. tr., Bergamo 1991, 269.

M. Maritano

DEMETRIAN of Antioch, saint (3rd c.). Saint, feast 10 November, bishop of *Antioch, successor of *Fabius (Euseb., HE VI, 46,4) and father of Bishop *Domnus. Elected in 253, he was deported to Persia with his fellow-citizens by *Shapur I, and continued to serve the deported community as bishop at Gondeshapur. Died ca. 260.

DHGE 14, 194; BS 4, 550f.

E. Prinzivalli

DEMETRIAS (d. 460?), saint, Roman virgin and ascetic (*Rome ca. 398–460 [?]). Daughter of *Anicia Juliana and the consul Olybrius Probus, granddaughter of Anicia Proba Faltonia, Demetrias was a descendant of the gens Anicia, one of the first politically important Roman families to convert to Christianity. Settled with her mother at *Carthage after her father's death and the sack of Rome (410), she came to know *Augustine and *Alypius. In late 413 or early 414, Demetrias renounced an illustrious marriage, consecrating herself to God and receiving the veil from Bishop *Aurelius of Carthage. Due partly to her youth, the event aroused such interest in the Christian community that eminent persons addressed advice and encouragement to her mother and grandmother. Pope *Innocent I (PL 20, 518-519) and Augustine (Ep. 150: CSEL 44, 380-382) wrote congratulatory letters to Juliana and Proba; *Pelagius and *Jerome also wrote. Pelagius sent a letter from *Africa, Ad Demetriadem (PL 30, 15-46; 33, 1099-1120), in fact an instruction manual for the consecrated virgin: written in the style of the court, after the usual compliments it contained advice on temperate ascesis, as well as Pelagius's doctrine of nature and grace. Jerome wrote a treatise, Ad Demetriadem (Ep. 130: CSEL 56, 175-201), from Bethlehem. After the laudatio of the family, he praised the faith and ardor with which the young woman had consecrated herself to God, renouncing the comforts of her social position. Jerome advised her to dedicate fixed hours to prayer and Bible reading, to do penance, to be generous toward the poor, to guard herself from heresies. Pelagius's letter—which circulated anonymously—greatly worried Augustine, who pointed out (Ep. 188: CSEL 57, 119-130) its doctrinal ambiguity: this was the first skirmish of the Pelagian controversy. After returning to Rome, Demetrias received an explicitly anti-Pelagian letter, Ad sacram virginem Demetriadem seu de humilitate tractatus (PL 55, 161-180, among the works of *Leo the Great), generally attributed to *Prosper of Aquitaine. The Liber Pontificalis attests she that had a basilica built in honor of St. Stephen on a property she owned on the via Latina (Duchesne LP I, 238); its ruins and dedicatory inscription were discovered in 1858 (Diehl 1765).

M. Gonsette, Les directeurs spirituels de Démétriade: NRTh 60 (1933) 783-801; G. Bardy, Démétriade: DSp 3, 133-137; K.C. Krabbe, Epistula ad Demetriadem de vera humilitate, PSt 97, Washington D.C. 1965 (Pelagius's work); H.A. Oberman, Werden und Wertung der Reformation, II, Tübingen 1979, 87-88; G. Mariani, Sant'Agostino guida spirituale. Lettere del vescovo di Ippona a Proba, Giuliana e Demetriade, Rome 1982; C. Tibiletti, Moduli stoici in Pelagio. A Demetriade, in Filologia e forme letterarie. Studi offerti a Francesco della Corte, Urbino 1987, 109-119; E. Giannarelli, Demetriade, in Il grande libro dei santi, Cinisello B. 1988, 527-529.

G. Pani

DEMETRIUS MEGALOMARTYR (d. 306?). The saint's name appears on 9 April, as a native of *Sirmium, in Mart. Syr. and Mart. hier., in which he is called a deacon; they do not mention a martyr with this name honored at Thessalonica. After the destruction of Sirmium by *Attila in 441, the saint's cult was probably moved to Thessalonica where, in ca. 510–520, a basilica was built in his honor within the walls over older structures. There was no tomb with relics: a ciborium replaced the presence of the saint's relics. The political situation influenced the growth of his legend: in 535 the seat of the prefecture of Illyricum was moved from Sirmium to Thessalonica. The legend turned the deacon into a soldier and proconsul who suffered under *Maximian (306). In the 7th c., the collection of miracles edited by Archbishop *John of Thessalonica calls him an intercessor and protector of the city against the Avars and Slavs. Demetrius is depicted at *Rome in S. Maria Antiqua; icons frequently depict him as a cavalryman. *Cyril and *Methodius brought his cult to Moravia and Pannonia, the Crusades to the West. The Greeks celebrate Demetrius 26 October; Florus inserts him in his martyrology on 8 October.

BHG 496-547; BHL 2121-2127; BHO 248-251; BS 4, 556-565; LCI 6, 41-45; BBKL 1, 1255-1256; LMA 3, 686-689; E. Lucius, Die Anfänge des Heiligenkults in der christlichen Kirche, Tübingen 1904, 214-228; W. De Grüneisen, Sainte Marie Antique, Rome 1911, 522-523; P. Lemerle, Les plus anciens recueils de miracles de S. Démétrius et la pénétration des Slaves dans les Balkans, 1. Le texte, Paris 1979; C. Bakirtzis, Le culte de Saint Démétrius: Akten des XII. Internationalen Kongresses für Christliche Archäologie, Vatican City - Münster 1995, 58-68; E. Schurr, Die Ikonographie der Heiligen, Dettelbach 1997, 252-263; J.C. Skedros, Saint Demetrios of Thessaloniki. Civic Patron and Divine Protector, 4th-7th Centuries CE, Harrisburg 1999 (with a tr. of BHG 496-497); D. Woods, Thessalonica's Patron. Saint Demetrius or Emeterius?: HTR 93 (2000) 221-234; Ch. Bakirtzis, Pilgrimage to Thessalonike. The Tomb of St. Demetrios: DOP 56 (2002) 175-192.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

DEMETRIUS of Alexandria (d. 232). According to *Eusebius (HE 5, 22), Demetrius was made bishop in the tenth year of *Commodus (189) and governed for 43 years (HE 6, 26), until 232. After *Septimius Severus's persecution, he entrusted the teaching of catechesis to the young *Origen (HE 6, 3), whose self-mutilation he initially approved but later condemned (HE 6, 8). He encouraged Origen's apostolic work (HE 6, 14), but protested when *Alexander of Jerusalem and *Theoctistus of Caesarea allowed him to preach while still a layman, obliging him to return to *Alexandria (HE 6, 19). When Origen, ordained priest during a second journey to *Palestine, returned to Alexandria after disputing with certain heretics in Greece (230–231), Demetrius, offended by this ordination carried out by extraneous bishops, made Origen's mutilation public and held a synod of bishops and priests which obliged the theologian to leave Egypt; with some other bishops, he declared Origen deposed from the priesthood (*Pamphilus according to *Photius, Bibl. 118). *Jerome, at that time still an Origenist (Ep. 33), and Eusebius attribute Demetrius's hostility to jealousy: evidence (e.g., Origen's letter "To the friends of Alexandria") seems to indicate that there may have been doctrinal concerns, as well. Approved by *Rome, Demetrius's sentence was ignored by the bishops of *Palestine, *Syria, *Arabia and *Achaia (Greece), who received Origen, recognizing his priesthood. Demetrius died shortly thereafter. *Coptic sources give him a peasant origin and attribute to him some letters to Pope *Victor and to the bishops of *Antioch and *Jerusalem on the date of *Easter. The events of Demetrius's relationship with Origen find an adequate explanation in the historical context of the passage—precisely the work of the strong-willed Demetrius—from a presbyteral to an episcopal hierarchical structure in the church of Alexandria.

A. Harnack, Die Überlieferung . . . 1893, 330-332.

H. Crouzel

DEMETRIUS of Antioch (pseudo) (6th c.?). *Coptic literary tradition and the Ethiopian tradition dependent on it know a Demetrius, bishop of *Antioch, said to have ordained *John Chrysostom as priest. This Demetrius is named in a Coptic Encomium of St. Victor, attributed to Chrysostom (a patent falsehood). Directly attributed to him are a homily on Christmas (Coptic; ed. Budge, Miscellaneous Coptic Texts), one on Penitence (Coptic; ed. De Vis, Homélies coptes I), Miracula S. Philothei (Coptic, fragmentary) and Miracula S. Victoris (Ethiopic). It is certain that the figure of Demetrius was invented at a later date, when the memory of Chrysostom's true consecrator, *Flavian I of Antioch, had been forgotten in Egypt. The reasons for the invention are unknown.

H. De Vis, Homélies coptes de la Vaticane, Copenhagen 1922-1929, I, 127-197; T. Orlandi, Demetrio di Antiochia e Giovanni Crisostomo: Acme 23 (1970) 175-178; K. Modras, Omelia copta attribuita a Demetrio di Antiochia "Sul Natale e Maria Vergine," Rome 1994; Coptic Encyclopedia 2, 893-894.

T. Orlandi

DEMON. The NT writings often mention Satan (also called the devil), his angels (as distinct from good angels) and demons, following the LXX δαιμόνια and πνεύματα (RAC 9,692). The synoptic gospels and esp. Acts emphasize Jesus' superiority to demons, esp. manifested in exorcisms (RAC 9,693f.); the fourth gospel, on the other hand, does not go into this problem, though it does present the unbelieving Jews as children of the devil (Jn 8:44) and opposes Christ to the prince of this world (Jn 12:31; 14:30). Paul's epistles hardly mention spirits and demons (see 1 Cor 12:3), but reserve an important place for principalities, dominations and powers, characterizing them as wicked beings (1 Cor 15:24, 27; Col 1:15-20; Eph 1:20–2:2) but subjecting them completely to Christ, victorious over them in the parousia and indeed already in the resurrection (cf. RAC 9,695f., with Phil 2:9-11 and other texts). The Apocalypse gives a detailed account of the struggle of Christ and his church against the devil and his angels (cf. DSp 3,150f., with Rev 12). All of this rather ample NT demonology undoubtedly goes back to biblical (see esp. Job 1–2; Zech 3:1f.; Wisd 2:24) and Jewish traditions (esp. the Qumran writings).

Besides its distant Eastern roots, we can certainly detect resemblances to the demonology of the Hellenistic world, distinguished by its religious syncretism but sharing the biblical world's fear and anguish before the many hostile and harmful forces of everyday life. Judeo-Christian and pagan demonologies, however, were separated by a wide gulf, since the former considers demons and evil spirits to be creatures of God who at one point rebelled against the Creator. This biblically based general judgment of Christian demonology is also true of its later developments, which are essentially a continual reinterpretation of the primitive heritage.

Evaluation is more difficult and complex regarding details, however, since from the 2nd c. external influences were undoubtedly greater: this is attested by the very Christian authors who had to oppose pagan opinion on this matter. Thus *Clement of *Alexandria who, discussing biblical doctrines taken up by the Greeks, likens their demons to the angels of the Bible (Strom. VI,3; cf. Paed. III, 2,14); so also *Augustine, who mentions that the negative sense that Scripture always gives to the word demons would also have been accepted by the pagans (cf.

Den Boeft 213f., with Civ. Dei IX,19). It is not easy, however, to define the extent to which patristic demonology was determined in its particular positions by its non-Christian surroundings. If, on the one hand, during the first four centuries theologians in general did not deal systematically with the question and their references are mostly scattered, we should also note that certain pagan authors like *Celsus and *Porphyry were influenced by the Judeo-Christian tradition (RAC 5,53-60). The matter is considerably complicated by the bewildering variety of reference points: evil spirits and Judeo-Christian demons on the one hand, and on the other, the demons (some even considered good), *aeons, ghosts, nature spirits, mediators and souls of certain dead people, of the pagan tradition. We must nonetheless hold firmly to our previous statement that the Jewish matrix of patristic demonology was by far the most important.

None of this puts in doubt—and indeed it confirms—that the devil and demons held an important place in the thought and devotion of the early Christian churches. In fact, Christians attributed every fact and phenomenon that in any way hindered the person's union with God and the submission of the world to Christ to demonic influence, seeing it everywhere. Faced with this demonization of the whole environment—felt to be hostile to faith—they took unceasing pains to discover and combat the nefarious action of demons: in *liturgy, in ascesis, in popular devotions (the sign of the *cross), in prayer, in preaching and even in theology itself.

To better understand the crucial, ongoing confrontation taking place on the theological level as a gradual reinterpretation of the Judeo-Christian heritage, it is helpful to distinguish the fields in which Christian thinkers were concerned with the question of demons. In the first place they took account of it in antipagan apologetic. Faced every day and everywhere with expressions of pagan life, judged as contrary to Christian faith and morals—be it idolatry, entertainments, mythology, superstition, divination—the 2nd-c. apologists tried to work out a demonological explanation; they thus attributed idol-worship to the action of demons who had taken possession of the images erected in honor of the gods, i.e., of certain famous dead men (see so-called euhemerism: RAC 9,740ff.). Similarly, they attributed pagan worship to the intent of demons, who wished to feed on the aroma of sacrifices or receive honors reserved to God alone (RAC 9,742ff.). They likewise condemned myths, magic, divination and other pagan practices as means by which the demons tried to prevent conversion and seduce believers (RAC 9,744-750). At the same time, the Christians of the 2nd c. were forced to defend their own existence against public opinion that accused them of immorality and atheism, and indeed to explain the violent and unjust hostility toward them. In this also, they cited the pernicious action of demons, who had ever stirred up people against the truth, provoking the persecution of the just (RAC 9,755ff.). In the same way, later authors would see the instigation of demons behind heresies, indeed continually stigmatizing the demonic possession of the heretics (RAC 9, 756).

Included in all this antipagan polemic was a more fundamental problem that not only concerned Christians, but was also felt by pagans, i.e., the question of the origin of evil. *Origen was clearly aware of this philosophical knot of demonology when he wrote: "It is impossible to know the origin of evil without knowing the teaching on the devil and his angels, that is, what he was before becoming the devil, as well as the reason why his angels shared his apostasy" (C. Cels. IV, 65). Indeed, against the dualistic tendencies of the times, theologians of the Great Church—the apologists and, more clearly, Origen (C. Cels. IV, 65) and so many other Fathers after him (see the texts in RAC 9,701.721)—stressed that even the devil and demons were creatures of God and that their wickedness was not innate, but due to their own completely free decision. Rejecting the *Manichean positions in which the *gnostic dualism of the 2nd c. survived, Augustine deepened Catholic doctrine on the origin of the devil and demons (HDG 45f.; Den Boeft 214). His position ultimately received official confirmation by the Synod of *Braga (561), which condemned the errors of Spanish *Priscillianism (HDG 57).

The same dualistic climate of the 2nd c. gave rise to a soteriological vision summed up under the title theory of redemption (RAC 9,710ff.; Studer 70-73). *Justin had already emphasized Christ's victory over the demons for mainly apologetic reasons. For him, the struggle between Christ and the demons had already taken place in Jesus' temptation (Dial. 125,2ff.) and passion (Apol. 1,63,10), but continued in the church, esp. in exorcisms, and will only be victoriously concluded at the Lord's parousia (Apol. 1,28,1). This idea of Christ's triumph, taken from the apostolic tradition, found a mythological expression in the theme of the descensus ad inferos, later inserted into the baptismal creed (Studer 68f.). More important, however, was the development that the apostolic doctrine on the victory of the Savior produced in the anti-Marcionite discussion on the justice and goodness of God. Extending the biblical theme of the "ransom for many" (Mk 10:45) in his extremely dualistic perspective, *Marcion himself seems to have claimed that the good God had redeemed human beings, paying his Son's blood in ransom to the demiurge.

In the polemic against his dualism, Christian authors from *Irenaeus on, inspired by the biblical and traditional themes of the demons' ignorance (1 Cor 2:7f.; Ign., Eph. 19,1-3), cancellation of the certificate of debt (Col 2:14f.), ransom and the precious blood of Jesus, elaborated the theory of a just victory of Christ over the devil, stressing both the devil's deception by God and the devil's abusus potestatis, having extended his "just rights" over human beings—his prisoners due to sin—to include the innocent life of Christ, thus losing both the unjustly persecuted Jesus and sinful humanity at one and the same time. This theory, illustrated with many popular details, some even in bad taste, was defended esp. by Origen (Hom. Exod. 6,9) and *Gregory of Nyssa (Or. cat. 22f.), whereas *Gregory of Nazianzus strongly criticized it (Or. 45,22). Nonetheless, by inserting the victorious liberation of humanity, expressed perhaps in a way that owed too much to folklore, into the whole of salvation history, the Fathers opened some truly grandiose perspectives. Thus, following the Pauline antithesis of Adam and Christ, Irenaeus put forward his doctrine of the apokatastasis: having defeated the first Adam, seducing him to disobedience, the devil was defeated by the obedience of the second Adam, Christ (Iren., Adv. haer. 3, 18,7). This historical vision of Christ's redemptive work then became the common heritage of the Fathers, who would never cease, in imitation of the Bible's own relative dualism, to oppose light to darkness, Christ's kingdom to that of Belial—a perspective given its most powerful expression by Augustine in his apologia De civitate Dei.

All of these apologetic, philosophical, soteriological and historical concerns could not fail to have significant repercussions in parenetic literature. Indeed, it was in the ascetical-moral field that Christian demonology reached its widest extension (DSp 3,152-219). Following Jewish traditions, attested most clearly in the Qumran writings, Christian moralists quickly put forward the practical demands of faith, opposing the way of light, over which God's angels were given charge, with that of darkness, dominated by Satan's angels (Barn. 18,1f.; Did. 1,1), or tried to explain the origin of evil in humanity itself by distinguishing two spirits, one good, the other of temptation (cf. the Ps.-Clem.Hom. and Herm. and DSp 3,160-168). Following the same Jewish traditions, also present in the NT writings but reread in the context of Stoic ethics, each vice was ascribed to a particular spirit (see DSp 3,168-174). This doctrine on the vices and their demons attained its most complete synthesis in *Evagrius of Pontus's theory on the eight vices (DSp 3,200f.), later taken up by Byzantine authors (John Damascene, De octo Spir.: PG 95, 80-96) and handed down through *John Cassian's Collationes (7-8) to the medieval West (DSp 3,208f.). Understanding sins and vices as instigated by the nefarious action of demons, the spiritual writers, beginning with Origen (DSp 3,182-189), thus considered the entire life of faith as a temptation, a struggle against demons; they esp. associated the commencement of this struggle with the catechumenate and baptism, exhorting not just catechumens but the whole community to ascesis, fasting and prayer, and insisting on the need to renounce the pompa diaboli (DSp 3,174-182). Likewise they stressed these demands of the Christian life in penitential preaching, esp. during Lent. They also celebrated, esp. in hagiographical writings—largely on the model of *Athanasius's Vita Antonii—the glorious victories gained by monks and saints, like the martyrs before them, over the devil and demons (DSp 3,194-196).

In light of the importance attributed to demons in the life of the church and of the individual believer, one can easily understand why the Christian authors took special care to explain properly the biblical passages most concerning demons and the activities attributed to them, such as the account of the union of the "sons of God" with the "daughters of men" (Gen 6:1-4: origin of the demons), the episode of the witch of Endor (1 Sam 28:7-25: invocation of the dead), the first two chapters of Job (Greg. Gt., Moralia) or the story of the Magi (Mt 2:1-12: astrology).

Rereading, therefore, for various reasons and in ever-changing conditions, the demonology inherited from the Judeo-Christian tradition, early Christian authors asked, more or less systematically, the following questions: in the first place, as we have said, they were interested in the origin of the devil and demons. Faithful to the Bible's fundamental conviction that God created all things, they firmly held that evil spirits were also creatures of the one Creator and that, as he could not create anything evil, their wickedness did not come from God, but solely from their own freedom. Many distinguished the sin of the devil, prince of the apostate angels, from that of his followers, perhaps committed immediately after it (RAC 9,702).

According to Jewish traditions, represented esp. by the book of Enoch but also present in the NT (see Jude 14), the fall of the angels was long understood as a carnal sin whose fruit was the giants and the demons (RAC 9,720f.). But this mythological idea soon gave way to more spiritual explanations, and indeed was explicitly rejected (RAC 9,702f.). Based esp. on Wisd 2:24, the cause was considered to be the devil's envy of Adam, who was seduced so that he would share the unhappiness of the fallen angels (see RAC 9,722f.: on *Lactantius). The doctrine of the pride and rebellion of the devil gradually came to prevail, however, a doctrine esp. defended by Augustine (cf. RAC 9,702f., with En. Ps. 58,11,5). This theological development regarding the fall of the devil and his followers also had secondary consequences. On the one hand, the primitive distinction between fallen angels and demons, favored esp. by Jewish exegesis of Gen 6:1-4, was gradually abandoned—attributing the same characteristics to both groups, they ended up being completely identified (RAC 9,724ff.). On the other hand, by linking the apostasy of the angels with that of the devil, the time of the former event was moved back to the beginning (cf. RAC 9,723f., with Augustine, Gen. lit. XI, 16,21; Civ. Dei XV, 23). Also of considerable interest is the Origenian doctrine that intellectual beings committed more or less grave sins and were consequently condemned to a more or less substantial corporeity, i.e., they became angels, humans or demons (cf. RAC 9,701f., with Princ. 1, 8,2).

A second question of patristic demonology concerned the final destiny of the devil and his angels (RAC 9,758f.): fallen into sin, they were expelled from heaven; their condemnation, however, was not definitive, and their activity continues between heaven and earth. Only at the universal judgment will they suffer "death in immortality" (Tat., Orat. 14), being punished in eternal fire. Origen nonetheless advanced the hypothesis, later contested by anti-Origenists, of a repentance of the devil (Princ. 1,6,3). Until that definitive condemnation, the demons, living in the air, exercise a pernicious power over human beings, indeed over the entire world.

The nature of this nefarious dominion was the third and undoubtedly the most extensive problem of patristic demonology (RAC 5,194-197; 9,734-757). Filling the whole world, or rather dwelling in the lower air between heaven and earth, the devil and his angels do everything they can to separate human beings from God: they cause sickness and natural disasters; they invent noxious arts like magic, astrology and even feminine fashion; they imitate Christian rites and corrupt sound teaching with myths and heresies; they provoke human beings to sin and vice; they esp. threaten newborns, who must therefore be protected by exorcisms and baptism. Their activity, however, is not without limits (RAC 9,756f.): subject always to the divine will, they essentially act in accordance with divine providence; their pernicious actions are even hindered by the good angels. Above all, human freedom, helped by God and the angels, can always resist even the most subtle seductions of the devil and his followers. In particular, demons cannot penetrate the interior of human beings: while they cause bad dreams and disturb anxious souls, they do not know the mysteries of the heart, and their attacks are thus always essentially external.

Finally, in thinking about the origin, condemnation and esp. the present activity of the devil and demons, the Fathers could not avoid considering the question of their nature (RAC 9,728-734). In the elaboration of their demonology, as with their angelology, we see a gradual spiritualization. Like the angels, demons were soon presented as spiritual beings (πνεύματα - spiritus, with negative attributes). According to *Tertullian, however, though not having flesh, they are not immaterial: rather, they are of a very fine substance (Adv. Marc. II,8,2; Carn. 6,9), which no longer possesses the dignity of that of the angels (Latt., Instit. II,14, 1). This opinion endured among the Latins until Augustine (Gen. lit. III, 10,14f.), who, while attributing to demons an "airy" corporeity, hesitated to explain demonic apparitions by means of this corporeity (Trin. III, 1,5); rather, he stressed that demons do not accept material sacrifices, asking instead for the honors and submission due to God (Civ. Dei X, 19; cf. RAC 9,743). Augustine thus prepared a completely spiritual understanding of the demonic nature, though in fact he was not much interested in such questions (Ench. 15,59).

The spiritualization went much further, however, among the Greeks (RAC 9,703f.), who, assuming the angelic origin of demons, stressed their immateriality. In the 4th c. they explicitly denied that demons had a body that needed feeding. As with angelic corporeity, that of demons was understood to be something relative, i.e., more subtle than the human body; nevertheless, the nature of demons was not equated with that of angels. While Origen had admitted a twofold difference between angels and demons, both in nature and character (προαίρεσις; Orig., C. Cels. III, 37), later one sees a difference only in character (ps.-Athan., Quaest. ad Ant. 7: PG 28, 604A). The visibility and mobility of demons was determined in a way consistent with the opinion of a more or less fine corporeity: they were normally invisible, but could make themselves seen by means of their own body or that of another. They are also very fast, moving on wings throughout the whole earth. Because of their mobility, but also because of their wider experience, they exceed human beings in knowledge, more easily guessing even thoughts (Aug., Div. daem. 3,7; 5,9). Their knowledge of the mysteries of salvation, however, is very small: in particular, they have not understood the profound significance of the Lord's incarnation and cross.

In conclusion, it can be said that the existence and activity of the devil and demons played a very important role not only in the popular beliefs and devotions of the early church (see also RAC 9,761-797), but also in the theology of the Fathers. Significantly conditioned by the cosmological and anthropological vision of the times, patristic demonology presents many difficulties for the modern mentality. An understanding of it should be sought, however, not just to enter into the mentality of the early Christian authors, but also to be able to deduce from it that lesson on the origin and gravity of evil without which we cannot completely appreciate the saving work of Jesus Christ, the central point of Christian faith.

S. Lyonnet et al., Démon: DSp 3, 141-238 (bibl.); J. Michl et al., Engel: RAC 5, 53-322 (bibl.); C. Colpe et al., Geister: RAC 9, 546-797 (bibl.); H. Wey, Die Funktionen der bösen Geister bei den griechischen Apologeten des 2. Jahrhunderts nach Christus, Winterthur 1957; J. Daniélou, Théologie du Judéo-Christianisme, Tournai 1958 (It. tr. Bologna 1974); J. Daniélou, Message évangélique et culture hellénistique aux IIe et IIIe siècles, Tournai 1961 (It. tr. Bologna 1976); G. Tavard, Die Engel: HDG II/2b, Freiburg 1968 (bibl.); J. Daniélou, Les origines du christianisme latin, Paris 1978; B. Studer, Die Soteriologie der Kirchenväter: HDG III/2a, Freiburg 1978; G. Tavard, Dämonen V/1: Alte Kirche: TRE 8 (1981) 286-291; L. Scheffczyk, Dämon IV: LTK³ 3, 3f.; den Boeft, Daemon(es): AugL II/1-2 (Basel 1996) 213-222; J. Haustein, Dämonen, IV. Kirchengeschichtliche, Geister: RGG⁴ 2, 537ff.

B. Studer

DEMOPHILUS of Constantinople (d. 387). Of a good family and a moderate *Arian, as bishop of Beroea (Thrace) he was part of an eastern delegation that presented the Ekthesis makrostichos to Constans at *Milan in 345. In 351 he participated at the Council of *Sirmium which deposed *Photinus; his presence in 359 at *Rimini is uncertain. In 356–357 Pope *Liberius was exiled to Beroea, near him; Demophilus must have had a hand in the pope's decision to comply and subscribe the condemnation of *Athanasius. In 370 *Valens promoted his election to bishop of *Constantinople to succeed the deceased *Eudoxius, who had been bishop of the capital for 11 years. Demophilus, ordained by Arian bishops, supported the emperor's pro-Arian activity in the East, but was also very hostile to radical Arians. In 380 he refused *Theodosius's order to subscribe the Nicene Creed and was forced to abandon his see and return to his native Thrace (Socrates, HE 5,7; Philostorgius, HE 9,10 and 14). In 383 the emperor asked of him a profession of faith as leader of the moderate Arians; it has not reached us (Socrates, HE 5,10: PG 67, 688-693; Sozomen, HE 7,12: PG 67, 1445). Philostorgius (HE 9,14) has him professing a *monophysite *Christology ante litteram. Upon his death Marinus was elected as the Arian bishop, but Dorotheus, then at *Antioch, was later selected (Sozomen, HE 7,14).

Hfl-Lecl 1,918-928; DHGE 14, 212-215; H.C. Brennecke, Studien zur Geschichte der Homöer, Tübingen 1988; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVe siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, passim.

M. Simonetti

DENDRITAE, from the Greek dendron (tree). Eastern Christian ascetics who spent part of their lives in trees (a *Maronite monk at Irenim, near Apamea: ROC 4 [1899] 337-40) or inside their trunks (the monk Adolas, Pratum spirituale 70: PG 87, 2924). It is likely that some of them, like *stylites, built huts among the branches, as did shepherds who lived in places exposed to the danger of wild animals.

DACL IV, 582-583; EC 4, 1430; DIP III, 442; C.P. Charalampidis, The Dendrites in Pre-Christian and Christian Historical-Literary Tradition and Iconography, Rome 1995.

T. Špidlík

DEO GRATIAS. Formula of greeting and thanksgiving, and liturgical acclamation, meaning "thanks be to God." The expression was used by St. Paul (1 Cor 15:57; 2 Cor 2:14) and was first taken up by African Christians: the *Scillitan martyrs, upon hearing the proconsul's sentence of condemnation, responded, "Deo gratias." The acclamation reappears in the Passio Perpetuae and the Acts of Martyrdom of *Cyprian. African Christians used it as a baptismal name and a greeting. St. *Augustine explains its meaning: with this expression one means to thank God upon meeting another Christian, rejoicing that they both live in Christ (En. Ps. 132,6). Catholics joined the Deo laudes to the Deo gratias in acclamations and inscriptions: the former expression became a mark of the *Donatists, more feared than the war trumpet or the lion's roar (Augustine, Contra litt. Petil. II, 65,146; 84,186, and En. Ps. 132,6). Deo gratias is also an acclamation of joy and glory to God for miracles (Aug., Civ. Dei 22,8) and for the election of bishops (Aug., Ep. 213). It has been preserved in the Regula Benedicti 66 as an expression of welcome to one who knocks at the door. It passed into the Mozarabic liturgy, then the *Ambrosian, Roman and *Gallican: the faithful give thanks to the Lord for what they hear and celebrate. It thus expresses a basic attitude of the Christian, joined to a humble acknowledgment that everything is God's gift.

DACL 4 (1920) 649-659; EC 4 (1950) 1437; M. Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica I, Rome [2]1950, 174; R. Lesage (ed.), Dizionario pratico di liturgia romana, Rome 1956, 144; J.A. Jungmann, Missarum solemnia, Vienna 1962, I, 537-538; AugL 2,294-296.

M. Maritano

DEO LAUDES. *Donatist password, used by *circumcellions as a war cry (vividly described by *Augustine, Ep. 108,5,14 and C. Litteras Petiliani II, 65,146; 84,186), "more feared than a lion's roar" (Enarr. in Ps. 132,6), and contrasted with the Catholic Deo gratias. The Donatist expression is found in fragments of architecture or other inscriptions in stone at ca. 30 sites, esp. N of the Aures mountains and in the olive-producing area S of Theveste, but also in *Mauretania Sitifensis and Tripolitania (Henchir Msuffin). Apart from churches, the motto was inscribed on an olive press at Hr. Gosset (district of Theveste) and on the architrave of a farm and ecclesiastical building at Msuffin, Tripolitania (information: R.C. Goodchild). It was traced on a false stone door-arch in a chapel near Khenchela (illustrated by H. Leclercq, DACL 4, 654, fig. 3710). It was associated with the rite of baptism, as in Deo laudes super aquas (Ps 28:3), Novar[ensia] = Sillègue [CIL VIII, 20482]), with the invocation B(onis) B(ene), Henchir bou Said (Bull. des Antiquaires de France, 1909, 210) and, in the church cemetery of Ain Ghorab (district of Theveste), with the relics of the martyrs (v. L. Leschi, Basilique et cimetière donatiste de Numidie [Ain Ghorab]: Rev. Africaine 78 [1936] 27-43). None of these inscriptions seems to be later than the early 5th c. They confirm the statements of *Optatus, Augustine and others about the strength of the circumcellion movement in *Numidia in the 4th and early 5th c., also showing its close identification with the main nucleus of the Donatist church in that province.

H. Leclercq, Deo Gratias - Deo Laudes: DACL 4, 652-659; Monceaux IV, 439-443; P. Cayerl, Une basilique donatiste de Numidie (Ksar el Kelb): MEFR 51 (1934) 114-142; A. Berthier et al., Les vestiges du Christianisme antique dans la Numidie centrale, Algiers 1942, 77 (Foun el Amba), 103 (Naamane); M. Klöckener, Deo gratias, Deo laudes, in AugL II/1-2, Basel 1996, 294-296.

W.H.C. Frend

DEOGRATIAS (d. 457), bishop of *Carthage. Successor of Quodvultdeus in the see of Carthage from 454–457, his election was obtained from *Genseric by *Valentinian III. He was ordained in the basilica of Faustus, 24 October. He helped prisoners brought from *Rome by the *Vandal king after the sack of 455, making available two basilicas to accommodate them. The see remained vacant for 24 years after his death. In the Cal. Carth. he is included 5 January, in the Mart. rom. 22 March, but neither of these dates is certainly that of his death.

Victor of Vita, Hist. pers. Afr. 1,8; LTK 3, 99-100; DHGE 14, 312-313; V. Saxer, Saints anciens d'Afrique du Nord, Vatican City 1979, 187-189; PCBE 1, 271-273; J.- L. Maier, L'épiscopat de l'Afrique romaine vandale et byzantine, Bibliotheca Helvetica Romana 11, Rome 1973, 290; A. Isola, I cristiani dell'Africa Vandalica nei "Sermoni" del tempo (429-534), Milan 1990, 1-2; 47; 87; 118.

V. Saxer

DEPOSITIO AD SANCTOS. The earliest example of burying Christians near the tombs of saints could be that of *Maximilian, buried near St. *Cyprian of Carthage in 295. *Ambrose (Exc. Satyr.) explains that the practice protects the dead person from dangers beyond the grave. *Augustine, in his De cura pro mortuis gerenda (ca. 421–422), addressed to *Paulinus of Nola, explains that the proximity to the tombs has value only if it encourages the living to pray more fervently for their dead ones. Christian archaeology offers many examples of the practice.

DACL I, 479-509; V. Saxer, Morts martyrs reliques en Afrique chrétienne aux premiers siècles, Paris 1980, 108, 116, 166, 239; P.A. Fevrier, Le cult des martyrs en Afrique et ses plus anciens monuments, in Corsi di cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina, Faenza 1970, 191-195; Y. Duval, Loca Sanctorum Africae. Le culte des martyrs en Afrique du IV^{e} au VI^{e} siècle, II, Rome 1982, 501-523; Id., Auprès des saints, corps et âme. L'inhumation "ad sanctos "dans la chrétienté d'Orient et d'Occident du III^{e} au VII^{e} siècle, Paris 1988; Id., "Sanctorum sepulcris sociari," in Les fonctions des saints dans le monde occidental (III^{e}-XIII^{e}). Actes du colloque organisé par l'École française de Rome avec le concours de l'Université de Rome "La Sapienza." Rome, 27-29 octobre 1988 (Collection de l'École française de Rome, 149), Rome 1991, 333-351; L'inhumation privilegiée du IV^{e} au VIII^{e} siècle en Occident. Actes du Colloque tenu à Créteil le 16-18 mars 1984, Y. Duval and J.Ch. Picard (eds.), Paris 1986; J.Ch. Picard, Le souvenir des évêques. Sépultures, listes épiscopales et culte des évêques en Italie du Nord des origines au X^{e} siècle (Bibliothèque des Écoles Françaises d'Athènes et de Rome, 268), Rome 1988; G. Mallet - P. Perry, Les tombeaux de saints à l'époque romane; quelques exemples: Cahiers de Saint-Michel de Cuxa 29 (1998) 113-120.

V. Saxer

DEPOSITIO EPISCOPORUM - DEPOSITIO MARTYRUM

I. The Depositiones and the Chronographer - II. The Depositio episcoporum - III. The Depositio martyrum.

I. The Depositiones and the Chronographer. The two Depositiones pose the same problems with respect to origin, date and function; they have the same heortological characteristics and the same destiny. They were incorporated together into the Chronographer of 354 by Furius Dionysius *Philocalus, occupying the third-to-last and penultimate places (parts 11 and 12). Its decorations make this collection of Roman writings a de luxe book in the same class as the Vienna Genesis and the Vatican Virgil. Its date of 354 is given by the consular fasti, the lists of the prefects of *Rome and of the popes, and by the Liberian catalog. Moreover, the two Depositiones are based on a calendar that begins on 25 December, i.e., with the winter solstice. Each item contains three elements: the day of the month (but no year), which could also be the day of their death, a name of a pope or martyr, and their place of burial (depositio). The function of the two documents is clear from their arrangement and from the expression that appears on 14 September: XVIII. kal. octob. (dies natalis) Cypriani Africae, Romae celebratur in (coemeterio) Calisti: their purpose was to regulate the Roman church's official celebration of the anniversaries of the deaths of those whose names they list. The lists reflect an intensification of the veneration of the saints at Rome. Ten years after the Chronographer, Pope *Damasus attended to the so-called historical crypts of the catacombs, and had his epigrams written to Furius Dionysius Philocalus in characteristic calligraphy, called from then on "Philocalian."

II. The Depositio episcoporum. In order, the first bishop of Rome commemorated in the calendar is *Dionysius, 27 December, in the cemetery of *Callistus. The names then follow the order of the calendar, ignoring the year of death until *Eutychianus, 8 December, in the cemetery of Callistus. Then come two names following the normal order, *Mark, 7 October (336), *Julius, 12 April (352). Since the last pope of the original list is *Sylvester (31 December 335), we deduce that the compilation stopped at 336, and that the list was later completed with two new names before finally being closed in 354, as regards the exemplar used by the Chronographer. The Mart. hier. used a different exemplar, updated to the time of *Boniface's episcopate (418–422).

III. The Depositio martyrum. Though we possess no similar elements for dating the second document, it is possible that it was drawn up during the same period as the first. All the items in it follow the order of the calendar and are largely concerned with the martyrs whose feasts are celebrated at Rome or in the immediately surrounding area. There are three papal martyrs: *Fabian (20 January 250), *Sixtus II (6 August 258), *Callistus (14 October 222), who of course are not included in the Depositio episcoporum. Besides *Peter and *Paul, Callistus is the earliest martyr recorded. Curiously, these Roman martyrs are not listed: *Ignatius of *Antioch (ca. 110), Pope *Telesphorus under *Hadrian (Iren., Adv. haer. 3,3,3), *Ptolemy and Lucius under Antoninus Pius (Just., Apol. 2,2), *Justin in 165 (BHG 972z, 973), Apollonius under *Commodus, whose Passio, however, may not be authentic (BHG 149; V. Saxer, Martyrium Apollonii Romani. Analyse structurelle et problèmes d'authenticité: Rend. PARA 55-56 [1982–1984] 265-298; P. Lampe, Die stadtrömischen Christen in den ersten beiden Jahrhunderten, Tübingen [2]1989, 270-277). The item for 29 June 258, regarding the celebrations for Peter in Catacumbas and for Paul in Ostiense Tusco et Basso consulibus (258), cannot concern their martyrdom, but refers to an event pertaining to their cult, on the occasion of *Valerian's persecution. There are 16 Roman martyrs or groups of martyrs, to which others from Porto, Albano and *Africa (*Cyprian, *Perpetua and *Felicity) are added. For the martyrs of *Diocletian's persecution, the consular year is cited (304). Finally there are two nonmartyrial feasts: Christmas, 25 December (theological idea: Christ as the first martyr; his birth as the beginning of the dies natales of the martyrs); the chair of Peter, 22 February (*Cathedra). This document was also used by the compiler of the Mart. hier.

CPL 2028; Duchesne LP 1, 10-12; P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana, Bari [2]1980, 18-20; RAC 19, 1186-1187; H. Stern, Le calendrier de 354, Paris 1953; Ph. Harnoncourt - H. Auf der Maur, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit 2,1, Regensburg 1994, 137-138; R. Aigrain, L'hagiographie, Brussels [2]2000, 14-17 and 404.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

DESCENT into HELL. A doctrine of Jewish Christian origin that entered some formulations of the credo. Commenting on the creed, *Rufinus (ca. 404) interprets Christ's descent into hell as a taking possession of the infernal realms, announcing the good news to the dead who there awaited resurrection (Expos. Symb. 12,15,26). He notes that the phrase was not present in the creeds of the Roman and Eastern churches, unless implicitly in the mention of burial (ibid., 16). From the 7th c. on it spread increasingly, assuming the form of a soteriological act and becoming a proposition of faith, assent to which was required of those returning to the Roman church (see DS, passim). The roots of the doctrine are in the NT, esp. in Peter's Pentecost discourse (Acts 2:24-31) and in Paul (Rom 10:7, cf. Eph 4:9). Whereas other NT passages (Mt 12:40; Lk 23:43) are outside this christological perspective, 1 Pet 3:18-20 seems at least disputable: the phrase "he went and preached to the spirits in prison" may be interpreted as a clear allusion. Leaving aside some textual-critical difficulties, the context (Easter and baptismal) and cosmic vision of Christ's preaching must be emphasized.

The truth that Christ, moved by the Holy Spirit, desires to save all people, even the most perverted of sinners (e.g., those at the time of Noah), is proposed through a mythological and legendary image linked with the cosmic notions of the time, according to which people of earlier generations continued to live a diminished existence in the realm of the dead. Christ appearing in this realm and announcing liberation is a vivid way of saying that salvation is offered to all. In the perspective of Jewish theological categories, according to which those who acted well before the coming of the Messiah waited in Sheol for his descent and their consequent liberation, the picture is limited to the OT righteous. Regarding Christ himself, his soul, still subsistent in the person of the Word, was really present in Sheol (place of the dead); the purpose of this descent-presence, which coincided with his death and ended with his resurrection, was to accord to the just the clear vision of God, the essential element of eternal beatitude and their glorification in heaven with Christ. The Fathers' speculations agree on a fundamental point: Christ preached to the rebellious spirits in Sheol with the intention of converting them, just as he did with human beings. Some of the Fathers foresaw a complete emptying of hell, with the sole exception of the devil (Cyr. Al., Hom. pasch. VII; Greg. Naz., Oratio 45, 24).

Hermas, Shepherd, Parab. XI, 16: PG 2, 995; SC 53,326-328; CPS 16,215, 217; Clement Al., Strom. VI, 6: PG 9, 266-276; GCS 2,453-459; Origen, Contra Celsum II, 43: PG 12, 855; GCS 1,166; SC 132, 382; Irenaeus, Adv. haer. IV 22: PG 7, 1045; SC 100,686; Irenaeus, Epideixis, chs. 56.78 (E. Peretto [ed.], Rome 1981, 150-151, 174-175); SC 62,118-121; 144-145; Gregory Naz., CPG 3010, Oratio 45, 24: PG 36, 557; Cyril Al., CPG 5240, Homilia paschalis VII: PG 77, 552; Rufinus, CPL 196, Expositio Symboli, 14,15,16: PL 21, 352-355; CCL 20,149, 152, 161; P. Callon, Descente du Christ aux enfers: Cath III, 658-661; J. Chaine, Descente du Christ aux enfers: DBS II, 395-431; K.H. Schelkle, Die Petrusbriefe. Der Judasbrief, Freiburg - Basel - Vienna [2]1964, 98-117; W.J. Dalton, Christ's Proclamation to the Spirits, A Study of 1 Peter 3,18–4,6, Rome 1965; J. Capmany, Discesa di Gesù agli inferi: Enc Bibl, Turin 1969, 940-941; U. Vanni, Lettere di Pietro, Giacomo, Giuda, Rome 1974, 59-60; 64-65; J. Daniélou, La Teologia del giudeo-cristianesimo, Bologna 1974, 325, 334; J. Galot, La descente du Christ aux enfers: NRTh 83 (1961) 471-491; K.H. Schelkle, Le lettere di Pietro. La lettera di Giuda (CTNT, XIII/2), Brescia 1981, 180-186; G. Ancona, Discesa agli inferi. Storia e interpretazione di un articolo di fede, Rome 1999; R. Gounelle, La descente du Christ aux enfers, Paris 2000; T. Buchan, Blessed Is He Who Has Brought Adam from Sheol, Georgias Dissertations 13, Piscataway NJ 2004.

E. Peretto

DESCENT into HELL (apocryphal). The doctrine of Christ's descent into hell has its roots in the NT (esp. 1 Pet 3:18-20) and developed during the patristic period: R. Gounelle presents a dossier of patristic texts until 550 (290-424). This tradition found its imaginative expression in the account of the Descent into Hell, part III of the Acts of Pilate (Gospel of Nicodemus) (q.v.). In response to questions put to them by the Jews, Leucius and Carinus—sons of Simeon (Lk 2:25-28), fictitious authors of the five great apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, and among those resurrected during Christ's passion (Mt 27:52-53)—recount as eye witnesses mysteries that took place in Hades after Christ's death; both written accounts are identical, thus confirming their truth as the testimony of two witnesses. The text recounts Christ's descent into hell and his victory over the devil, Hades and *death; Christ leads out of Hades all the OT righteous and *John the Baptist. The account is theological: it shows the victory of light over darkness and the universal redemption accomplished through the mystery of the *cross. Probably of Jewish Christian origin, the Descent into Hell has been perfectly inserted into the Acts of Pilate (a late work), of which it is now an integral part. The text is very picturesque and expressive (the dialogues and monologues are esp. vivid); it was translated or paraphrased in various languages and greatly influenced literature and painting; some of its passages have even been inserted into liturgical texts.

J. Kroll, Gott in Hölle. Der Mythos des Descensuskampfe, Leipzig 1932; B. Bagatti, L'iconografia dell'Anastasis o Discesa agli inferi: Liber Annuus 32 (1982) 239-272; R. Gounelle, Pourquoi, selon l'Evangile de Nicodème, le Christ est descendu aux Enfers, in J.D. Kaestli - D. Marguerat (eds.), Le mystère apocryphe, Geneva 1995, 67-84; Id., La descente du Christ aux Enfers, institutionalisation d'une croyance, Paris 2000; Z. Izydorczyk (ed.), The Medieval "Gospel of Nicodemus," Tempe 1997 (influence of the Gospel of Nicodemus in the culture of various countries).

M. Starowieyski

DESERT. When the anonymous translator of *Athanasius's Vita Antonii wanted to make the concepts of ἠρεμεῖν (49,4) and/or ἀναχωρεῖν (48,1) comprehensible to Latin readers, he had to use more words than the Greek text used. He thus specified that the vere secedere et in silentio esse (49,4) or quiescere (49,3) had as its content attendere sibi e vacare studio deifico (3,2), at the invitation, almost the inspiration, of God (50,1), in order to dirigere animum in conspectu Dei (55,4), without avoiding the needs of the brothers, hermits or simple people who sought out *Anthony or wanted a visit from him. The eremetical ideal spread initially in the East, where the experience of solitary life included ascetics with no rule (Sarabaites, *Encratites), whose way of life was opposed by reforms. In the 4th c. it came to the West where, at *Rome, *Trier and elsewhere, the Vita Antonii was widely circulated in its two Latin versions—*Evagrius's literary version and the earlier anonymous one, which was more popular. According to Athanasius, Anthony was the first hermit to dwell in the desert. Parallel traditions point to *Paul of Thebes (Jerome, Vita Pauli 1,1) and Amun (Vita Antonii 60) as the initiators of the eremitical life. Anchoritic life probably arose simultaneously in different places (K. Heussi, Der Ursprung des Mönchtums, Tübingen 1936, 70,2). Places where monks, *anchorites or *cenobites, gathered were numerous from the start: Lower Egypt (Anthony), Upper Egypt (Pachomius), *Syria, *Palestine, *Cappadocia, *Constantinople, Greece, *Persia, *Ethiopia—through the centuries extending to the whole Christian East. In the West: N Africa, the Iberian peninsula, *Italy, *Gaul, the Celtic lands, with *Jerome, *Columbanus, *Benedict and others.

In every form of Christian monasticism, as indeed in any form of monasticism, including those less ancient—Hindu, Buddhist, Muslim, pre-Columbian American, native African—there are common elements such as voluntary withdrawal from the world, the discipline typical of solitary life, and the renunciation of material goods, family and independence. The desert, as a manifestation of the desire for solitude, is present in all civilizations and in every period of their development, since it is the manifestation of a deep human need, that of seeking a relationship of communion with the Transcendent and a fully human relationship with oneself.

Literary and philosophical elements, OT and NT biblical elements, imitation of Jesus—all were present and came together in the history and development of desert monasticism. The desert became a real place where a certain type of life was practiced, and a spiritual place—an interior sphere in which a specific form of communion with God was sought, an ascetical category common to all spiritual experiences. After the great persecutions, which presented the figure of the true and complete disciple of Christ in the martyr, withdrawal to the desert became the way, accessible to anyone, to become an imitator of Christ and to enter the path of the sequela Christi. The desert thus became the place in which Jesus is imitated (Vita Antonii 47ff.), and the monks were those who, in a Christian social milieu that was no longer as authentic and genuine as during the persecutions of the first centuries, preserved intact the original ideal of the Christian life (C. Morin, L'idéal monastique et la vie chrétienne des premiers jours, Paris [3]1921). *Origen's Ad Martyras shows the transition from the ideal of the martyr trained by *ascesis to the ideal of ascesis as equivalent to *martyrdom.

In the OT, the desert was the place where the Jewish people became aware of God's call and of the way he acted to teach them and make them his people (Lev 26:12; Dt 7:6; 26:18; etc.). It was also the place where God tested the people, and where they consummated their rebellions against him, so that none of those who were in the desert entered the Promised Land (Num 14:22ff.).

In the life of individuals, the experience of the desert prepared the protagonists of the great religious "undertakings": Moses, David, the prophets. In the OT an "idealistic," mystical conception of the desert, linked to the spirituality and mentality of the Exodus and to the eschatology of the Messianic times, coexists with a "realistic," pessimistic conception, not exclusive to the Jews but shared by the neighboring civilizations, for whom the desert was the place that contrasted with cultivated and inhabited lands, and was therefore inhabited by wild beasts and demons: the fitting place for those excluded from human society. The great prophets who received *theophanies in the desert (cf. the theophanies of Moses, Ex 3:1-18, and Elijah, 1 Sam 19:9ff., with Athanasius's Vita Antonii, the first to present Elijah as a model for desert solitaries), *John the Baptist, who preached conversion and penance in the desert (Mt 3:1ff.: Mk 1:1ff.; Lk 3:1ff.), and Jesus, who withdrew to the desert to combat the devil (Mt 4:1ff.; Mk 1:12-13; Lk 4:1ff.), are the anchorites' models. For monks the desert was the place where all these realities were fulfilled, even if different aspects of life in the desert were emphasized at different periods.

Ancient wisdom had offered human beings the experience that two things (otium and solitudo) that brought weariness to most (languorem afferunt) made better men of those with great and wise souls (Cic., De off. 3, 1,1, taken up by Ambr., De off. 3, 1,2, who notes that Moses, not Scipio the African, was the first to experience solus non esse, cum solus esset, nec minus otiosus, cum otiosus esset). *Stoicism invited many to consistere and secum morari, as the primary condition of inner serenity (see Sen., Ep. 2,1; 7,2; 10,1; 56,5; etc.). Plato invited men to ἑαυτῷ, πως προσέχειν τὸν νοῦν (Symp. 174 D 5), withdrawal into oneself and separation from sensible realities (ἐκ τούτων sc. τῶν αἰσθήσεων ἀναχωρεῖν, Phaedo 83 A6). If Dio Chrysostom recognized πολλὴ ἐρημία καὶ ἀναχώρεσις (Λόγοι, ed. von Arnim II 261,32–262,4) as indispensable for paideia and philosophy, Plotinus used and practiced ἀναχωρεῖν as inner refuge (Porph., Vita Plotini 22), as "flight of the alone to the alone" (μόνος πρὸς μόνον).

But it was a Christian use of ἀναχωρεῖν (Vita Antonii 45,1), influenced by Mt 14:13 and Jn 6:15, that oriented "flight from the world" to the giving of oneself to prayer (Orig., In Lc. hom. XI).

In the Hellenistic milieu there developed a romantic desire for solitude (J. Burckhardt, L'età di Costantino, Florence 1957, It. tr., 405ff.), to withdrawal to the desert, where the citizen, tired by the life of the great metropolises, could create an idyllic retreat in which he could lead a life of simple, pure study, far from the schemes of the city, to find or recover inner peace. The desert thus came to be valued as such, losing the sense of something temporary and provisional that it had in Scripture: this is Philo's idea of the desert (De decalogo 2; De vita contemplativa 22-23: a blessed place, privileged because pure). From the 4th c., the literary theme of the desert appears in monastic authors with a certain level of literary culture. *Gregory of Nazianzus (Ep. 4,6) replies to *Basil of Caesarea's enthusiastic description of the desert (Ep. 14) that such enthusiasm is a rhetorical theme. *Jerome's image of the desert (Vita Pauli) was also idyllic, becoming very popular in literature and painting. His Ep. 14 inviting *Heliodorus to the eremitical life, though presenting realistic elements (Ep. 14,1: nudos amat eremus. Nolo te antiquae peregrinationis terreat difficultas), opens into an enthusiastic song—which had a significant impact in the birth and development of the subsequent "idealistic," idyllic ideal of the desert—which exalts the desert, Christi floribus vernans, where the light is clearer, poverty is blessed, toil guarantees victory, faith casts out hunger, and closeness to Christ takes away the discomforts of penance, harshness and squalor, in an eschatological projection of the present life (Ep. 14,10, copied in some points from Cypr., Ep. 76,2ff.).

Alongside this "literary" conception of the desert was a more "realistic" idea of what life in the desert implied, demanded and offered. For the monks of Egypt (almost the "natural" place of the desert), the desert was very real: the place of sterile lands, tombs (as is typical of the Semitic mentality), wild beasts and nomadic bands. The monk went to the desert in response to a "call," whose connotations varied for each individual and which impelled the seeking of solitude (as the name "monk" indicates, see Jerome, Ep. 14,6) so as to more freely live the teaching of the NT (1 Cor 7:25ff.; Mt 10:9-10; Acts 2:44; Rom 14:1-2). The fact that withdrawal to the desert was open to hospitality gives the full, true meaning of the separation, which was not an "alienation" in the modern social-psychological sense, but a separation so as to be able to offer others, with the word of God, a fully human welcome (Reg. Bened. 53,8-9; Vita Antonii 48.57ff. passim). Hospitality was thus a duty and was offered in a climate of faith since, in the guest's visit, the monk was invited to recognize the visitation of God (H. mon. 8,55, ed. Festugière 68, 348ff.; Cass., Conl. 2,26).

Anchorites met for the solemn and common celebration of the *liturgy on Saturdays and Sundays (H. mon. 20, 7, ed. Festugière 120, 38ff.; Cass., Conl. 3,1); at these gatherings they learned whether someone was sick or had died (H. monl. 20, 7, ed. Festugière 121, 40ff.). In the desert the monk met wild beasts and tamed them (Cyr. Scyth., Euthym. 23,4ff.; 118,30–119,14; 138,19–139,11; etc.), and serpents who then defended him against robbers (H. mon. 9,6-7, ed. Festugière 73,33-47; Greg. Gt., Dial. 1,3). But most of all in the desert the monk struggled with the devil, who assumed the most varied appearances and waged a fierce war, without truce, against him. In the desert the monk sought to unify his life, and he thus had to struggle against his thoughts (λογισμοί = demon for *Evagrius, late 4th c.) and memories (the demon was identified with the inner world that tended to separate the person from God); he had to face the struggle of the heart (καρδία—Apopht. Patr. Anton. 11), not so much of unchastity (πορνεία). Through this struggle in the desert, the monk sought hēsychia, God's presence, training for it by what we would call the practice of the presence of God, μνήμη τοῦ θεοῦ.

It is the seeking of God's presence, not escape from the devil's temptations, that the monk sought in withdrawing to the desert. The most dangerous and subtle of the devil's temptations was that of ἀκήδεια, i.e., dissuading the monk from remaining in the desert. By ascesis one could win hēsychia (inner tranquility), through which the anchorite rid his mind of earthly things, to unite it to Christ within the limits allowed by the human condition (Cass., Conl. 19,8). The hermit's solitude was not only an effective means for gaining purity of heart, it was at the same time an inner condition born of purity of heart.

Anachōrēsis, the separation from the world indispensable for escaping the passions, was not motivated by aversion to people (Apopht. Patr. Arsenio 1-2; Climacus maintains it must be done ἀμίσως), but by the fact that interaction with people impedes or destroys hēsychia. While all monks must leave the world and their family, the anchorite also abandons living in company with other monks; indeed, he had to separate himself even from his own body and live as though he were outside it: this was the purpose of fasting, penance, vigils. Hēsychia has various aspects: apatheia, contemplation, purity (absence of earthly concerns, replaced by spiritual concerns such as people's salvation), lack of useless curiosity, simplicity and interior freedom that disposed to contemplation (Cass., Conl. 14,9), union with Christ (Cass., Conl. 10,6).

LTK 10, 1335-1336; J. Guillet, Thème de la marche au désert dans l'Ancien et le Nouveau Testament: RecSR 36 (1949) 161-181; A.J. Festugière, Personal Religion Among the Greeks, Berkeley, CA 1954, 53-67; L. Bouyer, La spiritualité du Nouveau Testament et des Pères, Paris 1960; A.J. Festugière, Les moines d'Orient. I. Culture ou sainteté, Paris 1961, 41-57; J. Leclercq, Eremus et eremita. Pour l'histoire du vocabulaire de la vie solitaire: CollOrdCistRef 25 (1963) 8-30; P. Deseille, L'évangile au désert. Dès premiers moines à S. Bernard, Paris 1965; Id., L'esprit du monachisme pachomien, Bellefontaine 1968; J. Leclercq, Marginalité et accueil: CollCist 33 (1971) 401-405; Id., Évangile et culture dans la tradition bénédictine: NRTh 94 (1972) 171-182; J. Steinmann, Saint John the Baptist and the Desert Tradition, Eng. tr., New York 1958; G.J.M. Bartelink, Les oxymores desertum civitas et desertum floribus vernans: StudMon 15 (1973) 7-15; Var. aus., Les mystiques du désert dans l'Islam, le Judaïsme, et le Christianisme, Sénanque 1974; Var. aus., Askese und Mönchtum in der alten Kirche, Darmstadt 1975; A. Guillaumont, La conception du désert chez les moines d'Égypte: RHR 188 (1975) 3-21; E. Ward, The Desert Myth: Reflections on the Desert Ideal, Kalamazoo, MI 1976, 183-199; S. Bonnet - E. Gouley, Les ermites, Paris 1980; G. Trotta, La via del deserto tra ebraismo e cristianesimo, Brescia 1993; D. Burton Christie, The Word in the Desert. Scripture and the Quest for Holiness in Early Christian Monasticism, Oxford 1993; S.P. Bratton, Christianity, Wilderness and Wildlife. The Original Desert Solitaire, London 1993; M.-E. Brunert, Das Ideal der Wüsten-Askese und seine Rezeption in Gallien bis Ende des 6. Jahrhunderts, Münster 1994; T.L. Burden, The Kerygma of the Wilderness Traditions in the Hebrew Bible, New York 1994; A. Sisti, L'esperienza del deserto nella Bibbia: Euntes docete 51 (1998) 99-125; P. Miquel, Lessico del deserto. Le parole della spiritualità, It. ed. V. Lanzarini (ed.), Bose 1998; M.-M. Davy, Esperienze mistiche in Oriente e in Occidente, It. ed. L. Borriello (ed.), Vatican City 2000; D. Carrer, Wandering, Begging Monks: Spiritual Authority and the Promotion of Monasticism in Late Antiquity, Berkeley, CA 2002 (ample bibl.).

M.G. Bianco

DESIDERIUS of Cahors (d. 650). Desiderius, a member of the Gallo-Roman senatorial aristocracy of Aquitaine, received a classical education at home, and after studying law and rhetoric entered the court of *Chlothar II (d. 629), king of Neustria, where his elder brother, *Rusticus, served as chaplain and archdeacon before being appointed bishop of Cahors. At court Desiderius was the king's treasurer, and succeeded his brother *Syagrius as governor of *Marseille. In 630, shortly after his brother Rusticus's assassination, he was elected bishop by the people of Cahors, where he remained until his death in 650. At Cahors he rebuilt and restored churches and founded the first monastery. During the 22 years of his episcopate he continued his contacts with the royal court and with his friends from his time as Chlothar's treasurer; he corresponded with them regularly, himself preparing a collection of 36 letters, 20 of which were addressed to him. These letters are an extraordinary source of information for the history of the reigns of Chlothar II, Dagobert I (d. 639) and his two sons, Sigebert I (d. 656) and Clovis II (d. 657), as well as for the relations and exchange of communication among important Merovingians.

Some of his letters address problems regarding the episcopal administration of Cahors, others refer to legal proceedings; most, however, were written to cultivate social contacts. Many are addressed to old friends so as to continue to foster amicitia and dulcedo, such as characterized the letters of *Sidonius Apollinaris or *Avitus of Vienne, even if his Latin does not come close to theirs. He does show ability, however, using a lively style with a rich and pleasant literary sensibility. It is unfortunate that his Carolingian biographer did not have more of his letters (BHL 2143; CPL 1304).

CPL 1303; PL 87, 247-266; W. Arndt (ed.), MGH Ep. III, Berlin 1892, 193-214, repr. in CCL 117, Turnhout 1957, 309-342; D. Norberg (ed.), Epistulae Sancti Desiderii, Acta Universitatis Stockholmiensis 6, Uppsala 1961. Fr. tr. (selected): R. Barroux, Dagobert roi des Francs, Paris 1938, 174-175. R. Rey, Un grand bâtisseur au temps du roi Dagobert, S. Didier évêqee de Cahors: Annales du Midi 65 (1953) 287-294; J. Durliat, Les attributions civiles des évêques mérovingiens: l'exemple de Didier, évêque de Cahors (630–655): Annales du Midi 91 (1979) 237-254; PLRE III, 398; P.J. Geary, Before France and Germany. The Creation and Transformation of the Merovingian World, New York - Oxford 1988, 160-162, 165-166; I.N. Wood, The Merovingian Kingdoms 450–751, London 1994, in part. 149-152; Patrologia IV, 348f.; Y. Hen, Culture and Religion in Merovingian Gaul, A.D. 481–751, Leiden 1995.

Y. Hen

DEUS TUORUM MILITUM. The hymn recited at Vespers on the Common of a martyr. It was written by an unknown author between the 5th-6th c. There are two recensions, a shorter one of four strophes (Chevalier, Repertor. hymnolog., no. 4534) and a longer one of eight strophes (ibid., no. 4533). The text of the new breviary gives strophes of both versions, as they are considered particularly beautiful (Lentini, Hymni instaur., 156). The second strophe is the most inspired and comes closest to the meaning and value of martyrdom; the rest resolves into a prayer. It has often been put to music, including by Orlando di Lasso, Monteverdi and Vivaldi. It is also used by other Christian confessions.

U. Chevalier, Repertorium hymnologicum, I, Louvain 1892, nos. 4534 and 4535; A. Lentini, Hymni instaurandi Breviarii romani, Vatican City 1968, 156 (with comm.); Dreves u. Blume, Analecta hymnica Medii Aevi, Leipzig, 51 (1907) 130, nn. 114 a) b); EC 4, 1500-1501; CE 2,822; J. Szövérffy, Die Annalen der latein. Hymnendichtung, I, Berlin 1964, 96; ICL p. 166, n. 76; P.M. Lefferts, The Motet in England in the Fourteenth Century, Ann Arbor, MI 1986, 277.

L. Dattrino

DEUSDEDIT (d. 664). *Bede (Hist. eccl. gent. angl. II, 18) tells how at the death of Justus, once bishop of Hrofescaestir (Rochester) and later archbishop of Doruvernis (*Canterbury), the archbishop of Eboracum (*York) Paulinus elected *Honorius as his successor. The pope of the same name ratified the election by sending the pallium, with a letter (quite valuable for historians) confirming that at the death of one of the archbishops of the two mentioned sees, the other archbishop had the faculty of appointing the successor without having to make the long and arduous trip to *Rome. Still according to Bede (III, 20), however, at Archbishop Honorius's death (30 September 653) the practice, intended to equate the episcopal dignity of the two principal English sees, failed: after 18 months of vacancy, Ithamar, bishop of Hrofescaestir, elected Deusdedit (original *Celtic name: Frithbona) as the 6th archbishop of Canterbury.

We know very little of Deusdedit's life and pastoral activity, but fortunately Bede stressed his Saxon origin—he was a native of Wessex—allowing us to recognize in him the first in a long line of Anglo-Saxon bishops. He was ordained archbishop 26 March 655 and—still according to Bede—ruled his diocese for 9 years, 4 months and 2 days. At Ithamar's death (656), Deusdedit consecrated Damian, a southern Saxon, as his successor on the see of Hrofescaestir; this is Deusdedit's only official act that we are certain of: attribution of the foundation of monasteries to him is unproven. He died on 14 July 664—the same day as Earconbert, king of Kent and son of Eadbald—and was buried in the portico of St. Peter's church near the tomb of the first bishop, St. Augustine. According to circumstantial evidence from Bede (IV, 1), his see remained vacant for a long period, and to correct this dangerous situation Egbert, king of Kent and son of Earconbert, and Oswiu, sovereign of Northumbria, sent the priest Wighard—a highly esteemed English religious thought capable of remedying the precariousness and organizational gaps of the English churches—to Rome for the purpose of having him ordained archbishop by Pope *Vitalian. He died of plague at Rome, however, which gave the pope the opportunity of sending a person of his own choosing to that hard-to-manage country—an outsider not preconditioned by the difficult environment. After a long search, the choice fell to the Cilician monk *Theodore, a native of Tarsus, whose episcopal activity as Deusdedit's successor proved decisive for the radical and definitive reorganization of the churches of England.

Bede, Hist. eccl. gent. angl. III, 20, 28-29 and IV, 1-2; DCB 1, 821-822; DHGE 14, 357; 7, 310; BS 4, 590; LTK 3, 115.

M. Ghilardi

DEVOTION - DEVOTIONS. Here we will examine forms of piety and objects that favored devotion. Little is known of private devotion and its forms in the first Christian centuries. In the presence of paganism, believers carefully avoided anything that could be seen as a pagan remnant. *Tertullian (De oratione 15) reviews some deviations that bordered on superstition, such as removing one's cloak to pray, and takes issue with those who refused the kiss of peace on the pretext of having fasted (18). For him, the Christian life must alternate between respites and vigils, which dispose the faithful to eschatological expectation (29). He also tells us of the custom of taking home the eucharistic bread to nourish personal devotion.

*Cyprian links prayer to the time of the episodes of Christ's passion (De or. dom. 34). This connection reappears in the Traditio Apostolica, which advises those who are tempted to make the sign of the *cross on their forehead and eyes, to cast out the devil with the sign of redemption (Trad. Ap. 42; also see Tertull., De or. 3,4). This sign is even more effective if traced with the *Eucharist (Just., Dial. 40,1; Dölger, AC 3,231-244). The sign of the cross used in baptism recalls both the seal of the elect and membership in Christ. It became a sign of victory, and now plays a considerable role in both piety and Christian art: we find the cross incised on Christian dwellings. Also attested is a tradition of praying, facing east, before death (as with some martyrs, see Didasc. 12 based on Ps 68:34 and Mt 24:27). The posture of the Christian in prayer with arms extended and raised appears frequently in Christian art. The *liturgy exercised a profound influence on popular piety, which it nourished and inspired. On simple potsherds and papyri we find acclamations, doxologies (Faiyum papyrus), the trisagion, maranatha, Kyrie eleison, the beginning of the Gloria, and sometimes a Bible verse or a psalm. In *Coptic areas scholars have found charms or talismans, clear expressions of religious syncretism.

Epitaphs in particular reflect the devotion of the faithful. Prayers are addressed to God, to Christ (e.g., "Jesus, son of God, Alleluia"), to the Holy Spirit; the most solemn invoke the "God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob." The Eucharist is cited as the pledge of resurrection (inscriptions of Abercius, Pectorius: see Hamman, Prières des premiers chrétiens, nos. 132, 133; see also 95,110-131). The stereotyped liturgical formulae, which recur frequently in inscriptions and sometimes in accounting books preserved by papyri, are a prelude to the ejaculatory prayers that *Augustine recommended to Proba (Ep. 130,20) and which nourished monastic piety. *John Climacus had monks simply repeat the name of Jesus (Scala 27).

From the 2nd c. Christians collected relics and objects that had been in contact with martyrs. From the 4th c. esp., we see a marked increase in relics and objects of piety: above all, the holy cross, venerated throughout the world (Cyr. of Jer., Cat. 4,10; 10,19; 13,4). At *Jerusalem, pilgrims had to be watched so they did not remove slivers of the cross with their teeth as they venerated it (Egeria 37,2). *Gregory the Great sent fragments of the true cross with his letters (Ep. 14,12). Also at Jerusalem, pilgrims received oil that had been in contact with the holy cross. *Macrina wore an iron cross over her heart and an iron ring, which is surprising, given that the Council of *Laodicea (can. 36) had prohibited such objects from being made or worn. *Jerome rebuked women who wore small gospels or fragments of the cross (In Mt. comm. IV, 23), as did *Epiphanius (Panarion 15,1). *John Chrysostom preferred to see children wearing a cross rather than an amulet, and knew of the practice of wearing a fragment of the true cross mounted in gold as a necklace (Hom. Quod Christus sit Deus). *Clement attests the custom of incising Christian symbols on signet rings. Christians loved wearing medals with a simple cross or the monogram of Christ or the profile of a saint, with an inscription, e.g., Dominus dat legem. A papyrus has been discovered with an invocation of the blood of Christ (Dölger, AC 5,255-261). A 4th-c. medal preserved at the Vatican Museum has the Virgin showing the Child to the Magi. Some believers had boxes with gospel pericopes inside (Dölger, AC 5,110). The opening of Matthew's gospel has been found on a papyrus at Cairo. The nails of the Crucifix were likewise reproduced, which leads to the theme of images and their cult. The cult of relics was not limited to the cross, but included the martyrs, their remains and everything that touched their remains: clothes, water from pilgrimages preserved in phials (we have many examples), oil from sanctuary lamps, candle wax (esp. from Paschal candles), even soil from Palestine. Hagiography informs us of the spread of this cult, which Augustine himself promoted in his last years. Catacomb graffiti also gives important evidence on worship, devotions and pilgrims.

Articles in DACL: Amulettes, I, 1784-1860; Croix et crucifix, III, 3045-3131; Amulettes chrétiennes (ed. Wessely): PO XVIII, 399-423; AC 3 (1932) 81-116 (Macrina); Art. Devotionalien: RAC 3, 862-871 (bibl.); AC I-V (passim); S. Salaville, Christus in pietate: EphLit 52 (1938) 221-236; B. Kötting, Peregrinatio religiosa, Regensburg 1950; B. Fischer, Le Christ dans les Psaumes. La dévotion aux Psaumes dans l'Église des Martyrs: La MaisonD 27 (1951) 86-113; A. Hamman, Prières des premiers chrétiens, Paris 1952 (It. tr. Milan 1962); M. Simon, Les Saints d'Israël dans la dévotion de l'Église Ancienne: RHPhR 34 (1954) 98-127; J. Hausherr, L'Hésychasme. Étude de spiritualité, Rome 1956; B. Kötting, Le Pèlerinage de Rome et le dévouement à l'Église: Lumen Vitae 13 (1958) 241-248; A. Hamman, La prière, II, Tournai 1959, 270-273 (It., Sp. tr.); J. Hausherr, Noms du Christ et voies d'oraison, Rome 1960; S. Ferrua, Rileggendo i graffiti di S. Sebastiano: La Civiltà Cattolica 116 (1965) 134-141, 428-437; A. Frolow, La relique de la croix, Paris 1961; Id., Les reliques de la vraie croix, Paris 1965; B. Fischer, La prière ecclésiale et familiale dans le christianisme ancien: La MaisonD 116 (1973) 41-58; J.M. McCulloh, The Cult of Relics in the Letters and "Dialogues" of Pope Gregory the Great: A Lexicographical Study: Traditio 32 (1976) 145-184; E.D. Hunt, Holy Land Pilgrimage in the Later Roman Empire AD 312-460, Oxford 1982, 128-154; J.H. Walker, Nouveaux aperçus sur la pratique de la réserve eucharistique et la dévotion à l'eucharistie. L'apport de l'église romaine ancienne: La MaisonD 154 (1983) 167-184; P. Jounel, Le culte des reliques et son influence sur l'art chrétien: La MaisonD 170 (1987) 29-57; A. Hamman, La prière dans l'église ancienne, Berne 1989; Y. de Andía, Prière à Jésus et hésychasme dans l'Église orientale: Christus 39 (1992) 309-324; P. Maraval, L'attitude des Pères du IVe siècle devant les lieux saints et les pèlerinages: Irénikon 65 (1992) 5-23; G.T. Dennis, Popular Religious Attitudes and Practices in Byzantium: POC 43 (1993) 273-294; R.A. Markus, How on Earth Could Places Become Holy? Origins of the Christian Idea of Holy Places: JECS 2 (1994) 257-271; D. Krueger, Writing as Devotion: Hagiographical Composition and the Cult of the Saints in Theodoret of Cyrrhus and Cyril of Scythopolis: ChHist 66 (1997) 709-719; R. MacMullen, Christianity and Paganism in the Fourth to Eighth Centuries, New Haven - London 1997, 103-149; L. Perrone, Christian Holy Places and Pilgrimage in an Age of Dogmatic Conflicts: POC 48 (1998) 5-37; G. Sicari, Reliquie insigni e "corpi santi" a Roma, Rome 1998; C.P. Charalampidis, Representations of Supplicants (orants) in the Iconography of the First Four Centuries of Christianity, in La preghiera nel tardo antico (SEA 66), Rome 1999, 471-476; M.W. Meyer - R. Smith, Ancient Christian Magic, Princeton 1999; J. Michaud, Culte des reliques et épigraphie. L'exemple des dédicaces et des consécrations d'autels, in E. Bozóky - A.M. Helvétius, Les reliques: objets, cultes, symboles, Turnhout 1999, 199-212; M. Wallraff, La preghiera verso oriente alle origini di un uso liturgico, in La preghiera nel tardo antico (SEA 66), Rome 1999, 463-469; F. Bisconti - V. Fiocchi - D. Mazzoleni, Las catacumbas cristianas de Roma, Regensburg 1999, 48-59, 147-180 (It., Eng., Fr., Ger. tr.); B. Beaujard - F. Prévot, Il culto dei santi in Occidente, in Storia del Cristianesimo, III, Le chiese d'Oriente e d'Occidente (432–610), Rome 2002, 968-1009.

A. Hamman - M. Flores Colín

DEXTER, Nummius Aemilianus (2nd half 4th c.). Son of Bishop *Pacian of Barcelona. Proconsul of Asia under *Theodosius from 379–387, he became praetorian prefect under *Honorius (395). *Jerome dedicated his De viribus illustribus to him, after Dexter had persuaded him to compose biographies of the Christian writers on the model of Suetonius. In ch. 132 Jerome mentions the omnimoda historia, written by Dexter, of which we have no trace. The Chronicon Dextri (PL 21, 55-572) is a counterfeit by a 17th-c. Spanish Jesuit.

DCB 1, 823; PLRE I, 151.

G. Pilara

DIACONATE (minor ministries). Doorkeepers, exorcists, acolytes, lectors and subdeacons. Until the reforms of Pope Paul VI they were called minor orders, and were conferred on candidates for the priesthood as phases of the ecclesiastical gradus (Mohlberg, Liber sacramemtorum, 115-116).

In times of persecution, the doorkeeper (lat.: aeditus, ianitor, ostiarius; Gr. πυλωρός) must have acted as a kind of security guard to prevent pagans and ill-wishers from entering Christian meeting places. After the persecutions, he was entrusted with the care and custody of churches and oratories. At the same time he had the duty of keeping order and tranquility during the celebration of the *liturgy, as *Epiphanius attests (Pan. III, 2,21: PG 42, 825). In the Byzantine liturgy, the words for sending away catechumens were probably addressed to him: τὰς θύρας, τὰς θύρας. The doorkeeper had other not strictly liturgical roles: St. *Ambrose entrusted him with the task of enforcing his prohibition of refrigeria in cemeteries, as *Augustine attests in Confessions (6, 2): "Cum ad memorias sanctorum, sicut in Africa solebat, pultis et panem et merum attulisset (Monica), atque ab ostiario prohiberetur."

In the early church until the 3rd c., the exorcist was not necessarily an ordained or instituted minister. Exorcism was a function of any Christian called to cast out the evil spirit from a possessed person (Tertull., Apol. 23). *Cyprian also spoke of exorcism in the sense of casting demons out of persons who were possessed, and described the powers and dramatic effects of demons on the possessed (Ad Demetr. 14). Origen declared that demons are expelled not by magic rites or incantations, but by prayers and abjurations (C. Cels. 6, 4). *Cyril of Jerusalem encouraged his catechumens to receive willingly and devoutly the exorcism he had conferred by breathing on them (Procat. 9). In the cited references, emphasis is more on the office than on the minister himself. The first trace of ordination of exorcists is found in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Mohlberg, Liber sacramentorum, 116, 118).

The acolyte had no clearly defined function in the liturgy of the early church. Pope *Damasus (Epigr. 18: PL 13, 392) speaks of the martyr Tarcisius who carried the *Eucharist to sick members of the community. The tradition remained even after the persecutions, but in a different way: the acolyte brought the fermentum to the titular churches of *Rome on Sundays, as Pope *Innocent writes to Bishop *Decentius of Gubbio (Ep. 25 ad Decentium: PL 20, 556). A later development of the role of acolyte is described by *Isidore in De eccl. off. (I, 2,24), where he writes that acolytes lit the candles and carried them during the reading of the gospel and the offering of the sacrifice or canon of the *Mass. Later sacramentaries such as the Gelasian, the Gregorian and their revisions speak of the ordination of acolytes.

The office of lector may be considered one of the oldest liturgical roles. Since *Justin (I Apol. 67) indicates the lector not by a noun, but a participle—τοῦ ἀναγινώσκοντος—it is clear that he was a well-defined person. All Justin says is that the lector read the memoriae of the apostles or prophets for as long as time permitted, before the homily by the president of the assembly. *Tertullian's De praescr. haer. (41: CCL 1,222) shows that, unlike the heretics, the Catholic church considered the lectorate as a stable office, not to be confused with others: "Itaque," he writes of heretics, "alius hodie episcopus, cras alius: hodie diaconus qui cras lector; hodie presbyter qui cras laicus." *Hippolytus distinguished the ministry of lectors from those of bishop, presbyter and deacon, using the word καθίσταται instead of χειροτιθεῖται of their institution: "The lector is instituted when the bishop consigns him the book; he receives no laying on of hands" (Botte, La Tradition Apostolique, LQF 39,30). In Hippolytus's hierarchy the lector comes after confessors and widows, but before virgins and subdeacons, an order reflecting that of contemporary Egypt. Cyprian began to speak of lectors as clerics: "in ordinationibus clericis . . ." (Ep. 38: CSEL 3,580). The letter speaks of a certain Aurelius whom Cyprian had ordained without consulting the local presbyters and deacons, because of his obvious and outstanding merits. In *Ambrose's time, the lectors at *Milan were almost always young men beginning their ecclesiastical career. In the homily De excessu fratris 61 (CSEL 73,240-241), Ambrose says: "Unde non immerito quantus fuerit, hodie quoque per vocem lectoris parvuli spiritus sanctus expressit." The Cappadocians also speak of the office of the lectorate, which was considered the entry into ecclesiastical service and precluded its holder from secular work such as teaching rhetoric (Greg. Naz., Ep. 11: PG 37, 44).

Indeed, *Gregory of Nazianzus recommended that candidates for higher ecclesiastical office should first pass through the lower grades, like *Basil, who served as lector before becoming a priest and bishop (Orat. 43, 27: LNPF 7, 404-405). *Jerome speaks of lectors as distinct from cantors in the liturgy, and requiring a high level of morality. Regarding the use of vestments for lectors, he advises: "Si lector, si acolythus, si psaltes te sequitur, non ornentur vestibus, sed moribus, nec calamistro crispent comas, sed pudicitiam habitu polliceantur" (Ep. 52: CSEL 54, 423-424). *Africa also had lectors, as we see in Augustine's writings, which allude to young lectors who read from the codices of Scripture chosen by the bishop (Enarr. in Ps. 138,1: CCL 40, 1990; Ep. 29,4: CSEL 33,115-116; De doctr. christ. IV, 6: CCL 32,119-120; Ep. 71,3: CSEL 34,250-251). *Isidore of Seville attests the ministry of lectors in Spain. In De eccl. off. II, 1-4 (PL 83, 777-780) he lists the technical and moral requirements of lectors; he also distinguishes them from cantors and assigns them two tasks: pronuntiare the readings, praedicare populis. If praedicare is to be understood as explanation of the readings, it is unlikely that lectors at Seville were youths (Ep. 1: PL 83, 893-898; see also Libri etym. sive orig. VII, 12).

The subdeacon in the early church did not occupy a higher rank than that of lector. Hippolytus puts him after the lector (Botte, La Tradition Apostolique, LQF 39,32). Only in the 6th c. does the subdeacon assume the role of reading during the liturgy; the change could have been because the lectors who lived in the episcopal schools were only children. In the East, the subdeacon was more important, as appears from the Apos. Con.: he is put after the deacon (VIII, 12,43: ed. Funk 512) and considered as instituted by the apostles (VIII, 46,13: 560). With Paul VI's reform, the office of subdeacon was eliminated in the Latin Church, to give more importance to the role of lector, although the Apos. Con. "Ministeria quaedam" maintains the possibility of calling the acolyte "subdeacon": Nihil tamen obstat, quominus, ex Conferentiae Episcopalis iudicio, Acolythus alicubi etiam Subdiaconus vocari possit (no. IV: AAS 64 [1972] 532).

L.C. Mohlberg, Liber sacramentorum romanae aecclesiae ordinis anni circuli, Rome 1960 ([2]1968); A. Martimort (ed.), L'Église en prière, Tournai 1961 (It. tr. Rome [2]1966), 481-482, 500-503; K. Adloff, Lektor: TRE 20 (1990) 734-736; A. Lameri, La "traditio instrumentorum" e delle insegne dei riti di ordinazione e di istituzione dei ministeri oggi. Studio storico-liturgico, Padua 1995; E. Cattaneo (ed.), Suddiaconi, lettori, accoliti, esorcisti, ostiari, I ministeri nella chiesa antica. Testi patristici dei primi tre secoli, Milan 1997, 169-180.

A. Chupungco

DIACRINOMENI. The term, meaning "hesitant," was applied to those who were undecided over whether to recognize the authority of the Council of *Chalcedon (Timothy of Constantinople, PG 86, 52-56); they were later subdivided into twelve sects. Leontius Scholasticus says that the emperor *Anastasius I belonged to this group (Sect. V, 3: PG 86, 1229). Later the followers of *Severus of *Antioch were also called diacrinomeni, in the sense of the "those who distinguish themselves": they professed the consubstantiality of Christ with the Father as to his divinity, and with human beings as to his humanity, but did not acknowledge the faith of Chalcedon. Their doctrine was expounded to the patriarch of *Constantinople in 535 (Evagr., HE IV, 11).

F. Cocchini

DIADOCHUS of Photice. Bishop of Epirus Vetus (ca. 400–474). Praised by *Victor of Vita as a great pontiff (CSEL 7,2) and cited by *Photius as an anti-*monophysite (Bibl., cod. 231), he has been identified with one of the signers of a letter of Chalcedonian solidarity to the emperor *Leo (Didachus of Phocas, Mansi 7,619). This is the tendency of his Discourse on the Ascension of Our Lord Jesus Christ, which proclaims the glorification in a single divine hypostasis of the Lord's human nature. Its influence was felt not just in the East: Pomerius transmitted its doctrine to the West through *Caesarius of Arles. The Vision of St. Diadochus Bishop of Photice in Epirus is mystical in content: St. *John the Baptist talks to Diadochus about the familiarity with God's word (theology in a restricted sense) that he gained in the silence of the hermitage, and thus he was able to hear the Father's voice at the Jordan, not emitted by an organ of speech,

